command of all the provinces of Aſia Minor. He was a very young man to be intruſted with ſo much power, for, being born after his father's acceſſion to the crown, he could not have been above ſixteen years old when he received this important commiſſion. But as he was the darling of his mother Paryſatis, who had an abſolute ſway over the king her huſband, ſhe obtained this command for him, with a view to put him in a condition to contend for the crown after his father's death; and this uſe he accordingly made of it, to the great diſturbance of the whole empire, as we ſhall ſee hereafter [w]. On his receiving his commiſſion he was ordered to aſſiſt the Lacedæmonians againſt the Athenians, countrary to the wiſe meaſures obſerved by Tiſſaphernes, who, by ſometimes helping one ſide and ſometimes the other, had ſo ballanced matters between them, that they continued to haraſs each other, without being at leiſure to diſturb the Perſians, who had ſo long been the common enemies of both. This order given, Cyrus ſoon diſcovered the weakneſs of the king's politics. For the Lacedæmonians having, with the aſſiſtance given them by Cyrus, ſoon overpowered the Athenians, ſent firſt Thimbro, and after him Dercyllidas, and at laſt Ageſilaus their king to invade the Perſian provinces in Aſia, where they made great conqueſts, and would have endangered the whole empire, had not Darius, by diſtributing large ſums of money among the demagogues or governors of the Greek cities, found means to rekindle the war in Greece, which obliged the Lacedæmonians to recall their troops for their own defence [x].

Cyrus having put to death two noble Perſians, ſons to a ſiſter of Darius, for no other reaſon, but becauſe they had not, in meeting him, wrapt up their hands in their ſleeves, as was cuſtomary among the Perſians in the preſence of their kings, Darius recalled him to court, on pretence that he was indiſpoſed and deſired to ſee him. Cyrus, well knowing how great an aſcendant his mother had over the king, prepared for his journey; but before he ſet out he ordered ſuch large ſubſidies to be ſent to Lyſander general of the Lacedæmonians, as enabled him to gain that memorable victory over the Athenians at the Goats-river on the Helleſpont, which put an end to the Athenian power and the Peloponneſian war, after it had laſted twenty-ſeven years [y]. Darius was highly incenſed againſt Cyrus, not only on account of the death of his two nephews, but becauſe he had preſumed to challenge honours that were due only to the king: and therefore deſigned to deprive him of his government. But upon his arrival the queen not only reconciled his father to him, but uſed all her art to have him declared heir to the crown, by reaſon he was born after his father's acceſſion to the throne, which had given the preference to Xerxes in the reign of Darius Hyſtaſpis. Darius could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with her requeſt; but, however, bequeathed him the government of thoſe provinces which he ruled before. Not long after Darius Nothus died, after he had reigned nineteen years, and was ſucceeded by Arſaces his eldeſt ſon by Paryſatis, who on his aſcending the throne took the name of Artaxerxes, and was for his extraordinary memory called by the Greeks Mnemon, that is Remember-er. While he was attending his father on his death-bed, he deſired to be informed by what art he had ſo happily managed the government, that by following the ſame rule he might be bleſſed with the like ſucceſs. The dying king gave him this memorable anſwer, that he had ever done, to the beſt of his knowledge, what religion and juſtice required, without ſwerving from the one or the other [z].

[w] Xenoph. Hellen. l. i. Plutarch. in Artax. & Lyſandro. Juſtin, l. v. c. 5. Diodor. l. xiii. p. 368. [x] Xenoph. Diodor. Juſtin, ibid. Thucyd. l. ii. Plutarch. in Lyſandro.

Darius Nothus dies. Year of the flood 2594. Before Chriſt 405.

Artaxerxes Mnemon.

UPON the death of Darius his ſon Artaxerxes went to Paſargada, to be there inaugurated after the Perſian cuſtom by the prieſts of Bellona. He was no ſooner arrived there, but he was informed by one of the prieſts, that his brother Cyrus had formed a conſpiracy againſt him, with a deſign to murder him in the very temple. Upon this information Cyrus was ſeized and ſentenced to death. But his mother Paryſatis prevailed upon the king, not only to ſave his life, but to ſend him back to the government of Aſia Minor, which his father had left him [a].

ARTAXERXES was no ſooner ſettled on the throne, but Statira his queen, whom he was very fond of on account of her extraordinary beauty, employed her power with him to the utter ruin of Udiaſtes, who had killed her brother Teriteuchmes. This quarrel had its riſe in the reign of of Darius, and the whole was a complication of adultery, inceſt, and murder, which raiſed great diſturbances in the royal family, and ended in the ruin of all who were concerned in it. Statira was daughter to Hydarnes a Perſian lord, and governor of one of the chief provinces of the empire. Artaxerxes, then called Arſaces, falling in love with her, married her, and at the ſame time Teriteuchmes her brother married Hameſtris, one of the daughters of Darius and ſiſter to Arſaces, by reaſon of which marriage he was appointed on his father's death to ſucceed him in his government. But falling in love with his own ſiſter Roxana, no ways inferior in beauty to Statira, that he might without any conſtraint enjoy her, he reſolved to diſpatch his wife Hameſtris, and raiſe a rebellion in the kingdom. Darius being acquainted with his wicked deſigns engaged Udiaſtes, an intimate friend of Teriteuchmes, to murder him, which he did accordingly, and was rewarded by the king with the government of his province. Mithridates, the ſon of Udiaſtes, who was one of Teriteuchmes's guards and greatly attached to his maſter, hearing that his father had committed this murder, uttered all manner of imprecations againſt him, and, to ſhew his abhorrence of ſo vile an action, ſeized on the city of Zaris, and openly revolting declared for the ſon of Teriteuchmes. Mithridates was by the king's forces blocked up in the city of Zaris, and with him the ſon of Teriteuchmes; all the reſt of the family of Hydarnes were apprehended and delivered to Paryſatis to execute her revenge upon them, for all the ill uſage done or intended againſt her daughter. That cruel princeſs began with Roxana, whoſe beauty had been the occaſion of all this miſchief, and cauſed her to be ſawed in two, the others were all beheaded except Statira, whom ſhe ſpared at the earneſt entreaties and thro' the importunate tears of her huſband Arſaces, contrary to the opinion of Darius, who told her, that ſhe would afterwards have occaſion to repent it. Thus the caſe ſtood at the death of Darius. But Arſaces was no ſooner ſettled on the throne, than Statira prevailed upon him to deliver Udiaſtes into her hands; whereupon ſhe cauſed his tongue to be drawn out at his neck, and made him die in the moſt exquiſite torments ſhe could invent, in revenge of the part he had acted in the ruin of her family. His ſon Mithridates ſhe appointed governor of his province, for the attachment he had ſhewn to Teriteuchmes. But Paryſatis, bitterly reſenting, senting this fact, poisoned the son of Teriteuchmes, and not long after Statira herself, as we shall hereafter relate [b].

[y] Xenoph. Hellen. l. ii. Plutarch. in Lyſandro. Diodor. l. xii.
[z] Plutarch. in Artaxerxe. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Juſtin, l. v. c. 8. & 11. Athenæus, l. xii. [a] Plutarch. in Artax. Xenoph. de exped. Cyri. l. 5. Juſtin. l. 1. c. 5. 11.

Cyrus, returning to his government of Asia Minor, full of resentment for the sentence of death, which his brother had pronounced against him, resolved to revolt and use his utmost endeavours to drive him from the throne. With this view he employed Clearchus a Lacedæmonian general to raise a body of Greek troops for his service, under pretence of a war which the Lacedæmonians were to carry into Thrace. Alcibiades the Athenian, being well apprised of the true end for which these levies were made, passed over into the province of Pharnabazus, with a design to proceed from thence to the Persian court, and acquaint Artaxerxes with the whole scheme. Had he arrived there, a discovery of such importance had without all doubt procured him the favour of that prince, and the assistance he wanted for the re-establishment of his country. But the partisans of the Lacedæmonians, at Athens, that is the thirty tyrants, fearing the negotiations of so superior a genius, found means to induce Pharnabazus to put him to death, whereby the Athenians lost the great hopes they had conceived of speedily recovering their former state [c].

Cyrus designs a war against his brother. Year of the flood 2596. Before Christ 403.

The cities that were under the government of Tissaphernes revolted from him to Cyrus. This incident, which was the effect of the secret practices of that prince, gave birth to a war between them. Cyrus, under pretence of arming against Tissaphernes, assembled troops openly, and, to amuse the court more speciously, made grievous complaints to the king against that governor, demanding his protection and assistance in the most submissive manner. Artaxerxes, being deceived by these appearances, believed, that all Cyrus's preparations were designed only against Tissaphernes, and, not being displeased that they should be at variance with each other, suffered him to raise what forces he pleased [d].

The young prince lost no time on his side, and hastened the execution of his great design. As he had assisted the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, and put them in a condition of gaining those victories which made them masters of Greece, he thought he might safely disclose to them his design, and ask their assistance for the accomplishing of it. The Lacedæmonians readily granted him his demand, demand, dispatching immediately orders to their fleet to join that of the prince, and to obey in all things the command of Tamos his admiral. But they took care not to mention Artaxerxes, pretending not to be privy to the designs that were carrying on against him. This precaution they used, that in case Artaxerxes should get the better of his brother, they might justify themselves to him for what they had done [e].

[b] Ctes. in Pers. [c] Xenoph de exped. Cyr. l. 1. Plut. in Artax. [d] Xenoph. ubi supra. Plut. in Artax.

The army, which Cyrus had raised, consisted of 13000 Greeks, who were the flower of his army, and 100,000 regular troops of other nations. Clearchus the Lacedæmonian commanded all the Peloponnesian troops, except the Achæans, who were led by Socrates of Achaia. The Bœotians were under Proxenus, a Theban, and the Thessalians under Menon. The other nations were commanded by Persian generals, of whom the chief was Ariæus. The fleet consisted of 35 ships under Pythagoras a Lacedæmonian, and 25 commanded by Tamos an Egyptian, admiral of the whole fleet [f]. Cyrus opened his design to none of the Greeks except Clearchus, fearing the boldness of the enterprise might disencourage the officers as well as the soldiers. Proxenus, between whose family and Xenophon's an ancient friendship subsisted, presented that young Athenian to Cyrus, who received him favourably, and gave him a commission among the Greek mercenaries [g]. Cyrus, having at length got all things ready, set out from Sardis, directing his march towards the upper parts of Asia, the troops neither knowing where, nor in what war, they were to be employed: For Cyrus had only given out, that he was marching against the Pisidians, who with frequent incursions harassed his province. However, Tissaphernes, judging these preparations to be too great for so small an enterprise, set out with all possible expedition from Miletus to give the king a true account of them. Artaxerxes, being now well apprised of his brother's designs, assembled a numerous army to receive him. In the mean time, Cyrus advancing with long marches arrived at the straits of Cilicia, where he found Syennesis, king of that country, prepared to dispute his passage; wherein he would have easily succeeded, had he not been obliged to abandon that important pass, to defend his own territories against Tamos mos and the Lacedæmonians fleet which appeared upon the coaſts [h].

[e] Xenoph. ubi supra. Plutarch, ibid. Justin, l. v. c. 11.
[f] Xenoph. ubi. supra. p. 252.
[g] Xenoph. l. ii. p. 294.

When they arrived at Tarſus the Greeks refuſed to proceed any farther, ſuſpecting that they were marching againſt the king, and proteſting, that they did not enter into the ſervice upon that condition. Clearchus at firſt made uſe of his authority to quell the tumult, but with very ill ſucceſs; and therefore deſiſting from force he pretended to enter into their views, and adviſed them to ſend deputies to Cyrus, to know from his own mouth againſt whom they were to be employed. By this artful evaſion he appeaſed the tumult, and was himſelf choſen for one of the deputies. Cyrus, whom he had acquainted before-hand with what had happened, anſwered, that he was going to attack Abrocomas, who was at twelve days march diſtance encamped on the banks of the Euphrates. The Greeks plainly ſaw that this was not his true deſign, but nevertheleſs ſhewed themſelves willing to proceed, on condition that their pay was increaſed. This Cyrus willingly granted, and having gained their affections during the march, by treating them with extraordinary kindneſs and humanity, he at laſt declared that he marched againſt Artaxerxes. Upon this ſome complaints were heard at firſt, but they ſoon gave way to expreſſions of joy and ſatisfaction, occaſioned by that prince's magnificent promiſes to the army [i].

Cyrus arriving, after a long march, in the plains of Cunaxa in the province of Babylon, found there Artaxerxes with an army of 900,000 men ready to engage him. Whereupon, leaping out of his chariot, he ordered his troops to ſtand to their arms and fall into their ranks, which was done with great expedition, he not allowing them time to refreſh themſelves. Clearchus adviſed Cyrus not to charge in perſon, but to remain in the rear of the Greek battalions. This advice Cyrus rejected with indignation, ſaying, that he would not render himſelf unworthy of the crown for which he was fighting. As the king's army drew near, the Greeks fell upon them with ſuch fury, that the wing oppoſite to them, was at the very firſt onſet, put to flight; whereupon Cyrus was, with loud ſhouts of joy, proclaimed king by thoſe who ſtood round him. But he in the mean time perceiving, that Artaxerxes was wheeling about to attack him in flank, advanced againſt him with 600 choſen horſe, killed Artagerſes, captain

[h] Idem, l. i. p. 241——261. [i] Xenoph. & Plut. ibid.

tain of the king's guards, with his own hand, and put the whole body to flight. In this encounter diſcovering his brother, he cried out, I ſee him, and ſpurring on his horſe engaged him with great reſolution, which in ſome degree turned the battle into a ſingle combat, each of the two brothers endeavouring to aſſure himſelf of the crown by the death of his rival. Cyrus killed his brother's horſe, and wounded him on the ground; but he immediately mounted another, when Cyrus attacked him again, gave him a ſecond wound, and had already lifted up his hand to give him a third, which the king's guards obſerving, they all diſcharged their arrows, aiming at him alone, and he at the ſame time throwing himſelf headlong upon the king was run through by his javelin and pierced with innumerable arrows. He fell dead upon the ſpot, and all the chief lords of his court, reſolving not to ſurvive their maſter, were killed in the place where he fell; a certain proof, ſays Xenophon, that he well knew how to chuſe his friends, and that he was truely beloved by them. Some writers tells us, that Cyrus, was killed by a Carian ſoldier. Mithridates, a young Perſian nobleman, boaſted that he had given him the mortal blow with his javelin, which entered his temple, and pierced his head quite through. Artaxerxes, after having cauſed his head and right hand to be cut off, purſued the enemy to their camp, and there poſſeſſed himſelf of great part of their baggage and proviſions. The Greeks had defeated the king's left wing commanded by Tiſſaphernes, and the king's right wing, commanded by himſelf, had routed the enemies left; and as neither knew what had happened elſewhere, both parties believed they had gained the day. But Tiſſaphernes acquainting the king that his men had been put to flight by the Greeks, he immediately rallied his troops in order to attack them. The Greeks under the command of Clearchus eaſily repulſed them, and purſued them to the neighbouring hills. As night was drawing near, the Greeks halted at the foot of the hill, much ſurpriſed that neither Cyrus himſelf nor any meſſenger from him appeared, for they yet knew nothing of his death, or the defeat of the reſt of the army. They determined therefore to return to their camp, which they did accordingly; but found there that the greateſt part of their baggage had been plundered, and all their proviſions taken, which obliged them to paſs the night in the camp without any ſort of refreſhment. The next morning, as they were ſtill expecting to hear from Cyrus, they received the ſad news of his death, and the defeat of that

Cyrus ſlain. Year of the flood 2598. Before Chriſt 401.

that part of the army. Whereupon they ſent deputies to Ariæus, who had retired to the place whence they had marched the day before the action, offering him as conquerors the crown of Perſia in the room of Cyrus. Ariæus rejected the offer, and acquainted them that he intended to ſet out early the next morning on his return to Ionia, adviſing them to join him in the night. They followed his directions, and under the conduct of Clearchus began their march, and arrived at his camp about midnight, whence they ſet out on their return to Greece [k]. They were at a vaſt diſtance from their own country, in the very heart of the Perſian empire, ſurrounded by a numerous and conquering army, and had no way to return again into Greece, but by forcing their retreat through an immenſe tract of the enemies country. But their valour and reſolution maſtered all theſe difficulties; and in ſpight of a powerful army, which purſued and haraſſed them all the way, they made a retreat of 2325 miles through provinces belonging to the enemy, and got ſafe to the Greek cities on the Euxine ſea. This was the longeſt march and moſt memorable retreat that ever was made through an enemy's country. Clearchus had the conduct of it firſt, but he being cut off by the treachery of Tiſſaphernes, Xenophon was choſen in his room, and to his valour and wiſdom it was chiefly owing, that at length they got ſafe into Greece. As the ſame Xenophon has given a minute account of this expedition, and the retreat of the Greeks from the place of the battle to their own country, we ſhall refer the reader to that inimitable performance, and return to what paſſed in the court of Artaxerxes after the battle of Cunaxa.

As he believed that he had killed Cyrus with his own hand, and looked upon that as the moſt glorious action of his own life, to diſpute that honour with him was wounding him in the moſt tender part. Being therefore informed, that the Carian ſoldier, whom we have mentioned above, laid claim to that glory, he cauſed him to be delivered to Paryſatis, who had ſworn the deſtruction of all thoſe who were any ways concerned in the death of her ſon. She made that unhappy wretch ſuffer the moſt exquiſite torments ſhe could invent during ten days, and then put him to a moſt cruel death. Mithridates likewiſe, having boaſted that it was he who gave Cyrus his mortal wound, was was treated in the manner we have deſcribed, where we ſpoke of the puniſhments uſed among the Perſians. Maſabates, one of the king's eunuchs, who by his order had cut off the head and hand of Cyrus, being delivered to Paryſatis, was flead alive, and his ſkin ſtretched before his eyes upon two ſtakes prepared for that purpoſe. Nor did the cruelty and reſentment of Paryſatis ſtop here; for having conceived an implacable hatred againſt Statira for reproaching her, as if ſhe had countenanced her ſon Cyrus's revolt againſt his brother, that revengeful woman poiſoned her own daughter-in-law in the following manner. Paryſatis, feigning to be reconciled to her, invited her one night to ſupper, and a certain bird being ſerved up, which was a great rarity among thePerſians, ſhe divided it between Statira and herſelf with a knife which was poiſoned on one ſide only: the ſound part ſhe immediately eat, which encouraged Statira, though upon her guard, to eat the other; whereupon ſhe was that inſtant ſeized with horrible convulſions and died in a few hours. Artaxerxes being greatly afflicted for the loſs of his beloved wife, and ſuſpecting his mother, cauſed all her domeſtics to be put to the rack, when Gygis one of her confidents diſcovered the whole. Artaxerxes cauſed Gygis, who was privy to the crime, to be put to a cruel death, and confined his mother to Babylon, telling her, that he would never ſet his foot within the gates of that city while ſhe was there; but at length, time having alleviated his grief, he allowed her to return to court, where, by an entire ſubmiſſion to his will, ſhe regained his favour, and bore a great ſway at court to her death [1].

[k] Xenoph. ibid, 272—292. Diodor. l. xiv. p. 255—257.

The Lacedæmonians make war upon the Perſians. Year of the flood 2509. Before Chriſt 400

AFTER the death of Cyrus, Tiſſaphernes being ſent back to his former government, and moreover inveſted with the ſame power which had been given to Cyrus, he began to haraſs and oppreſs the Greek cities, that were within the verge of his authority and had ſided with that unfortunate prince. Whereupon they ſent embaſſadors to the Lacedæmonians imploring their aſſiſtance and protection. The Lacedæmonians, having now ended the long war which they had waged with the Athenians, laid hold of this opportunity of breaking again with the Perſians, and ſent Thimbro with an army againſt them, which being ſtrengthened by the conjunction of thoſe forces that Xenophon brought back from Perſia, they took the field againſt Tiſſaphernes. But Thimbro being ſoon recalled upon upon ſome complaints and ſent into baniſhment, Dercyllidas was appointed to ſucceed him. As he was both a brave general and a famous engineer, he was attended with far better ſucceſs than his predeceſſor. Upon his firſt arrival finding that Tiſſaphernes and Pharnabazus, governors of the two neighbouring provinces, were at variance with each other, he made a truce with the former, and marching againſt the latter with all his forces drove him quite out of Æolis and ſeveral cities of other provinces. Pharnabazus, fearing he might invade Phrygia the chief province of his government, was glad to make a truce with him, leaving him in poſſeſſion of what he had taken. Upon this truce he marched into Bithynia, where he took up his winter quarters to avoid being chargeable to his allies. At the ſame time Pharnabazus took a journey to the Perſian court, and there made loud complaints againſt Tiſſaphernes, for concluding a peace with Dercyllidas inſtead of aſſiſting him againſt the common enemy. He likewiſe earneſtly preſſed the king to equip a great fleet, and appoint Conon the Athenian, then an exile in Cyprus, admiral, telling him, that as Conon was the beſt ſea-commander of his time, he might by that means obſtruct the paſſage of all farther recruits from Greece, and ſoon put an end to the power of the Lacedæmonians in Aſia. His propoſal was approved of by the king, who immediately ordered 500 talents to be paid him for the equipment of a fleet, with inſtructions to give Conon the command of it [m].

[1] Plutarch. in Artax.

In the mean time, Dercyllidas, having reduced Atarna, marched into Caria, where Tiſſaphernes uſually reſided. For the Lacedæmonians, believing that, if he were attacked there, he would comply with all their demands, in order to ſave that province, had ſent Dercyllidas expreſs orders to march thither. This Tiſſaphernes and Pharnabazus no ſooner heard, but they united againſt Dercyllidas, whom they came up with in ſo diſadvantageous a poſt, that had they charged him immediately, he muſt inevitably have periſhed. Pharnabazus was for attacking him, but Tiſſaphernes, who at the battle of Cunaxa had experienced their valour, could not be brought to venture an engagement; but ſent heralds to Dercyllidas to invite him to a parley, in which propoſals for a peace being offered on both ſides, they made a truce till the anſwer of their reſpective ſpective maſters ſhould be known. Thus Dercyllidas and his army were ſaved from utter deſtruction, through the cowardice of his enemy, when nothing elſe could have delivered them [n].

[m] Diodor. l. xiv. p. 417. Juſtin. l. vi. c. 8. Pauſan. in Atticis.

In the mean time the Lacedæmonians, receiving accounts from Aſia, that the king of Perſia was equipping a powerful fleet on the coaſts of Phænice, Syria, and Cilicia, and ſuppoſing it to be deſigned, as it truly was, againſt them, reſolved to ſend Ageſilaus, one of their kings, into Aſia, in order to make a diverſion. All things being ready for this expedition, Ageſilaus ſet ſail with a conſiderable body of troops, and arrived at Epheſus before any of the king's officers had the leaſt intimation of this deſign; with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition was the whole managed at Sparta. Ageſilaus upon his arrival took the field with 10,000 foot, and 4000 horſe, and, finding no body in a condition to oppoſe him, carried all before him. Whereupon Tiſſaphernes ſent a meſſenger to enquire for what end he was come into Aſia, and why he had taken up arms. Ageſilaus replied, that he was come to aſſiſt the Greeks inhabiting Aſia, and reſtore them to their antient liberty. Tiſſaphernes, being quite unprepared for a war, aſſured Ageſilaus, that his maſter would grant him what he demanded, provided, he committed no acts of hoſtility till the return of an expreſs which he had ſent to court. Ageſilaus believed him, and a truce was agreed on and ſworn to on both ſides. But Tiſſaphernes, without any regard to his oath, made no other uſe of this truce than to aſſemble troops on all ſides, and ſend to the king for more forces, and aſſoon as he received them, he ſent word to Ageſilaus to depart Aſia, denouncing war againſt him in caſe of refuſal. This meſſage greatly alarmed the Lacedæmonians and their confederates, as not believing themſelves in a condition to oppoſe the now numerous army of Tiſſaphernes, who had been joined by auxiliaries from all parts of the Perſian empire. As for Ageſilaus himſelf, he heard Tiſſaphernes's heralds with a gay and eaſy air, and deſired them to tell their maſter, that he was under great obligations to him, for having made the gods by his perjury enemies to Perſia and friends to Greece. Having with this anſwer diſmiſſed the heralds, he drew all his forces together, and made a feint, as if he intended to invade Caria; but but aſſoon as he underſtood, that Tiſſaphernes had cauſed all his troops to march into that province, he turned ſhort and fell upon Phrygia. As his coming thither was wholly unexpected, he over-ran great part of that province without any oppoſition, took many towns, and, loaded with an immenſe booty, marched back by the ſea-coaſt into Ionia, and wintered at Epheſus [o].

Ageſilaus paſſes into Aſia.

Year of the flood 2603. Before Chriſt 396.

[n] Diodor. ibid. Xenoph. Hellen. l. iii.

EARLY in the ſpring Ageſilaus took the field, and gave out, that his deſign was to invade Lydia. But Tiſſaphernes, who had not forgot the ſtratagem of the former campaign, took it for granted, that he now truly intended to fall upon Caria, and accordingly made his troops march to the defence of that province. But Ageſilaus led his army, as he had given out, into Lydia, and approached Sardis. Whereupon Tiſſaphernes recalled his forces from their former rout, with a deſign to relieve the place. But Caria being a very mountainous country and unfit for horſe, he had marched thither only with the foot, and left the horſe behind on the borders of that province. Whence, on their marching back to the relief of Sardis, the horſe being ſome days marches before the foot, Ageſilaus took the advantage of ſo favourable an opportunity, and fell upon them before the foot could come up to their aſſiſtance. The Perſians were routed at the very firſt onſet, and Ageſilaus, becomeing by this victory maſter of the field, over-ran the whole country, and enriched both himſelf and his army with the ſpoils of the conquered Perſians [p].

Tiſſaphernes put to death.

THE loſs of this battle greatly incenſed the king againſt Tiſſaphernes, and encreaſed the ſuſpicion which he had before conceived of him, as if he had ſomething elſe in view beſides his maſter's intereſt. At the ſame time, Conon, arriving at the Perſian court, heighten'd the king's diſpleaſure with new complaints againſt him; for he had deprived the ſoldiers on board Conon's fleet of their pay, and thereby diſabled him from doing the king any ſervice. Queen Paryſatis, actuated by an irreconcileable hatred againſt all thoſe who had any ſhare in the death of her ſon Cyrus, did not fail on this occaſion to aggravate the charges brought againſt him. Hereupon the king reſolved to put him to death, but being afraid to attack him openly, by reaſon of the great authority he had in Aſia, he charged ed Tithrauſtes, captain of the guards, with that important commiſſion, giving him, at the ſame time, two letters; the one directed to Tiſſaphernes, and impowering him to purſue the war againſt the Greeks in what manner he thought beſt; the other was addreſſed to Ariæus, governor of Lariſſa, commanding him to aſſiſt Tithrauſtes, with his counſel and all his forces, in ſeizing Tiſſaphernes. Upon the receipt of this letter, Ariæus deſired Tiſſaphernes to come to him, that they might confer together about the operations of the enſuing campaign. Tiſſaphernes, who ſuſpected nothing, went to him with a guard only of 300 men. But while he was bathing, according to the Perſian cuſtom, and diſarmed, he was ſeized and put into the hands of Tithrauſtes, who cauſed his head to be ſtruck off and ſent into Perſia. The king gave it to Paryſatis, an acceptable preſent to one of her revengeful temper [q].

[o] Xenoph. Heilenic. l. iii. Plut. & Cor. Nep. in Ageſilao.
[p] Xenoph. ibid. p. 501——657. Plut. in Artax. p. 1022. & in Ageſil. p. 601.

Upon the death of Tiſſaphernes, Tithrauſtes, who was appointed to ſucceed him, ſent great preſents to Ageſilaus, telling him, that the cauſe of the war being removed, and the firſt author of all their differences put to death, nothing could prevent an accommodation; that the king his maſter would allow the Greek cities in Aſia to enjoy their liberty, paying him the cuſtomary tribute, which was all that the Lacedæmonians required when they firſt began the war. Ageſilaus replied, that he could not come to any agreement without orders from Sparta. However, as he was willing to give Tithrauſtes the ſatisfaction of removing out of his province, he marched into Phrygia, which was the province of Pharnabazus, Tithrauſtes paying him thirty talents to defray the charges of his march. Upon his march he received a letter from the magiſtrates of Sparta, giving him the command of the fleet as well as of the land-forces. By this new commiſſion he was appointed ſole commander of all the troops in Aſia, both by ſea and land. This drew him down to the ſea-coaſt, where he put the fleet in good order, and appointed Piſander, his wife's brother, admiral, ordering him forthwith to put to ſea. In this he was more influenced by private affection for his brother-in-law, than by the due regard he ought to have had for the public good; for though Piſander was a man of great courage and valour, yet he was not in other reſpects equal to that truſt, as the event ſufficiently proved [r].

[q] Xenoph. ubi ſupra. Diodor. l. xiv. p. 220. Polyæn. ſtratag. l. vii. [r] Pauſan. in Laconicis. Xenoph. & Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

AGESILAUS, having ſettled the maritime affairs, purſued his deſign of invading Phrygia, where he reduced many cities, and amaſſed great ſums of money, maintaining his army on the territories of Pharnabazus in great affluence. From thence he marched into Paphlagonia, being invited thither by Spithridates, a noble Perſian, who had revolted from the king. There he concluded a league with Cotys, king of that country, and returning into Phrygia took the ſtrong city of Daſcylium, and wintered there in the palace of Pharnabazus, obliging the adjacent countries to ſupply his army with all ſorts of proviſions [s]. Tithrauſtes, finding that Ageſilaus was for carrying on the war in Aſia, ſent Timocrates of Rhodes into Greece, with large ſums of money, to corrupt the leading men in their cities, and rekindle a war againſt the Lacedæmonians. This ſtratagem produced the intended effect, for the cities of Thebes, Argos, Corinth, and others entering into confederacy, obliged the Lacedæmonians to recal their king, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place. In the beginning of the next ſpring as Ageſilaus was ready to take the field, Pharnabazus invited him to an interview, and he accepting the invitation, Pharnabazus, after expatiating on the ſervices he had done the Lacedæmonians in their war with the Athenians, reproached them with ingratitude, ſince, in return for ſo many favours, they had pillaged his palace, and ravaged his lands at Daſcylium, which were his hereditary eſtate. As what he ſaid was true, Ageſilaus and the Lacedæmonians, that attended him, were to ſuch a degree aſhamed, in ſeeing themſelves ſo juſtly upbraided with ingratitude, that they knew not what to anſwer, nor how to excuſe ſuch an ungenerous proceeding. However, to make him the beſt amends they could, they obliged themſelves, by a ſolemn promiſe, not to invade any of the provinces under his government, ſo long as there were others into which they might carry the war againſt the Perſian king. They were as good as their word, and immediately withdrew with a deſign to invade the upper parts of Aſia, and proſecute the war in the very heart of the Perſian empire.

Ageſilaus recalled.

Year of the flood 2605. Before Chriſt 394.

But while Ageſilaus was projecting this expedition, a meſſenger arrived at the camp from Sparta, acquainting him, that the Ephori recalled him to defend his own country, againſt which ſeveral ſtates of Greece had formed a ſtrong confederacy. He readily complied with this order, and made made all the haſte thither he could, complaining at his departure, that the Perſians had driven him out of Aſia with 30,000 archers, alluding to the Perſian Darics, which were pieces of gold ſtamped on one ſide with the figure of an archer [t].

[s] Plut. in Ageſil. Xenoph. Hellenic. l. iv. p. 507. 510.

Conon, on his return from the Perſian court, having brought money enough to pay the ſoldiers and mariners their arrears, and ſupply the fleet with arms and proviſions, took Pharnabazus on board, and forthwith ſet ſail in queſt of the enemies. The Perſian fleet conſiſted of 90 veſſels and upwards; that of the Lacedæmonians was not ſo numerous, but their ſhips were larger. They came in view of each other near Cnidos, a maritime city of Aſia Minor. Conon, who had in ſome meaſure occaſioned the taking of Athens by loſing the ſea-fight at Ægoſpotamos, or the Goats-river, was determined to uſe his utmoſt efforts in order to retrieve that misfortune, and efface, by a glorious victory, the diſgrace of his former defeat. On the other hand, Piſander was deſirous to juſtify by his conduct and valour the choice which Ageſilaus, his brother-in-law, had made, in appointing him admiral. In effect, he behaved with extraordinary courage, and had at firſt ſome advantage. But Conon having boarded his ſhip and killed him with his own hand, the reſt of the fleet betook themſelves to flight. Conon purſued them, took fifty of their ſhips, and, having gained a complete victory, put an end to the power of the Lacedæmonians in thoſe parts. The conſequence of this victory was a general revolt of all the allies of Sparta; ſome declaring for the Athenians, and others reſuming their antient liberty. After this battle the empire of the Lacedæmonians declined daily, till at length the over-throws, which they received at Leuctra, and Mantinea, completed their downfal [u].

The Lacedæmonians defeated at Cnidos.

After this victory Conon and Pharnabazus being maſters at ſea, ſailed round the iſlands and coaſts of Aſia, reducing the cities, which in thoſe parts were ſubject to the Lacedæmonians. Seſtus and Abydus were the only two cities that held out againſt them. Pharnabazus attacked them by land, and Conon by ſea; but neither ſucceeding in the attempt, the former on the approach of winter retired home, leaving Conon to take care of the fleet, and ſtrengthen it with as many ſhips as he could aſſemble, from the cities on the Helleſpont, againſt the enſuing ſpring [x].

[t] Xenoph ubi ſupra. p. 513. Plut. in Ageſil. p. 603, 604.
[u] Xenoph. ubi ſupra. p. 518. Diodor. l. xiv. p. 302, Juſtin. l. vi. c. 2, 3.

CONON having aſſembled, purſuant to his commiſſion, a powerful fleet againſt the time appointed, he took Pharnabazus again on board, and ſteering his courſe thro' the iſlands, landed in Melos the moſt diſtant of them all. Having reduced this iſland, as lying very convenient for the invading of Laconia, the country of the Lacedæmonians, he made from thence a deſcent on the coaſts of that province, pillaged all the martimie places, and loaded his fleet with an immenſe booty. After this, Pharnabazus returning to his government of Phrygia, Conon obtained leave of him to repair to Athens with 80 ſhips and 50 talents, in order to rebuild the walls of that city, having firſt convinced him, that nothing could more effectually contribute to the weakening of Sparta, than putting Athens again in a condition to rival its power. He no ſooner arrived at Piræus, the port of Athens, but he began the work, which, as he had a great number of hands and was ſeconded by the zeal of all thoſe that were well inclined to the Athenians, was ſoon compleated, and the city not only reſtored to its former ſplendor, but rendered more formidable than ever to its enemies. Thus Athens was rebuilt by the Perſians, who had deſtroyed it, and fortified at the expence and with the ſpoils of the Lacedæmonians, who had diſmantled it. Conon, having rebuilt the walls of the city, of the port, and thoſe which led from the former to the latter, and were called the Long-walls, diſtributed the 50 talents, which he had received of Pharnabazus, among his citizens, and offered the gods a ſacrifice of an hundred oxen, in thankſgiving for the happy re-eſtabliſhment of his native country [y].

Conon rebuilds the walls of Athens. Year of the flood 3606. Before Chriſt 393.

THE Lacedæmonians could not behold without great concern ſo glorious a revolution, and finding themſelves unable to maintain a war, with men as brave as themſelves, aſſiſted with the treaſures of Perſia, diſpatched Antalcidas, one of their citizens, to Tiribazus, governor of Sardis, enjoining him to conclude a peace with Artaxerxes upon the moſt advantageous terms he could. The other cities of Greece, in alliance with the Athenians, ſent at the ſame time their deputies, and Conon was at the head of thoſe from Athens. The terms, which Antalcidas propoſed, were, that the king ſhould poſſeſs all the Greek cities in Aſia;

[x] Xenoph. ibid. p. 534. Diodor. l. xiv. p. 441. [y] Xenoph. & Diodor. ibid.

Aſia; but the iſlands and other cities in Greece ſhould enjoy their liberty, and be governed by their own laws. As theſe propoſals were very advantageous to the king, and diſhonourable to the Greeks in general, the other embaſſadors were all unanimous in rejecting them. The Lacedæmonians, bearing an implacable hatred to Conon for the reſtoring of Athens, had charged Antalcidas to accuſe him to Tiribazus of having purloined the king's money for the carrying on of that work, and of having formed a deſign for the taking of Æolis and Ionia from the Perſians, and uniting them anew to the republic of Athens. Upon theſe accuſations Tiribazus ſeized him, and, having ſupplied the Lacedæmonians underhand with conſiderable ſums of money for the equipping of a fleet againſt the Athenians, ſet out for the Perſian court to give the king an account of his negotiations. Artaxerxes was well pleaſed with the terms which the Lacedæmonians had propoſed, and directed him to put the laſt hand to the treaty. At the ſame time, Tiribazus laid before the king the accuſations which the Lacedæmonians had brought againſt Conon. Whereupon he was, according to ſome writers [z], ſent to Suſa and there put to death by the king's command; but the ſilence of Xenophon, who was his cotemporary, as to his death, makes us doubt of the truth of this event [a].

WHILE Tiribazus was attending the court, Suthras was charged to guard the coaſts of Aſia in his abſence. On this occaſion obſerving the havock, which the Lacedæmonians had made in all the maritime provinces, he conceived ſuch an averſion to them, that he ſent what ſupplies he could ſpare to their enemies the Athenians. This obliged the Lacedæmonians to ſend Thimbro into Aſia to renew the war there; but, as they were not in a condition to ſupply him with men or money ſufficient for ſuch an undertaking, he was ſoon cut off, and his army diſperſed by the ſuperior power of the Perſians. Diphridas was ſent in his room to carry on the war with the ſcattered remains of his army; but was attended with no better ſucceſs, all their attempts upon Aſia, after the battle of Cnidus, being but faint ſtruggles of a declining power. In the mean time, Tiribazus returning from Suſa ſummoned all the deputies of the Greek cities to be preſent at the reading of the treaty, which had been already approved of by the king.

The peace of Altancidas. Year of the flood 2612. Before Chriſt 387.

[z] Cornel. Nep. in Cononе. Diodor. l. xiv. p. 442.

[a] Xenoph. ubi ſupra.

The terms were; that all the Greek cities in Aſia ſhould be ſubject to the king of Perſia, and beſides, the iſlands of Cyprus and Clazomeny; that the iſlands of Scæros, Lemnos, and Imbros ſhould be reſtored to the Athenians; and all the cities of Greece, whether ſmall or great, ſhould be declared free. By the ſame treaty Artaxerxes engaged to join thoſe who accepted the terms he propoſed, and aſſiſt them to the utmoſt of his power againſt ſuch as ſhould reject them. Theſe conditions were equally diſadvantageous and diſhonourable to the Grecian name; however, as Greece was extremely weakened and exhauſted by domeſtic diviſions, and therefore no-ways in a condition to carry on a war againſt ſo powerful a prince, they were all forced to ſwear to the treaty. This is called the peace of Antalcidas, for he was the firſt that propoſed it, giving up to the Perſians, with the utmoſt injuſtice and baſeneſs, all the Greeks ſettled in Aſia, for whoſe liberty Ageſilaus had ſo long contended [b].

Artaxerxes, being now quite diſengaged from the Grecian war, turned his whole power againſt Evagoras king of Cyprus, whom he had long before deſigned to drive out of that iſland, but had never been at leiſure to put his deſign in execution. Evagoras was deſcended from the antient kings of Salamine, the capital city of the iſland of Cyprus. His anceſtors had held that city for many ages in quality of ſovereigns; but were at laſt driven out by the Perſians, who, making themſelves maſters of the whole iſland, reduced it to a Perſian province. Evagoras, who was a man of extraordinary parts, not brooking to live in ſubjection to a foreign yoke, expelled Abdymon a Citian, governor of Salamine for the king of Perſia, and took poſſeſſion of his paternal kingdom. Artaxerxes attempted to recover that city, but being diverted by the Greek war, and finding Evagoras determined to hold out to the laſt, gave over, or rather put off, that enterprize. In the mean time, Conon, by means of Cteſias the Cnidian, who was chief phyſician to Artaxerxes, made up all differences between Evagoras and Artaxerxes, the latter promiſing not to moleſt him in the poſſeſſion of his ſmall kingdom. But Evagoras, who was every way qualified for great undertakings, could not content himſelf with the city of Salamine alone. He extended his dominions, and by degrees made himſelf maſter, in a manner, manner, of the whole iſland of Cyprus. The Amathuſians, Solians, and Citians, alone of thoſe Iſlanders, held out againſt him. Theſe had recourſe to Artaxerxes, who, becoming jealous of the power of this active and wiſe prince, promiſed them an immediate and powerful ſupport. But being employed elſewhere, he could not perform his promiſe ſo ſoon as he expected. Having at length concluded a peace with the Greeks, he bent all his force againſt Evagoras, determined to drive him quite out of the iſland. The Athenians, notwithſtanding the treaty of peace lately made with the Perſians, and the many favours received at their king's hands, could not forbear aſſiſting their old ally, who had befriended them on all occaſions. Having therefore equipped ten men of war, they ſent them, with all poſſible expedition, under the command of Philocrates to aſſiſt him. But the Lacedæmonian fleet, commanded by Teleutias, brother to Ageſilaus, falling in with them near the iſle of Rhodes, ſurrounded them, ſo that not one ſhip could eſcape [c]. The Athenians, determined to aſſiſt Evagoras at all adventures, ſent Chabrias with another fleet and a conſiderable number of land-forces on board to join him. This new ſupply arrived ſafe, and in a ſhort time obliged the whole iſland to ſubmit to Evagoras. But the Athenians being forced, by the articles of a new treaty concluded between Artaxerxes and the cities of Greece, to recal Chabrias, the Perſians attacked with all their forces the iſland of Cyprus, not doubting, but they ſhould ſoon reduce it, ſince no ſupplies could be ſent thither from Greece. The king's army conſiſted of 300,000 men, and his fleet of 300 ſhips. The land-forces were commanded by Orontes ſon-in-law to Artaxerxes, and the fleet by Gaus the ſon of Tamus, whom we have mentioned above. Tiribazus was commander in chief both of the ſea and land-forces. Evagoras, ſeeing himſelf threatened with ſo dreadful a war, had recourſe to all thoſe princes who were at enmity with the Perſians, receiving ſupplies, both of men and money, from the Egyptians, Lybians, Arabians, Tyrians, and other nations. Beſides, as he had amaſſed immenſe treaſures, he hired a great number of mercenaries of various nations. As he had a great many ſmall veſſels, he intercepted all the enemies ſhips that brought proviſions from the continent, and thereby reduced their numerous army, after their landing in the iſland, to ſuch ſtraits, that they began to mutiny, and and killed ſeveral of their officers. But the whole Perſian fleet putting to ſea, the army was again plentifully ſupplied from Cilicia. At the ſame time, Evagoras likewiſe received a great ſupply of corn and fifty ſhips from Egypt, which, together with thoſe he had fitted out himſelf, making up a fleet of 200 ſail, he advanced to attack the whole naval force of the Perſians. At firſt he had the advantage, and took or deſtroyed ſeveral of the enemies ſhips; but Gaus advancing with a few ſhips attacked him with ſuch vigor, that Evagoras was obliged to retire after an obſtinate reſiſtance. The reſt of the Perſian fleet, being encouraged by the example of their admiral, returned to the charge, and at laſt obtained a complete victory, driving the enemy's ſhips into their harbours. Evagoras with a few ſhips eſcaped to Salamine, where he was immediately cloſely beſieged both by ſea and land. After this victory Tiribazus went in perſon to acquaint the king with the ſucceſs that attended his arms in Cyprus, and having obtained 2000 talents for the uſe of the army, he returned with that new ſupply to carry on the war more vigorouſly than ever. During his abſence, Evagoras, leaving the defence of the city to his ſon Pythagoras, got through the enemies fleet in the dead of the night with ten ſhips and ſailed for Egypt, in hopes of engaging Achoris, king of that country, to join him with all his forces. But not obtaining from him the aid he expected, and finding on his return the city reduced to the laſt extremities, and himſelf deſtitute of all means of raiſing the ſiege, he was obliged to capitulate. The propoſals made to him were, that he ſhould abandon all the cities of Cyprus, except Salamine, which he ſhould hold of the king, as a ſervant of his lord, and pay an annual tribute. The extremity to which he was reduced obliged him to accept the other conditions, hard as they were, but he could by no means be brought to conſent to that of holding of Salamine, as a ſervant under his maſter, and perſiſted in declaring, that he would hold it no otherwiſe than as a king under a king. Tiribazus, who commanded in chief, would not make the leaſt alteration, nor abate any thing of his pretenſions; whereupon Evagoras, being determined to die ſword in hand rather than yield to ſuch terms, broke off the conference, and applied himſelf entirely to the defence of the city [d].

[b] Xenoph. l. v. p. 548—551. Diodor. ubi ſupra. p. 447

The Perſians invade Cyprus with 300,000 men. Year of the flood 2613. Before Chriſt 386.

[c] Xenoph. ubi ſupra. Diodor. l. xv. p. 459.

In

[d] Diodor. ubi ſupra.

In the mean time, Orontes, who commanded the land-forces, not being able to brook the ſuperiority which Tiribazus had over him, as being intruſted with the whole management of the war, and jealous of the ſucceſs that attended him, wrote ſecretly to court, accuſing him amongſt other things of forming deſigns againſt the king's intereſt, and holding a private correſpondence with the Lacedæmonians. Upon the receipt of theſe letters, Artaxerxes immediately diſpatched orders to Orontes to ſeize Tiribazus and ſend him priſoner to court, which being without delay put in execution, the chief command was conferred upon Orontes. But the army being very much diſſatified with the change, many left the ſervice, and others refuſed to obey their new commander. Whereupon Orontes was obliged to renew the treaty with Evagoras, and conclude it upon terms which Tiribazus had rejected; for he conſented, that he ſhould hold Salamine as king of that city, paying only a ſmall tribute to the king of Perſia. Thus the ſiege was raiſed, and a peace concluded with Evagoras, after a war which had coſt the Perſians above 50,000 talents, that is near ten millions of our money [e]. For the eulogy and character of this prince we refer the reader to Iſocrates.

The peace concluded with Evagoras did not put an end to the war in thoſe parts. For Gaus reſenting the unjuſt uſage of Tiribazus, whoſe daughter he had married, and fearing to be involved in the ſame proſecution with his father-in-law, and put to death on bare ſuſpicions, ſent deputies to Achoris king of Egypt, and having concluded an alliance with him againſt the king of Perſia, openly revolted, and was joined by a great part both of the fleet and army, moſt of the officers being intirely at his devotion. He likewiſe ſolicited the Lacedæmonians to come into the league, aſſuring them, that he in his turn would, at the end of the war, employ all his forces in their favour, and make them maſters of all Greece. They hearkened favourably to theſe propoſals, and embraced with joy ſuch an opportunity of making war upon the Perſians, being highly diſſatisfied with the peace of Antalcidas. But, before matters were ripe for execution, Gaus was treacherouſly ſlain by one of his own officers, and Tachos, who took upon him to carry on the ſame deſign, ſoon died; whereby the vaſt preparations they had made came came to nothing; and the Lacedæmonians never afterwards medled with the affairs of Aſia [f].

[e] Iſocrat. in Evag.

Artaxerxes invades the Caduſians with ill ſucceſs. Year of the flood 2615. Before Chriſt 384.

ARTAXERXES had no ſooner finiſhed the Cyprian war, but he entered upon another againſt the Caduſians, who perhaps had revolted, for authors are ſilent as to the occaſion of this war. This people inhabited the mountains between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas, and, being from their infancy inured to a hard and laborious life, were accounted a very warlike race. The king marched in perſon againſt them at the head of 300,000 foot and 20,000 horſe: But, the country by reaſon of its barrenneſs not affording proviſions ſufficient to maintain ſo numerous an army, they were ſoon reduced to feed upon the beaſts of burden which accompanied the army; and theſe became ſo ſcarce, that an aſs's head was ſold for ſixty drachmas. The king's proviſions too began to fall ſhort, and only a few horſes remained. In this ſad poſture of affairs, Tiribazus contrived a ſtratagem which ſaved the king and the army. He followed the court in this expedition, or rather was carried about as a priſoner, being in diſgrace by reaſon of the crimes laid to his charge by Orontes, as we have ſaid above. The Caduſians had two kings, who were encamped apart from each other. Tiribazus, who took care to be informed of all that paſſed in the enemy's camp, found, that there was ſome miſunderſtanding between them, and that the jealouſy and miſtruſt, which they had of each other, prevented their acting in concert. Whereupon he adviſed the king to enter into a treaty with them, and, taking upon himſelf the whole management of it, went in perſon to one of the kings, and ſent his ſon to the other. Each of them informed the king, to whom he applied, that the other had ſent embaſſadors to treat ſeparately with Artaxerxes, and adviſed him to loſe no time, but make his peace as ſoon as poſſible, that the conditions might be the more advantageous. Their negotiations had the deſired effect, and both princes were brought ſeparately to ſubmit to the king, which ſaved both him and his army from impending deſtruction [g] (Q).

THE

[f] Diodor. l. xv. [g] Plut. in Artax. p. 1023, 1024. Diodor. l. xv. p. 462.

(Q) A modern writer is of opinion (76), that the Caduſians were deſcended from the Iſraelites of the ten tribes, which the king of Aſſyria carried out of the land of Canaan; but as

(76) Fuller Miſcel. l. ii. c. 5.

THE king loſt, in this ill projected expedition, a great number of his beſt troops, and all his horſes. Among others who loſt their lives on this occaſion, was Camiſſares, by nation a Carian, a man of extraordinary courage and conduct. He was governor of Leuco-Syria, a province lying between Cilicia and Cappadocia, and was ſucceeded in that government by his ſon Datames, who attended Artaxerxes in this expedition, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very particular manner. Datames was the greateſt commander of his time, and by none ever exceeded, as Cornelius Nepos, who has wrote his life, informs us, in courage, boldneſs, and abilities for contriving and executing military ſtratagems. But his eminent qualities and too great merit occaſioned his ruin, as we ſhall have occaſion to relate hereafter.

ON the king's return to Suſa, the eminent ſervice which Tiribazus had done him in that expedition inclined him to have his cauſe thoroughly examined, and to grant him a fair hearing. For that purpoſe he appointed three commiſſioners, who were all of eminent rank and diſtinguiſhed probity. Theſe, after an impartial diſcuſſion of the whole affair, were unanimous in declaring him innocent; whereupon he was by the king reſtored to his former honours, and Orontes, his accuſer, with diſgrace baniſhed the court [h].

ARTAXERXES, being now at leiſure from all other engagements, reſolved to reduce the Egyptians, who had long before ſhaken off the Perſian yoke; and accordingly made great preparations for that war. Achoris, who then reigned in Egypt, foreſeeing the ſtorm, was not wanting on his ſide to provide againſt it the beſt he could. He joined a great number of Greeks and other mercenaries, under the command of Chabrias the Athenian, to his own ſubjects. Pharnabazus, being charged with the management of this war, ſent embaſſadors to Athens, complaining of Chabrias for engaging to ſerve againſt the king of Perſia, with whom the king of Athens lived in amity, and threatening the republic with his maſter's reſentment, if he were not immediately recalled. He demanded at the ſame time Iphicrates, another Athenian, and the beſt general of as he has no other foundation to ground his opinion upon but the ſimilitude between the words Caduſian and Keduſhim, which ſignifies Holy People, we cannot fall in with him.

[h] Diodor. ubi ſupra. p. 463.

of his time, to command the Greek mercenaries in the Persian service. The Athenians, who at that time had [a] great dependence on the Persian king's friendship to support them against their domestic enemies, recalled Chabrias, ordering him to repair to Athens on pain of death by a certain day. Iphicrates was sent to take upon him the command of the Greek mercenaries in the Persian army. On his arrival having mustered the forces he was to command, he so exercised them in all the arts of war, that they became very famous among the Greeks under the name of Iphicratesian soldiers. And indeed he had time enough to instruct them before they entered upon action; for the Persians being very slow in their preparations, two whole years elapsed before they were in a condition to take the field. Achoris, king of Egypt, died in the mean time, and was succeeded by Psammuthis, who reigned only a year. After him Nepherotes reigned four months, and then Nectanebis, the first of the Sebennytic race, twelve years [i].

ARTAXERXES, that he might draw more auxiliaries out of Greece for his Egyptian war, sent embassadors thither to put an end to their domestic broils, and declare in his name, to the different states and cities of that country, that it was his pleasure they should live in peace with each other upon the terms of the treaty of Antalcidas, and that, all garisons being withdrawn, each city should be left to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own laws. This declaration was received with pleasure by all the cities of Greece, except the Thebans, who, aspiring to the empire of all Greece, refused to conform to it [k].

His unsuccessful expedition against Egypt. Year of the flood 2625. Before Christ 374.

AT length, all things being in a readiness for the invasion of Egypt, the Persian army was drawn together at Ace, since called Ptolemais, the place of the general rendezvous. In a review there, the army was found to consist of 200,000 Persians, under the command of Pharnabazus, and 20,000 Greeks led by Iphicrates. Their forces by sea were in porportion to those by land; for their fleet consisted of 300 gallies; besides an incredible number of vessels which followed to furnish both the fleet and the army with necessary provisions. The army and fleet began to move at the same time, and that they might act in concert, they separated as little as possible. The war was to

[a] Euseb. Chron. Syncell. p. 257. [k] Diodor. l. xv. p. 355.

to begin with the ſiege of Peluſium; but Nectanebis, having had ſufficient time to provide for the defence of that place, had rendered the approach to it impracticable both by ſea and land. The fleet therefore, inſtead of making a deſcent, as had been at firſt projected, ſailed from thence to the Mendeſian mouth of the Nile; for the Nile at that time emptied itſelf into the ſea by ſeven different channels, and each of theſe was defended by a fort and a ſtrong gariſon. But the Mendeſian mouth of the Nile not being ſo well fortified as the Peluſian, where the enemy was expected, they landed their forces there without great oppoſition, carried the fortreſs that guarded it, and put all the Egyptians that were found in it to the ſword. After this action Iphicrates was for reimbarking the troops without loſs of time, and attacking Memphis the capital of Egypt. Had this opinion been followed, before the Egyptians recovered from the conſternation, which ſo formidable an invaſion and the blow already recieved had thrown them into, they would have found the place without any defence, and muſt have certainly taken it and re-conquered all Egypt. But the main body of the army not being yet come up, Pharnabazus would undertake nothing before their arrival. Iphicrates, in the utmoſt deſpair to ſee ſo favourable an opportunity loſt, which perhaps might never be retrieved, made preſſing inſtances for leave to attempt the place, with the mercenaries only that were under his command. But Pharnabazus, out of a mean jealouſy of the honour that would redound to Iphicrates, ſhould he ſucceed in the enterprize, would by no means hearken to his propoſal. This delay gave the Egyptians time to recover their courage, and put themſelves in a condition to oppoſe any further attempts. For Nectanebis having lodged a ſufficient gariſon in Memphis, with the reſt took the field, and ſo haraſſed the Perſians, that they could not advance farther into the country; and the Nile at the accuſtomed period overflowing the land, the Perſians were obliged to return into Phœnice, having loſt great part of their army in this unſucceſsful expedition. Thus ended this war, which had coſt immenſe ſums, two whole years having been ſpent in making the neceſſary preparations for ſo fruitleſs an attempt. The only effect that it produced was, an irreconcileable enmity between the two generals. For Pharnabazus to excuſe himſelf, laid the whole blame of the miſcarriage upon Iphicrates, and he, with more reaſon, on Pharnabazus; but being well appriſed, that Pharnabazus nabazus would find more credit at the Perſian court than he, and remembering what had happened to Conon, that he might not meet with the like fate, privately hired a ſhip and retired to Athens. Pharnabazus ſent embaſſadors to Athens, accuſing him of making the Egyptian expedition miſcarry, and requeſting the republic to puniſh him according to his demerit. The Athenians made no other anſwer, than that if he were found guilty he ſhould undergo the puniſhment he deſerved. But, it ſeems, they were ſo well convinced of his innocence, that they never called him to a trial on that account; nay, he was not long after appointed ſole admiral of their whole fleet [1].

TWELVE years after this expedition, Artaxerxes, who had not laid aſide the thoughts of ſubjecting Egypt, notwithſtanding his many miſcarriages in that attempt, began to make new preparations for the invading of that country. Tachos who had ſucceeded Nectanebis, drew together what forces he could to defend himſelf againſt ſo powerful an enemy. To ſtrengthen himſelf the more, he ſent into Greece to raiſe mercenaries, and prevailed with the Lacedæmonians, who were at that time exaſperated againſt Artaxerxes, for obliging them to include the Meſſenians in the late peace, to ſend a good number of troops under the command of Ageſilaus. This commiſſion did no ways redound to the honour of Ageſilaus, for it was thought below the dignity of a king of Sparta, and a great commander, who had acquired ſuch reputation in the world, and was then above eighty, to become a mercenary, and hire himſelf to a Barbarian. However, Ageſilaus, either out of vanity to be ſtill at the head of an army, for Tachos had promiſed to make him commander in chief of all his forces, or out of a proſpect of great gain, willingly accepted the commiſſion, and ſet ſail for Egypt. On his landing he was met by Tachos, who in their firſt interview conceived ſuch diſadvantagious ideas of him, that he ever after ſlighted his counſels and deſpiſed his perſon. For both he and his Egyptian generals expected to ſee a great and magnificient prince, with an attire and equipage equal to the fame of his exploits; and not a little old man, of a mean aſpect, and dreſt in an old robe of coarſe ſtuff, without any pomp, magnificence, or outward ſhew. This haſty and ill-grounded impreſſion proved the ruin of Tachos; for he would allow Ageſilaus no no other command but that of the mercenaries, which alone had been ſufficient to diſguſt ſo great, ſo old, and ſo experienced a commander, and was the firſt cauſe of his averſion to Tachos. The charge of the fleet he gave to Chabrias, reſerving to himſelf the chief command over all. Having joined the Egyptians and mercenaries into one body, he reſolved to march into Phœnice, thinking it more adviſeable to make that country the theatre of the war, than to expect the enemy at home. Ageſilaus, being appriſed of the bad conſequences that might attend this reſolution, adviſed him againſt it, remonſtrating, that his affairs were not ſo well ſettled in Egypt, as to admit of his abſence, and that it would be more for his intereſt to manage the war abroad by his lieutenants, and ſtay himſelf in his kingdom to be at hand in caſe of any diſturbance. Tachos deſpiſed this wiſe counſel, and expreſſed no leſs diſregard for him on all other occaſions. But the event ſhewed, that Ageſilaus's advice was the reſult of a very prudent forecaſt; for, while Tachos was in Phœnice, the Egyptians revolting ſet up Nectanebus his couſin, or, as Diodorus calls him, his ſon, in his ſtead. Ageſilaus, laying hold of this opportunity to vent his reſentment againſt Tachos, joined the revolters, and drove him quite out of Egypt. The dethroned prince fled firſt to Sidon, and from thence to the Perſian court, where he was not only received with great kindneſs, but entruſted with the command of the troops againſt the rebels [m] (R). TOWARDS

Year of the flood 2637. Before Chriſt 362.

[1] Diodor. l. xv. p. 478.

[m] Diodor. l. 15. 397—401. Plut. in Ageſil. p. 616, 618. Corn. Nep. in Ageſ. c. 8.

(R) Plutarch condemns Ageſilaus as guilty of treachery in thus turning his arms againſt the prince who had hired him. But Ageſilaus alledged in his juſtification, that he had been ſent to aſſiſt the Egyptians, and that therefore, as they had taken up arms againſt Tachos, he could not ſerve againſt them without new orders from Sparta. He accordingly diſpatched meſſengers thither, and the inſtructions he received were, to act as he ſhould judge moſt advantageous for his country; whereupon he immediately declared for Nectanebus. Thus Ageſilaus pretended to cover ſo criminal a conduct, ſays Plutarch; but if we remove that deluſive blind of the public good, the only true name that can be given to this action is, that of perfidy and treaſon (77). Xenophon endeavours to palliate this conduct by ſaying, that Ageſilaus joined that king who ſeemed the beſt affected to Greece (78).

(77) Plut. in Ageſil. (78) Xenoph. de reg. Ageſil. 663.

TOWARDS the latter end of the reign of Artaxerxes, great disturbances arose in the Persian court, rent into factions by his sons, each making parties among the nobility to support their pretensions to the crown. He had 115 sons by his concubines, and three by his queen, viz. Darius, Ariaspes, and Ochus. To put a stop to these practises and contentions, he declared Darius the eldest his successor, and, the better to settle him on the throne, allowed him to assume the title of king, and wear the Tiara, even in his own life-time. But this not contenting the young prince's ambition, who was also disgusted with his father for refusing him one of his concubines whom he demanded, he formed a design against the old king's life, and engaged in the conspiracy fifty of his brothers. Tiribazus, whom we have often mentioned in this history, contributed the most to his taking this unnatural resolution, and that for a like subject of discontent. Artaxerxes had promised him in marriage one of his daughters, but falling in love with her married her himself, and to make him amends, having promised him another daughter, he married that likewise. These two disappointments provoked Tiribazus to such a degree, that to revenge the affront he stirred up the young king to that wicked attempt. The number of the conspirators was already very formidable, and the day fixed for the execution of their design, when an eunuch, who was privy to the plot, discovered it to the king. Whereupon the conspirators were seized, as they were entering the king's palace, and all put to death.

DARIUS being thus cut off, the same contention was revived, which before his being declared king had rent the court into several factions. Three of his brothers were competitors, Ariaspes, Ochus, and Arsames. The two first claimed the crown in right of their birth, being the king's sons by his queen; the third only by the king's favour, who tenderly loved him, though only the son of a concubine. Ochus, prompted by his restless ambition, found means to get rid of his two rivals. For Ariaspes being of an easy temper and very credulous, he suborned the eunuchs of the palace to threaten him in the king's name in such manner, that expecting every moment to be treated as Darius had been, he poisoned himself to avoid a more cruel death. But Arsames still remaining to rival him in his pretensions, and being for his wisdom and other princely virtues, in the opinion of his father and all others, the most worthy of the crown, he caused him to be assassinated by Harpates the son of Tiribazus. This loss added to the former, and the wickedness which attended both, overwhelmed the king, who was then 94 years old, with such grief, that, not being able to bear up against it, he broke his heart, and died in the 46th year of his reign [n]. He was a mild and generous prince, and governed with great clemency and justice; whence he was honoured, and his authority respected, throughout all the empire. This Ochus was sensible of, and well knew that it would be quite otherwise with him, the death of his two brothers having alienated the minds both of the nobility and people. To avoid the inconveniences that might attend this general hatred and aversion, he prevailed with the eunuchs and others, that were about the king's person, to conceal his death, and took upon himself the administration of affairs, giving orders, and issuing decrees in the name of Artaxerxes, as if he had been still alive; by one of these decrees he caused himself, as by his father's order, to be proclaimed king thoughout the whole empire. After having thus governed near ten months, believing his authority sufficiently established, he at length declared the death of his father, and openly ascended the throne, takeing the name of Artaxerxes. Historians however, most frequently call him Ochus, and under this name we shall speak of him in the sequel of this history.

all

Artaxerxes Memnon dies. Year of the flood 2640. Before Christ 359. Ochus.

It was no sooner known that Artaxerxes was dead, and Ochus in possession of the throne, but all Asia Minor, Syria, Phœnice, and many other provinces openly revolted. The chief men concerned in this revolt were Ariobarzanes governor of Phrygia, Mausolus king of Caria, Orontes governor of Mysia, and Autophradates governor of Lydia. Datames likewise, whom we have mentioned before, was engaged in the rebellion, being at that time governor of Cappadocia. By this, as we may call it, general insurrection, half the revenues of the crown were on a sudden diverted into different channels, and the remainder had not been sufficient to carry on the war against so many revolters, had they acted in concert. But they did not long keep firm to each other, and those, who had been the first and most zealous in shaking off the yoke, strove who should soonest betray the others, and thereby make their peace with the king. The provinces of Asia Minor on withdrawing their their obedience had entred into a confederacy for their mutual defence, and chosen Orontes for their general. They had also resolved to add 20,000 mercenaries to their own troops, and charged Orontes with the care of raising them. But when he had received a sufficient sum both for the raising of those forces and maintaining of them for a year, he kept the money for himself and delivered up to the king those who had brought it to him from the revolted provinces. Rheomitres, another of the chiefs of Asia Minor, being sent into Egypt to negociate succours in that kingdom, was guilty of a like treachery. For having brought from thence 500 talents and 50 ships of war, and assembled the ring-leaders of the revolt at Leucas, a city of Asia Minor, under pretence of giving them an account of his negociations, he seized them all, and made his peace with the king, by betraying them into his hands. Thus this formidable revolt, which had brought the Persian empire to the very brink of ruin, came to nothing; and Ochus was without striking a blow settled on the throne [o]. Only Datames, governor of Cappadocia, having possessed himself also of Paphlagonia, gave him much trouble. By what we read of him in Cornelius Nepos [p] and Polyænus [q], it appears, that he maintained himself a long time in both those provinces, and was at last murdered by the treachery of Mithridates, one of his intimates (S).

[n] Diodor. l. 15. p. 327—401. Plut. in Artax.

Ochus was the most cruel and wicked of all the princes of that race in Persia. For he had not been long on the throne, when he filled the palace and the whole empire with blood and slaughter. That the revolted provinces might have none of the blood royal to set up against him, and to rid himself at once of all the uneasiness which the princes

[o] Diodor. l. xv. p. 506. Polyæn. Stratag. l. vii. [p] Corn. Nep. in vita Datam. [q] Polyæn. Stratagem. l. vii.

(S) Diodorus Siculus (79) places this revolt in the last year of Artaxerxes; but as he was greatly esteemed and beloved by his subjects, it is not likely, that so great an insurrection should have happened under him. We have therefore placed it in the reign of his successor Ochus, whose cruelty, chiefly in the murder of his two brothers, incensed the nobility and governors of the provinces against him, who therefore refused to submit to him. As he took the name of Artaxerxes, this may have led Diodorus into the mistake of placing in the father's reign what happened in the son's.

(79) Diodor. l. xv. p. 400.

princes of the royal family might give him, he put them all to death, without any regard to ſex, age, or proximity of blood. He cauſed Ocha, his own ſiſter and mother-in-law, for he had married her daughter, to be buried alive; and having ſhut up one his uncles with an hundred of his ſons and grandſons in a court of the palace, he ordered his archers to diſpatch them with their arrows [r]. This uncle ſeems to have been the father of Syſigambis, mother to Darius Codomannus. For Q. Curtius tells us, that Ochus cauſed 80 of her brothers, together with their father, to be maſſacred in one day. With the ſame barbarity he treated all thoſe who gave him any umbrage, ſparing none of the nobility, who betrayed the leaſt mark of diſcontent or diſaffection to his perſon.

But all the cruelties he practiſed could not keep his ſubjects in awe. Artabazus, governor of one of the Aſiatic provinces, rebelled, and engaged Chares the Athenian to join him with a fleet and body of troops, which he commanded in thoſe parts. Ochus ſent an army of 70,000 men againſt the rebels; but they were by Chares and his Athenians all cut in pieces. Artabazus, in reward of ſo great a ſervice, gave Chares a ſum of money ſufficient to pay his fleet and the forces he had on board. The king highly reſented this conduct of the Athenians, and, as they were then engaged in a war with the Chians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantines, he threatened to join their enemies with a numerous fleet, if they did not recal Chares. The Athenians, fearing to provoke ſo powerful an enemy, ordered Chares to return forthwith into Greece [s].

Artabazus, being thus deſerted by the Athenians, had recourſe to the Thebans, who ſent to his aſſiſtance a body of 5000 men under the command of Pammenes. With this reinforcement Artabazus again took the field, and gained two very conſiderable victories over the king's forces, which greatly redounded to the honour of the Thebans and their commander [t]. However, they made their peace ſoon after with the king, who having given them 300 talents, they returned home. Artabazus, thus deſtitute of all ſupport, was at laſt overcome and forced to take refuge with Philip of Macedon [u].

[r] Juſtin, l. x. c. 3. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 2. [s] Diodor. l. xvi. p. 527, 528. [t] Diodor. ibid. [u] Idem, p. 438.

Year of the flood, 2648. Before Christ 351.

THIS rebellion was scarce quelled, when several others broke out in divers parts of the empire. The Sidonians and other Phœnicians, being oppressed by those the king had set over them, taking up arms entered into a confederacy with Nectanebus king of Egypt. The Persians were then making vast preparations to reduce Egypt; but as they could not approach the borders of that kingdom any other way than by marching through Phœnice, the revolt of that country happened very opportunely for the king of Egypt. Therefore, to keep up their courage, he detached a body of 4000 Greek mercenaries under the command of Mentor the Rhodian to join them, in hopes of making Phœnice a barrier to Egypt, and keeping the war at a distance. The Phœnicians encouraged by this supply took the field, and having routed the governors of Syria and Cilicia that were sent to reduce them, they drove the Persians quite out of their territories [w].

THE Cypriots, being likewise ill-used by their Persian governors, and encouraged by this success of the Phœnicians, joined with them and the Egyptians in the same alliance [x]. Hereupon Ochus dispatched his orders to Idriens king of Caria, enjoining him to invade the island of Cyprus, and make war upon the inhabitants, putting all to fire and sword. Idriens, in compliance with his command, having equipped a fleet, sent it with 8000 Greek mercenaries, under the command of Phocion an Athenian and Evagoras, (T) to make a descent in the island. The troops landed without any considerable opposition, and, being

[w] Idem. l. xvi. p. 531, 532, 533. [x] Idem. ubi supra. p. 532.

(T) Another Evagoras had formerly reigned in the city of Salamine, whom we have spoke of above. On his death he was succeeded by Nicocles his son, and this Evagoras seems to have been the son of Nicocles, and to have succeeded him in that kingdom; but, being driven out by Protagoras his uncle, was in banishment when this war began. He gladly joined the Persians in hopes of recovering his crown; and the knowledge he had of the country made him a very proper person to command in this expedition (80). Cyprus had then nine chief cities, and each of them had its king, but subject and tributary to the king of Persia. All these joined together in this confederacy, with a design to shake off the Persian yoke, and make themselves each independent in his own city (81).

(81) Isocrat. in Evag. & Nicol. (81) Diodor. l. vi. p. 532.

being reinforced with other bodies from Syria and Cilicia, beſieged Salamine by ſea and land [y].

OCHUS, finding that his lieutenants made no progreſs againſt the Egyptians and Phœnicians, reſolved to head his forces in perſon; and accordingly having drawn together an army of 300,000 foot and 30,000 horſe, marched at the head of them into Phœnice. Mentor the Rhodian, who was then at Sidon with the Greek mercenaries, being terrified at the approach of ſo great an army, ſent privately one of his intimate friends to Ochus to make his peace with him, offering not only to deliver Sidon into his hands, but to join him with the troops under his command. Ochus glad of this proffer ſpared no promiſes to draw him over to his party, knowing what ſignal ſervice he could do him in the Egyptian war, as being thoroughly acquainted with the country. And accordingly Mentor, having received ſuch aſſurances as he deſired, engaged Tennes, king of Sidon, in the ſame treacherous deſign, and by his aſſiſtance delivered Sidon up to the Perſians. The Sidonians, ſeeing themſelves thus betrayed and the enemy within the walls, ſhut themſelves up, with their wives and children, in their houſes, and ſetting fire to them conſumed themſelves, to the number of 40,000 men, beſides women and children. Tennes met with no better fate than his ſubjects, for Ochus ſeeing he could do him no farther ſervice, and deteſting in his heart the treachery of the man, cauſed his throat to be cut, leaſt he ſhould out-live the ruin which he had brought upon his country, as we have related elſewhere [z]. The ruin and total deſtruction of Sidon terrified the other cities of Phœnice to ſuch a degree, that they all voluntarily ſubmitted to the conqueror, each of them makeing peace with the king upon the beſt terms they could. Neither was Ochus unwilling to compound with them, that he might be no longer retarded from putting in execution the deſigns he had upon Egypt [a].

Sidon betrayed by Mento. the Rhodian.

BUT before he marched thither, his army received from Greece a reinforcement of 10,000 mercenaries. For the Thebans ſent him 1000 men under the command of Lachares, and the Argives 3000 commanded by Nicoſtratus; the reſt joined him from the Greek cities of Aſia. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians excuſed themſelves, telling the king's embaſſadors, that they ſhould be glad to maintain peace and friendſhip with their maſter, but could not at that time ſpare him any ſuccours [b]. The Jews alſo ſeem to have been engaged in this revolt of Phœnice. For Ochus from Sidon marched into Judea, where he beſieged and took Jericho, carrying along with him into Egypt a great many captive Jews, and ſending others into Hyrcania, where they were planted in the provinces bordering on the Caſpian ſea [c].

[y] Idem, ibid. [z] Vol. ii. p. 370, 371, 372. [a] Diodor. l. xvi. p. 531, 532, &c.

Ochus at the ſame time put an end to the Cyprian war, and compounded with the nine Cyprian kings, having his mind entirely bent on the reducing of Egypt. He willingly redreſſed all their grievances, and confirmed them in their reſpective governments [d].

Ochus, having thus ſettled the affairs both of Phœnice and Egypt, ſet out on his Egyptian expedition. On his march he loſt a great many men, drowned in the lake of Serbonis, which lies between Phœnice and Egypt, and extends about 30 miles. When the ſouth-wind blows, the whole ſurface of the water is covered with ſand from the deſart, in ſuch manner, that no one can diſtinguiſh it from the firm land. Several parties of Ochus's army, for want of good guides, were loſt in it, and we are told, that entire armies have there met with the ſame fate [e]. When he arrived on the frontiers of Egypt, he detached three bodies to invade the country, each body being commanded by a Perſian and a Greek general. The firſt was led by Lachares the Theban, and Roſaces governor of Lydia and Ionia; the ſecond by Nicoſtratus the Theban, and Ariſtazanes; the third by Mentor the Rhodian, and Bagoas one of his eunuchs. The main body of the army he kept with himſelf, and encamped near Peluſium, with a deſign to watch there the events of the war. In the mean time Nectanebus drew together an army of 100,000 men, conſiſting of 20,000 mercenaries from Greece, as many from Lybia, and the reſt Egyptians; but they did not all amount to a third of the Perſian army. With ſome of theſe he gariſoned his frontier-towns, and with the others he guarded the paſſes, through which the enemy was to enter the country. The firſt Perſian detachment, under the command of Lachares, ſat down before Peluſium, gariſoned by 5000 Greeks. While the ſiege was carrying on, on, Nicoſtratus with his detachment embarked on board a ſquadron of the Perſian fleet, and ſailing up the Nile landed his forces in the heart of the country, and there formed a ſtrong encampment. Hereupon all the gariſons of the neighbouring caſtles, taking the alarm, joined Clinias of the iſland of Cos in order to diſlodge him. This led them to a battle, which was fought with great obſtinacy; but at laſt the Egyptians were put to flight, having loſt Clinias with above 5000 of his men; the reſt were utterly broken and diſperſed, which, we may ſay, determined the fate of this war. For Nectanebus, fearing leſt Nicoſtratus ſhould ſail up the Nile with his victorious forces, and take Memphis the metropolis of his kingdom, haſtened thither, and left open the paſſes which he ought chiefly to have defended. The Greek mercenaries, who gariſoned Peluſium, hearing of the king's retreat, gave all for loſt, and therefore coming to a parley with Lachares, delivered up the city to him, upon condition, that they and their effects ſhould be ſafely conveyed to Greece. Mentor with the third detachment, finding the paſſes deſerted, entered the country, and giving out, that Ochus would graciouſly receive all that ſubmitted, and utterly deſtroy ſuch as reſiſted, treating them as he had treated the Sidonians, both the Egyptians and Greeks ſtrove which ſhould firſt make their ſubmiſſion. Nectanebus, ſeeing he could no longer hold out, took with him what treaſures he could carry, and withdrew into Ethiopia. Ochus, having thus reduced all Egypt, diſmantled their ſtrong-holds, plundered their temples, and returned in triumph to Babylon, loaded with immenſe treaſures[f]. Henceforward Egypt was a province of Perſia, till Alexander overturned that monarchy, and delivered the Egyptians from the Perſian tyranny.

[b] Idem. ibid. p. 533. [c] Solin. c. xxxv. Syncell. ex Africano, p. 256. Oros. l. xxxi. c. 7. Joſeph. l. i. contra Apion. [d] Diodor. ibid. p. 534. [e] Idem, 534, 535.

Egypt reduced by Ochus. Year of the flood, 2649. Before Chriſt 350.

Ochus, having ended with ſuch ſucceſs the Egyptian war, ſent back the Greek mercenaries to their reſpective countries with ample rewards. But as all his conqueſts were chiefly owing to Mentor, he diſtinguiſhed him above all the reſt, not only rewarding him with an hundred talents and other preſents to a great value, but appointing him governor of all the coaſts of Aſia, and committing to his care the whole management of the war, which he was ſtill carrying on againſt ſome provinces that had revolted in the beginning of his reign. Theſe, what by cunning and ſtratagems, what by open force, he reduced, and reſtored reſtored the king's authority in all the parts of that vaſt empire.

[f] Idem, ibid.

ALL the revolted provinces being reduced, and peace eſtabliſhed throughout the whole empire, Ochus gave himſelf up to eaſe, luxury, and pleaſure, leaving the adminiſtration of public affairs entirely to his miniſters. The chief of theſe were Bagoas his favourite eunuch and Mentor the Rhodian, who agreeing to part the power between them, the former governed all the provinces of the upper Aſia, and the latter thoſe of the lower [g]. Bagoas, being by birth an Egyptain, had a great zeal for the religion of his country, and endeavoured, on the conqueſt of Egypt, to influence the king in favour of the Egyptian ceremonies; but, in ſpite of all his endeavours, the king not only plundered the temples, but carried away the ſacred records that were lodged in them; and, in contempt of their religion, ſlew the god Apis, that is, the ſacred bull, which they worſhipped under that name. This irreligious behaviour Bagoas deeply reſented, and ever afterwards watched an opportunity of revenging the affront offered to his religion. The records he redeemed with a great ſum of money and ſent them back into Egypt; but the injury done to his god he thought could be no otherwiſe atoned for, but by putting the ſacrilegious king to death; which he did accordingly with poiſon in the twenty-firſt year of his reign. Nor did his revenge ſtop here; for the king's body he kept, cauſing another to be buried inſtead of it; and, becauſe the king had cauſed his attendants to eat the fleſh of the Apis, he cut his fleſh in pieces, and gave it ſo mangled to the cats, making of his bones handles for ſwords. Having in this barbarous manner diſpatched his maſter and benefactor, and ſeeing the whole power of the empire in his hands, he placed Arſes, the youngeſt of the dead king's ſons on the throne, and put all the reſt to death, that he might the better ſecure to himſelf the authority which he had uſurped. For the bare name of king was all that he allowed to Arſes, reſerving for himſelf the whole power and authority of the government [h].

Bagoas the eunuch poiſons Ochus, and raiſes Arſes to the throne. Year of the flood, 2661. Before Chriſt 338.

Arſes.

ARSES did not long enjoy even the ſhadow of power, being ſlain by the ſame Bagoas, who, finding that the king, well appriſed of his wickedneſs and treachery, was taking meaſures to bring him to condign puniſhment, was before-before-hand with him, putting to death him and his whole family in the second year of his reign [i].

[g] Idem, p. 537. [h] Diodor. p. 564. Ælian. var. hiſt. iv. c. 8. Sever. Sulpit. l. ii.

THE throne becoming again vacant by the death of Arses, Bagoas, who durst not yet usurp it himself, placed it on Darius, the third of that name in Persia. Before his accession to the crown he was called Codomannus, and is said not to have been of the blood-royal, because he was not the son of any king that reigned before him. However, he was of the royal family, being descended from Darius Nothus, whose grandson Arsanes marrying his own sister Sysigambis had by her Codomannus. Ostanes, the son of Darius Nothus and father to Arsanes, was put to death by Ochus on his first ascending the throne, and with him above eighty of his sons and grandsons [k]. How Codomannus came to escape this slaughter is no where said. In the reign of Ochus he made but a very poor figure, being only an Astanda, that is one employed to carry the royal dispatches to the governors of the provinces; a mean employment for one of the royal family [l]. In the war which Ochus made upon the Cadusians, towards the latter end of his reign, one of these Barbarians having challenged the whole Persian army, to find a champion that durst encounter him in a single combat, Codomannus accepted the challenge, after all the others had declined it, and slew the Cadusian. For this gallant action he was rewarded with the government of Armenia [m], and thence raised to the throne by Bagoas in the manner we have already related. But he had not long enjoyed the sovereign power, when Bagoas, finding that he would not be entirely governed by him, which was all he aimed at in advancing him to the crown, resolved to remove him in the same manner as the had done his predecessor; and accordingly provided a poisonous potion; but Darius being acquainted with his design, when the potion was brought him, made Bagoas himself drink it, and having thereby got rid of the traitor by his own artifice, he settled himself on the throne, without any further difficulty or opposition [n]. Authors represent Darius as a prince of a mild and generous disposition, of great personal valour, and for his stature and shape far preferable to any of the whole Persian empire. But having such a fortunate rival as Alexander the Great to encounter, he was not able with all all his good qualities and personal courage to withstand him; and he was scarce warm on the throne when he found this powerful enemy preparing to drive him from it.

Darius Codomannus. Year of the flood 2663. Before Christ 336.

[i] Diodor. ibid. [k] Diodor. ibid. Plut. in Artax. [l] Plut. de vita & fortuna Alexandri. [m] Diodor. l. xvii. p. 564. Justin. l. x. c. 3. [n] Diodor. ubi supra.

For Alexander, having settled his affairs in Macedon, and used all imaginable precautions to prevent any troubles that might arise there during his absence, set out for Sestos, and thence passed over the Hellespont into Asia, in the second year of Darius's reign. A war against the Persians had been resolved on some time before, in a general assembly of the Amphictyons, to revenge the many injuries, which Greece had received from the Barbarians during the space of 300 years, and Philip king of Macedon had been appointed commander in chief of the forces destined for this expedition. But Philip being in the mean time murdered, his son Alexander summoned a general assembly of all the states and free cities of Greece to meet at Corinth, and having prevailed with them to chuse him in his room, he obliged each city to furnish its quota, both of men and money, for the carrying on of the war. His army, according to the highest account, amounted to no more than 30,000 foot and 3000 horse. But they were all chosen men, well disciplined, and inured to the toils of war, most of them having served under Philip during his long wars, and all of them been employed in several expeditions. Parmenio commanded the infantry, Philotas his son had the command of 1800 horse, all Macedonians; Callas, the son of Harpalus, led the same number of Thessalian cavalry; the rest of the horse had their particular commanders, each being set over those of of his own nation. With this army he crossed the Hellespont, as we have hinted above, and, pursuing his march, arrived at the River Granicus, where he found the Persian governors of the neighbouring provinces encamped with an army of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, with a design to dispute his passage(U). Memnon the Rhodian whom Darius had appointed governor over all the coasts of Asia, had advised the generals not to venture a battle, but to lay waste the whole country, and even destroy the cities, that the enemy might be obliged for want of provisions to return back into Europe. But Arsites, governor of Phrygia, opposed

(U) Justin and Orosius tells us, that the Persian army consisted of 600,000 foot, and 20,000 horse; Arrianus makes it amonnt to 200,000 foot. We have chosen to follow Diodorus's account, which to us seems the most rational. In the history of the Mysians the authors follow Justin and Orosius.

oppoſed the opinion of Memnon, proteſting, that he would never ſuffer the Greeks to make ſuch havock in the countries he governed. This raſh and impolitic counſel prevailed, and Memnon was even ſuſpected to hold intelligence with the enemy, or at leaſt to be deſirous of ſpinning out the war, and thereby continuing the command to himſelf [o].

THE Perſian cavalry, which was very numerous, lined the banks of the Granicus, and formed a large front in order to oppoſe Alexander, where-ever he ſhould attempt a paſſage; and the foot, conſiſting chiefly of Greek mercenaries, was poſted behind the cavalry on an eaſy aſcent. Parmenio, obſerving the diſpoſition of the enemy's army, adviſed Alexander to encamp on the oppoſite banks of the river, that his troops might have time to reſt, and not to attempt the croſſing over till the next morning, the river being deep, the banks very craggy and ſteep, his troops tired with their march, and thoſe of the enemies quite freſh, as having been encamped in that place for ſeveral days. But all the reaſons he could produce made not the leaſt impreſſion on Alexander, who anſwered, that it would be a diſgrace to him and his army, ſhould he, after croſſing the Helleſpont, ſuffer his progreſs to be ſtopt by a rivulet; for ſo, out of contempt, he called the Granicus [p]. The battle of Granicus. Year after the flood 2665. Before Chriſt. 334.

THE two armies being drawn up in battle-array on the oppoſite banks of the river continued ſome time in ſight of each other, as though they dreaded the event. The Perſians waited till the Macedonians ſhould enter the river, that they might attack them to advantage on their landing; and the Macedonians were looking for a convenient place to croſs in, which they no ſooner found, than Alexander ordered a ſtrong detachment of horſe to advance into the river, he himſelf following with the right wing, which he commanded in perſon, the trumpets in the mean time ſounding, and loud ſhouts of joy being heard throughout the whole army. The Perſians let fly ſuch ſhowers of arrows, againſt the detachment of the Macedonian horſe, as cauſed ſome confuſion, ſeveral of their horſes being killed or wounded; and as they drew near the bank a moſt bloody engagement enſued, the Macedonians endeavouring to land, and the Perſians puſhing them again into the river. As Memnon commanded in this this place with his sons, the first ranks of the Macedonians were entirely cut off, and the rest, after having with the utmost difficulty gained the shore, driven anew into the river. Alexander, who followed them close, observing the confusion they were in, headed them himself, and, landing in spite of all opposition, attacked the enemy's cavalry with great vigor, and obliged them, after an obstinate resistance, to give way. However, Spithrobates, governor of Ionia and son-in-law to Darius, being surrounded by forty Persian lords, all of them his relations, still maintained his ground, and did all that lay in his power to lead the Persians back to the charge. Alexander, seeing in how gallant a manner he signalized himself, advanced full gallop to engage him; neither did he decline the combat, and both were slightly wounded at the first encounter. Spithrobates, having thrown his javelin without effect, immediately advanced sword in hand against Alexander, who, being upon his guard, ran him through with his pike, as he was lifting up his arm to discharge a blow with his scymetar. But Rosaces, brother to Spithrobates, gave Alexander at the same time so furious a blow on the head with his battle-ax, that he beat off his plume, and slightly wounded him through his helmet. As he was ready to repeat the blow, Clitus with one stroke of his scymetar cut off Rosaces's head, and by that means saved the life of his sovereign. The Macedonians, animated by the example of their king, attacked the Persian horse with new vigor, who, not being able to stand so violent a a shock, first gave ground, and soon after betook themselves to a precipitous flight. Alexander did not pursue them, but immediately charged, at the head of the right wing, the enemy's foot, who, seeing themselves attacked at the same time by the cavalry and the Macedonian phalanx which had crossed the river, made no great resistance. The Grecian infantry retired in good order to a neighbouring hill, whence they sent deputies to Alexander, demanding leave to march off unmolested; but he, instead of coming to a parley with them, rushed sword in hand into the middle of this small body, where he was very near being cut in pieces, his horse being killed under him. The Greeks defended themselves a long time with incredible valour, but, being at last over-powered with numbers, were almost all killed on the spot. In this engagement the Persians lost 20,000 foot and 2500 horse; of the Macedonians 25 men of the king's own troop fell in the firſt attack, whoſe ſtatues, made by Lyſippus, Alexander ſome time after cauſed to be ſet up in Dia, a city in Macedon, whence they were many years after carried to Rome by Q. Metellus. About 60 others of the horſe were killed, and 30 of the foot, who were all buried the next day with great ſolemnity, the king exempting their parents and children from all taxes and burdens [q].

[o] Arrian. l. i. Plut. in Alex. Q. Curt. l. iii. [p] Diodor. Arrian. Plutarch. Curt. ubi ſupra.

the

THIS victory was attended with all the happy conſequences that could be expected. For Sardis, which was the key of the Perſian empire, immediately ſurrendered, and was by Alexander declared a free city, the citizens being permitted to live according to their own laws. From Sardis he advanced to Epheſus, where he was received with great joy. Here he offered a great number of ſacrifices to Diana, and aſſigned to the temple of that goddeſs, all the tributes that were paid to the Perſians. Before he left Epheſus the deputies of Trallis and Magneſia waited upon him with the keys of their cities. From Epheſus he advanced to Miletus, which city, flattered with the hopes of being ſoon relieved, refuſed him admittance; and indeed the Perſian fleet, which was very numerous, made as if they would ſuccour the city; but after various fruitleſs attempts they ſailed off. Memnon had ſhut himſelf up in this ſtrong hold, with a conſiderable number of his men who had eſcaped from the battle on the Granicus, and was reſolved to make a vigorous reſiſtance. Alexander, having ſurrounded the city with his whole army, planted ſcaleing ladders on all ſides, thinking that the moſt expeditious manner of becoming maſter of the place. But his men being every where repulſed, and the city well ſtored with proviſions for a long ſiege, he began to batter the walls with all his engines night and day without intermiſſion. Several breaches were made, but ſtill he could not maſter the town, the beſieged ſuſtaining all his efforts with incredible bravery. At laſt the town being almoſt quite diſmantled, and the beſieged tired out with the hard ſervice, Memnon demanded to capitulate, and ſurrendered the city upon honourable terms; the Mileſians were allowed to live according to their own laws, and Memnon with his Greeks to march out unmoleſted, but the Perſians were either put to the ſword or ſold for ſlaves [r].

HAVING thus poſſeſſed himſelf of Miletus, he marched into Caria, in order to beſiege the city of Halicarnaſſus, which which refuſed to ſubmit. The place was both by nature and art one of the beſt fortified in all Aſia; and beſides Memmon had thrown himſelf into it with a conſiderable body of choſen men, reſolved to ſignalize, in the defence of ſo important a place, his courage and attachment to the intereſt of Darius. And accordingly he made a moſt vigorous reſiſtance, being ſeconded by another general of great proweſs, by name Ephialtes. Whatever could be expected from the moſt intrepid bravery, and the moſt conſummate knowledge in the art of war, was practiſed on this occaſion, both by the beſiegers and the beſieged. After the Macedonians had, with the utmoſt difficulty, filled up the ditches, and brought their engines near the walls, their works were all demoliſhed in an inſtant, and the engines ſet on fire by the beſieged. No ſooner was any part of the wall beat down by the battering rams, but a new one was raiſed in its ſtead, the Macedonians finding themſelves no farther advanced after an immenſe labour, than they were when they firſt ſat down before the place. The city held out ſo long, and the beſiegers had ſo many difficulties to ſtruggle with, that any general beſides Alexander would have given over the enterprize. But his troops were encouraged to purſue the undertaking, by thoſe very difficulties, which would have diſheartened others; and their patience at laſt proved ſucceſsful, Memnon being obliged to abandon the city, which he could no longer defend. As the ſea was open, he placed a ſtrong gariſon in the citadel, which was ſtored with all ſorts of proviſion, and going on board the Perſian fleet, whereof himſelf was admiral, he conveyed the inhabitants with all their effects to the iſland of Cos, not far diſtant from Halicarnaſſus. Alexander, finding the city empty both of riches and inhabitants, razed it to the ground; but the citadel he did not think proper to beſiege, it being of little importance to him after the city was deſtroyed [s].

[q] Plut. in Alex. Diodor. p. 503. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 6. Arrian. l. i. c. 18. [r] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Arrian l. i. c. 19.

After the reduction of Halicarnaſſus, all the Greek cities in Aſia declared for Alexander, he giving out whereever he came, that he had undertaken this war with no other view but of freeing them from the Perſian bondage. In the ſecond year of this war he reduced the province sof Phrygia, Lycia, Piſidia, Pamphylia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, and Cappadocia, and appointed ſuch of his friends to govern them as he thought fit. Theſe tranſactions we ſhall relate more at length in the life of this great warrior.

In

[s] Diodor. Arrian ibid.

In the mean time, Darius was not wanting to prepare for a vigorous defence. Memnon adviſed him to carry the war into Macedon; and a wiſer reſolution could not have been taken; for the Lacedæmonians and ſeveral other Greek ſtates, that were diſaffected to the Macedonians and jealous of their over-grown power, would have readily joined his enemies; which would have obliged Alexander to leave Aſia, and return to the defence of his own country. Darius, being well appriſed of the reaſonableneſs of this advice, willingly embraced it, and charged Memnon to put it in execution, appointing him admiral of the fleet, and commander in chief of all the forces that were to be employed in this expedition. That prince could not have made a better choice, for Memnon was by far the beſt general in his ſervice, and had for many years given undoubted proofs, not only of his courage and conduct, but of an extraordinary fidelity and attatchment to the Perſian intereſt, not abandoning his ſovereign, as other mercenaries had done, when his arms were unſucceſsful. Having received this new commiſſion, he aſſembled the ſcattered remains of the army, and appointed the fleet to rendezvous at the iſland of Cos, where he took on board the land-forces, and with them reduced the iſlands of Chios and Leſbos, except the city of Mitylene. From thence he deſigned to paſs over into Eubœa, and make Greece and Macedon the ſeat of the war; but died before Mitylene, which city he had been forced to beſiege. His death was the greateſt misfortune that could befal the Perſian empire, having defeated the wiſe meaſures which he had propoſed; for Darius not having one general capable of carrying on that enterprize, the only one that could have ſaved his empire, was obliged to drop it, and entirely depend upon his eaſtern armies. Theſe he appointed to aſſemble at Babylon, and having ſet up his ſtandard there, and muſtered his forces, he found, that they amounted in all to the number of four, five, or ſix hundred thouſand men, according to the various accounts of authors [t].

The news of Memnon's death confirmed Alexander in the reſolution he had taken of marching immediately into the provinces of Upper Aſia. Accordingly he marched with all poſſible expedition into Cilicia, and arriving at a place place called Cyrus's camp (whether from Cyrus the Great, as Curtius tells, or from the younger, as we read in Arrian, is uncertain), about fifty ſtades diſtant from the ſtraits of Cilicia, he was informed, that the enemy guarded that important paſs with a conſiderably body of troops. Whereupon, leaving Parmenio there, he marched in perſon at the firſt watch to ſurprize them; but the Perſians, having intelligence of his deſign, betook themſelves to flight, and abandoned the paſs, which Alexander entered, and, after viewing with attention the nature of the place, admired his good fortune, and owned, that he might have been ſtopped with great eaſe, ſeeing the road was ſo narrow, that four men could ſcarce paſs a breaſt, and ſo broke in ſeveral places, and encumbered with large ſtones rolling down from the mountains, that a very ſmall number of reſolute men might have kept back, with no other weapons but ſtones, a numerous army. From the ſtraits of Cilicia the whole army marched to the city of Tarſus, where they arrived the inſtant the Perſians were ſetting fire to the place, in order to prevent the Macedonians from enriching themſelves with the plunder of ſo wealthy and flouriſhing a city. They arrived very ſeaſonably to ſtop the progreſs of the fire, and ſave the city from utter deſtruction [u].

[t] Vide Plut. in Alexand. Arrian. l. ii. c. 6. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 9. Curt. l. iii. c. 8.

In the mean time, Darius had begun his march at the head of his numerous army, and was advanced as far as the vaſt plains of Meſopotamia. Here the commanders of the Greek mercenaries earneſtly preſſed him to wait for the enemy, that he might engage them with all the advantage his numbers gave him. But Darius would not hearken to their advice, haſtening blindly to the mountainous parts of Cilicia, where his cavalry and the number of his troops would rather be an incumbrance to each other, than of any ſervice in an engagement [w].

The order he obſerved in his march was as follows. Before the army was carried on ſilver altars the ſacred and eternal fire, as they called it, attended by the Mages, ſinging hymns after the manner of their country, and three hundred and ſixty-five youths in ſcarlet robes. After theſe came a chariot conſecrated to Jupiter, drawn by white horſes, and followed by one of an extraordinary ſize, whom they called the horſe of the ſun; all the equerries were cloathed in white, each having a golden rod in his hand hand. Next appeared ten ſumptuous chariots, enriched with curious ſculptures in gold and ſilver; and then the van-guard of the horſe, compoſed of twelve different nations, and all armed in a different manner; this body of horſe was followed by another of foot, called by the Perſians immortal, becauſe if any of them died, his place was immediately ſupplied by another; they were ten thouſand in number, and remarkable for the ſumptuouſneſs of their apparel; for they all wore collars of pure gold, and were cloathed in robes of gold tiſſue, having large ſleeves garniſhed with precious ſtones. About 30 paces diſtance came the king's relations or couſins, to the number of 15,000, apparelled like women, and ſurpaſſing even the immortal body in the pomp and richneſs of their attire; they were honoured with the title of the king's couſins, and poſſibly ſeveral of the king's relations were in this body. After theſe came Darius himſelf, attended by his guards, and ſeated on a chariot, as on a throne; the chariot was ſupported on both ſides by the gods of his nation caſt in pure gold; from the middle of the beam, which was ſet with jewels, roſe two ſtatues of pure gold, a cubit in height, the one repreſenting war, the other peace, and both ſhaded with the wings of a ſpread-eagle of the ſame metal. The king was cloathed with a garment of purple ſtriped with ſilver, wearing over that a long robe enriched with a great number of precious ſtones, and the ſcabbard of his ſcymetar, as our author tells us, was made out of a ſingle precious ſtone. On either ſide of the king walked 200 of his neareſt relations, followed by 10,000 horſemen, whoſe lances were plated with ſilver, and tipt with gold; after theſe marched, 30,000 foot, the rear of the army, and laſtly 400 led horſes belonging to the king. At a ſmall diſtance followed Syſigambis, the king's mother, and his conſort, both ſeated on high chariots, with a numerous train of female attendants on horſe-back, and fifteen chariots, in which were the king's children, and thoſe who where charged with the care of their education. Next to theſe were the royal concubines to the number of 360, all attired like ſo many queens; they were followed by 600 mules and 300 camels, which carried the king's treaſure, and were guarded by a body of bow-men; the march was cloſed by a great many chariots carrying the wives of the crown-officers, and lords of the court, and guarded by ſome companies of foot lightly armed [x]. One would take this to be the deſcription of a maſquerade rather than of an army, and imagine, that Darius's chief care was not to provide for his own ſafety, but to ſet out his own glory and riches, as though the Macedonians were to be dazled with pomp, and frightened with pageants.

[u] Arrian. l. ii. Curt. l. iii, c. 8. [w] Arrian. & Curt. ibid.

[x] Arrian. & Curt. ubi ſupra.

ALEXANDER, upon advice that Darius was advancing towards the Euphrates in order to enter Cilicia, detached Parmenio to poſſeſs himſelf of another narrow paſs (W), leading from Aſſyria, or rather Syria, into Cilicia. As for himſelf, he marced from Tarſus to Anchialos, and thence to Soli, which city he reduced, obliging the inhabitants, who refuſed at firſt to admit him into their city, to pay 20,000 talents for the maintenance of his army. While he was at Caſtabala, a ſmall city not far from mount Amanus, news was brought him, that Darius with his whole army was advanced as far as the city of Sochus in Syria, within two days march of Cilicia. Hereupon Alexander ſummoned a council of war, wherein it was determined, that the whole army ſhould march the next day, and wait for Darius among the mountains of Cilicia; which they did accordingly, encamping on a ſpot of ground, which, being wide enough only for two ſmall armies to act in, reduced both in ſome degree to an equality. When intelligence was brought to the Perſian camp, that Alexander had halted in the midſt of the mountains, the Greek commanders, who ſerved in Darius's army, adviſed him again to wait for the enemy in the plains where he was then encamped, or return to the plains of Meſopotamia, where he might have room enough to draw up his great army, bring them all to engage at the ſame time, and ſurround the enemy; whereas, within thoſe ſtraits, there not being room any where to draw up above 30,000 men in battle-array, the Macedonians could bring all their men to engage, and the Perſians not the twentieth part of theirs. If he did not approve of this counſel, they then adviſed him to divide his army into ſeveral bodies, and not put all to the chance of one battle. But his adverſe fate did not ſuffer him to follow ſo wholeſome an advice; nay, the courtiers traduced

(W) For the clearer underſtanding of Alexander's march and that of Darius, we muſt diſtinguiſh three ſtraits, the firſt leading from Cappadocia into Cilicia, through which Alexander marched his army; the ſecond leading from Cicilia into Syria, which Parmenio took poſſeſſion of; and the third called the ſtraits of mount Amanus lying to the north of the paſs of Syria; through this Darius's army from Aſſyria entered Cilicia.

traduced thoſe who had ſuggeſted it, as traitors, telling Darius, that they adviſed him to divide his troops with no other view, than that they might have, after ſuch a ſeparation, a fair opportunity of delivering up into the enemies hands whatever ſhould be in their power. However, Darius thanked the Greeks for their zeal and good-will, and even condeſcended to lay before them the motives that induced him to reject their advice. The courtiers had made him believe, that Alexander was flying before him, and that therefore he ought to march forward with all poſſible expedition, and fall upon him while entangled in thoſe ſtraits, leſt he ſhould make his eſcape. Upon this it was agreed in a council of all the Perſian generals, that they ſhould engage the enemy in the narrow paſſes, the Gods, ſays our hiſtorian [y], blinding that prince, that they might pave a way to the deſtruction of the Perſian empire. Darius, having ſent his treaſures and moſt valuable moveables to Damaſcus in Syria under a ſmall convoy, led the main body of the army towards the ſtraits of mount Amanus, through which he entered Cilicia, and advanced as far as the city of Iſſus, not knowing that Alexander was behind; for he had been told, that the Macedonians were retired in great diſorder into Syria. In the city of Iſſus he barbarouſly put to death the ſick and wounded Macedonians that had been left there by Parmenio, ſparing only a few, whom he diſmiſſed, after making them view his camp, that they might be eye-witneſſes of the immenſe number of his forces. Theſe brought Alexander word of Darius's approach, which he could ſcarce believe, though he deſired nothing more earneſtly. However, having offered a ſacrifice to the gods of the place, he advanced to meet him, and drew up his army on a ſpot of ground near the city of Iſſus, bounded on one ſide by the mountains, and by the ſea on the other. Here Darius, not being able to extend his front beyond that of the Macedonians, by reaſon of the narrowneſs of the place, could diſpoſe of his great army no otherwiſe, than by drawing them up in many lines one behind the other. But the Macedonians ſoon breaking the firſt line, and that recoiling upon the ſecond, and the ſecond again upon the third, and ſo on, the whole Perſian army was put in diſorder; and the Macedonians purſuing the advantage by preſſing forward, the confuſion was increaſed to ſuch a degree, that even the braveſt among the Perſians, who were deſirous to ſignalize themſelves, could neither ſtand their ground, nor manage their arms. As the crowd, which was made in the flight of ſo numerous an army, was very great, thoſe who fell that day were for the moſt part trampled to death by their own men, as they preſſed to eſcape. Darius, who fought in the firſt line, with much difficulty got out of the crowd, and fled in his chariot to the neighbouring mountains, where he mounted on horſe-back, and purſued his flight, leaving behind him his bow, his ſhield, and royal mantle. Alexander was prevented from following him by the Greek mercenaries, who, charging the Macedonian phalanx with incredible bravery, killed Ptolemy the ſon of Seleucus with 120 officers of diſtinction, beſides a great many private men, and, though attacked in flank by Alexander in perſon, maintained their ground, till they were from twenty reduced to eight thouſand; they retired then in good order over the mountains towards Tripoli in Syria, where finding the tranſports, that had conveyed them from Leſbos, lying on the ſhore, they fitted out ſuch a number as ſuited their purpoſe, and ſailed to Cyprus, after having burnt the reſt to prevent their being purſued. Alexander no ſooner ſaw them put to flight than he haſtened after Darius; but growing weary of the purſuit, and night drawing on, he returned to the enemies camp, which his ſoldiers had juſt before plundered. Syſigambis, Darius's mother, and his wife, who was alſo his ſiſter, with his ſon Ochus not full ſix years old, and his two daughters both marriageable, and beſides ſome noblemens daughters, who attended them, were found in the camp and taken priſoners. The reſt had been ſent to Damaſcus, with part of Darius's treaſure and all the rich furniture, which the Perſian monarch uſed to carry with them into the field; ſo that in the camp they found only three thouſand talents of ſilver; but the reſt of the treaſures fell afterwards into the hands of Parmenio at his takeing the city of Damaſcus [z]. In this engagement the Perſians loſt, according to Arrian [a], 10,000 horſe, and 90,000 foot, and with him other writers agree, as to the number of the horſe; but as to the foot they all vary, not only from him, but from each other, ſome making the number of the dead amount to 80, others to 90, others to 100, and ſome to 120, thouſand, adding, that 40,000 were taken taken priſoners, while Alexander, according to the higheſt computation, loſt in all but 300 men [b].

The battle of Iſſus. Year of the flood 2666. Before Chriſt 332.

[y] Arrian. l. ii. Curt. iii. c. 11.

[z] Plut. in Alex. Curt. l. iii. Arrian. l. ii. Diodor. l. xvii.
[a] Arrian. ubi ſupra.

THE next day, Alexander, after viſiting the wounded, cauſed the dead to be buried with great pomp in the preſence of the whole army, which was drawn up in battle-array. The ſame honours he paid to the manes of the Perſians of rank, and allowed Darius's mother to bury as many as ſhe pleaſed, according to the cuſtoms and ceremonies of her country. But the prudent princeſs uſed that permiſſion with great modeſty and reſerve, burying only a few, who were her near relations. Alexander treated her and the other captive princeſſes with great humanity; they were, ſays Plutarch [c], in Alexander's camp, not as in that of an enemy, but as in a holy temple deſigned for the aſylum of virtue, they all living ſo retired, that they were not ſeen by any one, none daring to approach their pavilion, but ſuch as were appointed to attend them. As Darius's conſort and her two daughters were princeſſes of an extraordinary beauty, Alexander after the firſt viſit reſolved never to ſee them any more, that his frailty might not expoſe him to any danger. This memorable circumſtance we find in a letter which he wrote to Parmenio, commanding him to put to death certain Macedonians who had abuſed the wives of ſome captives. In ſhort, he uſed them with ſuch reſpect, good nature, and humanity, that nothing but their captivity could make them ſenſible of their misfortune [d].

ALEXANDER, ſeeing himſelf now maſter of the field, detached Parmenio to Damaſcus, where Darius's treaſures were lodged, with the Theſſalian horſe. As he was on his march thither, he met with a meſſenger ſent by the governor of that city with a letter to Alexander, wherein he offered to betray the city to the king. The fourth day Parmenio arrived at Damaſcus, when the governor, pretending that he was not able to defend the city againſt a victorious army, cauſed by day-break a vaſt number of beaſts of burden to be loaded with the king's treaſure and rich furniture, as if he intended to retire and ſave them for his maſter, but in reality to deliver them up to the enemy, as he had agreed with Parmenio, who had opened the letter directed to the king. At the firſt ſight of the forces, which this general headed, the Perſians, who convoyed the treaſures, betook themſelves to flight, and left the Macedonians maſters of all the gold and ſilver that was deſigned to pay ſo numerous an army. Among the priſoners of diſtinction taken in the city were three young princeſſes, daughters of Ochus, who had reigned before Darius, and his widow; the daughter of Oxathres, brother to Darius; the wife of Artabazus, or Artabanus, the greateſt lord at court, with his ſon Ilioneus; the wife of Pharnabazus, whom Darius had appointed governor of all the cities on the coaſt, three daughters of Mentor; the wife and ſon of Memnon, that illuſtrious and renowned commander; inſomuch, that there was ſcarce one noble family in all Perſia which did not ſhare in this calamity. Beſides the immenſe treaſures which the Macedonians had already taken, they found in the city 2600 talents in ready money, and 500 in bullion, which was afterwards coined; they took 30,000 priſoners, and with the plunder of the city loaded 7000 camels. The Theſſalian horſe had the beſt ſhare of this booty, having been ſent by Alexander on this expedition, that they might enrich themſelves with the plunder of ſo wealthy a city, in regard they had diſtinguiſhed themſelves above the reſt in the late engagement [e]. The governor of the place was killed by one of his own men, and his head carried to Darius [f].

[b] Diodor. Plutarch. Arrian. Curt. Juſtin. ubi ſupra. [c] Plutarch. de fortuna Alexandri. [d] Plut. ibid.

After this victory Alexander marched into Syria, moſt of the cities of that country voluntarily ſubmitting to the conqueror, and even Darius's governors and commanders delivering themſelves and their treaſures up into his hands. Being arrived at Marathus, he received a letter from Darius, in which he ſtiled himſelf king without beſtowing that title on Alexander. He rather commanded than entreated him to aſk what ſum he pleaſed for the ranſom of his mother, wife, and children; and as to their diſpute about empire, they might decide it, if he thought proper, in a general engagement, to which both parties ſhould bring an equal number of troops; but if he were ſtill capable of wholeſome counſel, he would adviſe him to be contented with the kingdom of his anceſtors, and not invade that of another to which he had no right; that for the future they ſhould live in friendſhip and amity, and that he was ready to ſwear to the obſervance of theſe articles, and receive Alexander's oath. This letter, which was wrote with ſuch an unſeaſonable pride and haughtineſs, provoked Alexander to a great degree, who therefore in his anſwer began thus; Alexander the king to Darius; he he then enumerates the many injuries and calamities which the Greeks and Macedonians had ſuffered from the Perſians, reproaches that nation with the baſe and treacherous murder of his father Philip, and Darius in particular with ſetting a price upon his own head; whence he concludes, that he is not the aggreſſor, but has taken up arms in his own defence, and to revenge the death of his father and the injuries done to his country; and that the gods, who always declare for the juſt cauſe, approved of this war, he ſhews from the ſucceſs that attended it, ſince with their protection he had already ſubdued great part of Aſia, and defeated the mighty hoſt of the Perſians in a pitched battle with a handful of men. However, he engaged his word, that he would reſtore to him his wife, mother, and children, provided he repaired to him in the attire of a ſuppliant, and humbly begged him to give them their liberty, aſſuring him, that he might do it without the leaſt danger. He concluded by deſiring him to remember, when he next wrote, that he not only addreſſed a king, but his king. Theſippus was ordered to carry this letter [g].

[e] Plutarch, de fort. Alex. & Curt. l. iii. c. 25. [f] Curt. ibid.

ALEXANDER marched from thence into Phœnice, where the citizens of Byblos opened their gates to him, and their example was followed by other cities, in proportion as he advanced into the country; but none received him with greater joy than the Sidonians, whoſe city Ochus had lain in aſhes about eighteen years before, and put moſt of the inhabitants to the ſword. Since that time they bore ſuch a hatred to the Perſian name, that they were over-joyed at this opportunity of ſhaking off the yoke; and indeed were the firſt in Phœnice who ſubmitted to Alexander by their deputies, in oppoſition to Strabo their king, who was in the Perſian intereſt. Alexander depoſed him, and permitted Hephæſtion to elect in his room whomſoever of the Sidonians he ſhould judge worthy of ſo exalted a ſtation [h], as we have elſewhere related at length [i].

WHILE Alexander was in Phœnice, ſome of the Perſian generals, who had eſcaped from the battle at Iſſus, drawing together the remains of the ſcattered army, attempted, with the aſſiſtance of the Cappadocians and Paphlagonians to recover Lydia; but were in ſeveral engagements routed, and at laſt entirely diſperſed by Antigonus, whom Alexander had appointed governor of that province.

At

[g] Diodor. l. xvii. p. 517, 518. Arrian. l. ii. p. 83—86. Plut. in Alex. p. 678. Curt. l. iv. c. 1. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 10. [h] Curt. l. iv. c. 2. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 10. [i] Vol. ii. p. 374.

At the ſame time, theMacedonian fleet ſailing from Greece fell in with that of the enemies commanded by Ariſtomenes, whom Darius had ſent to recover the cities on the Helleſpont, and attacked them ſo briſkly that not one ſingle ſhip eſcaped [k].

ALL Syria and Phœnice were already ſubdued, except the city of Tyre, which he beſieged and took by aſſault, after the inhabitants had held out with incredible bravery for ſeven whole months, as we have related in the hiſtory of Phœnice [l].

WHILE Alexander was carrying on the ſiege of Tyre he received a ſecond letter from Darius, who at laſt condeſcended to give him the title of king; he offered him ten thouſand talents by way of ranſom for the captive princeſſes, and his daughter Statira in marriage with all the country he had conquered as far as the Euphrates; he put him in mind of the inconſtancy of fortune, and ſet out in moſt pompous terms the vaſt number of troops he could ſtill bring into the field; he repreſented the difficulties he might meet with in croſſing the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Araxes, and the Hydaſpes, which were ſo many barriers to the Perſian empire; that he would not have always the opportunity of ſhutting himſelf up among rocks and mountains, but would be obliged, ſome time or other, to engage in an open champain country, where he would be aſhamed to appear before him with a handful of men. Upon the receipt of this letter Alexander ſummoned a council, in which Parmenio was of opinion, that he ought to accept the offers of Darius, declaring, that he would agree to them were he Alexander; and ſo would I, replied Alexander, were I Parmenio. Without hearkening therefore to his advice, he anſwered, that he did not want the money Darius offered him; that it did not become him to offer what he no longer poſſeſſed, nor pretend to diſpoſe of what he had already loſt; that if he was the only perſon who did not know which of the two was the beſt commander, a battle would ſoon determine it; that he ſhould not be frightened with rivers after having croſſed the ſea, and would not fail to purſue Darius, and come up with him at laſt, to what place ſoever he ſhould think proper to retire [m]. Darius, upon the receipt of this letter, loſt all hopes hopes of an accommodation, and began anew to prepare for war.

[k] Curt. l. iv. c. 4. [l] Vol. ii. p. 386. & ſeq. [m] Plut. in Alex. p. 681. Curt. l. iv. c. 5. Arrian l. ii. p. 101.

ALEXANDER having reduced Tyre marched from thence to Jeruſalem, and from Jeruſalem to Gaza. On his arri val at that city he found it defended by a ſtrong gariſon under the command of Betis, or, as ſome call him, Babemeſis [n], one of Darius's eunuchs, who, being a man of great experience in military affairs, and very faithful to his ſovereign, reſolved to hold out againſt Alexander till he was reduced to the laſt extremities. As this place was the only inlet into Egypt, Alexander could not paſs thither till he was become maſter of it, and therefore was forced to beſiege it. But notwithſtanding his men behaved with the utmoſt intrepidity, and his commanders exerted the utmoſt of military ſkill, yet it coſt him and his whole army two entire months to reduce it. The ſtop which this put to his intended march into Egypt, and two dangerous wounds which he received in the ſiege, provoked him to ſuch a degree, that on his taking of the place he treated the commander, inhabitants, and ſoldiers in a manner no-ways becoming a conqueror. For having cut 10,000 of them in pieces, he ſold the reſt with their wives and children for ſlaves. When Betis, who had been taken priſoner in the laſt aſſault, was brought before him, inſtead of uſing him kindly, as his valour and fidelity juſtly deſerved, and a generous enemy ought to have done, he ordered his heels to be bored, a cord to be drawn through them, and the unhappy captive, thus tied to a chariot, to be dragged round the city till he expired, bragging, that herein he imitated his progenitor Achilles, who, as Homer relates, cauſed the dead body of Hector to be thus dragged round the walls of Troy, as though a man ought ever to take pride in imitating a bad example. Both acts were barbarous and inhuman, but that of Alexander much more ſo; for Achilles cauſed only Hector's dead body to be ſo abuſed, whereas Alexander thus treated Betis while alive, and for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had ſerved his ſovereign with fidelity in the poſt committed to his charge, which even Alexander, though an enemy, would have admired and rewarded, had he made the true principles of virtue and generoſity the rule of his actions; but his ſentiments and conduct began now to change with his fortune [o]. He ſent ſent great part of the booty he found in the city to Olympias, to Cleopatra and his friends, and having left a gariſon there, he marched directly for Egypt, and in ſeven days arrived before Peluſium, where he was met by great numbers of Egyptians, who flocked thither to make their ſubmiſſion to him. The hatred they bore to the Perſians was ſuch, that they willingly embraced all opportunities of ſhaking off the yoke they groaned under, and ſeemed not to care by whom they were governed, provided they could but meet with one who was able to reſcue them from that inſolence and indignity, with which the Perſians treated them and their religion. Ochus had ſlain their god Apis, in a manner highly injurious to themſelves and their religion; and the Perſian governors treated their gods in the ſame manner; which raiſed their indignation to ſuch a height, that when Amyntas (X) came thither a little before with a handful of men, he found them ready to join him in driving out the Perſians. Alexander therefore no ſooner appeared on the frontiers, but the Egyptians flocked to him from all parts, and received him with open arms. His arrival at the head of a powerful and victorious army gave them ſecure protection, which they could not promiſe themſelves from Amyntas, and on this conſideration they openly declared, without reſerve, in his favour. Hereupon Mazæus, who commanded in Memphis, ſeeing he was not in a condition to oppoſe this general

The city of Gaza beſieged and taken by Alexander.

[n] Joſeph. antiquit. l. xi. c. ult. [o] Curt. l. iv. c. 10. Arrian. l. ii. prope finem. Plut. in Alex. p. 679.

(X) This Amyntas, having fled from Alexander to Darius, was one of the commanders of the Greek mercenaries at the battle of Iſſus, from whence having brought off 4000 of his men, he got ſafe to Tripoli in Syria, where he embarked, as we have related above, and ſailed firſt to Cyprus, and then to Peluſium in Egypt, which city he ſeized, making the gariſon believe, that he had been appointed governor of Egypt in the room of Sabaces, who had been killed in the battle of Iſſus. Aſſoon as he found himſelf poſſeſſed of this important place, he threw off the maſk, and declared his deſign of ſeizing Egypt for himſelf, and driving the Perſians from thence. Whereupon the Egyptians, out of hatred to the Perſians, readily joined him, and he, having formed a conſiderable army, marched directly for Memphis, where he defeated the Perſians in a pitched battle, and ſhut them up in the city. But, after this victory, permitting his ſoldiers to ſtraggle up and down the country in queſt of booty, thePerſians ſallied out upon them thus diſperſed, and cut them all to pieces with Amyntas their leader (82) neral inſurrection, opened the gates to the conqueror, and put him in poſſeſſion of the metropolis of that kingdom, with 800 talents and all the king's rich furniture [P]. Thus Alexander, without any oppoſition, became maſter of all Egypt.

(82) Arrian. l. ii. Curt. l. iv. c. 3. Diodo. l. xvii. p. 587, 588.

Egypt ſubmits to Alexander.

At Memphis Alexander formed a deſign of viſiting the temple of Jupiter Hammon, and in his way thither built Alexandria, which ſoon became the metropolis of that kingdom. On his return from the temple he ſettled the affairs of Egypt, and marched from thence in the beginning of the ſpring to find out Darius. On his return into Phœnice he ſtaid ſome time at Tyre, that he might there ſettle the affairs of the countries which he was to leave behind him, before he ſet out to make new conqueſts; and having ordered matters as he thought fit, he began his march, and with his whole army arrived at Thapſacus, where he croſſed the Euphrates, and continued his march towards the Tigris in queſt of the enemy. Darius in the mean time, after ſeveral overtures for a peace, finding, that there were no hopes of an accommodation, unleſs he reſigned the whole empire, applied himſelf to make the neceſſary preparations for another engagement. For this purpoſe having aſſembled at Babylon an army half as numerous again as that with which he fought at Iſſus, (for it conſiſted of 1,100,000 men) he took the field, and marched towards Niniveh. Advice being brought him, that the enemy was not far off, he detached Satropates, commander of the cavalry, at the head of a thouſand choſen horſe, and Mazæus, governor of that province, with ſix thouſand, to prevent Alexander from croſſing the Tigris, and to lay waſte the country through which he was to paſs. But they came too late, Alexander having, with the utmoſt difficulty, croſſed the river a little before they arrived. He encamped two days on the banks of the river, during which time there happened an eclipſe of the moon, which ſo terrified the Macedonians, that they refuſed to proceed in their march, crying out, that heaven diſplayed the marks of its anger, that they were dragged againſt the will of the gods to the utmoſt extremities of the earth, and that even the moon refuſed to lend them her uſual light. Hereupon Alexander, having ſummoned the officers of the army into his tent, commanded the Egyptian ſoothſayers to declare what they thought of this phænomenon.

[P] Curt. l. iv. c. 20. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 11. Arrian. l. iii. p. 104—110. Diodor. l. xvii. p. 526—529.

phænomenon. Theſe were well acquainted with the natural cauſes of eclipſes, but, without entering into ſuch enquiries, they replied, that the ſun was predominant in Greece, and the moon in Perſia, whence as often as the moon ſuffered an eclipſe, ſome great calamity was thereby portended to the latter. This anſwer, being immediately ſpread abroad among the ſoldiers, revived their hopes and courage; and Alexander, taking advantage of this ardor, began his march after midnight, having on his right the Tigris, and the Gordyæan mountains on his left [q]. At day-break the ſcouts, he had ſent out to reconnoitre, brought word, that Darius was on full march to meet him; whereupon he immediately drew up his forces, and put himſelf at the head of the army. But as they drew near, he found, that it was only a detachment of 1000 horſe, which, as the Macedonians advanced, retired in great haſte to the main army; they were perſued by Ariſto, commander of the Pæonian horſe, who having defeated that body and killed Satropates their leader, brought back his head, and threw it down at Alexander's feet, telling him, that in his country ſuch a preſent was uſually rewarded with a cup of gold; Alexander replied ſmiling, with an empty one, but I will give you a golden cup, and that full of wine [r]. Not long after Alexander received intelligence, that Darius was not above 150 furlongs off; whereupon he halted to refreſh his ſoldiers before the engagement, having in the camp great ſtore of proviſions. During this time he intercepted ſome letters wrote by Darius to the Greeks, ſoliciting them with great promiſes either to kill or betray Alexander. The king was in doubt with himſelf whether he ſhould read them in full aſſembly, for he relied as much on the fidelity of the Greeks, as on that of the Macedonians; but Parmenio diſſuaded him from it, telling him, that even the raiſing of ſuch thoughts in the minds of ſoldiers might be attended with ſome danger, and that the hopes of a great reward were capable of prompting a man to attempt the moſt enormous crimes. The king followed his prudent advice, and ordered his army to march forward [s]. He was ſcarce ſet out, when an eunuch brought him word, that Statira, Darius's wife, was dead, whereupon he immediately returned, and entering the pavilion, where Syſigambis and the other royal priſoners were kept, comforted them in ſo kind and

[q] Arrian. l. iii. Curt. l. iv. c. 24. [r] Arrian. l. iii. Curt. l. iv. c. 23. Plut. in Alex. [s] Curt. l. iv. c. 25.

and tender a manner, as plainly ſhewed his deep concern. He cauſed the funeral obſequies of the deceaſed princes to be performed with the utmoſt ſplendor and magnificence, which Darius hearing, and at the ſame time being informed with what reſpect Alexander had treated her in her life-time, he is ſaid to have prayed the gods, that if the time ordained by the fates for the transferring of the Perſian empire into other hands was come, none might ſit on the throne of Cyrus, but ſo juſt, ſo merciful, ſo generous a conqueror as Alexander [t]. And although he had twice ſued in vain for peace, yet being overcome by the tenderneſs and humanity, which Alexander had ſhewn his wife, mother, and children, diſpatched ten of his relations as embaſſadors, offering him new conditions of peace more advantageous than the former, and returning him thanks for the kind treatment he had indulged his family. He had in his former propoſals offered him all the provinces of Aſia as far as the Halys; but now he added the countries lying between the Helleſpont and the Euphrates, that is, whatever Alexander was already maſter of, and offered 30,000 talents by way of ranſom for his family. Parmenio again adviſed Alexander to accept of the conditions, telling him, that the provinces between the Euphrates and the Helleſpont would be a great addition to the kingdom of Macedon, and that the Perſian priſoners were only an incumbrance to the army, whereas the treaſure offered for their ranſom might be employed for the uſe of his troops, or to reward the ſervices of his friends. But Alexander, without hearkening to his advice, returned the following anſwer to the embaſſadors; that the clemency he had ſhewn to the wife and children of Darius proceeded from his own good nature, without any regard to their maſter; that he did not make war upon women and children, but upon ſuch only as appeared in arms againſt him; that if Darius had ſued for peace in good earneſt, he would have hearkened to his propoſals; but ſince he continued to ſpirit up, with large bribes, his own ſoldiers to murder or betray him, he could not believe that his offers were ſincere, and therefore was determined to purſue him, with the utmoſt vigor, not as a fair enemy, but as a traytor and aſſaſſin; that as to the provinces he offered him, they were already his own, and if Darius could force him to retire beyond the Euphrates, which he had already croſſed, he might then offer them

[t] Curt. & Plutarch. ibidem.

them as his ; that he propoſed to himſelf, as a reward for the toils he had already endured, all thoſe kingdoms which Darius ſtill enjoyed, wherein whether he flattered himſelf with a vain hope or no, the next day's engagement ſhould determine ; he concluded by telling the embaſſadors, that he was come into Aſia to give, and not to receive ; that the heavens could not hold two ſuns, and therefore if Darius would ſubmit to him, acknowledging him his lord and ſovereign, he would then hearken to propoſals [u]. The embaſſadors returned back, and told Darius, that he muſt prepare for an engagement ; whereupon that prince encamped near a village called Gaugamela, in a large plain at a conſiderable diſtance from the city of Arbela, having before-hand levelled the ground, that his cavalry and chariots might move and act with more eaſe. Alexander, hearing that Darius was ſo near, continued four days in his camp to reſt the army, and ſurrounded it with deep trenches and palliſades, being determined to leave there his baggage and ſuch of his men as were indiſpoſed. He ſet out about the ſecond watch with a deſign to engage the enemy at break of day, and arriving at a riſing ground, whence he could diſcover their whole army, he halted, and ſummoned a council, being in doubt whether he ſhould encamp there, or immediately fall upon the enemy. Parmenio adviſed him to attack their camp in the night-time, alledging, that they might eaſily be defeated, if taken by ſurprize and in the dark, but the king anſwered, that it did not become Alexander to ſteal a victory, and therefore he was reſolved to fight and conquer in broad day-light. Accordingly he encamped there in the ſame order in which the army had marched, and after giving the proper orders he retired to repoſe the remaining part of the night, but, being under no ſmall concern, he could not ſleep till towards the morning, ſo that when his generals were aſſembled at day-break before his tent, they were greatly ſurprized to find that he was not yet awake. Parmenio, after waiting ſome time, thought fit to call him, and ſeeming amazed that he ſhould ſleep ſo ſound, when he was upon the point of hazarding a battle, on which depended the empire of Aſia ; Alexander told him, that Darius, by bringing all his forces into one place, had freed him from the trouble of thinking how he might purſue them into different countries [w]. He then without delay delay put on his armour, mounted on horſeback, and, having drawn up his men in battle array, advanced to encounter the enemy, who was at a very ſmall diſtance.

[u] Curt. l. iv. c. 26. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 12. [w] Juſtin. l. xi. c xiii. Curt. l. iv. c. 3—31. Plut. in Alex.

BOTH armies were drawn up in the ſame order, the infantry in the center and the cavalry on the wings; Darius's front was covered with 200 chariots, armed with ſcythes, and 25 elephants. Beſides his guards, which were the flower of his army, he had poſted the Grecian infantry near his perſon, believing this body alone capable of oppoſing the Macedonian phalanx. As his army took up a far greater ſpace of ground than Alexander's, his deſign was to ſurround and charge them at the ſame time in front and flank, which Alexander ſuſpecting, ordered thoſe who led the wings to extend them as wide as poſſible without weakening the center. His baggage and the captives, among whom were Darius's mother and children, were left in the camp under a ſmall guard. Parmenio commanded, as he had always done, the left wing, and Alexander the right. When the two armies were in ſight of each other, the Macedonians halted, waiting till the enemies ſhould advance to attack them, which they did accordingly, Darius himſelf charging in the firſt line. Arrian and Curtius [x] deſcribe this battle at length; they tell us, that the Perſians were often repulſed, but returned again to the charge; that victory inclined ſometimes to one ſide, and ſometimes to another; that Parmenio, who commanded the left wing, was in great danger, and his men obliged to give ground; that Alexander's rear was put in diſorder, and the baggage taken; that both kings wrought wonders, &c. But after all Curtius tells us, that the Macedonians, notwithſtanding the great oppoſition they met with, loſt only 300 men, and Arrian allows not a third of that number ſlain; whereas of the Perſians there fell 40,000 ſays Curtius, 30,000 according to Arrian, and 90,000 if we believe Diodorus. From theſe accounts, we can form no other judgment of this great encounter, but that the Perſians at the very firſt onſet betook themſelves to flight, and the Macedonians purſued them: for had the ſeven or eight hundred thouſand men, which Darius brought into the field, thrown each one dart or ſtone, the Macedonians could not have bought the empire of the eaſt at ſo an eaſy

a

[x] Arrian. l. iii. Curt. l. iv. c. 25. & ſeq.

a rate. In the heat of the battle, when the Macedonians were in the greateſt danger, Ariſtander the ſoothſayer, cloathed in his white robes, and holding a branch of olive in his hand, is reported to have advanced among the firſt ranks, and in concert with Alexander to have cried out, that he ſaw an eagle hovering over the king's head, a ſure omen of victory; he pointed with his finger at the pretended bird; and the ſoldiers believing him, and ſome even fancying they ſaw it, renewed the attack with more courage and reſolution than ever. We are told, that Darius, ſeeing his numerous army put ſo ſhamefully to flight, drew his ſcymetar, and was ſome time in ſuſpenſe whether he ſhould lay violent hands on himſelf, rather than fly in ſo ignominious a manner, but at laſt reſolved to ſave himſelf by flight, and arrived at Arbela the ſame night (Y). After he had paſſed the Lycus, ſome, who attended him in his flight, adviſed him to break down the bridge in order to ſtop the enemy's purſuit; but he, reflecting how many of his own men were haſtening to paſs over the ſame bridge, replyed, that he had rather leave an open way to a purſuing enemy, than ſhut it to a flying friend [y]. (Z). He arrived about midnight at Arbela, whither he was followed by a great many of his nobles and commanding officers, whom he called together, and acquainted them

[y] Curt. l. iv. c. 36, 37. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 14.

(Y) This battle was fought at Gaugamela near the river Beumelus, as Ptolemy Lagi and Ariſtobulus, who were preſent, aver; they are followed both by Strabo (83) and Plutarch (84), and nevertheleſs becauſe Gaugamela was only a ſmall village, and the name not agreeable to the ear, ſignifying the camels houſe, the battle is ſaid to have been fought at Arbela, which was a great and famous city in thoſe parts (85). Gaugamela and Arbela were at a conſiderable diſtance from each other; for between the river Beumelus, on which ſtood Gaugamela, and the Lycus, on the banks of which Arbela was ſituated, Curtius reckons 80 furlongs (86). According to Strabo's deſcription of thoſe places Arbela in Ptolemy's fifth map of Aſia ought to be placed where we find Gaugamela (87).

(Z) In Juſtin we read Cydnus inſtead of Lycus, which laſt river runs through the City of Tarſus in Cilicia; and hence it is, that Oroſius, who ever follows Juſtin, was led into ſo groſs a miſtake as to think that this great battle was fought at Tarſus (88).

(83) Strabo, lib. 26. p. 737. (84) Plut. in Alexand. (85) Arrian. l. 6. p. 101. Strabo, ubi ſupra. (86) Curt. l. iv. c. 22. (87) Vide Strab. l. ii. p. 79. (88) Oroſ. l. iii. c. 17.

them that he deſigned to leave all for the preſent to Alexander and fly into Media, from whence and from the reſt of the northern provinces he could draw together new forces, to try once more his fortune in battle. Alexander purſued him as far as Arbela, but, before his arrival there, Darius was by the quickneſs of his flight got over the mountains of Armenia, attended by ſome of his relations, and a ſmall body of guards called Melophori, becauſe each of them bore a golden apple on the point of their ſpear. In Armenia he was joined by 2000 Greek mercenaries, who, under the command of Pharon an Ionian and Glaucus an Æolian, had eſcaped from the battle. Alexander took the city of Arbela, where he ſeized on immenſe ſums of money, with all Darius's rich furniture and equipage, and returned to his camp. After having allowed his army ſome days of reſt, he ſet out on his march to Babylon. Mazæus was governor of that city and province, and had after the late battle retired thither with the ſcattered remains of the body he commanded. But, on the approach of Alexander's victorious army, he had not courage enough to oppoſe him; marching therefore out to meet him he delivered the city and himſelf with his children into the conqueror's hands. Bagaphanes governor of the caſtle, where all Darius's treaſures were lodged, did the ſame, and Alexander entered the city at the head of the whole army, as though he had been marching againſt an enemy. After a ſtay of 30 days in that city, he continued Mazæus in the government of that province, but giving the command of the caſtle and gariſon to a Macedonian, he took Bagaphanes along with him, and marched towards Suſa, where he arrived twenty days after his departure from Babylon. As he drew near the city, Abulites governor of the place, ſent his ſon to meet him, and acquaint him, that he was ready to deliver the city and all the king's treaſure into his hands. The king's received the young nobleman with great marks of kindneſs, and, uſing him as a guide, advanced to the river Choaſpes, where Abulites himſelf met him with preſents worthy of ſo great a prince; among other things he preſented him with dromedaries, or running camels, of incredible ſwiftneſs, and twelve elephants which Darius had ſent for out of India. Having entered the city, the governor delivered up to him 50,000 in bullion, and 40,000 talents in ready money, with all the king's furniture to an immenſe value. Here he found part of the rarities which Xerxes had brought out of Greece, namely, the brazen ſtatues of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, which he ſent to Athens, where they were ſtill ſtanding in Arrian's time. As for the purple and ſcarlet robes, he ſent them all to Syſigambis together with ſome others curiouſly wrought, which had been ſent him out of Macedon, adding in his meſſage to her, that if ſhe liked the Macedonian robes, he would ſend her thoſe who had wrought them, that her grand children might learn the art by way of amuſement. At theſe words ſhe could not help betraying ſome concern and uneaſineſs, it being looked upon by the Perſian women as mean and unbecoming to employ themſelves in works of that nature; which when Alexander underſtood, he thought himſelf obliged to make an apology for what he had done; and accordingly went immediately to wait upon her, and begged, that ſhe would not conſider that as an affront, which was entirely owing to his ignorance of the Perſian manners; adding, that the robes he then wore were not only a preſent from his ſiſters, but wrought with their own hands [z].

ALEXANDER having thus comforted Syſigambis took his leave of her, and, leaving a ſtrong gariſon in the city of Suſa, advanced towards the province of Perſis. He arrived in four days march on the banks of the Paſitigris, which river he croſſed with 9000 foot and 4000 horſe, and entered the country of the Uxians. This province extends from Suſiana to the frontiers of Perſis, and was governed by one Madates, who had married the niece of Syſigambis. Madates, who was not, like the other Perſian governors, a time-ſerver, but faithful to his ſovereign, reſolved to hold out to the laſt extremity, and with this deſign retired into a ſtrong hold, in the midſt of craggy mountains, and ſurrounded on all ſides by ſteep precipices. Here he held out for ſome time with great bravery, and, when the city was taken by aſſault withdrew into the citadel, whence, ſeeing there were no hopes of being relieved, he ſent 30 deputies to Alexander to treat of a ſurrender. The king, who was greatly provoked againſt Madates, would not at firſt hearken to any propoſals; but, in the mean time, receiving letters from Syſigambis, wherein ſhe intreated him to pardon her relation, he not only complied with her requeſt, but ſet all the priſoners at liberty, reſtored Madates to his former dignity, left the city untouched, and the citizens in the full enjoyment of their ancient liberty and privileges [a].

HAVING

[z] Curt. l. v. c. 8. [a] Curt. l. v. c. 9.

HAVING reduced the Uxians, he ordered Parmenio with part of his army to march through the plain, while he himſelf, at the head of the light-armed foot, advanced by the way of the mountains, which extend to the frontiers of Perſia. The fifth day he arrived at the ſtraits of Perſia. Theſe Ariobarzanes held with 4000 foot and 700 horſe, which he had poſted on the tops of the hills out of the enemies reach. Aſſoon as Alexander advanced to attack him, the Perſians from the tops of the mountains rolled down ſtones of ſuch a prodigious ſize, that they cruſhed at once whole ranks. The king, being greatly frightened at this ſight, commanded a retreat to be ſounded, and withdrew about 30 furlongs from the paſs, where he lay encamped ſome time, not knowing how to advance, and being aſhamed to return; but, in the mean time, a Greek deſerter coming to his camp offered him readily to conduct him through by-paths to the very top of the mountain, whence he might eaſily ſo annoy the Perſians, as to oblige them to abandon the ſtraits and leave an open paſſage to the whole army. He was as good as his word; for Alexander, at the head of ſome choſen troops, having followed his guide all that night through rocks and precipices, arrived a little before day-break at the top of a mountain, which commanded all the hills where the enemies were poſted; which they obſerving betook themſelves to flight; and at the ſame time Craterus, who had been left in the camp, advancing with the troops under his command, poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſtraits. Ariobarzanes with part of the cavalry, breaking through the Macedonians with great ſlaughter both of them and his own men, made his eſcape over the mountains, with a deſign to throw himſelf into Perſepolis; but finding all the paſſes leading to that city guarded by the enemy, he returned back upon thoſe that purſued him, and was killed with all thoſe that followed him, after having cut in pieces great numbers of the Macedonians [b].

BEING now poſſeſſed of the ſtraits, Alexander purſued his march into Perſis, or Perſia, properly ſo called. When he was at ſome diſtance from Perſepolis the metropolis of that province, he received letters from the governor of the place, acquainting him, that the citizens, upon the news of his approach, were ready to plunder Darius's treaſures with which he had been intruſted, and deſired him to march with all poſſible expedition, that he might ſeize them himſelf. Alexander, upon the receipt of this letter, leaving his infantry behind, marched the whole night at the head of the cavalry, and having paſſed the Araxes on a bridge, which by his order had been built ſome days before, arrived by day-break within two furlongs of Perſepolis. The next day having aſſembled the generals of his army, he repreſented to them, that no city had ever been more fatal to Greece than Perſepolis, the antient reſidence of the Perſian monarchs and the capital of their empire; that from thence thoſe mighty armies had been ſent, which had over-run and laid waſte great part of Europe, and that it was therefore incumbent upon them to revenge on that proud metropolis the many injuries and calamities which their anceſtors had ſuffered. The commanders, being encouraged by this ſpeech, allowed their ſoldiers to practiſe all manner of cruelties againſt the miſerable inhabitants, who were maſſacred in a moſt barbarous manner. After this cruel execution, leaving Craterus and Parmenio in the place, the king with a ſmall body went to reduce the neighbouring cities and ſtrong holds, which all ſubmitted at the approach of his troops; he then returned to Perſepolis, and there took up his winter quarters. In this city he is ſaid to have found 120,000 talents, lodged in the treaſury to defray the expences of the war [c].

[b] Curt. Arrian. Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra & Polyænus. l. iv. ſtratagem.

During his ſtay at Perſepolis he gave himſelf up to feaſting and drinking, making daily great entertainments for his officers to refreſh them after the great fatigues they had endured. In one of theſe entertainments both the king and his gueſts having drunk to exceſs, Thais, a famous Athenian courtezan, and at that time miſtreſs to Ptolemy, who was afterwards king of Egypt, propoſed the burning of Darius's palace, telling Alexander, with a gay air, that it would be matter of inexpreſſible joy to her, were ſhe permitted to burn the ſtately palace of Xerxes, who had burnt Athens, and ſet it on fire with her own hands, that it might be ſaid in all parts of the world, that the woman, who had followed Alexander in his expedition into Aſia, had revenged more ſeverely the many calamities Greece had ſuffered from the Barbarians, than all the generals that had been employed againſt them. As the whole company was drunk, the propoſal was received with general applauſe, and the king himſelf, riſing from table, and taking a torch in his hand, followed Thais. The reſt of the the Macedonians, crowding at this noise to the palace, armed themselves, after the king's example, with lighted tapers, and surrounding the palace burnt it with the city, for the flames could not be stopt, down the ground [d]. Thus the most stately edifice in the world was, at the motion of a drunken strumpet, reduced to ashes.

[c] Curt. l. v. c. 13. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 14.

From Persepolis Alexander marched early in the spring to Pasargada, resolved to pursue Darius, who was fled to Ecbatan in Media. That unhappy prince had still an army of 30,000 foot, among whom were 4000 Greeks, who continued faithful to the last. Besides these he had 4000 slingers and 3000 horse, most of them Bactrians, and commanded by Bessus, governor of Bactria. When he heard, that Alexander was in full march towards Ecbatan, he left that city with a design to retire into Bactria, and there raise another army. But he was not far advanced when he altered his resolution, and determined to venture a third battle with the forces then about him. While he was making the necessary preparations for the engagement, Bessus, governor of Bactria, and Nabarzanes, a Persian lord of great distinction, formed a conspiracy against him, proposing to seize his person, and, if Alexander pursued them, to gain his friendship and protection by betraying their master into his hands; but if they escaped, their design was to murder him, usurp the crown, and renew the war. They easily won over the troops by representing to them, that Darius was draging them to destruction, that they were no-ways in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy, that they would inevitably perish if they followed Darius, crushed under the ruins of an empire which was ready to fall. Though these practices were carried on with great secrecy, yet they came to Darius's ear, but he could not believe them. Patron, who commanded the Greeks, earnestly entreated him to encamp among them, and trust the guard of his person to men on whose fidelity he might depend. Darius replied, that he had rather suffer any misfortune among those of his own nation, than seek for shelter among strangers, how faithful and affectionate soever he might believe them, and that he could not die too soon, if his own Persians thought him unworthy to live. Not long after Darius had occasion to repent his not following Patron's advice; for [d] Curt. l. v. c. 15. Diodor. Plut. in Alex. Arrian. l. iii. Justin. l. xi.

Bessus and Nabarzanes, seizing his person, bound him, out of respect to his royal dignity, in chains of gold, and, shutting him up in a covered cart, fled with him towards Bactria. The cart, was covered with skins, and strangers appointed to drive it, without knowing who the prisoner was they had in their custody [e]. Bessus was proclaimed commander in chief in Darius's room by the Bactrian horse; but Artabazus and his sons, with the forces they commanded, and the Greeks under the command of Patron retired from the body of the army under Bessus, and marched over the mountains towards Parthiene [f]. In the mean time, Alexander, arriving at Ecbatan, was informed that Darius had left that city five days before. Here the Thessalians shewing a great reluctancy to accompany him any further, he gave them leave to return to their own country, and at their parting divided 2000 talents among them over and above their full pay; to such as were willing to continue in his service he gave three talents a piece [g]. He then commanded Parmenio to lay up in the castle of Ecbatan the remaining part of the treasures, which, according to Strabo [h], amounted 180,000 talents, and afterwards to march with the Thracians and great part of the cavalry into the country of the Cadusians. He dispatched orders to Clitus, who had fallen sick at Susa, to repair as soon as he recovered, to Ecbatan, and from thence to follow him into Parthia with the cavalry and 6000 Macedonians that were left in Ecbatan. Alexander with the rest of his army pursued Darius, and the eleventh day arrived at Rages, having marched in that space of time 3300 furlongs. Most part of those who accompanied him died through the fatigues of so long and expeditious a march; insomuch, that, on his arrival at Rages, he could muster but 60 horsemen [i]. Finding, that he could not come up with Darius, who had already passed the Caspian straits, he staid five days at Rages, in order to refresh his army, and settle the affairs of Media. From thence he marched into Parthia, and encamped the first day at a small distance from the Caspian straits, which he passed the next without any opposition. He had scarce entered Parthia when he was informed by Bagisthenes a Persian nobleman, that Bessus and Nabarzanes had conspired against Darius, and designed to [e] Curt. l. v. c. 18. 22, 23. Arrian. l. iii. p. 67. [f] Curt. l. v. c. 23. Arrian. l. iv. p. 68. [g] Curt. l. vi. c. 3. Arrian. l. iii. Plut. in Alex. [h] Strabo, l. xv. p. 741. [i] Arrian. l. iii. Plut. in Alex.

to ſeize him. Hereupon, leaving the main body of the army behind under the command of Craterus, he advanced with a ſmall troop of horſe lightly armed, and, having marched night and day without ever halting, except a few hours, came the third day to a village where Beſſus with his Bactrians had encamped the day before. Here he underſtood, that Darius had been ſeized by the traitors, that Beſſus had cauſed him to be ſhut up in a cloſe cart, which he had ſent before that he might be the ſurer of his perſon, and that the whole army, except Artabazus and the Greeks, who had taken another rout, obeyed Beſſus and acknowledged him for their general. This was a freſh motive for Alexander to haſten his march; taking therefore along with him a ſmall body of light-armed horſe, for the others could not poſſibly proceed any further, he ſet out again the ſame night, and early next morning was acquainted by Orcillus and Mithracenes two Perſian officers, who in deteſtation of the treachery of Beſſus had fled over to him, that the Bactrians were not above 500 furlongs off, and that they could lead him to them by a nearer way. Taking them therefore for his guides, he ſet out again the ſame night, and after marching 300 furlongs was met by the ſon of Mazæus, formerly governor of Syria, who informed him, that Beſſus was not above 200 furlongs off, and that his army, as not apprehending any danger, was marching in diſorder, and might eaſily be ſurprized and cut in pieces. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and at laſt came in ſight of the enemy. His unexpected arrival ſtruck the Barbarians, though far ſuperior in number, with ſuch terror, that they immediately betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, and becauſe Darius refuſed to follow them, Beſſus and thoſe that were about him diſcharging their darts at the unfortunate prince, left him wallowing in his blood to the mercy of the Macedonians. This done they ſeparated and took different routs, Beſſus flying towards Hyrcania, and Nabarzanes into Bactria, that by this means they might elude the purſuit of the enemy or at leaſt oblige him to divide his forces. They were attended only by a few horſe, the reſt, now deſtitute of leaders, diſperſing themſelves up and down the country, as fear or hope directed their ſteps. Alexander, ſeeing what confuſion the enemies were in, ſent Nicanor with a troop of light-armed horſe to ſtop their flight, and himſelf followed at the head of 3000 Macedonians. Nicanor put near 3000 of the ſtragglers to the ſword, but could not come up either with Beſſus or Nabarzanes, which Alexander obſerve-

Darius Codomanus ſlain, Year of the flood 5968. Before Chriſt 331.

ing

ing ſent him orders to give quarters to all thoſe that ſhould throw down their arms and ſubmit. In the mean time, the horſes that drew the cart in which was Darius halted of their own accord, for the drivers had been killed by Beſſus, near a certain village about four furlongs from the highway, whither Polyſtratus a Macedonian, being preſſed with thirſt in the purſuit of the enemy, was ſoon after conducted by the inhabitants to refreſh himſelf, at a fountain not far from the place wherethey ſtopt. As he was filling his helmet with water he heard the groans of a dying man, and looking round him diſcovered a cart with a team of horſes, not able to move for the many wounds they had received. As he drew near he ſaw Darius lying in the cart and very near his end, having ſeveral darts ſtill ſticking in his body. However, he had ſtrength enough to call for ſome water, which Polyſtratus, being by a Perſian captive informed of this barbarous tragedy, readily brought him. Darius after drinking turned to the Macedonian, and told him with a faint voice, that, in the deplorable ſtate to which he was reduced, it was no ſmall comfort to him that his laſt words would not be loſt; he then charged him to return his hearty thanks to Alexander for the kindneſs he had ſhewn to his wife, mother, and children, and acquaint him, that with his laſt breath he beſought the gods to proſper him in all his undertakings, and make him ſole monarch of the univerſe; he added, that it did not ſo much concern him as Alexander to purſue and bring to condign puniſhment thoſe traitors, who had treated with ſuch cruelty their lawful ſovereign, that being the common cauſe of all crowned heads; then taking Polyſtratus by the hand, "Give Alexander, ſaid he, your hand, as I give you "mine, and carry him, in my name, the only pledge I "am able to give in this condition of my gratitude and affection". Having uttered theſe words he expired in the arms of Polyſtratus. Alexander coming up a few minutes after, and beholding Darius's body, burſt out in tears, bewailing the cruel lot of a prince, who, ſaid he, deſerved a better fate. He immediately pulled off his own military cloke and covered it, cauſing it to be embalmed, and ſent in a rich and magnificent coffin to Syſigambis, that it might be interred with the other Perſian monarchs. Thus died Darius, in the fiftieth year of his age and ſixth of his reign. He was a mild and pacific prince, his reign having been unſullied with injuſtice, cruelty, or any of thoſe vices which moſt of his predeceſſors had been greatly addicted to. In him the Perſian empire ended, after it had laſted from

from the firſt of Cyrus 209 years under thirteen kings, viz. Cyrus, Cambyſes, Smerdis, Darius Hyſtaſpis, Xerxes I. Artaxerxes Longimanus, Xerxes II. Sogdianus, Darius Nothus, Artaxerxes Mnemon, Artaxerxes Ochus, Arſes, Darius Codomannus [k]. Upon the death of Darius all his commanders ſubmitted to the conqueror, by whom they were reſtored to their former honours and employments; but above all others he deſtinguiſhed Artaxerxes, in regard of his conſtant and unſhaken fidelity to his maſter, and Oxathres, Darius's brother, whom he ever treated in a manner becoming his high ſtation and noble birth. He was even, to his great diſhonour, prevailed upon to receive and pardon Nabarzanes, who together with Beſſus had murdered Darius. But Beſſus having fled into Bactria, and there aſſumed the title of king, Alexander in the beginning of the next ſpring marched againſt him: but his march out of Perſia into theſe northern countries is by authors deſcribed with great confuſion, for, after they had told us, that he was reſolved to find out Beſſus in Bactria, they make him take the way of Hyrcania, from thence wander northwards into the country of the Mardi, bordering on the Caſpian ſea, and after ſubduing the Mardi croſs mount Coronus into Aria and Drangiana. Be that as it will, he arrived at laſt after a long and tedious march in Bactriana, and having reſted his army ſome time at Drapſaca, he advanced againſt and reduced Aornos and Bactra, the two ſtrongeſt cities of that province. Alexander had no ſooner reached the confines of Bactria, but 8000 Bactrians, who till that time had followed Beſſus, abandoning him, withdrew to their reſpective homes. Hereupon Beſſus, at the head of the few troops that continued faithful to him, croſſing the river Oxus, retired into the province of Sogdiana, with a deſign to raiſe there a new army. In order to prevent Alexander from purſuing him, he burnt all the boats he had made uſe of in paſſing over his troops, hoping, that, as the river was no way fordable, and the country afforded no timber, he would thereby be obliged to return and give over the purſuit. But no difficulties were unſurmountable to that conqueror, who, finding no timber wherewithal to make boats or floats, cauſed the hides, which covered the ſoldiers tents and carriages, to be filled with ſtraw, and tied together. By this means he ſupplied the want want of timber, and paſſed his whole army over that large and deep river in the ſpace of five days; which Beſſus might have eaſily prevented had he but dared to look the Macedonians in the face. When the Bactrians, who were encamped at a place called Nautaca, heard that Alexander had croſſed the river, and was on full march to fall upon them, Spitamenes, whom Beſſus moſt confided in, together with Catanes and Dataphernes, formed a conſpiracy to ſeize Beſſus, and purchaſe their own ſafety by delivering him up to Alexander; which they did accordingly, tearing in pieces his diadem and royal robes, of which he had ſtript his lawful ſovereign Darius, and carrying him loaded with chains to the Macedonian camp. Spitamenes himſelf preſented the traitor to Alexander, not only bound, but ſtark naked, holding him by a chain round his neck; a ſight no leſs agreeable to the Perſians than the Macedonians. Alexander, having amply rewardedSpitamenes and his companions, and cauſed the traitor's noſe and ears to be cut off, delivered him into the hands of Oxathres, Darius's brother, to ſuffer whatever puniſhment he ſhould think proper to inflict for ſo baſe and treacherous a murder [l]; Plutarch [m] has left us an account of this execution; he tells us, that ſeveral trees being by main force bent down to the ground, and to each one of the traitor's limbs faſtened, the trees, as they were let return to their natural poſition, flew back with ſuch violence, that each carried with it the limb that was tied to it. Thus Beſſus ſuffered the puniſhment that was due to his treachery, and at his death Alexander ſaw himſelf in quiet poſſeſſion of the whole Perſian empire. This is what we have gathered from theGreek and Latin hiſtorians of the beſt account, concerning the affairs of the antient Perſians: In the following ſection we ſhall hear the orientals on the ſame ſubject.

[k] Curt. l. v. c. 25. Juſtin. l. xi. c. 15. Arrian. p. 69. Plut. in Alex.

Beſſus put to death. Year of the flood 2669. Before Chriſt 330.

SECT

[l] Curt. l. 7. c. 12. Arrian. l. 3. Diodor. l. 17. [m] Plut. in Alex. & Diodor. l. 17. p. 554. Arrian. l. iv. c. 7. Curt. l. 7. c. 10.

In ſtating the times of the Perſian empire we have followed all along Ptolemy's canon, and the records of the Greek and Latin authors. For the Jews own ſuch kings only as they find mentioned in the books of the Old Teſtament; whence, according to their computation in the greater chronicle Seder Olam Rabbah, the Medo-Perſian empire, from the building of the temple in the ſecond year of Darius Hyſtaſpis, flouriſhed only 34 years. Joſephus

SECT. V.

The hiſtory of Perſia according to the Oriental writers.

What degree of certainty may be expected in the following hiſtory.

WE have been ſo long uſed to hear every thing tranſcribed from eaſtern authors cenſured as vain and fabulous; that how unwilling ſoever we may be to trouble the reader with preparatory diſcourſes, yet in this caſe there ſeems to be a neceſſity of ſaying ſomewhat in ſupport of the narratives we are going to recite, that they may not be taken for mere figments, or romances void of all foundation. It is far from being our opinion, that every thing recorded by the Perſian writers is ſtrictly fact, that would be to place them not on a level with the beſt hiſtorians of other nations, but in a claſs high above them. For what people, what kingdom, what republic, can boaſt of ſuch a faultleſs ſeries of hiſtory? or why ſhould we expect a greater degree of clearneſs in the hiſtory of Perſia, as written by Oriental authors, than we find in the hiſtory of Greece, though written by Greeks, who were ſo proud of their own abilities, that they ſtiled all the reſt of the world Barbarians? It is ſufficient for our purpoſe, (which is no more than to gain the reader's proper attention for what we have collected of the Perſian hiſtory from eaſtern writers) that we ſhew there is as juſt reaſon to ſuppoſe they have delivered us a great many truths in their accounts of theſe early times, as can be produced in favour of any other hiſtory as antient. In order to this we ſhall neither multiply arguments nor words. In the firſt place we are told by Moſes [a], that there were kings in Perſia in the age immediately following that in which the Perſian writers placed the beginning of their monarchy. It is therefore evident, that theſe writers are not wrong in making their king

[a] Genes. xiv. 1. 9.

phus acknowledges only the following kings of Perſia, Cyrus Cambyſes, Darius Hyſtaſpis, Xerxes, Artaxerxes, and Darius; this Darius, who was Darius Nothus, he confounds with Darius Codomannus, who was conquered by Alexander, and refers to the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, whatever happened in the reigns of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and Artaxerxes Ochus.

kingdom ſo antient as they do. But ſecondly, there is no juſt cauſe to doubt, that either as ſoon as, or within a ſmall time after, the ſettling of regal government amongſt them, hiſtories, or at leaſt hiſtorical poems, were alſo introduced. This was the cuſtom in all places, at leaſt as far as we are able to trace things back. Firſt, a people lived miſerably and without order, then ſome great genius reformed and reduced them into ſociety, ſucceſſive kings cheriſhed and encreaſed that ſociety, and men having leiſure and eaſe conſidered theſe benefits, and gratefully ſung the praiſes of their benefactors. Moſes hath preſerved two fragments of an Amoritiſh poem, as old in all probability as the times we are ſpeaking of; and if the bards of that country ſung ſo early the praiſes of Sihon [b], why might not the Perſians have perſons among them as capable of tranſmitting to poſterity the memorable deeds of their princes? Thirdly, it is univerſally allowed, that the preſent Perſians have not only quick wits but are wonderfully ſtudious, and in a particular manner addicted to the converſation of the antiquities of their country. It may indeed be objected to this, that the modern and antient Perſians are not one and the ſame people; but hereto it may be replied, that the Perſees, the unadulterated remnant of the old inhabitants of this wide empire, are ſtill more ſtudious and more thoughtful than the preſent Perſians [c]. We may therefore conclude, that there were formerly many authentic hiſtories of the reigns of the moſt antient kings of this realm, I ſay we may conclude this from the reaſons already given if we had no other proof, but as we have, it would be unfair not to mention it, eſpecially ſince it may be drawn into very little room. The authorities which may be adduced in ſupport of this aſſertion, that the antient Perſians kept authentic records of their affairs, may be reduced under theſe two heads, viz. ſacred and profane. The authors of the books of [d] Ezra and [e] Nehemiah ſpeak frequently not only of the immutability of the Perſian laws, which implies that they were recorded, but alſo of public acts and regiſters. In the book of [f] Eſther, we have not only frequent mention of theſe, but alſo of the chronicles of the kingdom, or rather of the kings, of Perſia, wherein every thing of moment was ſet down. As to prophane writers, [g] Herodotus and [h] Xenophon are ſufficient to ſatisfy tisfy any impartial perſon as to the wiſdom and virtue of the ancient Perſians, and their care of all things which had regard to the honour and welfare of their country.

[b] Numb. xxi. 27. [c] Chardin. tom. iii. p. 130. [d] vi. 2. [e] ii. 7. [f] ii. 23. vi. 1. [g] Clio, p. 25. [h] Cyropædia.

How the antient hiſtories have been preſerved.

SUPPOSING it therefore as clear as the nature of the thing will admit, that the Perſians had amongſt them of old the hiſtories of their kings and heroes, we are next to ſhew how theſe can be reaſonably believed to be yet in being, and to have reached theſe diſtant times. Ofthis, however, we are not poſitive ourſelves; all that we can ſay is this, that the Perſians having lived under their own laws down to the time of Yezdegherd, there ſeems to be no difficulty in allowing that till then their hiſtories were frequent among them; for though the Macedonians might burn and deſtroy their records, yet it is incredible, that they ſhould deſtroy all the books in the empire; beſides, we know that the modern Perſees have the Zend or original Code of Zerduſht among them, with many other antient books: now it being generally agreed, that Zerduſht flouriſhed in the days of Darius Hyſtaſpis, it will be hard to aſſign a reaſon, why ſome of their antient hiſtories might not be preſerved, as well as theſe books of their law. But farther ſtill, Mohammed Ben Emir Khoandſchah commonly called Mirkhond, or Mirhound, with other modern Perſian authors, conſtantly and uniformly aſſert, that they write from ſuch authorities, and therefore we have no juſt reaſon to doubt them, unleſs we could ſhew the contrary (A).

IT

(A) This famous hiſtorian is quoted by various names, and thoſe names have received ſome alterations from the different orthographies uſed in oriental apellations; ſometimes he is called Mirchond, ſometimes Mirkhond, and ſometimes Chondemir; he wrote a general hiſtory from the beginning of the world to the year of the Hegira 900, under the title of Raoudhat al Safa; he was a perſon of great natural parts, and of much learning, perfectly well ſkilled in the Perſian antiquities, and wrote from the beſt hiſtories extant in his time (1); for this reaſon we find him often quoted by the very learned D. Hyde (2), and indeed by all the writers of note on Perſian affairs. His fame became known in Europe by an abridgment of his work, publiſhed in Spaniſh by Texeira, which is, however, far from being correct. There is a better extract extant in a book cited at the bottom of the page (3); we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter of this author and his works, when we come to the hiſtory of the age in which he lived, and ſhall therefore put an end to this note here.

(1) D'Herbelot. tit. Mirkhond. (2) Hyde rel. vet. Perſ. cap. viii. 152. (3) Les Eſtats, Empires, & Principautes du Monde. Paris 4to, 1662. p. 999.

On what authorities this hiſtory is founded.

It is from the author beforementioned that we take, for the moſt part, what is delivered in the following pages concerning the Oriental hiſtory of Perſia. He is allowed to have been a perſon of great learning and judgment by ſuch as are well verſed in oriental hiſtory, and his works are eſteemed as oracles throughout the eaſt. We may juſtly hope therefore, that what we tranſcribe from him, with the addition of ſuch circumſtances as we can meet with elſewhere, will render this ſection as uſeful and as agreeable as could be expected on ſo abſtruſe a ſubject. Without farther introduction, therefore, let us proceed to the catalogue of kings afforded us in his writings.

A Table of the kings of Persia, to the time of Alexander the Great, according to Mirkhond.

The firſt Race,

Or the Dynaſty of the Pischdadians.

1	Kejomaras, or Cajoumarras	40
2	Siamek
	Kejomaras reſumes the kingdom
3	Hûſhangh, or Houſchenk
4	Tahmuraſb	50
5	Gjemſhîd, or Giamſchid	30
	Dahâc, Zahâk, Zoâk
6	Aphridûn, Phredûn, or Feridoun
7	Manugjahr, or Manougeher, ſirnamed Phirouz	120
8	Nodar	7
9	Apherâſiab, or Afraſiab	12
10	Zab, Zaab, or Zoub

The ſecond Race,

Or the Dynaſty of the Kaianites.

1	Kaikobad	100
2	Kaikaus	150
3	Kiakhoſru	60
4	Lohraſp or Lohoraſb	120
5	Guſhtâſp, or Guſtaſp, or Kiſchtaſp	120
6	Ardſchir, ſirnamed Bahaman	112
7	Queen Homai	32
8	Darab 1.	4
9	Darab 2.	14

A Table of the ſame kings, with the years of their reigns, according to other oriental authors.

The firſt Race,

1	Kejomaras, or Cajoumaras	560
	Siamek ſlain after a ſhort reign
	Kejomaras reſumes the kingdom, and reigned	30
	An interregnum	200
2	Hûſhang, or Houſchenk, ſirnamed Piſchdad	50
3	Tahmuraſb	700
4	Gjemſhîd, or Giamſchid	30
5	Dahâc, Zahâk, Zoâk	1000
6	Aphridûn, Phridûn, or Feridoun	120
7	Manugjahr, or Manougeher, ſirnamed Phirouz	500
8	Nodar	7
9	Apheraſiab, or Afraſiab	12
10	Zab, Zaab, or Zoub	30
11	Guſtaſp ſon of Zoub	30

The ſecond Race,

1	Kaikobad	120
2	Kaikaus	150
3	Kaikhoſru	60
4	Lohraſp, or Lohoraſb	120
5	Guſhtâſp, or Guſtaſp, or Kiſchtaſp	120
6	Ardſchir, ſirnamed Bahaman	112
7	Queen Homai	32
8	Darab 1.	14
9	Darab 2.

IT is evident enough from the years ſet down in the two tables above, that there is a great mixture of fable and uncertainty in the accounts we have of theſe princes reigns, but there may, notwithſtanding this, be a great deal of truth in theſe relations, and, by comparing them with what the Greek and other writers of the Perſian affairs have given us of the ſame times, it may be very poſſible to extract a better idea of the antient Perſian empire, than could have been had without conſidering the oriental writers at all. Reaſon will be everlaſtingly the ſupreme judge of facts, and if a hiſtory be attended with continual im-probabilities or abſurdities, men of ſenſe will either doubt or reject its authority, whether its author lived in the eaſt, or in the weſt. On the other hand, where a hiſtory is compoſed of a ſeries of mixt facts, ſome probable and ſome romantic, the candid reader will receive thoſe, though he throw away theſe, and will not deſtroy the wheat, becauſe there are tares amongſt it. As to the ſtile of the following hiſtory, we have not pretended to follow the rhetorical pomp of the Perſian authors; on the contrary, we have delivered ourſelves with the utmoſt plainneſs and perſpicuity, and have endeavoured, as far as in our power lay, to reſcue truth out of thoſe metaphoric clouds, which often obſcure the writings of the eaſtern hiſtorians. Farther remarks of the ſame nature we leave to the diſcernment of our readers.

The nature thereof in point of ſtile, &c.

Keyomaras. KEYOMARAS, or Cajumarath, is allowed by all the oriental authors to have been the firſt king of the firſt race, ſirnamed the Piſchdadians, from Piſchdad, which ſignifies a juſt judge, and was the ſirname given to Huſhangh the ſecond king of this race, afterwards, however, attributed to them all. The manner wherein Keyomaras aſcended the throne was this. In the province of Aderbayagjan the inhabitants feeling the ſad effects of anarchy, and finding that liberty could not be enjoyed, where every one was free to do what he pleaſed, they unanimouſly reſolved to elect one who ſhould be obeyed by all, and to whoſe judgment they would ſubmit as to an irrefragable law. His conſpicuous virtues determined them on this occaſion to Keyomaras, whom therefore they immediately owned for their monarch, inveſted him with royal robes, and put a bonnet called Tagi on his head, kiſſing his feet in token of ſubmiſſion, which cuſtoms laſt mentioned were preſerved in uſe by his ſucceſſors [i]. His elevation had a proper effect on the mind of this new king; he applied himſelf to every branch of his duty; he erected courts of juſtice; he taught men to build houſes and to live in villages; he invented various manufactures, ſuch as the making of woollen cloth, and ſpinning, and weaving ſilk; in a word, he civilized his people, and merited, by his wiſdom, juſtice, and goodneſs, that dignity, which, out of modeſty and a foreſight of the cares it would be attended with, he for a long time refuſed [k]. The happineſs enjoyed by ſuch as lived under ſo excellent a prince invited the neighbouring people to put put themselves under his protection. Thus his empire was extended by the same means that it began, viz. thro' an opinion of his worth, and he upon their submission treated his new subjects with the same care and kindness as he had always shewn to his old. He sent his brother to take a view of these new-acquired dominions, and went afterwards to look upon them himself. In the province of Chorasan he met with his brother, and embracing him tenderly, he to perpetuate the memory of that inverview erected the city of Balch where it happened, that word being derived from a verb, which signifies to embrace. He was also the founder of abundance of other cities of Persia, particularly Kabulstan, Sigistan, Gom, &c [l]. This prince had two sons, the name of the elder was Nazek, a young man of wonderful prudence, who addicted himself intirely to study, for which reason he withdrew himself from his father's court, and lived with his wife in a little hermitage, where he gave himself over to contemplation; his father, who was himself a very learned man, went frequently to visit and converse with his son in his cell. Once going thither on the same errand, he found his son dead with several wounds upon his body: on a strict enquiry he was informed, that this cruel fact was committed by certain robbers of Tabrestan. These Keyomaras pursued into their own country, defeated them, and after putting many to the sword made slaves of the rest, and employed them in his buildings [m]. The other son of Keyomaras, or rather his grandson, was Siamek, with whom the wife of Nazek was big when he was murdered. This child as soon as he was born Keyomaras adopted, bred him up with the utmost care, and having instructed him in all the arts of reigning, he with the consent of the people transferred the sovereignty to him, and made him king in his life-time. An event singular enough, if we consider, that Keyomaras was the first to whom a crown in this country was offered, and the first also, who, disgusted with the weight of regal authority, desired to lay it down.

[i] Mirkhond. Procem. Hiſt. [k] Tarik Montekheb, i. e. The ſelect chronicle.

Siamek. SIAMEK proved a gracious and a warlike prince. Within a short time after his accession, some of his neighbours entered his dominions in a hostile manner, whereupon he immediately raised an army, marched against them, and gave them battle, where fighting valiantly he received a mortal wound; he was carried out of the battle and died in the arms of his wife, whom he left, as his father left his, big with child, conjuring her with his laſt words, if ſhe brought forth a ſon to put him continually in mind of his unfortunate death, and to exhort him to revenge it on the people, who in ſo ſhort a time had deprived him both of his life and empire. Keyomaras by this unlucky accident was forced to aſcend the throne again. The firſt thing he did was to celebrate the obſequies of his deceaſed grandſon with great magnificence, the next to take vengeance on thoſe who had ſlain Siamek; after which he reigned for many years with great applauſe.

[l] Mirkhond. Hist. Sect. 1. [m] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. tit. Caiumarath.

THERE is nothing more uncertain than the lineage of this king, and the time in which he flouriſhed. Some oriental writers have fancied him Adam, and becauſe he was the firſt king would needs have him to be the firſt man alſo; but men of better judgments and cooler imaginations have conceived, that this notion was owing to a miſtake, and that the antient Perſians called him Adam by way of honorary ſirname, ſignifying, that he was as much the father of their nation as Adam of mankind. The moſt judicious among the Perſian writers believe him to have been the ſon of Aram, the ſon of Shem, the ſon of Noah, and that he choſe to erect the ſeat of his empire not far from mount Ararat and the countries firſt planted after the flood. His religion is another diſputable point, ſome holding him an idolater, and believing, that the magnificent pile he reared for the burning of the body of his ſon Siamek gave birth to the fire-worſhip, aſcribed to the Magians. But if we may credit graver authorities, Keyomaras, like moſt antient kings, was at once both prince and prophet, taught his people the true religion of the patriarchs, particularly the exiſtence of one infinite Almighty Being, and of a created evil being, the indefatigable enemy of mankind. The romance writers allow him a thouſand years of life, and ſay, that of theſe he reigned five hundred and ſixty. How long he reigned before he reſigned his throne to Siamek is uncertain, but from his reſuming the ſceptre to his death it is generally allowed there intervened thirty years [n].

Huſhang. HUSHANG, or Houſchenk, ſirnamed Piſchdad, was a perſon of great parts, as well as great courage, and is equally famous throughout the eaſt, for the extent of his knowledge and and his mighty feats of valor. He is ſaid to have given a regular body of laws to his ſubjects, whence he was called Piſchdad. He alſo divided his country, and eſtabliſhed governors throughout, encouraged the working of mines, and invented moſt of the inſtruments of agriculture, as alſo the art of conveying water through ſubterraneous paſſages, for the moiſtening of their grounds; to him likewiſe they aſcribe the taming of leopards and other beaſts of chace, and the introducing of furs for keeping the body warm in winter. As he made his kingdom flouriſh thro' his wiſdom, ſo he extended it by his courage, and after a reign of fifty years was killed by the fall of a piece of rock, thrown from the mountains of Damavend, by an army of barbarians who came to invade his territories. Some are of opinion, that he made the province of Chuſiſtan the ſeat of his empire, by erecting there the famous city of Suſa or Shuſhan [o].

[n] Shariſtani ap. Hyde rel. vet. Perſar. c. xxv. p. 175.

THERE is hardly an antient prince in the world whoſe name is more famous in romance than that of Huſhang, there is a Perſian book which bears the title of Huſhang Nameh, i. e. Huſhang's hiſtory, which, for the many wonderful things it contains, has been tranſlated into the Turkiſh tongue. In this famous piece it is recorded, that our hero beſtrid a monſtrous animal, called Rakhſche, which he found in the dry iſland, or new world, being the iſſue of a male crocodile and a female hippopotamus; this ſteed fed upon nothing but the fleſh of Serpents and Dragons. After Huſhang had made this animal ſubmit to the ſaddle, there was no giant ſo terrible, no monſter ſo frightful, but he attacked and ſubdued; amongſt the reſt of his conqueſts he reduced the people of Mahiſer, ſo famous in the eaſtern romances for their having fiſhes heads, and thence eſteemed a race of formidable monſters. The truth ſeems to be, that this prince ſubdued that people on the Perſic gulph, called by the Greeks Ichthyophagi from their living upon fiſh, whence the fruitful imagination of eaſtern poets deduced a people with fiſhes heads. The ſame fabulous writers aſcribe to this monarch a certain book bearing the title of Giavidan Khird, i. e. the wiſdom of all times; this is a very famous piece, and is certainly very antient, and has been tranſlated into various languages, particularly into Arabic, by the ſon of the vizier of the Caliph Almamon, and into Turkiſh under the title of [o] Leb. Tarik. Mirkhond. hiſt. ſect. iii.

Anvar Sohaili, it has alſo been in part rendered into French, and is in itſelf a very excellent treatiſe, whence in all probability it came to be attributed to this monarch, ſo famous for giving laws and teaching wiſdom and civility to his people; the reader will find a fuller account of the treatiſe beforementioned at the bottom of the page [P] (B).

Tahmuraſh. TAHMURASB, ſirnamed Diùbend, i. e. the humbler of the devil, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſon, by others the grandſon, of Huſhang, and by a third party his couſin, ſucceeded that famous monarch, and governed with great reputation.

[P] D'Herbelot. Art. Houſchenk.

(B) This piece is penned with all the enthuſiaſm natural to eaſtern writers; there are in it, however, ſome very fine ſentences, amongſt others theſe which follow:

" Great kings are gods on earth, and have all the attributes " of power, wiſdom, and mercy, in a ſuperior degree with " reſpect to private perſons, as the Almighty hath over them. " Let not this, however, encourage them to uſe their ſubjects " with rigor. Thunder is ſeldom heard, but the ſun ſhines " every day; we ſee ten thouſand inſtances of God's goodneſs, " for one extraordinary act of vengeance; let kings imitate him " by doing all the good they can, and always remember, that " though death is in their power, yet life is not; they may or- " der a man to be cut into a thouſand pieces, but there their " dominion ends, they cannot call him into being again; be- " ware therefore of ſudden judgments, and of penitence coming " too late.

" Miniſters are as the hands or inſtruments of kings; men " look not for an account of their actions from them, but from " their maſters; a king therefore ſhould look well to his mini- " ſters; for it is as vain to throw the weight of crimes upon them, " when the people riſe in rebellion, as it would be for a mur- " derer to tell the judge, that it was not he but his ſword that " killed his neighbour. Bad princes have ſometimes had good " miniſters, but good princes never have bad ones long.

" The paſſions of men may by long acquaintance be thorough- " ly known, but the paſſions of women are inſcrutable; there- " fore they ought to be ſevered from men, leſt the mutability " of their tempers ſhould infect others. Their natures, hu- " mours, and conſtitution, require reſtraint; large and coarſe " ſtones are employed in ordinary buildings; marble and alabaſ- " ter in palaces; but diamonds we lock up in cabinets; and as " things are rare or common, of ſmall value or of great price, " we ſet them to ſhew, or ſhut them up cloſe (4).

(4) Humaioun Namsh. ap; Beauchamp's eſſays, Sect. iii.

reputation. For finding that the wars of his predeceſſor had introduced both poverty and confuſion in his dominions, he to remedy the firſt remitted all taxes for three years, and to reduce things into order, made new laws, and took care that the magiſtrates ſhould every-where put them in execution. He is the firſt Perſian prince recorded to have had a vizier or prime miniſter; it is very poſſible, that the diſorder in which he found the affairs of his empire, engaged him to make uſe of ſuch an officer. The king fortified the frontiers of Perſia to prevent ſudden invaſions, and ſhewed ſo happy a mixture of wiſdom and valour, in his diſpoſition, that ſeveral of the neighbouring nations, ſtruck with the felicity of his ſubjects, voluntarily ſubmitted themſelves to him, and acknowledged him for their ſovereign. At laſt, after a glorious reign of thirty years, a peſtilence, which raged throughout his dominions and deſtroyed with equal rapidity both man and beaſt, cut the thread of his life at Balch, to the great grief of his ſubjects [q].

GJEMSHID, or Giamſchid, or rather Gjem Schid, his name being Gjem, to which Schid as a ſirname was added, becauſe of his wonderful beauty, Schid in the Perſic language ſignifying the ſun, his eyes having ſuch a luſtre that none could look him ſteadily in the face, tho' ſome authors are of opinion, that he received this addition to his name, not from the beauty of his perſon, but from the glory which reſulted from his actions. It is not very certain, whether this prince was the ſon of his predeceſſor, his nephew, or his grandſon, but all agree, that he was of the family of Keyomaras, and had a juſt right to the throne. The reputation of his anceſtors inſpired him with a laudable ambition of equalling at leaſt, if not excelling, them. With this view he encouraged all learned and wiſe men to come to his court, where he highly preferred them; amongſt the reſt were two perſons of ſingular abilities, on whom he chiefly relied, the one, a Jew, ſays our author Mirchond, whoſe name was Faël Iſſuf Rabban, and the other a Greek, called Fithagores, i. e. Pythagoras; but this muſt be a miſtake; for though we have no certainty as to the chronology of theſe times, yet it is eaſy to diſcern from the circumſtances of things, that Gjemſhid flouriſhed at a conſiderable diſtance from Pythagoras; but ſuch errors as theſe are not infrequent among Oriental writers, through their want Gjemſhid.

[q] Mirkhond hiſt. Sect. iv. D'Herbelot tit Tamuraſb.

want of underſtanding thoroughly the hiſtory of Greece, of which, however, they have moſt of them a general idea. By the advice in all probability of theſe wiſe counſellors, Gjemſhid divided his ſubjects into three claſſes; the firſt conſiſting of ſoldiers; the ſecond of huſbandmen; and the third of artizans [r]. In his time muſic, vocal and inſtrumental, and aſtronomy were firſt introduced in Perſia. He was alſo the firſt who built granaries in Perſia, into which he cauſed every year a certain quantity of corn to be carried, that in caſe of any deficiency in their harveſts famine might not be felt. In his time likewiſe wine came to be eſteemed, or rather brought into general uſe, throughout his territories from the following accident. A woman, who was much in Gjemſhid's good graces was afflicted with an inyeterate head-ach, which all the phyſicians in the court of Gjemſhid were not able to alleviate or remove; this woman went into the place where the king's wine was kept, and drank of it very freely; and finding that it in ſome meaſure relieved her, ſhe returned thither again after reſting herſelf for ſome hours, and drank yet a greater quantity which completed her cure; this ſhe told to the king, and it being divulged through the court, every body began to regard wine as an univerſal medicine, capable of removing the moſt ſtubborn diſeaſes. Among the moſt illuſtrious events of this great monarch's reign, we may juſtly place the rectification of the kalendar which he undertook and perfected, inſtituting two years, a civil or ordinary year and an eccleſiaſtic year, in which there was in the ſpace of one hundred and thirty years a month intercalated [s]. (C). He likewiſe inſtituted the Nauruz. i. e. the ſolemn obſervation of the new year, concerning which we are told that it had its riſe thus; king Gjemſhid going in progreſs through his provinces arrived in Aderbayagian

[r] Mirkhond hiſt. Sect. v.

[s] Hyde, rel. vet. Perſar. c. xiv.

(C) The reader might probably expect here an account of the kalendar, as it was ſettled by Gjemſhid; but as we ſhall be obliged to treat at large of this matter in another place, viz. when we come to ſpeak of the æra of Yezdegherd, we thought it needleſs to interrupt the ſeries of our hiſtory here with an imperfect account of this matter. The curious and learned reader may have recourſe to Dr. Hyde's book, where he will find this intricate ſubject treated at large (5).

(5) Relig vet. Perſar. c. xiv.

agjan, and ſhewing himſelf on a royal throne to his people, the ſun ſhone with ſuch luſtre on his crown adorned with precious ſtones and feathers, that the people ſhouted aloud, and ſaid, This is Nauruz, i. e. the new day, whence the king took the opportunity of inſtituting a feſtival, wherein, beſides the preſents made to the prince, 'twas uſual for him to receive and grant the petitions of all ſorts of people, to releaſe priſoners, and to do all other acts of clemency and benevolence which could be expected from him. As to the particular ceremonies attending this feſtival, the reader may probably be pleaſed to know that it laſted ſix days. On the firſt of theſe the king gratified his people, or, if the phraſe may be allowed, his commons. The ſecond day he paid the ſame regard to the learned men attending his court. On the third his prieſts and privy counſellors preſented their petitions. On the fourth he heard the ſuits of his nobility and kindred. On the fifth thoſe of his children. The ſixth belonged to himſelf. In the evening of the fifth day a young man handſome in his perſon was picked out, and appointed to wait at the king's door all night. At day-break he entered the chamber without ceremony, upon which the king with an air of familiarity aſked him whence he came, whither he went, what his purpoſe, and his name, wherefore he came and what he carried? to which the youth anſwered, I am Al Manſur, i. e. Auguſt; my name is Al-Mobarek, i. e. the Bleſſed, I come hither from God, bearing the new year. Then he ſat down, and immediately entered the nobility, bearing each a ſilver veſſel, in which were wheat, barley, peaſe, vetches, pulſe, a ſugar cane, and two pieces of gold freſh from the mint. Out of this baſon firſt the Waſir or Vizier, then the treaſurer, afterwards the nobility, according to their rank, each offered his ſilver veſſel to the king. At the concluſion of the ceremony a very great loaf made of ſeveral kinds of corn was brought in and placed before the king, who, after eating ſome of it himſelf, intreated ſuch as were preſent to eat the reſt in theſe words, this is a new day of a new month, the beginning of a new year; it is fit therefore that we renew our ties to each other. Then riſing up in his royal robes he ſolemnly bleſſed his nobility, beſtowing on them rich gifts [t]. The evening of this day the Perſians called Phriſtaph, on which they did every thing that might teſtify joy and ſtrong hopes of ſeeing

[t] Caſuini, ap. Hyde. p. 237.

ing a pleaſant year. A great part of his reign Gjemſhid remained in Segjiſtan, thinking it the propereſt province of his empire for his court, till affairs in the eaſt were thoroughly ſettled; then he changed it for the proper Perſia, where he erected the noble city of Eſtechar, which moſt take to be the Perſepolis of the Greeks, though ſome believe it the city of Schiras. If what the antient Perſian writers deliver of the extent of this city of Eſtechar be true, viz. that it contained a ſquare of twenty four leagues, then it is poſſible that both opinions may be true; but if we meaſure the probability of this account by the other things related of this prince, ſuch as that he made the tour of the whole earth, was ſkilled in the occult ſciences, and poſſeſſed a magic cup of incomparable virtues; we may ſafely reſtrain the bounds of this city, and though we allow it to have been very great, eſpecially for thoſe times, yet we may conceive it not to have taken up more than a third part of the ſpace they have aſſigned it. It is univerſally allowed, that Gjemſhid gave himſelf up entirely to the ſtudy of the arts of reigning, and ſome ſay, that he was much helped in his political contemplations, by conſidering the tranſactions among the bees, and that he drew many cuſtoms from the hive into the court of Perſia. Among other inventions the ſignet ring is aſcribed to him, and that mode, which ſtill prevails throughout the eaſt, of preferring the left hand to the right as the more honourable; he likewiſe directed, that the different degrees of people ſhould be diſtinguiſhable from their garb; in a word, he made it the whole buſineſs of his life to render his kingdom flouriſhing and his people happy, in which he ſucceeded to his utmoſt wiſh. But this great felicity proved the ſource of the deepeſt misfortunes; for, having reigned long and gloriouſly, he unaccountably took it in his head that he was immortal, ſent pictures of himſelf throughout his empire, and ordered them to be worſhipped with divine honours. This madneſs ſoon loſt him the hearts of the people, ſo that the province of Sigjiſtan, by the perſuaſion of a certain great captain, who was related to the king and whoſe name was Ahad, took arms, and, when they had formed themſelves into a regular army, marched under the command of Zoak or Dahâc towards Schiras, where Gjemſhid met him with a powerful army which he had raiſed; the engagement was fierce and bloody, but in the end Gjemſhid was defeated and taken priſoner, upon which the tyrant ordered him to be immediately ſawn aſunder, which was performed in Zoak's ſight. This is the account given by Mirchond and the beſt Arabian hiſtories; others ſay, that he eſcaped from the battle and wandered through his dominions. He left behind him a ſon whoſe name was Phridun or Aphridun of three years old, whom his mother Phramak found means to conceal from his enemies, and to breed up privately, till providence enabled him to aſcend the throne of Perſia [u].

was

DEHOC, Dahac, Zahak, Zoâk; ſome authors affirm, Dehoc. that the name of this prince is only an alteration of a nick-name beſtowed on him by the Perſians, viz. Deh-ak, ſignifying, that he had ten ill qualities, which made him hateful and abominable, and that his real name was Piuraſb. It is very uncertain of what family this prince was; ſome report, that he was lineally deſcended from Siamek the grandſon of Keyomaras; others that he was an Arabian, the ſon of Uluan, deſcended in a direct line from Ahad, the chief of the Adites. The truth ſeems to be, that he was an Arab by the father's ſide, but deſcended of the houſe of Keyomaras by the mother. There is indeed another fabulous genealogy or two, which ſcarce deſerve to be mentioned, becauſe they are glaringly falſe; the one ſuppoſes but two generations between him and Adam, the other that he was deſcended from Ham the ſon of Noah, and is to be looked on as the Nimrod of the ſcriptures. It is very likely, that all theſe ſtories were invented to diſgrace a prince whoſe cruelty rendered him odious, or that they happened through ſome miſtakes in reading or tranſcribing the works of antient poets. As this monarch gained the crown by his ſword, ſo he governed fiercely, and with little regard to his ſubjects. He was, however, a perſon of great genius, and deeply ſkilled in the occult ſciences, in one word, he is repreſented to us as a completely wicked man; one whoſe abilities anſwered the evil intentions of his ſoul, and whoſe perſon ſtruck beholders with horror, for he had a meagre pallid viſage, eyes wild and ſparkling, an air fierce and haughty; at the ſame time that his body was deformed, and his whole appearance terrible. The natural ſourneſs of his temper was irritated by a ſharp and incurable diſeaſe, conſiſting in two painful ulcers, one on each ſhoulder, the anguiſh of which reſembled the pain following the bite of a ſerpent, whence the ſtory inſerted in a famous oriental romance, that that the devil, having for many years obeyed him, demanded at laſt as a full reward, that he might have leave to kiſs his ſhoulders, which being granted, an ugly ſerpent immediately took poſt in each, and gnawed itſelf a den in his fleſh. Either ſome ſorcerer, or the devil in a dream, ſuggeſted to Zoak an inhuman remedy for this evil, viz. that of waſhing theſe ulcers frequently with the warm blood of men; or, as others ſay, applying to them the brains of men newly ſlain. At firſt the tyrant put to death criminals of all ſorts; but when there were no more of theſe, he fell without mercy upon the innocent, that he might have wherewith to alleviate his pain. The prieſts and other perſons in authority had recourſe to all the arguments they could uſe to engage him to have recourſe rather to the blood or brain of ſheep, but to no purpoſe; thoſe, however, who were entruſted with the care of theſe unhappy wretches deſtined to ſlaughter for the tyrant's eaſe, often out of mere pity let them ſlip through their fingers, ſo that flying to the mountains in order to preſerve themſelves and their benefactors from danger, they there formed themſelves into a particular nation, called ſince the Curdes [x]. All his reign long Zoak cauſed Phridun, the ſon of his predeceſſor, to be ſearched for, but to no purpoſe, his mother took care to hide him out of the reach of Zoak and his enemies. However, the tyrant diſcharged his wrath upon her father, whom he put to death, as he did many others, whom he ſuſpected inclined to the intereſt of the young Phridun. The chief cauſe of theſe proceedings was a dream, wherein the tyrant beheld three men who came to attack him; theſe he thought threw him down and bound him. Afterwards, one of them gave him a mortal wound on the head, then the other two looſened his girdle, tied his feet therewith, and carried him into the territory of Damavand. Having applied to the moſt ſkilful interpreters of dreams in his dominions to know what this ſignified, they unanimouſly agreed, that it portended the loſs of his kingdom and of his life, becauſe amongſt the Perſians the girdle is a mark of dignity, now this Zoak conceived could never be done but by Phridun and his party. Among the numbers put to death, on various accounts, by Zoak, were the ſons of a certain ſmith, whoſe name was Gao, or, as others write it, Kaoh. This man, driven to madneſs at the ſight of his children's blood, ran up up and down the ſtreets, crying out for juſtice and help againſt the tyrant, holding up a leathern apron in his hand, as if it had been a ſtandard. In a ſhort time the army he got together became very formidable, ſo that he made himſelf maſter of various ſtrong forts and great cities, particularly of the city Heri, or Herat, the capital of Choraſan, where he ſtaid for ſome time to put his affairs in order; and when he found that he was in a condition to bid Zoak battle, he made a long oration to encourage his people, aſſuring them amongſt other things, that he had not taken arms with any view to his private advantage, but that, as ſoon as he had reſtored them to their liberty, he would leave them to elect whom they would for a king. The people with one accord offered the ſovereignty to him, which he as poſitively refuſed, telling them, that as the ſenſe he had of his own injuries had put him upon firſt taking arms, ſo he would never conſent to injure others; that Phridun the ſon of Giamſhid was their lawful prince; that they ought to bring him immediately from his retreat, and put him at their head. Popular humours are eaſily turned; the army on this ſpeech grew as loyal to Phridun as they had been grateful to the ſmith. Phridun obſerving the ſpirit of his people, and being informed that Zoak's army was by no means hearty in his intereſt, marched with the utmoſt expedition to meet him, and the armies engaging, after a briſk action Zoak's troops abandoned him, and he was taken priſoner, whereupon Phridun ordered him to be conducted to the mountains of Damavand, and gave directions for his being impriſoned in a cave there. This victory being gained about the time of the autumnal equinox, the Perſians inſtituted a feaſt in memory thereof, which they called Mihirgian, or rather Mihragjân [y] (D).

[u] D'Herbelot. tit. Gjemſchid.

[x] Mirkhond. hiſt. ſect. vi.

PHARIDUN

[y] Hyde, rel. vet. Perſ. c. viii. p. 158. D'Herbelot, Biblioth. orient. art. Feridoun, Gaoh.

(D) The hiſtory of Zoak makes a prodigious figure in the Perſian romances; what is related in them of him being to us abſurd as well as fabulous, it would be to no purpoſe to ſwell out a note with ſuch ſtories. It is very likely, that the poets immediately after the time of this cruel prince drew the moſt invidious characters of him they could deviſe, and heightned all the miſchievous things he did with the utmoſt force of their inventions. If we conceive to ourſelves poets writing with this view, and at the Phridun. PHRIDUN, Aphridun, or Feridoun, this prince proved one of the greateſt, wiſeſt, and moſt ſucceſsful monarchs that ever ruled in the eaſt; his firſt act, after being quietly ſeated on the throne, was to make Kaoh the ſmith general of his armies; after which he ſent him towards the weſtern parts of his dominions in order to reduce ſuch provinces as, during the troubles of the kingdom, had ſhook off the Perſian yoke. Kaoh ſpent twenty years in this enterprize, in which ſpace he added many fine countries to the Perſian empire; at length the king recalled him and made him governor of Aderbayagjan, which he ruled ten years with equal ſatisfaction to the people and to his prince, the ſame time advert to the genius of oriental writers in general, and to poets in particular, we need not be at a loſs for all the ſtrange things that we now read of Zoak, and yet allow the firſt authors of them to have been men of good ſenſe too. Metaphors well underſtood, alluſions readily apprehended, and allegories eaſily explained in one age, appear all as matters, or at leaſt as circumſtances, of fact in ages which ſucceed; and hence it comes to paſs, that a ſtroke of poetic ſatyr, or the rhetorical flouriſh of an author is miſapprehended for a ſtrict aſſertion, and ſo delivered by hiſtorians, who come after, and tranſcribe all they find, without weighing or conſidering how or in what manner it was wrote. The firſt hiſtorians in all countries were poets, the ſecond race proſe-writers who copied from them; and hence it is, that antient hiſtories are full of grave fables, which through length of time are hard to be underſtood: this has been the fate of Greece, of Rome, of Britain, of Ireland, and why not of Perſia? But fiction, though it may obſcure, yet it does not abſolutely deſtroy truth. Zoak was in all probability an Arabian invader, who, after making himſelf maſter of Perſia, uſed his new ſubjects ill, till the weight of the loads he laid upon them grew too heavy to be borne, and then they did what a people may always do, viz. threw them off their ſhoulders and would bear no more. As to what we are told of his being confined in the caverns of Damavand, or rather of Dunbavand, we think it may be underſtood to mean no more than that he was kept there in ſome ſtrong caſtle. Theſe mountains are in the province of Aderbayagjan, which, as we have more than once remarked, is part of the antient Media; they are rocky, full of caverns, and conſequently have a gloomy appearance. The poets therefore, taking the ſame licence here allowed them elſewhere, have feigned, that Tamurah after overcoming the Divs or evil Genii, impriſoned them in theſe grottoes, and by degrees theſe expreſſions grow ſo frequent, that a wizard or a tyrant was as readily ſent to the mountains of Damavand as among our common people ghoſts are chained, or to preſerve the true phraſe, laid in the bottom of the red-ſea.

and

and then died much regretted by Phridun, who to do honour to his memory gave all his eſtates among his relations, and then taking his ſons into his own court, bred them up there in a moſt honourable manner; and when they grew up gave each of them greater poſſeſſions than their father had acquired [z]. To ſhew his gratitude yet more, he made the leathern apron, which Kaoh had hung upon a ſtick at the beginning of the inſurrection, the royal ſtandard of Perſia, calling it Dirfeſch Kaviani, i. e. the ſtandard of Kaoh, that he might perpetuate his name and ſervices to all poſterity. This ſtandard he adorned with precious ſtones, to which his ſucceſſors continually adding, it became at laſt of ſuch ineſtimable value, that being taken by the Arabians in the battle of Cadeſia, it enriched the whole army [a]. As Phridun was deſirous of reſtoring peace and good order throughout all his dominions, he ſent perſons, not only of great parts but eminent for their integrity, to govern all the provinces under his dominion. He married alſo, with a view of intereſt only, the daughter of his predeceſſor Zoak, by whom he had two ſons, Salm and Tur, but theſe proving like their grandfather, haughty, obſtinate, and cruel, he took a Perſian lady to his bed, by whom he had a ſon named Irege, equally wiſe and courteous, ſo that he became at once the darling of his father and the delight of the people. Thus things paſſed on, till Phridun, feeling himſelf beginning to decline under the weight of age and illneſs, ſummoned his grandees together, and, having informed them of his deſign to quit the regal dignity, deſired to know which of his ſons they wiſhed he ſhould make his ſucceſſor; thoſe lords unanimouſly anſwered, that, if he would no longer govern himſelf, they deſired to have Irege for their prince, to which Phridun aſſented; but, to prevent his brothers from taking this ill, he gave to Tur all the eaſtern provinces of his empire, to Salm the provinces on the other ſide, and reſtrained Irege within the compaſs of Perſia, Aſſyria, and Meſopotamia. From this diviſion came the names of Turon and Iran, the one ſignifying that great extent of country which lies to the eaſt of Perſia, and the other Perſia itſelf and the provinces dependent thereon [b]. As for Tur, he built a noble city which he made the capital of his territories, calling it after ter his own name Turon, and the country Turqueſtan; this city was ſeated in the province of Mauaralnahar in the neighbourhood of the Caſpian ſea, and hence the nation inhabiting that tract of country acquired the name of Turks [c]. However large thoſe ſhares might be, which Salm and Tur had received from their father, they ſtill hated him and their brother Irege, whoſe ruin they concerted together. Things being at laſt ripe for the execution of their projects, Salm and Tur marched each with great forces into Aderbayagjan, and having joined their armies, they ſent a ſort of manifeſto to their father, wherein they ſet forth, that with juſt reaſon they were diſpleaſed with the kindneſs which he had ſhewn Irege, whom they ſtiled a baſtard, and declared at the ſame time, that they would never lay down their arms till he was depoſed from the ſovereignty, and the countries divided between them, which hitherto had been in his poſſeſſion. Phridun, juſtly diſpleaſed at this undutiful behaviour, ſent immediately his orders to Irege to draw together all the forces he was able, and to march againſt his brethren. Irege, however, deſired the king to have recourſe to milder meaſures, in hopes of preſerving the peace of the empire. Phridun was of a contrary opinion, and determined to reduce the rebels by arms. Irege, however, unwilling to do his brothers any wrong, took with him ſome of his wiſeſt counſellors, and went with them to his brothers camp, in order if poſſible amicably to adjuſt the differences between them. They, who wiſhed for nothing more, immediately ſeized him and ſtruck off his head, which having ſtuck on a pole, they inſolently ſent to their father. Phridun was exceſſively grieved at his ſon's misfortune; he reſolved, however, to carry on the war againſt Salm and Tur; in order to which he gave the dominions of Irege to his ſon Manugeher, who immediately marched with an army againſt his uncles. They deſpiſing his youth quickly came to an engagement, in which the two brothers were routed and loſt their lives by the hand of Manugeher, who after this glorious victory returned in triumph to his grandfather Phridun, who was now grown blind. When he heard the acclamations of the people at the entrance of Manugeher, he aſked who it was that preſumed to enter his preſence in ſuch a manner. The young victor cried out, it is your grandſon Manugeher, the avenger of the blood of Irege, who hath ſlain

[z] Mirkhond. hiſt. ſect. vii. [a] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Dirfeſch. [b] Hyde. rel. vet. Perſar. c. xxxv. p. 417. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Feridoun.

[c] Mirkhond. hiſt. ubi ſupra.

Salm and Tur with his own hand. Phridun then received him with open arms, and with all the demonſtrations of paternal fondneſs. Afterwards he took the Tagi or Tiara from his head and put it on that ofManugeher orManugjhar, declaring him thereby ſovereign of Perſia, appointing at the ſame time one Soam or Soham, a perſon of great wiſdom and valour, to be his vizier [d]. Within a ſhort ſpace after this Phridun died, full of years and glory (E).

As

[d] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Soham.

(E) The oriental writers are univerſally agreed, that the terms Touran and Iran, expreſſive of the two great empires on the other and on this ſide of the Oxus, called by them the Gjeihon, took riſe at this time. It may ſeem ſtrange, that ſuch large tracts of country ſhould receive appellations from perſons who lived and governed them ſo ſhort a time; for it appears, that Irege, Tur, and Salm, all died in the life-time of Phridun, and within a ſmall ſpace after the partition of his dominions amongſt them. But when this is more thoroughly conſidered, the wonder will ceaſe. The monarchs of theſe extenſive kingdoms were, through a long courſe of ages, at war with each other; and this enmity proceeding originally from the quarrel of their anceſtors, it was natural enough for them to call their dominions after thoſe in whoſe right they held them. The whole empire belonged to Phridun; the deſcendants of Tur or Tour kept up the claim of their anceſtor to the whole; the kings of Perſia ſucceeding Manugjahr aſſerted the right of Phridun to divide his dominions as he pleaſed; and therefore it is likely that Iran and Touran were words firſt uſed in Perſia, and by degrees ſpread themſelves throughout the eaſt. Whether Tur was the undoubted father of the Turks will admit of ſome queſtion, ſince almoſt all the oriental writers affirm, that Japhet had a ſon called Turk, and yet many of them admit, that Turqueſtan had its name from the prince we ſpeak of. It would be needleſs and at the ſame time improper for us to enter into a prolix diſcuſſion of that point here, ſince it muſt be examined when we come to write the hiſtory of the Turks; however, we think it not amiſs to remark, that there is nothing ſtranger or more perplexed in this double derivation of the name of the Turks, than there is in that of the Hebrews, whom ſome affirm to have been ſo called from Heber the ſon of Salah, and others from the ſirname of Abraham, who was ſtiled the Hebrew from his coming from the other ſide of the river, i. e. the Euphrates. Such difficulties amuſe weak minds, but men of ſolid underſtandings eaſily paſs by theſe doubts, knowing, that there is little more of certainty to be found in ſearching for the riſe of denominations of far later date.

As to the perſonal qualifications of this prince, he is celebrated by oriental writers as the Solomon of Perſia, one who made it his whole ſtudy to govern his people in ſuch a manner as that they might enjoy greater felicity than if they had lived in a ſtate of freedom. He extended his dominions with a view of extending happineſs to thoſe whom he reduced under his obedience. He was a zealous worſhipper of the true God, and took ſuch care to repreſs Zabiiſm, that ſome Mohammedan authors have not ſcrupled to aſſert that he was a muſſulman. It is alſo recorded of him, that he left this advice with his ſucceſſor.

BELIEVE, my ſon, that the days of your reign are ſo many leaves of a book: be careful therefore to write nothing in any page thereof, that you would not have ſeen by poſterity [e]. Many other wiſe ſayings of this great prince are ſcattered in various authors, which we have neither time nor opportunity to inſert here. Some Perſian writers think, that Phridun was co-temporary with Abraham. On the other hand, the learned Dr. Hyde has entertained a notion that this Phridun is the Phraortes of Herodotus [f]; it would take up too much time to diſcuſs this controverſy here, and beſides we ſhall have occaſion to reſume this ſubject hereafter, and to conſider the opinions of the critics on oriental hiſtory at once; in the mean time, let us purſue the thread of our narration, and proceed to the reign of Phridun's grandſon (F).

MANUGJAHR

[e] D'Herbelot. Art. Feridoun. [f] Hyde, relig. vet. Perſar. c. viii.

(F) The reader will eaſily perceive from the characters he has already ſeen drawn in this hiſtory, that among the oriental nations wiſdom as well as valour is thought neceſſary in a hero. Phridun is as famous amongſt them, as any of the heroes of Greece or Rome amongſt us; and for the ſame reaſon; becauſe he was a man great in all things, in war and in peace, at the head of armies and on the throne. On this account oriental writers preſerve with as great care the wiſe ſayings of their princes, as the accounts of their conqueſts. We have excuſed ourſelves above from the repetition of all that has been recorded of this ſort in relation to Phridun; but the reader will in all probability be pleaſed with the following ſpecimens of his ſapience, becauſe they contain rules eaſily applied, and which concern mankind in general.

Man

MANUGJAHR or Manugeher, according to ſome authors, was not the ſon of Irege, but his grandſon by a daughter; it is not very material to us which of theſe opinions is true [g], certain it is, that he was a prince wiſe and of a mild diſpoſition, and had a miniſter, viz. the vizier Soham beforementioned, whoſe fame is ſtill great throughout all the eaſt. Manugeher, probably by his advice, made ſeveral juſt regulations in the government of Perſia; he aſcertained, more exactly than any of his predeceſſors had done, the boundaries of the provinces, into each of which he ſent a preſident or governor, independent of whom he eſtabliſhed in every great town or borough a mayor or provoſt, ſo that the governors had no opportunity of ſetting up for themſelves, and the provoſts were obliged to behave themſelves prudently for fear the governor ſhould write againſt them to court. Obſerving the infertility of Perſia to be chiefly owing to the want of water, Manugeher conſidered every way of ſupplying this defect; he cauſed fine canals to be cut from the mighty rivers Tigris and Euphrates to refreſh the barren countries in their neighbourhood; he took care to collect all the ſtreams iſſuing from the little ſprings on the tops of mountains, that their waters might be made as uſeful as poſſible. To incourage his ſubjects to cultivate their lands with care, he employed much time in gardening, and took great pains to diſcover the virtues of herbs and flowers, cauſing ſuch as were moſt valuable to be tranſplanted from Manugja hr.

[g] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. Orient. Art. Manugeher.

Man ſhould weigh well the nature of himſelf,
The varying frailneſs of this flatt'ring world,
And the true excellence of heaven's high lord;
Then would he this deſpiſe, and truſt in him.
The world deceives us all.——In God is truth.
Let not thy riches or thy power prevail
To ſwell thy boſom with conceits of pride;
Look back, remember thoſe thou haſt ſeen high,
And mark, if thou haſt never ſeen them ſink;
Let this teach thee. One end awaits us all!
And when inevitable death commands,
That we ſhould follow to his dreary realm,
Matters it much, if from a royal couch,
Or from a mattreſs thrown upon the ground,
We riſe to take our journey (5)?

(5) D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Feridoun.

mountains and uncouth places into his own gardens, or thoſe of his courtiers. But while he was thus cultivating the arts of peace, Apheraſiab, the deſcendent of Tur or Tour, invaded his dominions with a great army of Turks, in order, as he gave out, to avenge the death of his anceſtor. Manugeher, finding himſelf too weak to reſiſt ſo formidable an enemy, retired towards the country of Tabreſtan; ſome authors ſay, that there happened a battle between him and Apheraſiab, and that Manugeher was routed. However that matter was, all are agreed, that the king of Perſia withdrew into a fortreſs, and prepared to defend himſelf there againſt the attempts of his enemy. Apheraſiab beſieged him with all his army, but to no purpoſe; and the winter drawing on, the Turk, being afraid leſt his own men ſhould deſert him, began to think of peace. Upon this commiſſioners were diſpatched on both ſides, and a treaty concluded on theſe terms; that Apheraſiab ſhould poſſeſs all the country eaſt of the river Gihon, and that he ſhould leave Manugeher without moleſtation in poſſeſſion of Perſia and the provinces dependent on it. Such was the event of this cruel war, which threatened no leſs than the ſubverſion of the monarchy of Perſia [h]. Soon as Apheraſiab was retired into his own country, Manugeher began to provide againſt ſuch invaſions for the future. He ordered all his governors to provide their quotas of troops; but theſe meaſures alarming Apheraſiab, he gave orders to his forces to make inroads into Perſia; but the Turk had not the ſame ſucceſs in this as in the former war. The precautions of Manugeher perfectly anſwered his end, ſo that the enemy were not only repulſed where-ever they made their courſes, but alſo loſt a great number of their ſoldiers who were taken priſoners. Apheraſiab therefore very willingly renewed the peace, and left Manugeher to act as he thought fit in his own dominions. That wiſe and good prince made the city of Sigjiſtan for a time his royal ſeat, and when by his preſence he had put all things on that ſide in good order, he ſent thither his vizier Soham to preſerve all things in quiet, and went himſelf to reſide in the centre of his empire, where he applied himſelf, as he had done before, to the cultivation of arts and ſciences, and to every thing which might render his people powerful and happy. Soham managed all things in the province of Sigjiſtan

[h] Mirkhond. hiſt. ſect. ix.

jiſtan ſo as to gain the good-will of the people, as well as to maintain the favour of the court; but in the midſt of his happineſs an accident fell out which ſurprized him not a little: his wife was brought to-bed of a ſon with long yellow hair, Soham therefore gave him the name of Zal-zer, i. e, golden hair; this young man, when he grew up to years of diſcretion, gave manifeſt tokens of an exalted genius, inſomuch, that Manugeher ſent for him and his father to appear at court. Thither they went, and the ſight of the young nobleman augmented the eſteem and gratitude Manugeher had for his father and family. Loaded with new honours and dignities, Soham and his ſon returned into their own country, and lived there with the ſame ſplendor and reputation that they had done before. One day it ſo happened, that Zal-zer went to hunt in the province of Kablouſtan, dependent on the kingdom of Touran, but bordering northwards on the Perſian dominions. Meherab, who was at this time governor of that province, being informed of this, went out to meet him, that he might ſhew his reſpect to the father by the honours paid to his ſon. The converſation he had with Zal-zer charmed him ſo much, and made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion on his mind, that he could not help talking of him to his family upon his return home, which had ſuch a neffect on the mind of Roudabah his daughter, that ſhe fell violently in love with Zal zer on his report; and, as womens paſſions are ever ſudden and ungovernable, ſhe ſent immediately one of her maids into the place where Zal-zer was encamped, that ſhe might find an opportunity of ſpeaking with him. Her project ſucceeded perfectly well, the young nobleman perceiving the maiden gathering flowers, entered into diſcourſe with her, enquiring her condition, and with whom ſhe lived. The girl, properly inſtructed, anſwered him, that ſhe was the ſervant of Roudabah, the daughter of Meherab, and then fell a talking of the family, expatiating on the wit, beauty, and ſweet diſpoſitions of her lady. Zal-zer immediately conceived a great eſteem for this amiable perſon, which by degrees ripened into ſo warm a paſſion, that he could neither eat nor ſleep, till he had concerted the means of ſpeaking to her. An interview, as our author obſerves, between two perſons who equally deſire it, is very quickly obtained; the lovers made the beſt uſe of their time, that is, they exchanged the moſt ſolemn vows of fidelity, and engaged to marry each other, as ſoon as the conſent of their parents could be obtained. To cover his amour, Zal-zer made a viſit at the ſame time to the father of his miſtreſs, by whom he was very kindly received, and, after ſtaying with him all night, ſet out on his return to his father in the province of Sigjiſtan. Almoſt as ſoon as he came home he acquainted Soham with all that had happened, and that it was impoſſible for him to live, at leaſt in any degree of happineſs, without the poſſeſſion of the daughter of Meherab. Some difficulty there was in procuring the king's conſent to this marriage, for it was hitherto a thing without precedent for a Perſian to eſpouſe a Turk. However, the many ſervices of Soham, and the great merit of Zal-zer, prevailed ſo far over Manugeher, that he at laſt yielded to all they deſired. The nuptials were celebrated with prodigious magnificence; the inhabitants of Sigjiſtan and Kablouſtan vying with each other in their expreſſions of joy on this occaſion; nor were the conſequences of this match leſs happy than its concluſion was ſplendid, for at the end of nine months the lovely Roudabah was brought to bed of a ſon who was named Ruſtan, the mighty hero of all the oriental romances [i]. The reader will hereafter perceive, how the loves of this illuſtrious pair came to find a place in the Perſian hiſtory. Let us now return to Manugeher, who ſpent all his time in putting the affairs of his kingdom in the beſt order imaginable, with reſpect both to peace and war; that is, he took care to baniſh luxury, to encourage virtue, and to render every man's condition ſo happy, as to engage him to fight for that government on the continuance of which it depended. The perſonal qualifications of this monarch have been already, in ſome meaſure, diſplayed; it remains, however, that we do him juſtice in one particular of greater importance than all the reſt; he was a moſt zealous worſhipper of the true God, of which we have the moſt ſhining inſtances in the hiſtory of his life and reign, written by Tabari [k] an antient Perſian author. By him we are informed, that as ſoon as this prince heard of the Turks paſſing the river Gjeihon in order to drive him out of his dominions, he aſſembled a great council of his nobility, wherein he delivered himſelf in theſe words; "The moſt holy and high God

"delivered

[i] Mirkhond. hiſt. ſect. viii. D'Herbelot. Artic. Manougeher.
[k] Apud Hyde, Relig. vet. Perſ. c. viii. p. 156.

" delivered to me this kingdom, that I might render him
" praiſe and glory by my actions as a prince, preſerving
" my people in plenty and eaſe, and impartially diſtribu-
" ting juſtice, that thereby the glorious gift of God " might in my hand be ſtrengthened and encreaſed. If " contrary to this my duty I had acted ungratefully to" wards my creator, then I ſhould juſtly have deſerved
" to loſe my kingdom here, and to ſuffer everlaſting pu" niſhment for my wickedneſs hereafter. The moſt holy " and high God having cauſed me to be born of royal " blood, and in right thereof beſtowed a kingdom upon " me, let us not my friends baſely throw it away, or tame-
" ly ſuffer it to be taken from us; conſider well of the " ſtate we are in, and to morrow I will more largely in" form you as to my ſentiments of the matter". The next day accordingly the nobles of Perſia aſſembled again, and the king being ſeated in his throne of ſtate with his royal crown upon his head, and the Mubad Mubadan, or high-prieſt, ſeated near him in his golden chair, he roſe up and ſpoke as he had done the day before, aſcribing all dominion to the Almighty, and acknowledging that the crown of Perſia was his gift; he then obſerved, that all things depended alike on the will of the ſupreme being, and that nothing could take effect but by his command, or with his permiſſion. He ſaid farther, that God had long indulged the Perſian nation the full enjoyment of many bleſſings, in conſequence of which they were bound to live in exact obedience to his laws, that is, making a proper uſe of the good things beſtowed on them. He added, that as to the point at preſent before them, viz. the invaſion of the Turks, it came not but by the permiſſion of God, wherefore to him they ought firſt to apply themſelves for its being taken away. He exhorted them to reform their lives, to be conſtant in prayer, to exert their courage and their underſtandings in the defence of their country, and to reſt ſtedfaſtly in the hope that the Almighty would not forſake them, but reſtore them again to peace and quiet, either by giving them a victory over their enemies, or inclining the hearts of their enemies to peace. The piety of this prince was rewarded with a very long life and reign; as to the extent of the former we have no certainty, but as to the latter, authors agree in fixing it at 120 years. They ſay likewiſe, that the death of Manugjahr was like his his life majeſtic and ſerene, that he called to him his ſon and ſucceſſor, gave him in few words his advice as to the government of his dominions, and recommended his ſubjects moſt affectionately to his care [1].

Nudar. NUDAR, or Naudar, ſucceeded his father, but his reign was far from being as happy. He was ſcarce ſeated on his throne before his grandees began to form parties and to create ſeditions in his empire, which weakened it ſo much, that the Turks immediately conceived hopes of conquering it, a thing they had long ſet their hearts on. With this view Paſhangh, at that time king of Touran, the direct deſcendent of Tour the ſon of Phridun, called his ſons together; and having expatiated, firſt on the right which their family had to the kingdom of Perſia; and ſecondly, of the low ſtate the Perſian affairs were then in; he told them, that the intent of his drawing them together was to know which of them had courage enough to aſſert the pretenſions derived to him from his anceſtors, and to undertake the reduction of the provinces on the other ſide of the Gjeihon. Apheraſiab his eldeſt ſon, ſtung with ambition, and deſirous of excelling his brethren, immediately offered himſelf to raiſe an army in order to conquer Iran. Accordingly he drew together 400,000 horſe and foot, and with this prodigious army entered Sigjiſtan. Nudar, as ſoon as he was informed of this, cauſed his beſt troops to file off that way, and gave the command of them to Soham the father of Zal-zer; but he being old and decrepid was forced to march ſlowly towards the enemy, and even that fatigued him ſo much, that he died before he had reached the place of rendezvous, an event highly pleaſing to Apheraſiab, who very much dreaded the valour and conduct of this very great man. Nudar, not doubting that Soham and his troops were already arrived at the place he appointed them, marched with his army towards Mazanderan, where, on a ſudden, and before he expected it, they came within ſight of the enemy. The camps being oppoſite to each other, a Turkiſh champion, whoſe name was Baſmon, challenged any of the Perſian warriors to a ſingle combat, which challenge was readily accepted by Kobad the grandſon of Kaoh, of whom we have ſaid ſo much in the life of Phridun. The combat terminated in favour of the Perſian, who having ſlain his antagoniſt ſpoiled him of his arms, and carried them, as the trophy of his victory, to his tent. The Turks

[1] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. ubi ſupra.

Turks were prodigiouſly incenſed at this accident, and reſolved with themſelves to revenge it ſpeedily on Nudar and his army. Accordingly, having poſſeſſed themſelves of all the poſts about it, they attacked the Perſians in their camp, where a moſt obſtinate battle was fought, till at length there happened ſuch a prodigious ſhower of rain, attended with ſuch an extraordinary darkneſs, that Nudar laid hold of this opportunity to retire, and to order his ſons Thus and Guſtam, who were at the head of ſeparate bodies, to march ſpeedily to his relief, which they did, accompanied by Karen the brother of Kobad, who had found means to withdraw the royal treaſures out of Sigjiſtan, and to ſend them to a place of ſafety. Apheraſiab obſerving the meaſures taken by Nudar, and conceiving that his intent was to ſpin out the war, he, to prevent its running into a length, which in the end would have been deſtructive to his troops, ſent an officer of his, whoſe name was Karahon, with poſitive orders to attack Karen, and the body of Perſians under his command, which accordingly he did, killed their commander, and effectually diſperſed the reſt. Not long after Apheraſiab attacked Nudar in his camp, and, after obtaining a ſignal victory, took that monarch priſoner in his flight with many Perſian nobles. As ſoon as they came into his preſence Apheraſiab ordered them to be cut in pieces, but his brother, a prince of great humanity and wiſdom, hindered him, and prevailed on him to content himſelf with putting them in priſon, to which, with much ado, he yielded. The next ſtep after this victory was to poſſeſs himſelf of the court and treaſures of Nudar, in order to which Apheraſiab inſtantly detached a body of 30,000 men; they entering the province of Sigjiſtan made themſelves maſters of the capital and of the royal palace, the Perſians being every where ſo intimidated that they durſt not ſtir, but ſubmitted tamely to the yoke, which conqueſt had impoſed upon them. Meherab it ſeems, after the marriage of his daughter to Zal-zer, had retired into Perſia, and lived in great honour and affluence there, till this ſudden overthrow of the empire threatened him as well as the reſt of its inhabitants. Meherab, being a man of great policy, bethought himſelf of a means to divert immediate danger by ſending a meſſenger to Apheraſiab, with very rich preſents and a letter to this purpoſe, "That though he lived in "Perſia, he was by nation a Turk, and not only ſo, but "in ſome meaſure allied to him in blood, being lineally "deſcended

" deſcended from Zoak, wherefore he hoped his family, " and this early teſtimony of obedience, would be ſuffici- " ent to recommend him to his ſpecial protection". Having thus amuſed the victor, he gave notice to his ſon-in-law Zal-zer, who aſſembling, as privately as he could, ſeveral ſmall bodies of men, appointed them a place of rendezvous, where he himſelf joined them, and finding them numerous enough to attempt ſomewhat againſt the common enemy, he began to act offenſively, and in a ſhort time drove the Turks out of the province of Sigjiſtan. Of which when Apheraſiab received intelligence, it provoked him ſo much, that he ordered the unfortunate Nudar to have his head ſtruck off in priſon, which was accordingly put in execution without the leaſt regard to his dignity. As to the length of his reign authors are divided, ſome making it ſeven, others enlarging it to nine. Mirkhond, whom we generally follow, adheres to the former number. Some oriental writers make this prince co-temporary with Joſhua, others place him much higher; we ſhall not determine here who are in the right [m].

Apheraſiab. APHERASIAB, or Afraſiab, notwithſtanding this rebellion, or rather inſurrection, looking upon himſelf as monarch of Perſia, ſent an account to his father Piſhangh of the happy ſucceſs with which his expedition had been crowned. But it was not long before he had news of another nature to ſend him; for the Perſians, univerſally deteſting his haughty and inſolent temper, began to raiſe ſeditions in every part of the kingdom; nay, their averſion engaged them in ſteps which carried their intrigues farther, and made them endeavour to ſtir up the brother of Apheraſiab, who had at firſt ſaved Nudar's life, to put in his claim to the throne, promiſing him firſt aſſiſtance and then obedience. He, burning with the ambition natural to his family, liſtened readily to the propoſal, and adviſed them to engage Zal-zer to invade the provinces in the neighbourhood of Sigjiſtan in the ſpring, aſſuring them, that the war once begun, he would appear in their favour. Theſe negotiations could not be carried on ſo ſecretly, but that Apheraſiab gained intelligence of them, and immediately ſet all his wits to work to prevent their taking effect; with this view he cauſed his brother to be aſſaſſinated, and then applied himſelf indefatigably to the raiſing of troops, reſolving to reduce all his opponents. Zal-zer being being informed of theſe proceedings, and vehemently regretting the loſs of the young Turkiſh prince, openly excited the Perſians to take arms, deriding their cowardice, and giving them to underſtand, that more than half their enemy's ſtrength lay in their fears. His diſcourſes by degrees had ſuch an effect, that the inhabitants of Perſia, aſſembling together in ſmall bodies, marched by night through ſecret and by-ways to his camp, where when they were all arrived, Zal-zer found himſelf at the head of a very formidable army [n]. Afraſiab, who had his ſpies every where, receiving an exact account of Zal-zer's ſituation, immediately reſolved to change his manner of making war, and to act altogether on the defenſive. This gave the Perſian captain a great deal of trouble; but at laſt he found an opportunity of bringing Afraſiab to a battle; it was very bloody, and ſo obſtinate, that it laſted till it was dark, and then each army, retiring to its camp, found, that neither ſide had any reaſon to boaſt of victory; the war continued for a long time after this without any deciſive action, whereby all induſtry being deſtroyed, there followed firſt a ſcarcity, then a famine, and on the heels of this a grievous peſtilence, which, falling at once into both camps, filled Apheraſiab and Zal-zer with thoughts of peace. Negotiations were not long on foot before a treaty was concluded, whereby it was ſtipulated, that Afraſiab ſhould withdraw his troops and effects without moleſtation and retire into Touran, while Iran and all its dependencies ſhould remain under the protection of Zal-zer; this peace concluded and ratified, it would have been eaſy for that nobleman to have raiſed himſelf to the throne of Perſia; but he ſcorning to barter immortal fame for a ſhort-lived royalty, ſought out Zab, or Zoub, the lawful heir of the Houſe of Keyomaras, and put the crown upon his head [o].

[m] Mirchond. Hiſt. viii. D'Herbelot. Artic. Naudhar.

Zab. ZAB, Zoub, or Bazab, at the time of his acceſſion to the royal dignity was far advanced in years, but had notwithſtanding a tolerable ſhare of health and ſpirits; he applied himſelf to the reſtoring, as well as he could, the ſhattered affairs of Perſia; the more effectually to do this he aſſociated with him in the empire Gherſchaſp his nephew, whom ſome have called Kiſchtaſp, and have made made him not the nephew and aſſociate, but the ſon and ſucceſſor of Zab or Zoub; but this ſeems to be a miſtake, and the ground of it pretty obvious, the father of this Gherſchaſp being called Kiſchtaſp. But to return to Zab; he ſacrificed much of the prerogative of the crown to make the people eaſy, and to enable them to recover their loſſes after the wretched depredations committed by Afraſiab and his troops; he did more than all this, he threw open the royal treaſury, and as often as any ſums were paid in there, he firſt paid his ſoldiers, and then diſtributed the reſt among the poor. Theſe were certainly high virtues, but this prince is branded for a vice, particularly infamous on a throne, viz. that of gluttony, or rather luxury in eating, and is recorded to have been the author of various ſorts of ſauces and broths, unknown before in theſe regions. It is not very clear how long he reigned, or who was his ſucceſſor. Mirkhond makes him expreſly the laſt of the firſt race of kings, who from the ſirname of Huſhangh were called in general Piſchdadians, though to us it ſeems more probable, that they received this appellation, becauſe during the ſeveral reigns of theſe princes the laws and conſtitution of Perſia were thoroughly ſettled [p]. According to other authors Gherſchaſp, or Kiſchtaſp, ſucceeded in the empire by the voluntary ceſſion of Zab orZoub; his mother is ſaid to have been a Jeweſs of the tribe of Benjamin, he proved a prince of great merit, and deſerving of a better fate than he met; for he did all in his power to reſtore the Perſian diadem to its antient luſtre. Afraſiab, little regarding his treaties, took advantage of the diſorder the kingdom was in, to re-enter it with a formidable army, and to poſſeſs himſelf of various provinces. The new king fought under great diſadvantages, but in ſpite of theſe he frequently defeated the Turks, and recovered various places out of their hands; at laſt, however, he fell into the error of many of his predeceſſors, that is, he put all his affairs to hazard in one battle, which he loſt, and with it his life, being killed fighting bravely for the liberty of his country after a reign ſome ſay of ſix, others of thirty, years; but whether the former may not include the reigns of Zab and of this prince too, or whether the latter ought to be accounted the time that this monarch reigned alone, we pretend not to determine. In this all are agreed, that here the empire empire of the Piſchdadians ended, and that Afraſiab the deſcendant of Tour became a third time abſolute lord of Perſia; how he afterwards loſt the poſſeſſion of this empire will be ſhewn in its proper place [q]. In the mean time, it may not be amiſs to inſert here ſome remarks on the foregoing period, in order to juſtify the obſervation we have ſo often made, that oriental hiſtory, though mixed with fables, is not altogether uſeleſs.

[n] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ubi ſupra. [o] Khondemir, in Khelaſſat. Alakbar. D'Herbelot. Art. Afraziab, Zal. Zoub. Mirkhond. hiſt. Sect. 10.

[p] Mirkhond. hiſt. Sect. 11. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Artic. Naudhar.

In the courſe of this work our method has been to ſpeak firſt of the chronology, and afterwards of the hiſtory of each country; in the preſent caſe it was impracticable, unleſs we had tormented the reader with needleſs repetitions and nauſeous tautologies. We have therefore choſen to give the ſeries of the Perſian hiſtory relating to the kings of the firſt race, as it lies in Mirkhond and other authors; and, after laying down theſe facts as foundations of our arguments, to lead the reader by degrees to what we eſteem the true ſtate of the antient Perſian empire. In the firſt place, it is remarkable, that the oriental writers make this race of kings Medians by deſcent. The province of Aderbayagjan, of which they make Keyomaras to have been at firſt ſovereign, is a a part of Media, taking in alſo a part of Armenia, ſo that in all probability it was one of the firſt peopled provinces of the dominion of Shem, if we ſuppoſe that territorieswere aſcertained and ſet out immediately after the flood. Within this province ſtands the little town, that is conſidering it in its preſent condition, Nakſhivan, which the inhabitants affirm to have been the firſt town built after the flood; and indeed in the Armenian language the very name implies as much, it being equivalent to the firſt place, or firſt habitation [r]. Thus the early erecting of a monarchy hereabouts is rendered every way probable, and conſiſtent with the moſt antient accounts ſacred and prophane. As the power of Keyomaras increaſed, he extended his territories towards the eaſt, and towards the ſouth; for it is agreed, that he made himſelf maſter of Irak-agami; afterwards Parthia, and in proceſs of time joined thereto the province of Phars or proper Perſia, where ſome hiſtorians affirm he founded the city of Iſtachr, afterwards called Perſepolis, though others deny it, and ſay it was built later.

[q] D'Herbelot. Art. Gherſchtaſb, Kiſchſtaſb. [r] Tavernier. Voyag. tom. i. p. 43. Chardin, Voy. tom. i. p. 250.

ter. The ſucceſſors of this prince conquered Khirman and Sigjiſtan, and afterwards many other countries on the eaſt of the preſent Perſian empire. It was Phridun or Feridoun who ſettled the dominions of Perſia in pretty near the ſame order we find them at this day; it is evident therefore, that the kings of the firſt race were not petty princes or tributaries, but lords of a very extenſive empire. As to the capital of their dominions in the time of Keyomaras, ſome think it was at Balch in Choraſan, others at Iſtachr. Perhaps he might firſt fix his reſidence at Balch, and afterwards remove it into the heart of his kingdom. Huſhang reſided again at Balch, Gjemſchid ſettled himſelf at Iſtachr, and is by moſt of the Perſian authors eſteemed its founder. In the reigns of ſucceeding kings, though their royal reſidence might ſometimes be changed, Iſtachr remained the capital, and received from time to time great improvements from the Perſian monarchs. Kiſchtaſp the laſt of them had a peculiar liking to this place, and no doubt took pains to re-edify whatever injuries it might have ſuſtained through the courſe of a long war. Thus the glory of this city, which was afterwards ſo famous among the Greeks under the name of Perſepolis, began, as we obſerved in our deſcription of Perſia, under the firſt race of kings [g]. How it was afterwards adorned with a royal palace, of which the ruins are ſtill remaining, we ſhall ſhew in the hiſtory of the princes of the ſecond race; in the mean time, let it be remembered, that ſeveral princes of the dynaſty of Piſchdadians were great lovers of arts, and great encouragers of ingenuity and learning; if therefore there were in their time, eſpecially in the days of Manugeher, who is particularly famous in the oriental hiſtory for delighting in architecture and every thing dependent thereon; if in his days, we ſay, there were any artiſts capable of carving in ſtone, they might have employed their time in cutting ſome of thoſe wonderful hiſtories in Baſ-relief, which are yet viſible in the living rock, behind the ruins of Chilminar, or of the other works of the like kind remaining in other parts of Perſia. This, we ſay, is poſſible, and not improbable, but we affirm nothing; the piety, however, of Manugeher is a circumſtance nothing unfavourable to this conjecture, that the king praying before the fire, and in ſight of the ſun, repreſented in the mountain beforementioned, [g] Biblioth. orient. Art. Eſtekar.

mentioned, might be intended for him. This leads us to the religion of theſe antient kings which we have already ſhewn to be very near the true religion, that is, the religion of the patriarchs. As to the worſhip of fire, it was indiſputably a very antient doctrine, and there ſeems to be no reaſon for doubting the truth of what ſome authors have affirmed, that it took its riſe in, if not before, the time of Keyomaras. Certain it is, that the province where he began to reign was the firſt in which Magiſm prevailed, and was always held ſacred by the profeſſors of that religion on that account; this the very name implies, for Aderbaygjan is no more than the place of fire, Ader or Azer ſignifying fire, and Bayagjan a place, whence it comes to paſs, that we frequently find this word thus written Azerbayagjan. The high mountain of Albors was the principal place of worſhip in theſe early times, and the people were perſuaded, that celeſtial fire was preſerved there; on this account when the treaſures of Nudar king of Perſia were removed out of Sigjiſtan, as we have before related, they were for ſecurity placed here. Nay, what is far more extraordinary, this ſuperſtition is not yet worn out of the heads of the Ghaurs, if we may believe Sir John Chardin; on the contrary they yet ſpeak confidently of celeſtial or elemental fire, which they ſay is ſtill to be ſeen in this mountain [t]. On the whole therefore, the religion of the Perſians under the firſt race of kings differed very little from that which ſtill ſubſiſts among the Ghaurs. Some indeed have been of opinion, that there were no Pyræa or fire-temples at all before the time of Zoroaſter or Zerduſht; others, on the authority of ſome Arabian writers, aſſert the contrary, ſo as it ſeems probable, that the former is the opinion neareſt truth. Our reaſons for ſaying this are theſe, firſt the antienteſt hiſtorians extant ſay nothing of temples till after the time of the Exodus of the children of Iſrael. Secondly, becauſe Herodotus ſays expreſly, that the antient Perſians had no temples, but ſacrificed on the tops of high mountains ſub dio; and thirdly, becauſe of Pyræa being at that time in uſe is not conſiſtent with the hiſtory of Zerduſht, as we ſhall ſhortly have occaſion to ſhew. From the power and the religion of the firſt race of Perſian kings, we come at length to the intricate queſtion, when they flouriſhed? or rather how their reigns are to be reconciled to ſacred and profane

[t] Chardin. Voyag. tom. i. 253.

profane hiſtory? Before we pretend to give the ſolution of this problem, let us conſider a little what ſacred and profane hiſtorians ſay of the antient kings of Media and Perſia. The ſcripture informs us, that Elam was a very antient kingdom, for Cherdorlaomer came with a great army to reduce the region of Pentapolis in Canaan, and the circumjacent countries to his obedience in the days of Abraham; from thence we hear nothing of this nation, till the kingdoms of Iſrael and Judah were on their decline. In reſpect to theſe antient times the Greek writers are very inſufficient guides, if we may believe the moſt judicious writer of hiſtory that nation ever produced, viz. Thucydides, who very frankly declares they knew very little of their own affairs beyond the memory of man [u], that is, they were able to give no account of them with order and certainty. They were indeed a bold and pretending people in hiſtory as well as in other ſciences, but they ſeldom told their ſtories in a manner capable of gaining them belief. Herodotus pretends not to ſay any thing of the hiſtory of the Medes, above one hundred and fifty years before the time of Cyrus, where he places Dijoces, whom he makes the firſt king of Media, and ſpeaks of his advancement in that dignity, in terms [x] exactly correſpondent to thoſe made uſe of by Mirkhond in his hiſtory of the election of Keyomaras. Diodorus Siculus, who really deſerves the higheſt credit, becauſe he took the utmoſt pains to be well informed, and ſpent a long ſeries of years in collecting the materials for his hiſtory; gives us a liſt of ten Median kings reigning in all 282 years [y]; but the critics are not pleaſed with theſe, becauſe Diodorus took them from Cteſias, and Cteſias had his materials from the Median and Perſian records; an odd reaſon for diſbelieving all he ſays. But it ſeems, Cteſias's account did not conſiſt well with thoſe that the Greeks had given before him, and therefore he loſt his credit, and his hiſtory was rejected as fabulous. By the ſame rule of argument our oriental hiſtory muſt be condemned too, for it is as inconſiſtent with the Greek hiſtory, as the memoirs of Cteſias, and for the very ſame reaſon; becauſe it is taken as his hiſtory was from what the Medes and Perſians ſay of themſelves. Not to keep the reader long in ſuſpenſe, there is evidently a great gap of time between the erection of the old Medo-Perſic monarchy, and its being ing deſtroyed by the Aſſyrian emperors. The queſtion is, whether we will ſuppoſe, that theſe people lived all that time without doing any thing, becauſe none of the Greek hiſtorians, except Diodorus from Cteſias, have vouchſafed, or indeed have been able, to tell us what they did, or whether we ſhall admit Cteſias's exploded method, and fill up this chaſm with what the Perſians ſay of themſelves? If this latter courſe be to be ſteered, here is room for all the Piſchdadians at once. But then as to the ſynchroniſm of their reigns we deſire to be excuſed from ſettling it, becauſe at preſent we ſee no likelihood of our doing it with any degree of exactneſs. However, when the Perſian hiſtory, according to oriental writers, ſhall be deduced as low as the reign of Yezdegherd, the laſt native of that country who ſwayed its ſceptre, we ſhall reconſider this point, and ſet the whole chronology of the Perſic empire in the beſt light we may. In the mean time, we ſhall conclude theſe obſervations with remarking, that Cteſias and all others, who have at any time thought of enquiring as to the Perſian hiſtory from the Perſian records, have found in the moſt early times great and potent princes reigning here, marching great armies into the field, erecting great cities, laying up immenſe treaſures, and ruling with an equal mixture of wiſdom and magnificence. Now this is exactly what we ſay from Mohammedan writers, who own they have taken all which they deliver from the old Perſian writers; if therefore all this be fable, 'tis at leaſt very antient and uniform fable, or to ſpeak ſeriouſly, it has as much the appearance of truth as any hiſtory as antient that we know of. But it is time to leave reaſoning and conjectures to return to the thread of our hiſtory, and to ſhew the ſteps by which Apheraſiab was expelled, and the Perſian dominions once more reſtored to a prince of that country.

[u] Thucydides, Præm. Hiſt. [x] Clio, c. 71. [y] Biblioth. lib. ii. c. 3.

The hiſtory of the Perſian kings of the ſecond race, or of the dynaſty of the Kainites.

KEYKOBAD, or Caicobad, whom ſome writers make the ſon of Zab, the ſon of Tahamaſp, the ſon of Manugeher, king of Perſia, and others call ſimply the nephew of Nudar, was ſeated on the throne of Perſia by the famous Zal-zer, who was ſo loyal to the family that raiſed him, that he twice refuſed the Perſian diadem, becauſe he would not injure them. At this time he and his ſon Ruſtan put themKeykobad.

selves at the head of such a body of troops as enabled them to give Apheraſiab abundance of trouble, and by degrees to put into the poſſeſſion of Keykobad the greateſt part of the provinces of Perſia. This monarch proved at once a good prince to his ſubjects in general, and extremely grateful to the perſons particularly concerned in raiſing him to the empire. He intruſted the command of all his forces with Ruſtan, and did nothing in civil affairs without the advice of his father; by degrees his troops, under the command of the famous hero before-mentioned, gained ſuch advantages, that Apheraſiab retired before them, and was at laſt driven to ſuch diſtreſs that he deſired to treat of a peace; but his commiſſioners and thoſe of the king of Perſia differing about the terms, Apheraſiab hazarded a ſecond battle, wherein, notwithſtanding his troops fought with great reſolution; he was totally defeated. In the heat of this engagement, Ruſtan deſired ſome of the officers about him to ſhew him Apheraſiab, which when they had done, Ruſtan ſpurred towards him with ſuch an impetuous force that he beat him from his horſe, and afterwards diſmounting from his own he tied his hands and feet together with a cord, and having laid him before himſelf upon his own ſteed rode out of the battle, and threw him in a particular place. Apherſiab, finding himſelf left alone, ſtruggled with ſuch force that he at laſt got looſe; then taking the cord, he tied the hands and feet of a dead man as Ruſtan had tied his, and retired to a troop of his own horſe, with whom he made his eſcape. After victory had declared itſelf in favour of the army of Keykobad, Ruſtan rode up to ſalute him. Amongſt other compliments of congratulation, he informed him that the war was now at an end, himſelf having made Apheraſiab priſoner, whom he alſo promiſed immediately to produce. Riding with that intent to the place where he had thrown the Turkiſh monarch, he found with ſurpriſe a dead man tied in his place; for this overſight of his he asked pardon of Keykobad, and ſolemnly promiſed, that if he met Apheraſiab in battle again, he would not make the ſame miſtake. But that prince, finding his affairs deſperate in Perſia, retired into Turqueſtan, and ſent from thence an embaſſador to treat with Keykobad, who was equally prevailed on not to carry his arms into Touran, when the right of him and his family to Iran was acknowledged by Apheraſiab, heraſiab, and all the ſcattered remnants of his army withdrawn [z]. The peace once ſettled, Keykobad applied himſelf to the reſtoring of the affairs of his kingdom, and in the firſt place fixed his court at Spahawn, which had been built by the famous king Houſhangh, adorned by Phridun, and afterwards given by him to Kaoh the ſmith and his family. The reaſon in all probability which determined Keykobad to reſide here, was its convenient ſituation in the heart of his dominions. His court once fixed, the king next beſtowed his favours on ſuch as had been inſtrumental in the expulſion of the Turks; to Ruſtan he gave the province of Zabluſtan, on the borders of India, watered with many pleaſant ſtreams, and adorned with the fineſt proſpects that can be wiſhed. This province afforded a ſirname to Ruſtan, and received itſelf a new name from him. That hero being ſtiled in moſt of the romances Zabeli, becauſe he was governor of Zabluſtan; and that province, or at leaſt a great part of it, was thenceforward called Ruſtandar, becauſe it had been the government of Ruſtan. Maharab, ſirnamed Kabuli, becauſe he had been governor of Kabul, was another of Keykobad's generals, and highly eſteemed by him. Kavan, one of the deſcendants of the famous Kaoh the ſmith, was alſo a perſon highly eſteemed by the king of Perſia; but what particular rewards he received authors do not mention. It ſeems he was a ſort of a knight errant, and acquired from thence the ſirname of Rezm Khuah, or the ſcarcher of adventures. A fourth captain of Keykobad's was Keſchvad, ſirnamed Zerin Kulah, from a golden tiara which he was allowed to wear, in reward for the mighty things he had done for the good of the empire. Keykobad divided all the ſpoil that had been brought into his treaſury among his ſoldiers, regulated their pay very exactly, and afterwards employed them in making great roads throughout the empire, ſetting up public marks at the end of every four thouſand paces, which ſpace by the Perſians is called Pherſengh, and from thence by the Greeks Paraſang. As this monarch was renowned for his wiſdom and proweſs, ſo he was no leſs famous on account of his piety; the Mohammedan writers inſiſt very much upon this, they aſſert, that he had many prophets who reſorted to his court, that he received, honoured, and obeyed them, and in time was a true believer, by which we are to underſtand that he was not a fire-worſhipper; but in this they are certainly miſtaken. They make him alſo contemporary with Samuel the judge of Iſrael, and aſſert, that he had ſome intercourſe with him. In the laſt years of his life he grew blind, and continued ſo till the day of his death, which happened, as ſome hiſtorians ſay, after a reign of one hundred years, according to others, when he had reigned one hundred and twenty years [a].

[z] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xii. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Afraſiab, Caikobad, Ruſtan.

Keykaus. KEYKAUS or Caikaus, the ſon, or, as ſome ſay, the grandſon of Keykobad, ſucceeded him in the throne of Perſia, on which he was ſcarce ſeated before a war broke out in Mazandrean, a province bordering on the Caſpian ſea, which required his preſence; a rebel prince, taking occaſion from the demiſe of Keykobad, made himſelf ſovereign there, and fortified the capital in ſuch a manner that he made it the ſtrongeſt place in the eaſt. Keykaus marched immediately againſt him, and coming with too great an army to be oppoſed, the rebel ſhut himſelf up in the city of Mazanderan, and prepared for a ſiege. Keykaus having viewed the place, and having received intelligence that it was extremely well provided with all ſorts of ammunitions and victuals, gave over all hopes of reducing it by force. But as in ſuch caſes 'tis uſual for experienced generals to have recourſe to ſtratagems, Keykaus deviſed one which anſwered his end effectually; he gave out in his camp, and he corrupted people to give it out in the city, that he was extremely diſtreſſed for proviſions, and ſhould be on that account obliged ſhortly to raiſe the ſiege. His emiſſaries in the place immediately inſinuated to the keepers of the ſtores, that by ſupplying the king of Perſia with ſmall quantities of victuals immenſe ſums might be got; this trade once on foot, Keykaus paid ſo well, that in a ſhort time there was not a loaf left; he then ſummoned the city peremtorily to ſurrender, and on a diſcovery of their circumſtances the inhabitants were forced to ſubmit [b]. He had not the like ſucceſs in another war, undertaken in this province againſt Apheraſiab; for the Perſian army being defeated, king Keykaus was taken and thrown into a priſon, from whence he was releaſed by the timely care of his general Ruſtan, who entering Touran with a numerous army, waſted all before fore him with fire and ſword, declaring, that he would deſtroy the whole country, if they did not ſet his maſter at liberty, which ſo terrified the people, that their clamour prevailed on Apheraſiab to diſmiſs Keykaus on his promiſe to recal Ruſtan. As ſoon as the Perſian monarch had regained his liberty, he made uſe of the hero we have ſo often mentioned to curb his enemies on every ſide; and he is recorded to have carried his arms into Mezr, i. e. Egypt; Shamah, i. e. Syria; and Rum, i. e. Aſia Minor. After theſe wars were over and all things in a quiet ſituation, Keykaus, to ſhew the high eſteem he had of Ruſtan's ſervices, gave him his ſiſter in marriage; the name of this princeſs was Gehernaz i. e. endowed with all virtues, and with her by way of portion he gave him the office of generaliſſimo of all his armies, and made him vicar general of his kingdom, with the title of Pehelevan Gihan, i. e. ſupporter of the Perſian empire. We are not told who it was Keykaus himſelf married, but whoever ſhe was he had by her two ſons, named Siavek and Phraiborz; the eldeſt of theſe, viz. Siavek, was ſent to live with, and to be bred up under his uncle Ruſtan. How long things continued in this tranquil ſtate does not appear; but the next war we hear of was againſt Zulzogar king of Arabia. What provocation he gave Keykaus is uncertain; but the king of Perſia carried his reſentment ſo far, that he had well reduced the whole kingdom of Yemen, over which Zulzogar reigned, under his dominion; at length it came to the ears of Keykaus, that this Arabian prince had a daughter, the moſt lovely woman in the world; upon which the Perſian king ſent to demand her in marriage the king of Yemen, deſirous to be rid at any rate of ſuch an enemy, ſent immediately his daughter to the king of Perſia's Haram. As ſoon as Keykaus beheld Saudabah, he was ſo ſtruck with her beauty, that he conceived himſelf the happieſt man in the world by having her in poſſeſſion. Overcome therefore with the violence of his paſſion, he abandoned himſelf to all ſorts of exceſſes, giving great entertainments, and encouraging all ſorts of diverſions in his camp, without ſo much as remembering that he was in an enemy's country. Zulzogar, who foreſaw all this, drew together privately a conſiderable body of horſe, and falling unexpectedly on the Perſian army abſolutely defeated it, and made the king and all his court priſoners. The news of this no ſooner reached Perſia, than Ruſtan put himſelf at the head of the forces left under his command, and marched with them immediately into Yemen. Zulzogar knew very well, that he had no troops capable of contending with the veterans under the command of Ruſtan, and for this reaſon he treated the king of Perſia, while in his power, with the utmoſt civility and reſpect, ſo that he had no great difficulty in prevailing on him to ſend his general orders to forbear hoſtilities and to think of peace. A treaty was quickly concluded between the father and ſon-in-law, whereby the former quitted all pretenſions to the kingdom of Yemen, and promiſed to invade it no more, while the latter engaged to be the friend and ally of the Perſian nation, and to aſſiſt it to the utmoſt of his power; in conſequence of which Keykaus was immediately ſet at liberty, with all thoſe who had been taken priſoners with him, and returned triumphantly into Perſia with his new ſpouſe Saudabah [c]. Not long after this Siavek came to court, and was received with the utmoſt affection by his father. Saudabah, either charmed with the beauty of his perſon, or affecting ſo to be, ſollicited him to an inceſtuous amour, which he, being a prince of great virtue, rejected with abhorrence; upon which waiting a proper opportunity, when the king was one day alone in his parlour, Saudabah ruſhed in with her hear diſhevelled, her night-gown torn, and her breaſt bloody, crying out for juſtice againſt Siavek, who had made an attempt upon her honour; the king immediately cauſed his ſon to be impriſoned, and obliged him to ſtand a tryal; ſome ſay he underwent the ordeal by fire, however it was, the young prince was acquitted, and the wickedneſs of Shudabah clearly appeared. Upon which the king would have put her to death, if his ſon had not interceeded for her on his knees. Theſe proceeding having created ſome diviſions and heart-burnings in the court of Perſia, Apheraſiab, who waited all opportunities of diſtreſſing that nation, failing not to take this, and to paſs the river Gjiehon with a great body of troops, in order to beſiege Balch. Keyhaus, rouſed by the impending danger, ordered his ſon to march into Sigjiſtan with twelve thouſand horſe, there to join the forces under the command of Ruſtan, in order to make head a-

[a] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Artic. Rezm Khuah, &c.
[b] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xiii.

gainſt

[c] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Caicaus. Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xiii.

gainſt the enemy. Syavek readily obeyed, and, after joining his uncle Ruſtan, marched with ſuch expedition, that they were ſoon in the neighbourhood of Apheraſiab and his army; but not thinking fit to hazard an engagement immediately, they took care to pitch on a very ſtrong camp. Apheraſiab, knowing that his affairs would not permit him to carry on a long and lingering war, attacked them therein, which Ruſtan foreſaw, and provided ſo well for his reception, that he was not only repulſed, but his troops ſuffered ſo much in the attack, that he began ſincerely to think of peace, in order to prevent the coming of this army of Perſians into his dominions. With this view he ſent commiſſioners to the camp of Syavek and Ruſtan, in order to ſettle the terms of a perpetual alliance; they were very kindly received, and the young prince, his uncle, and two Perſians of great quality, who were of his council, ſettled with them the heads of a treaty very advantageous to Perſia, which being ratified by Apherſiab, the young prince diſpatched an expreſs to carry the peace to his rather. It ſeems the intrigues of Saudabah had created this deſerving young prince many enemies in his father's court, who took this opportunity of perſuading the king, that Syavek had exceeded his commiſſion, and injured the majeſty of the Perſian empire by the treaty which he had made. Keykobad, influenced by theſe ſuggeſtions, diſpatched his uncle Thus to the army with letters full of ſharpneſs with reſpect to the young prince, and with directions to deliver up the command to Thus, and to ſignify to Ruſtan, that the king thought him now old enough to take his reſt, and therefore deſired him to retire to his government of Sigiſtan. Ruſtan obeyed, and the prince continued in the army, which now marched to the frontiers of Turqueſtan, in order to act offenſively againſt Apheraſiab. When they were arrived in the neighbourhood of the river Gihon, the prince taking with him Piran-Viſſeh, an officer of diſtinction in the Turkiſh army who had remained with him as an hoſtage, went directly to the court of Apheraſiab, to ſhew him how contrary to his humour it was to be guilty of a breach of faith. Apheraſiab received him with open arms, placed him on a throne by his own, and gave him his daughter Franghiz in marriage [d]. The nobility of Turqueſtan were ſo much charmed with this young prince, and gave him continually ſuch ſtrong marks of their eſteem, that Garſiaveſch, brother to Apheraſiab, took umbrage at it, and reſolved to have him taken off. Syavek, who was a prince of great penetration, diſcovered his intention, and foreſeeing that in a ſtrange country it was impoſſible for him to guard againſt ſuch attempts, he ſpoke of it to his wife, who was then great with child, and conjured her in caſe he ſhould be murdered, to ſend his ſon, if ſhe ſhould be brought to bed of one, into Perſia. A ſmall time after, what he feared came to paſs, he was killed by ſome aſſaſſins, hired by Garſiaveſch, who would alſo have diſpatched his wife, if Piran-Viſſeh had not luckily entered the room and prevented it. Franghiz was afterwards brought to bed of a ſon, called Key-choſrau, who in time ſucceeded his grandfather. The people of Turqueſtan were ſo much grieved for the death of Syavek, that, to ſhew their concern, they mourned in Perſian habits, a cuſtom which has ever ſince remained amongſt them. The news of the prince of Perſia's death reached Ruſtan in his government, he, without expecting orders, entered Turqueſtan with a conſiderable army, burning and deſtroying all the country before him. Garſiaveſch raiſed a body of troops as ſoon as he was able, and marched to oppoſe him; but coming to an engagement, they were ſoon defeated, and Garſiaveſch himſelf had his head ſtruck off by the ſword of Ruſtan [c]. The deſire this hero had to do all the good he could to the family of his pupil and nephew Syavek, put him upon enquiring for his ſon; but his mother kept him ſo effectually concealed, that neither his friends nor his foes could find him out, which gave Ruſtan inexpreſſible concern; ſome years after, however, Keykaus ſent Guiu the ſon of Gudarz, a young Perſian nobleman of great capacity, into Turqueſtan, in order to diſcover his grandſon. Some ſay, that Guiu having ſought the young prince a long time in vain, met him by chance one day as he was hunting, and, knowing him by the reſemblance he bore of his father, addreſſed himſelf frankly to him, told him his name and his commiſſion. Key-choſrau liſtened greedily to the propoſal made him of retiring into Perſia, but deſired, that he might carry his mother and Piran-Viſſeh, the old and faithful friend of his father, with him, that they might be ſafe from the attempts of their enemies. This being agreed to, all things were concerted ſo well, that they quitted quitted Turqueſtan and got ſafe into Perſia, little to the ſatisfaction of Apheraſiab, who was mighty well pleaſed with having in his hands the heir of the Perſian diadem. He ordered them immediately to be purſued by ſeveral roads but all to no purpoſe, though they paſſed the river Gjiehon in ſight of their purſuers. On the arrival of Key-choſrau at the court of his grandfather, the face of affairs ſuddenly changed; thoſe who had been avowed enemies of the prince Syavek his father were immediately removed, and Keykaubad, to ſhew his affection for the young prince, made him generaliſſimo of his armies, and raiſed Guiu, who had brought him back, to the higheſt honours. Thus, who had been no friend to Syavek, began to be apprehenſive of the power of Key-cohuſrau, and therefore took all opportunities of influencing Fraiborz, the ſon of Keykaus, by ſuggeſting to him, that the new-come prince would rob him of the crown of Perſia, which ought by no means to be placed on the head of one deſcended by the mother's ſide from Tour, the implacable enemy of their name and nation; theſe ſeeds of diſſention ſown, the Perſian court was quickly in diſorder, all the nobility taking one ſide or other, to the no ſmall detriment of the affairs of the nation. Keykaus in the mean time was unwilling to declare either againſt his ſon or his grandſon. At laſt, to prevent, as far as in him lay, the inconveniences that might attend a diſputed ſucceſſion, he reſolved to give the competitors for the crown a fair opportunity of diſplaying their abilities, and to declare him who had the greateſt deſert his heir. One Bahaman, who had been intruſted with the city of Ardebil or Ardevil in the province of Aderbayagjan, had made himſelf prince of that place, and thrown off his allegiance to the king of Perſia. Keykaus ſent a body of troops, under the command of his ſon Fraibroz, to inveſt the town on one ſide, and an equal number under Key-choſrau to ſit down before it on the other, informing both the princes, when they ſet out for their reſpective commands, that whoever reduced the place he would declare ſucceſſor to the throne. Thus, according to his repeated profeſſions of friendſhip to Fraiborz, ſet out with him for the army, and did all that in his power lay to make him maſter of Ardevil, but to no purpoſe; Bahaman, apprized of the ſiege, had provided all things neceſſary for a long defence, and was himſelf ſo conſummate an officer, that he triumphed over all the attempts of the Perſian army under Fraiborz. Key-choſrau had better ſucceſs; the troops commanded

[d] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Ruſtan, Slivek, Piran, Viſſeh. Mirkhond. Hiſt. ubi ſupra.

[c] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Caicaus, Siavek, Gherſciaveſch.

commmanded by this young prince behaved better than thoſe under his uncle, inſomuch, that Bahaman, finding it impoſſible to hold out, ſurrendred Ardevil into his hands. According to agreement therefore, when he returned to court, Keykaus declared him heir apparent of the crown, and thereby put an end to the contention which had ſo long ſubſiſted. Some ſmall time after this, the good old monarch, wearied with the fatigues of royalty, retired from the world, and left his grandſon in the poſſeſſion of the kingdom, after a reign of one hundred and fifty years [f].

ACCORDING to the method we have hitherto purſued, we ſhould here take leave of Keykaus's reign. But as it is our deſign to inform the reader, as far as we are able, of every thing relating to the hiſtory of thoſe kings we ſpeak of, we find our ſelves obliged to take notice here of ſome variations in circumſtances, into which the Perſian hiſtorians have fallen, as to the moſt material facts reported in the hiſtory of Keykaus: Thus, as to Saudabah, ſome make her to have been the daughter of Gherſchiaveſch brother to Apheraſiab; they ſay likewiſe, that ſhe was the mother of Syavek, and that takeing ſome diſguſt in his father's court, the young prince fled to that of his uncle in Turqueſtan, where, marrying the daughter of the king, he made himſelf ſo conſiderable, that his grand-father by the mother's ſide cauſed him to be deſtroyed [g]. Mirkhond, ſpeaking of the invaſion made by Ruſtan on Apheraſiab's dominions, in revenge for the death of Syavek, mentions one Keydah, the ſon of Apheraſiab, who commanded the armies of his father, and who was ſlain in ſingle combat by Ruſtan. If there be any fact in this, then it is probable, that this duel is repreſented in the figures cut on the rocky mountain of Tacks-Ruſtan, which we took notice of in our deſcription of Perſia [h]. A Perſian writer hath taken upon him to aſſert, that Keykaus ought to be regarded as the Nimrod of the Hebrews, and he will have it, that both theſe names ſignify the long liver, or the immortal, adding, that Keykaus was ſo called becauſe of his extraordinary long reign, viz. of one hundred and fifty years. Mirkhond, like a good hiſtorian, reports this fact, and and obſerves, that ſome have ſtigmatized Keykaus with building the tower of Babel, and attempting to ſcale heaven thereby, but he ſays expreſly, that this ſtory is fabulous, and ought not to be regarded; the king of Perſia being a wiſe and pious prince, who knew well, that to aſcend to heaven, there was no need of towers. But to proceed in our hiſtory [i] (G).

[f] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ubi ſupra. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Caicaus & Caikoſrau. [g] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. oriental. Artic. Gherſchiaveſch. [h] Mirkhond. hiſt. Univers. Hiſt. vol. iv. laſt paragraph but one.

KEY-

[i] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Artic. Nembrod.

(G) To prevent the reader's falling into any confuſion with reſpect to the wars recorded in this hiſtory, it may be neceſſary to obſerve, that the Perſians had for their neighbours, under the monarchs of the firſt and ſecond race, on the north-eaſt the inhabitants of the extended country of Touran. We have already ſpoken ſo copiouſly of the ſenſe and derivation of this name, that there is no neceſſity for our adding any thing farther on that ſubject; here it is ſufficient, that we obſerve, the boundaries thereof were never well fixed, and that it was always deſigned by an indefinite term, as well by the Romans as by the orientals; the former ſtiled all the provinces on the other ſide of that river which they called Oxus, the antient Perſians Gjeihon, and the moderns Amu, Tranſoxana; and the orientals called the ſame provinces Mauaralnahar, i. e. on the other ſide of the river, (6). This country was inhabited by the Turks, properly ſo called, whom ſome conceive to be the ſame nation with the Tartars, and that thoſe we generally call Turks have very little right to that appellation (7). On the eaſt of Perſia lay the empire of the Indies, then governed by princes who were natives of that country. To the ſouth of Perſia lay the peninſula of Arabia, governed by its own kings; and on the weſt the territories of Sham or Schamah, for ſo the Perſians ſtiled Syria, and the other dominions of the kings of Niniveh and Babylon. Nothing can be darker or more confuſed than the accounts we have from the Perſian hiſtorians of the ſtate of their neighbours in thoſe times of which we are now ſpeaking. To us there ſeems ſome reaſon to doubt, whether the word Khakan, made uſe of to ſignify the ſupreme monarch of grand Tartary by Mirkhond, was really heard of in theſe early times; it ſeems more likely, that our Perſian hiſtorian beſtowed that title, which is now frequent, on the monarch mentioned by the antient hiſtorians to have reigned then in thoſe parts, in order to familiarize the ſtile of his hiſtory to his cotemporaries. As the country of Touran bordered as well as Iran on the Caſpian ſea, and as the laſt battle fought by Apheraſiab happened

(6) D'Herbelot. Biblioth. oriental. Art. Touran. (7) Hiſtory of the Tartars, vol. ii. p. 384.

KEY-CHOSRAU or Kai-khoſru ſucceeded peaceably to the throne of his grandfather, and ſhewed himſelf worthy of that preference which had been given him; for in the firſt place, he took care to rectify all abuſes in courts of juſtice throughout his whole dominions, diſplacing all ſuch officers as had made themſelves odious to the people, and taking every method he could deviſe to put the poor into a condition of earning bread, iſſuing for this purpoſe great ſums out of his treaſury, and giving audience with the greateſt eaſe to all degrees of people. When he found his kingdom in tolerable order, he ſummoned a grand council of his nobility, wherein having repreſented the miſerable death of his father, and the mighty miſchiefs which had been done them by the inhabitants of Turqueſtan, he deſired them to ſpeak their minds freely, whether it would not be for their intereſt, as well as for his honour, if an army were immediately raiſed for the reduction of Turqueſtan. They came unanimouſly into this propoſal, whereupon Piran-Viſſeh returned into his own country, from whence, as we have heard, he fled with Key-choſrau and his mother. The king of Perſia, knowing that without unanimity no war could be carried on with any reaſonable hopes of ſucceſs, took pains to reconcile himſelf to Thus and to his uncle Fraiborz, and to ſhew that his reconciliation ned in the plains of Khuerezm, it was natural enough for him to fly into the mountains neareſt at hand, in hopes of returning that way into Touran; and when he found the enemy poſſeſſed of the paſſes near the mouth of the river Gjihon, he had no other way left than to endeavour to get through the mountains of Aderbayagjan, and ſo round the Caſpian ſea, till he entered Touran on the north, in which, however, we need not wonder that he proved unſucceſsful, ſince from thoſe times to ours, no conqueror whatever has had the honour to make that tour with his troops, excepting only the Tartar Hero Zinjis Khan. From the obſervations in this note it will be very plain to the reader, that Iran, under the reign of this monarch Key-koſrau, contained very nearly the ſame extent of country and the ſame provinces, which are ſtill comprehended under the empire of Perſia; and that whatever difference there might be, muſt have lain on the provinces on the weſt ſide of the empire; the bounds of which are not exactly laid down by the Perſian hiſtorians. As to the new kingdom on the Perſian gulph erected in favour of Fraiborz, we ſhall have occaſion to mention it hereafter; in the mean time, let us remark, that the ſituation of this kingdom proves the extent of Keykoſrau's empire towards the ſouth-eaſt to have been pretty near the ſame with the preſent Shah's.

conciliation was ſincere, he intruſted them with the command of thirty thouſand horſe, and ſent them to open the war by invading the dominion of Turqueſtan [k]. At their ſetting out he ſpoke to them thus, "You muſt know, "that before my father married the princeſs Franghiz my "mother, he had by the daughter of his friend Piran-"Viſſeh a ſon called Ferud, This young man I am in-"formed has at preſent a command of the army of Aphe-"raſiab; but where-ever he is, remember that he is my "brother, and that where-ever you find him you do him "no injury, but render him all the honours due to ſo near "a relation of mine". It happened unluckily, that the Perſian army no ſooner entered the country of Turqueſtan, than Ferud came to reconnoitre them at the head of a body of horſe. His ſcouts informed him, that the Perſians were by far more numerous than the troops under his command; but he, to ſhew his valour, inſtead of retiring, attacked very briſkly the army under the command of Thus, who, as ſoon as he underſtood that Ferud was at the head of the Turks, ordered his forces to retire, and preſenting himſelf before the young prince, informed him of the order he had received from his brother the king of Perſia. Ferud, full of imprudent bravery, would not be perſuaded to retire, but cauſing the Turkiſh horſe to make a freſh attack, the Perſians repulſed them with great ſlaughter, and Ferud, to the mighty regret of the whole army, was found dead upon the place [l]. Key-choſrau received this news with great concern, and apprehending that Thus had been in ſome meaſure inſtrumental to his brother's death, he ſent orders to his uncle Fraiborz to take upon him the command of the army, and to ſend back Thus a priſoner, to anſwer in Perſia for his conduct. Fraiborz executed the king's commands exactly with reſpect to Thus, and then marched farther into Turqueſtan. Apheraſiab gave the command of the great army he had raiſed to Piran-Viſſeh, the moſt experienced of his generals, and who was perfectly acquainted with the Perſian diſcipline This excellent officer did all that could be expected from him, he gave Fraiborz and Gudar ſo much trouble, and knew ſo well how to encamp his troops out of danger of an attack, that at length the Perſians were conſtrained to retreat, not without very conſiderable loſs; Gudar, who commanded commanded in the rear, having no leſs than ſeventy gentlemen of his own family ſlain [m]. The news of this defeat obliged the king to take other meaſures; he therefore removed his uncle from the command of the army, and gave it to Gudar, to whoſe valour and conduct it was owing, that any part thereof eſcaped. He alſo ſent Thus, who had fully juſtified himſelf as to the death of Ferud, with a reinforcement of troops, in order to enable him to carry on the war. Apheraſiab, perceiving that the Perſians were reſolved to deſtroy his empire, called to his aſſiſtance the Kha-khan or king of great Tartary and Schangal king of the Indies, and by the help of his confederates puſhed the Perſian troops ſo cloſely, that they being far inferior in number were forced to retire into the mountains of Choraſſan, where they threw up intrenchments, and fortified their camp in the beſt manner they could. Keychoſrau, informed of their diſtreſs, ſent orders to Ruſtan to march with the utmoſt diligence to their aſſiſtance. That experienced general readily obeyed his maſter, and the Perſian army that was beſieged in the mountains, when they heard of his approach, made no queſtion of carrying the victory. Ruſtan, as an earneſt thereof, deceived the vigilance of the Turkiſh officers, and, paſſing their advanced guards in the night, entered the Perſian camp, before the enemy was aware. The next day the moſt bloody battle was fought, that hitherto had been ſeen in Perſia Ruſtan did wonders, he took priſoner the Kha-khan and Kaimus, one of the principal generals in the ſervice of Apheraſiab. In the end victory declared itſelf for the Perſians, and Apheraſiab, having loſt half his army, was obliged to retire with the reſt into his own dominions. Notwithſtanding this mighty loſs, the king of Turqueſtan meditated new invaſions, exhauſting his whole country to draw together an army ſufficient for his purpoſe. Keychoſrau on the other hand ſet four great armies on foot, the chief of which lay in the neighbourhood of Balch, under the command of Gudar. Againſt him Apheraſiab ſent a detachment of his choiceſt troops under the command of Piran-Viſſeh, the beſt officer in his dominions. The two armies had not long been in the neighbourhood of each other, before an action enſued, wherein Piran-Viſſeh was killed and his army beaten When Gudar.

[k] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xiv.

[l] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Artic. Caichoſrau.

ſaw

[m] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ubi ſupra. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Caichoſrau.

ſaw the body of Piran-Viſſeh on the ground, he alighted from his horſe, and remembering the courteſies that nobleman had formerly done to Syavek and to Key-choſrau, when a young man, he bedewed it with his tears, and took care afterwards to ſee it interred with all the honours due to ſo great and worthy a man. Of which when the king of Perſia was informed, he highly commended his general, and ſpoke with very great regret of the death of his old friend [n]. Apheraſiab, when informed of this new diſaſter, ſent his ſon Schidah to command the remains of the army, which he cauſed to be reinforced as ſoon as poſſible. By this time Key-choſrau was come in perſon to his army, and marched at the head thereof, through the plains in the neighbourhood of the Caſpian ſea. Schidah, thinking this a proper place to give battle, advanced with his army, and attacked the Perſians with great reſolution; but his ſucceſs was not anſwerable to his valour, for he was killed in the beginning of the engagement, and all his army cut to pieces. The king of Perſia ſurveying the field of battle, and the vaſt number of dead bodies which lay thereon, cryed out aloud, Khuareſmi-bud, i. e. I have ſeen my deſire; whence the plains in which this battle was fought, and the province wherein they lye, received the appellation of Khuarezm, which they ſtill retain. Key-choſrau puſhed on the war now with the greateſt vigour, marching directy towards the capital of Turqueſtan, whither Apheraſiab had retired; but this prince not thinking himſelf ſafe there, becauſe the people murmured loudly at the evils they felt, firſt ſent away his Haram, and then retired himſelf. His wives and children fell a ſhort time afterwards into the hands of Key-choſrau, who treated them with all imaginable kindneſs and reſpect; Apheraſiab wandered from province to province with a ſmall body of troops, till, being ſhut up in the mountains of Aderbayagjan, he was at laſt taken priſoner, and by the orders of Key-choſrau put to death [o]. Thus ended this long and bloody war, which had well nigh exhauſted both empires. After it was was finiſhed, Key-choſrau fixed his court at Balch, for the conveniency of governing Touran as well as Iran; there it was, that ſeeing himſelf in full poſſeſſion of two great empires, this monarch did what none of his predeceſſors had thought of. He computed all the levies which had been been made on Perſia for the carrying on the war againſt the Turks, and out of the mighty treaſures which were fallen into his hands, he reſtored to every family the amount of the taxes they had paid. He ſent for his uncle Fraiborz, and after having commended him for his fidelity, he erected ſeveral provinces on the ſhore of the Perſian gulph into a kingdom, and made him ſovereign thereof. He aſſembled the nobility of Touran, and having ſhewn them the folly of hating the inhabitants of Iran, as they had hitherto done, he adviſed them to conſider of ways and means for re-eſtabliſhing the peace of their country, and aſſured them he would contribute to it as far as lay in his power He then marked out the quarters, and ſettled the yearly pay of his army, took an exact account of the ſtate of all the provinces, reformed ſeveral abuſes in religion; and when he had done all this, he ſaid he had reigned long enough for his own glory, and that it was now time for him to quit the world, and dedicate the reſt of his days to God. with this view he introduced his ſucceſſor Lohoraſb into a grand aſſembly of the nobility, he put the Tagi on his head, and retired himſelf to a cell in the deſart, having attained to the age of ninety years, ſixty of which he had paſſed upon the throne [p].

[n] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. ubi-ſupra, & Artic. Piran Viſſeh. [o] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. Orient. Artic. Caichoſrau.

WHAT has been above related of the reign of Keychoſrau is taken from the beſt and moſt credible hiſtorians, and connected with all the accuracy in our power; let us now ſee what other remarkable facts have been related of this monarch, which could not ſo well be reduced into the order we have followed. With reſpect to the deciſive battle fought againſt the king of Turqueſtan, ſome writers tells us, that it was not a general engagement, but that twelve Turks and as many Perſians fought in the ſight of both armies, which providence decided in favour of the latter; and this combat is very famous in oriental romances, where it is generally ſtiled Genk duazde Rokh, i. e. the combat of the twelve heroes. The terms on which this combat was fought were theſe; that if the Turks were victorious, the Perſians ſhould own Apheraſiab for their lord, but in caſe the Perſians were ſucceſsful, then the Turks were to retire into their own country, and ſo quit all pretenſions to Iran [q]. Apheraſiab complied with the agreement, and marched directly back into his own country; but, ſay the

[p] Mirkond. Hiſt. ubi ſupra. D'Herbelot. ubi. ſupra. [q] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. ubi ſupra.

the ſame writers, he ſoon after broke the peace by ſending his ſon with a numerous body of horſe to make inroads into Perſia. In conſequence of which followed the battle of Khuarezm, in which they make Apheraſiab and his brother to have been preſent. They add, that, after the loſs of the battle, Apheraſiab with the remains of his army fled into the mountainous countries on the banks of the Caſpian ſea, intending to paſs if poſſible behind it, and ſo thro' the extended territories of the Kipjaks into his own dominions; but his efforts were vain, the forces of Key-choſrau ſurrounded the handful of troops Apheraſiab had with him in the mountains of Aderbayagjan, ſo that he was at laſt taken priſoner and put to death [r]. Mirkhond and the writers we have followed do not ſay much as to the perſonal bravery of Key-choſrau, but there are writers who inform us of a very extraordinary act of chivalry performed by this monarch. They tell us, that in his reign there appeared in the mountains, which ſeparate Irak Ajemi from Phars, or, as we call them, Parthia from proper Perſia, a monſtrous ſerpent, which ſtruck the people with ſuch terror that they abandoned their habitations, and left all the adjacent country deſolate; this formidable dragon they ſtiled Gavſchid. The king, being informed of this, reſolved like a good prince to go immediately and deſtroy this monſter. Key-choſrau hunted it for ſome time before he came up with it, but at laſt he found it in its den in the mountains of Aderbayagjan, and his guards flying at the ſight of the dragon he attacked it alone, and killed it with his own hand. On the ſpot where this remarkable deed was done, a Pyræum or fire-temple was erected, called in ſucceeding times Deir Gavſchid, i. e. the habitation of Gavſchid, renowned to this day among the Perſees, and held by ſome to be the firſt fire-temple erected in Perſia, which, however, we doubt, if they mean, as certainly they do, that it was erected in the reign of Key-choſrau [s]. Though ſome writers are ſilent as to the valour of this prince, yet all who treat of his reign expatiate loudly on his wiſdom and piety. Some believe him a prophet, moſt acknowledge that he converſed with the prophets, and was in a peculiar manner favoured by the Almighty mighty, for the great regard he always ſhewed towards religion and religious perſons. During his reign flouriſhed Lokman the famous philoſopher of the eaſt, called by way of ſirname Lokman Al-Hakim, i. e. Lokman the wiſe. It would lead us far out of our way ſhould we enter here too deepiy into the hiſtory of this extraordinary perſon; we ſhall therefore content ourſelves with obſerveing, that it is generally agreed he was by birth an Ethiopian or Nubian, the oriental word Habaſchi including both; his parents mean, and himſelf ſold for a ſlave, and carried from one place to another, till at laſt he was brought into the land of Iſrael, where he lived under the reigns of David and Solomon. The Arabian writers tell us, that ſleeping in this condition during the heat of the day, the angels entered his room and awaked him, with this ſalutation, Lokman, we are the meſſengers of God, thy creator and ours, who hath ſent us to thee to inform thee, that he will make thee a monarch and his lieutenant over the whole earth. Lokman, after remaining ſilent for a ſmall ſpace, returned this anſwer: If by the abſolute command of God I am to become what you ſay, his will muſt be fulfilled in all things, and I hope, if it comes to paſs, that he will afford me the neceſſary aſſiſtance of his grace, that I may exactly execute his orders; but if he would give me leave to chuſe, I wiſh rather to continue in the ſtate I am in, and that he would prevent me from offending him, without which grace all the pomp and grandeur of the world would be to me no more than a cumbrous and inſupportable load. This, ſay theſe authors, appeared ſo juſt in the ſight of God, that he beſtowed on Lokman ſuch an excellent underſtanding, that he compoſed, ſay they, ten thouſand apologues, moral maxims, and wiſe ſayings, each of them more valuable than the whole world. A phraſe implying no more, than that they are highly uſeful as well as wonderfully ſublime. They tell us alſo, that Lokman ſtanding one day in the midſt of a great number of people, who all liſtened greedily to his wiſe and pleaſant diſcourſes, a Hebrew of great quality aſked him, if he was not the black ſlave whom he had ſeen formerly tending the ſheep: Lokman readily anſwered, I am, and how then, ſaid the nobleman, have you attained ſo high a degree of virtue? Why, anſwered Lokman, by theſe three eaſy ſteps: I have always ſpoke the truth, I have conſequently kept my word, and I have never meddled in any thing which did not concern me. A

[r] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ubi ſupra. [s] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Artic. Deir. Gaſvid.

Perſian

Perſian poet hath recorded another extraordinary inſtance of Lokman's preſence of mind; his maſter ſent him with ſome other ſlaves to gather fruit in his garden, the reſt eat the beſt, and when his maſter miſſed them, they roundly ſwore that Lokman eat them whether they would or not. The matter, Sir, ſaid Lokman, is eaſily decided; let us all drink heartily of warm water, and then let us join hands and run round; his lord commanded the experiment to be immediately made, upon which they all fell a vomiting with this difference, that they brought up the fruits which they had eaten, and Lokman nothing but the warm water. The comment of the Perſian poet on this ſtory is ſo remarkable, that the reader will doubtleſs be pleaſed to ſee it; "When we ſhall all drink of this hot water at our "tryals, in the day of the laſt judgment, then whatever has been concealed in the heart, and hidden far "from the ſight of men, ſhall be thrown up in the view "of all the world; and the hypocrite, who acquired the "reputation of a ſaint by his diſſembling, ſhall then be "covered with ſhame and confuſion of face". What we have reported is ſufficient to ſhew, that there is a ſtrong reſemblance between the hiſtory of Lokman, as reported by the eaſtern writers, and that of Æſop, as we find it written by the Greeks. Both were mean in their original; both ſlaves through the ſeverity of fortune; both famous for their wiſdom; and both delivered their maxims in the ſame manner, that is by way of apologue. But there is a wide difference between the times in which, the oriental authors ſay, Lokman lived, and thoſe wherein the Greeks place Æſop. As to the firſt, it is generally allowed, that Lokman lived in the reign of Solomon, whereas Æſop is ſaid to have been cotemporary with Cræſus king of Lydia and Solon the Athenian legiſlator. From the hiſtory of their lives, and from the compariſon of their fables, there is all the reaſon in the world to belive, that Lokman and Æſop were the ſame perſon; the difficulty ſeems to lie here, whether the Greeks ſtole him from the orientals, or whether the orientals took him from the Greeks. It ſeems moſt natural to believe the former, ſince in ſuch caſes the Greeks are known to have been notorious thieves, and to have altered every point of antient hiſtory they were able to their own advantage. Beſides the apologue was certainly the favourite mode of teaching in the eaſt, long before that or any other kind of learning was known to the after all, this is but conjecture, which we offer to the reader's consideration, rather than his belief. The chief reason why Lokman is so much considered in the east is, because Mohammed has mentioned him in terms of respect in the Koran, and has affirmed, that God bestowed on him the gift of extraordinary wisdom [t]. His fables, which are far from being numerous, have been printed in Arabic and Latin at Leyden, so that Europe is now no stranger to the wisdom of that famous person [u]. But to return to Key-chosrau; he is reported to have been himself a very wise and very learned prince, as well as remarkably pious. He was very fortunate throughout his reign, and yet he was so little exalted by an uninterrupted series of good fortune, that he not only resigned the crown, and retired into the deserts on the skirts of the province of Aderbayagjan, but left also this remarkable memento to all his successors, by causing it to be engraved in one of the rooms of the palace [w]. (H).

We

[t] Koran. Sor. Lokman. Art. Lokman. Note H. D'Herbelot. Art. Kaichosrau.

[u] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient.

[w] Mirkhond. Hist. sect. xiv.

(H) It is very fit that we should give an account in this note what our reasons were for inserting the life of Lokman in the Persian history. Not to trouble the reader with too long a detail, we shall acquaint him with no more than two. First, Lokman wrote in the Persian language, as is generally agreed, and as the learned editor of his fables in Holland positive affirms (8). 2dly, It is from Persian writers that we have the best and fullest accounts of Lokman's life and manners, and as they constantly speak of him as cotemporary with Key-chosrau, the third king of their second dynasty, it was but just, that we should insert his memoirs under that reign. Having thus justify'd our speaking of Lokman here, let us be indulged a few thoughts on fable, and on the high reputation which this author has obtained from his writing in that way. It is universally agreed, that the apologue was one of the most antient methods of instructing, and of consequence that it was invented in the east, where indeed all kind of science took birth. That this mode of teaching was far elder than Lokman's days, admitting that he lived where the oriental writers have placed him, we know from the sacred writings. And that this method was long, if it be not still, cultivated in the east, is a point so notorious, that we need not undertake its proof. Bishop Patrick has advanced a very

(8) Prefat. Erpen. Locm. Fabul.

We ought not to value ourſelves too much on our exaltation above the ordinary rank of men, ſince we are no more ſecure of our crowns than they of their eſtates; that which deſcended from ſeveral monarchs to me will deſcend, when I am gone, to ſeveral others; who then would be proud of what is uncertain in itſelf, and cannot at beſt laſt long?

Lohrasp, Lohrasp, or Lohoraſb, was the ſucceſſor of Key-choſrau, and his near relation; that prince having no heirs male. The authors who have recorded the principal events, which happened under the reigns of the ſeveral princes of the firſt and ſecond race, differ in no part of their account ſo much as where they ſpeak of the actions of this prince. For the reader's eaſe as well our own, we will firſt give, as ſuccinctly as we can, the ſtory of this monarch's reign, according to Mirkhond, and we ſhall afterwards ſet down ſuch variations as ſeem of greateſt importance, affixing the authors names from whom they very ingenious, though it may be no very ſolid, opinion in relation to the riſe and decay of fable. He ſays, that it was invented in early times, when mankind were as yet rude, and hiſtories unwritten; that as theſe came into vogue fable declined, becauſe truth being always preferable to falſehood, men choſe rather to appeal to facts which had happened, than to ſuppoſe things which might never come to paſs (9). But, with the biſhop's good leave, the other ſide of the argument may be taken, and ſupported with greater force; for points of hiſtory are very ſeldom exactly agreed on in all their circumſtances, and conſequently can hardly ever be ſimilar one to another; whereas fables, which are indeed repreſentations of facts without names, may be adjuſted to the utmoſt nicety, and conſequently are able to ſtrike with far greater vigor than any hiſtory applied. We will give an inſtance which will effectually ſupport what we ſay. Might not Nathan the prophet, when he reproved David for taking the wife of Uriah, have eaſily bethought him of ſome hiſtory, which would very nearly have repreſented the caſe of that prince; but will any man ſay, that a lecture from hiſtory would have penetrated the ſoul of David with ſo lively a ſorrow as Nathan's noble application of his parable, Thou art the man (10)? Fables ſhew us truth in an eaſy natural light, and the mind having thus conſented to a doctrine propoſed, the underſtanding afterwards applies; and we learn with the greater eaſe, becauſe we do not diſcern the teacher. But to return to Lokman, his fame are taken. Lohraſp was the nephew to king Keykaus's brother, and was the next heir-male of the royal line. He was elected king, and not without conſiderable oppoſition; his temper was known to be ſevere and haughty, the grandees therefore were many of them for putting the ſcepter into a milder hand; and at the head of this faction was Zal-zer the father of Ruſtan; but their cabals were vain, Lohraſp carried it in ſpite of them all, and was declared king. As ſoon as he was ſeated on the throne he determined with himſelf to raiſe his reputation, and to extend his empire by making war on both ſides thereof; in conſequence of this reſolution he fixed his court at Balch, and took all poſſible methods for putting every thing in the beſt order in the eaſtern provinces of Iran. He ſent in the mean time his general Gudarz with a puiſſant army into Shamach or Syria, with orders to reduce the whole of that large country under his power. Gudarz effectually anſwered his maſter's expectation; he conquered all Syria as far as Damaſcus, and alſo Paleſtine, with the famous city of Jeruſalem, called by the Perſians the Habitation of the ſaints.

(9) Vid. Preface to his paraphraſe on the proverbs.
(10) 2. Samuel c. xii.

fame is ſo great and ſo univerſal throughout the eaſt, that to expreſs an high idea of any man's wiſdom, they are wont to ſay, as the learned Erpennius expreſſes it, Non neceſſe eſt docere Locmanum, There is no need of teaching Lokman (11). His fables were doubtleſs almoſt without number, but the collection we have of them is not large; Sir John Chardin has printed a French tranſlation of them, which agrees exactly with the Arabic and Latin verſions above referred to; we call them verſions, becauſe, as we obſerved before, Lokman wrote originally in Perſian; and at this day, Sir John Chardin tells us, this nation is ſo fond of them, that they are the firſt things they teach their children, and ſpare no pains to make them enter into and comprehend their meaning. An inſtance or two may not be unacceptable (12).

The Boy in the River.

" A little boy went one day into a river, and, not having " learned to ſwim, had like to have been drowned; ſeeing a " man at a diſtance he called out to him for help: the man, as " ſoon as he ſaw the lad's diſtreſs, began to expoſtulate with " him on the folly of going into a river before he had learned
" to ſwim, the Boy inſtead of anſwering him cried out, Save " me, ſave me, and then chide as long as you will".

The

(11) Præfat. Erpen. Lokman. Fab. p. 7. (12) Chardin Voyag. tom. 227.

ſaints. The reigning king of the Jews ſubmitted and promiſed to pay tribute, for which he put as hoſtages into the hands of the Perſian general ſeveral perſons of quality, whom Gudarz quickly afterwards cauſed to be ſlain; this provoked the Jews to a rebellion, and gave Gudarz the opportunity he wanted of ſacking Jeruſalem, where he treated the inhabitants with inexpreſſible cruelty; and having loaded his ſoldiers with riches he retired, and carried into Perſia with him a vaſt number of captives. King Lohraſp had two ſons, the eldeſt called Guſhtaſp, the younger named Zaris; the former was of a fierce haughty diſpoſition, but was at the ſame time warlike and of great abilities: this young prince drew in many, who were deſirous of novelty, to join with him in a rebellion againſt his father, in which he had at firſt ſucceſs, and gained over to him a very conſiderable party; but Lohraſp, having drawn together all his friends, and having alſo done every thing in his power to engage the people to his ſervice, marched ſo briſkly againſt his ſon, that Guſhtaſp's adherents, fearing the fortune of the day in caſe of a battle, abandoned him by degrees, which he obſerving began immediately to provide for his own ſafety, by retiring into Turqueſtan in ſo diſtreſſed a condition, that he lived even at

The Smith and his Dog.

" An honeſt ſmith had a dog that ſleep all the while his maſter " was at work; but as ſoon as he left off and ſat down with his " companions to dinner, the dog waked, and ſolicited him for " meat; Worthleſs animal, ſaid the ſmith, how canſt thou ſleep " amidſt the noiſe of hammers which ſhake the very earth, and " yet wake at the wagging of one's jaws, which ſcarce make " any noiſe at all"?

The Gooſe and the Swallow.

" The gooſe and the Swallow entered into a league of friend- " ſhip, and reſolved to live together. They came unluckily to " a place where the fowlers were watching; the ſwallow, as " ſoon as ſhe ſaw them, flew away, but the poor gooſe, not being " able to make uſe of her wings, was taken and killed".

The paſſage in the Alcoran referred to in the text, is the whole xxx1ſt chapter, which therefore bears the title of Lokman. Mohammed ſpeaks in his own perſon at the beginning thereof, vehemently declaiming againſt the irreligious perſons and idolaters, ſuch eſpecially as deſpiſed the Koran, and lived in the errors of their fathers; he then makes God ſpeak thus: " We that court unknown and unſuſpected. Here, by a very odd accident, he married the daughter of the reigning prince. It was it ſeems a cuſtom in that country, that whenever the king had a mind to diſpoſe of a daughter in marriage, public notice was given, and the people aſſembled in great numbers in an open court, where being diſpoſed into the beſt order the place would allow, the king entered with his daughter, one of whoſe hands was held in his, and in the other ſhe had a golden apple, enriched with precious ſtones; when they were advanced into the middle of the place, the king let go his daughter's hand, and ſhe, after walking round and obſerving every body diligently, beſtowed her apple and herſelf on the man ſhe liked beſt. It happened not long after Guſhtaſp's arrival in Turqueſtan, that the king determined to marry his eldeſt daughter, and having brought her out into the court after the manner before deſcribed, ſhe, after looking a little about her, gave her apple and her perſon to this unknown. The grandees of Touran were inexpreſſibly vexed at ſeeing themſelves deſpiſed by the princeſs for a ſtranger, whom they ſuppoſed of no birth. They therefore engaged the king

" inſpired knowledge into Lokman and taught him to give God
" thanks; he that returneth thanks to God for his graces doth
" good to his ſoul, for God hateth the ungrateful, and praiſe
" is in all places due to him. Remember, thou, that Lokman
" ſaid to his ſon, O! my ſon, believe not that God hath equals;
" it is an exceeding great ſin; we have commanded man to " honour his father and mother, his mother bringeth him forth
" with ſorrow, and weaneth him at two years old; be not thou
" forgetful of God's benefits; honour thy father and thy mo" ther, for thou ſhalt one day be judged before God." The reſt of the chapter contains a great many excellent admonitions, all of which are put into the mouth of Lokman, and conſequently ſhew how high this philoſopher ſtood in the opinion of Mohammed. To ſay the truth, he was a very artful perſon, and took care never to run counter to popular opinions, where it might be avoided. The character of Lokman was too well eſtabliſhed to be overturned by him and therefore he very wiſely repreſented him as one who had long ago taught the ſame doctrines which he now ſought to recommend. Hence, however, it has come to paſs, that ſome commentators on the Koran have taught that Lokman was a prophet, tho' others underſtand what Mohammed ſays of that Sage's having only the gift of teaching (13).

(13) D'Herbelot, Biblioth orient. Art. iii. p. Lokman.

king to make a law, that for the future the princeſſes of Touran ſhould have their choice only out of people of high quality, that the royal line might not be drawn into contempt. The king had ſtill two daughters as remarkable for their beauty as their birth; theſe were demanded in marriage by the two ſons of a neighbouring and potent prince, to whom the king of Touran made no ſcruple of promiſing them on this condition, that they reduced under his obedience two lords who had revolted, and who committed great devaſtations throughout all Touran. The young princes, conſidering the difficulty of this taſk, had recourſe to Guſhtaſp, of whoſe proweſs they had ſeen frequent proofs, and engaged him to be aſſiſtant therein. Guſhtaſp, as ſoon as he had undertaken to ſerve them, appointed a hunting-match, and invited the two brothers to be of the party; he alſo brought to the chace a ſmall body of reſolute friends. When they were aſſembled he let them into his project, which was to go immediately to a certain caſtle, where he was informed the two rebel lords had an interview, and to ſtorm it before they could have any intelligence of their expedition; this was immediately agreed to, and inſtantly carried into execution. Guſhtaſp entered the place firſt himſelf, and having ſeized the rebels, put them into the hands of the two princes, who conducted them to court, and preſented them to the king. The Turkiſh monarch was prodigiouſly pleaſed with this fate of arms, and very readily made good his promiſe to the princes, by giving them his daughters in marriage. A few days after he cauſed great feaſts to be celebrated, and appointed public tournaments, wherein Guſhtaſp behaved himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he carried the glory of the day from all who were preſent. The king, who had hitherto ſhewed him but little countenance, ſpoke to him on this occaſion very kindly, and gave him the higheſt praiſes. Guſhtaſp took this opportunity of ſaying, that if he had excelled in combats that were not in earneſt, he had likewiſe been of ſome uſe in quelling the diſturbers of the public peace. This ſtruck the king's mind, who eaſily comprehended the meaning, and, having diligently ſought out the truth, made Guſhtaſp henceforward his favorite. It is to be obſerved, that after the conqueſt of Touran by Key-koſrau, though the people were left to live under their own laws and their own princes, yet they were obliged to own the ſuperiority of the monarchs of Iran, and to pay them a conſiderable tribute. Guſhtaſp perſuaded his father-ther-in-law that this was at once diſhonourable and needleſs, and therefore adviſed him to throw off the yoke by refuſing tribute, and by making preparations for and declaring war againſt Lohraſp, in caſe he ſhould diſpute his independency. This Guſhtaſp did to be revenged of his father, and from an apprehenſion, that, if he was ever diſcovered, the nobility of Touran in a time of peace would certainly deliver him up. Lohraſp was exceedingly ſurprized at the arrival of the Turkiſh embaſſador in his court; he treated him, however, with great civility, and endeavoured to get out of him the true ſource of theſe extraordinary proceedings. The embaſſador at firſt thought to put him off with trivial anſwers, but on the king's preſſing him, he acknowledged at laſt, that a certain ſtranger, who had married his maſter's daughter, was the true author of all this miſchief. Lohraſp no ſooner heard this, than he gueſſed it was his ſon, and immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to enquire privately, whether it was ſo or not; as ſoon as he was certain, that this new and dangerous enemy of his was his ſon Guſhtaſp, he took at the ſame time a moſt ſtrange and moſt generous reſolution, which was to ſpare his people at the expence of his crown. He found he was grown old, he ſaw the ambition of his ſon was to be ſatisfied with nothing leſs than the diadem; and as he knew he was brave and wiſe, though undutiful to him, he determined to reſign to him his dominions; and in order to this he ſent his younger ſon Zaris with the Tagi, or enſign of the royal dignity in Perſia, to his brother in Turqueſtan. Zaris took care to give his brother private notice of his arrival; Guſhtaſp went immediately to pay him a viſit, and, being informed of his father's reſolution, accepted the Tagi or Tiara, and cauſed himſelf to be ſolemnly proclaimed king of Perſia. His father-in-law was at firſt prodigiouſly diſturbed, conceiving, that there was ſome treaſon againſt him in theſe proceedings, but when he found things were really as they had been repreſented, he was overjoyed to the higheſt degree; and the nobility of Touran came in crouds to pay their compliments to the new king of Perſia. Theſe ceremonies over, Guſhtaſp took leave of his father-in-law, and with his wife Karathun ſet out for his own dominions, carrying with him a grand retinue and a conſiderable number of camels loaded with riches. Lohraſp received his ſon with all the marks of tenderneſs and joy; Guſhtaſp retained him at court for many years, and did nothing without his advice; at laſt the good old old man withdrew to lead a ſolitary life, to meditate on the vanities of this world, and to contemplate the wiſdom and goodneſs of God. A ſhort time after he died, having firſt ſent for his ſon, and given him in his laſt moments the moſt ſalutary counſels, in reſpect to his own glory and the good of his people. This Lohraſp was ſurnamed Balki, i. e. the Balchian, becauſe he reſided moſtly at Balk or Balch, one of the moſt antient cities in his dominions [p].

It muſt be owned, that the foregoing account taken from Mirkhond is by no means agreeable to what other Perſian authors have written on the ſame ſubject. In two of the moſt celebrated hiſtories of this people we find it recorded, that Lohraſp was the grandſon of Keykobad, and that he was oppoſed by the Perſian nobility, not for his cruelty or pride, as Mirkhond ſuggeſts, but becauſe his father and himſelf had led their lives in privacy, whence it was believed, he had not the capacity of reigning; it is alſo ſaid, that he was the firſt Perſian monarch who enacted martial laws, and obliged his troops to live like the reſt of his ſubjects, according to the rules of equity and juſtice, and not as they had hitherto done, at free quarter, and in contempt of both. He allowed his general officers and governors of provinces to give audience on a tribunal, raiſed one ſtory from the ground, and railed round about, reſerving to himſelf only this diſtinction, that he had a carpet or cloth of ſtate thrown before his footſtool. We are likewiſe told, that the name of the general ſent by this prince to invade Syria and Paleſtine was Raham, and that he was ſurnamed by the Perſians Bakhtalnaſſar, from whence the Hebrews framed the name of Nebuchadnezzer, and the Greeks Nabuchadonoſar. We have alſo on the ſame authority the hiſtory of Guſhtaſp's flight, marriage, and ſucceſſion to the throne of Perſia; but we are likewiſe told what little agrees with Mirkond's hiſtory, that Lohraſp, within a ſhort time after he reſigned the throne, was beſieged in the city of Balch by Arjaſp, nephew of Apheraſiab the famous Turkiſh monarch, who, after the town fell into his hands, cauſed the old king of Perſia to be put to death, after he had reigned 120 years [q] (I).

Khondemir

[p] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xv. [q] Lebtarik. Tarik. Montekeb.

(I) We have already ſpoken of Mirkhond, from whom the greateſt part of our hiſtory is taken; here therefore let us give the reader a ſhort account of the two hiſtories, mentioned in the text, Khondemir the famous Perſian hiſtorian, differs not only from Mirkhond, but the writers laſt cited; he ſays, that Lohraſp was the ſon of Keykaus's brother, and that he was elected on account of his extraordinary virtue; according to him it was Gudarz who conquered Paleſtine, and was ſurnamed by the Perſians Bakht-Naſſar; which ſurname has occaſioned ſuch confuſion among the Hebrew and Greek writers. As to the flight of Guſhtaſp, this writer ſays, that he retired to the court of a certain Greek prince, where he married the king's eldeſt daughter, called by him Kenaioum, and who, as he tells the ſtory, preſented him publickly with an orange, which is plainly ſubſtituted for the golden apple. Inſtead of the two rebellious lords he ſpeaks of two terrible monſters, that this Grecian prince, whoever he was, inſiſted ſhould be killed by thoſe who pretended to the young princeſſes who were ſtill unmarried.

THE firſt of theſe was a furious ſerpent, which had its den in a wood ſo very thick, that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to penetrate it, in order to combat this deſtructive animal: the other was a lion prodigiouſly fierce, which traverſed the plain country, and tore to pieces all he met with, whither of human kind or cattle. Two of the chief princes of Greece, who were pretenders to the daughters of the king in whoſe court Guſhtaſp lived, were quite abaſhed text, and their authors, that he may be able to judge in ſome meaſure of the credit due to each. Tarikh Montekeb is the Turkiſh name of a tranſlation of a Perſian hiſtory, ſtiled in that language Tarikh Khozideh, i. e. the choſen chronicle, written originally in Perſian verſe, and afterwards reduced into proſe by its author Hamdallah Ben Abibekr Ben Ahmed Ben Aſſer Al-Maſtouſi al Cazvini, i. e. native of the city of Caſhin. It contains a general hiſtory from the creation to A. H. 730 (14). The book commonly cited under the title of Lebtarik is properly called Lobb Al Taovarikh, i. e. the marrow of hiſtories; it written in the Perſian language, by Johia Ben Abdallathif Al Cazvini; it is divided into four books; the firſt containing the life of Mohammed and the twelve Imams; the ſecond the lives and reigns of the kings who governed before the introduction of Mohammediſm; the third the hiſtory of the reigning family in Perſia; the fourth an univerſal hiſtory of the dynaſties prior to Mohammed: It comes down to A. H. 948. the author dying in 960, or in the year 1552, according to our account (15).

(14) D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Tarkih. Khozideh.
(15) D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Lobb. Al. Taoverikh.

abaſhed at theſe propoſals, deſpairing of the conqueſt of the monſters, and conſequently of the princeſſes. However, they informed Guſhtaſp of the anſwer the king had given them. Guſhtaſp readily offered them his aſſiſtance, and accordingly attacked the monſters, killed them both, and gave all the honour of theſe extraordinary feats of chivalry to the two Greek princes, which procured for them the wives they deſired. Some time after this, Guſhtaſp growing a little into the king's favour, that prince aſked him one day how he paſſed his time; Guſhtaſp anſwered, that ſometimes he went a hunting, and that lately as he was taking that diverſion, he killed two extraordinary creatures; the king immediately underſtood what he meant, and, having cauſed the matter to be thoroughly enquired into, found, that Guſhtaſp had ſlain the monſters, upon which he immediately made him his chief miniſter as well as favourite; and at his perſuaſion refuſed to pay the king of Perſia the tribute which he was wont to ſend him yearly, and alſo to declare war againſt him. Lohraſp, being inform'd of this, immediately conceived it was his ſon who had influenced this king to ſuch bold proceedings, and therefore, inſtead of providing for the war, he ſent his younger ſon with the tiara, or royal diadem of Perſia, to Guſhtaſp, as a pledge of his friendſhip, and a certain ſign that he intended him for his ſucceſſor. On his return to his father's court, continues our author, the venerable old man went out to meet him, kiſſed his feet according to the Perſian cuſtom in ſubmitting to a ſovereign, and, after tenderly embracing him, placed the crown upon his head with his own hands; after which he retired from the world to lead a recluſe life at Balch, where he was killed. The prophets Jeremiah, Daniel, and Eſdras were his cotemporaries [r]. If we may believe the eloquent author of the Shah Nameh, or Royal Chronicle, Balch, at the time Lohraſp reſigned the kingdom to his ſon Guſhtaſp, was eſteemed by the Perſians as the holy city, the fountain of their religion, and the place worthieſt of their eſteem, as Mecca is now by the Mohammedans; on this account therefore, Lohraſp made it the place of his abode, where laying aſide his royal robes he put on the habit of a prieſt, applying himſelf wholly to devotion, in imitation of his predeceſſor Gjemſchid for the ſpace of thirty years, till he was ſlain, as will be hereafter related, related, in a cloyster of his own building which he called Nau-bahar, i. e. the new spring [s].

[r] Khondemir. in Khelaſſat. Al. Akbar.

GUSHTASP or Kischtasp, the son of Lohrasp, succeeded his father with general applause; he was a prince of great strength and activity of body, of great wisdom and extraordinary abilities of mind. He, leaving Balch to his father, went to reside at the antient metropolis of the kingdom Istachr, i. e. cut out of the rock, which he adorned with many fine structures, and reigned there in peace and glory about thirty years; at the end of that space, there appeared in his dominions a very extraordinary person, who took upon himself the character of a prophet, and declared, that he was sent by God to teach such as would listen to him the right way; this person was the Zoroastres of the Greeks, and the Zerdusht of the Persians. But as the history of this famous person is of very great consequence, we have found it necessary, to prevent confusion, to detach it from the reign of Gushtasp, and to deliver what hath been collected of this wonderful man, by authors of all nations, in a regular narration, with all the candor and impartiality we are masters of.

The Life of Zoroastres, Zoroaster, or Zerdusht: extracted as well from Greek and Latin, as Oriental, historians.

IF to be famous after death can afford any joyful sensation to the immortal spirit, that of this man, whether prophet, impostor, philosopher, must needs receive high satisfaction from the wide extension of his fame, which has been diffused throughout the whole learned world, and subsisted even to latest ages. The Greeks, who were very inquisitive after the inventers of science, amongst the nations whom they stile Barbarians, and from whom notwithstanding they drew all the learning they had themselves, have written so confusedly, and so obscurely, concerning Zoroastres, that it is hard to know how many famous men bore this name, when they lived, or for what they were eminent. Arnobius is thought to have reduced them to four, but such is the misfortune of all who have written about Zoroaster, that the sense of this

[s] Phirdausi in Shah Nameh. Hyde. Relig. veter. Persar. c. xxiii. p, 302.

this very paſſage is diſputed, ſome affirming, that Arnobius ſpeaks but of three Zoroaſters, others, that he mentions only two (K). However, four was certainly not too large a number, ſince authors undoubtedly mentioned many more

(K) In the text we have mentioned a paſſage from Arnobius, which has been very differently underſtood. This Arnobius was a rhetorician, and the maſter of the famous Lactantius; being converted to the chriſtian faith, he wrote a large work in a declamatory ſtile againſt the Gentiles, wherein there are many things contained of high uſe in reſpect to the hiſtory of learning among the ancients; for tho', as a chriſtian, he wrote but indifferently, theſe books being compoſed ſoon after his converſion, and before he was well inſtructed in the faith; yet as to heathen learning he was a great proficient therein; and his authority, in ſuch a caſe as this, muſt have conſequenly conſiderable weight. The paſſage, which has been ſo differently interrpreted, runs thus; Age nunc veniet quis ſuper igneam zonam magnus interiore ab orbe Zoroaſtres, Hermippo ut aſſentiamur authori: Bactrianus & ille conveniet cujus Cteſias res geſtas hiſtoriarum exponit in primo; Armenius Hoſtanis nepos, & familiaris Pamphilius Cyri (16). Patricius, the famous collector of the Zoroaſtrian oracles (17), Gabriel Naude, a man of diſtinguiſhed learning (18), and Kircher, who well underſtood theſe things (19), believe, that Arnobius mentions here four Zoroaſters, the firſt a Chaldean; the ſecond a Bactrian; the third a Pamphylian; the fourth an Armenian. Salmaſius will needs have the text read thus (20): Age nunc veniat quæſo per igneam zonam magnus interiore ab orbe Zoroaſtres, Hermippo & aſſentiamur auctori, Bactrianus, & ille conveniat, cujus Cteſias res geſtas hiſtoriarum exponit in primo, Armenius Hoſtanis nepos, & familiaris Pamphilus Cyri. It is evident by theſe alterations, that Salmaſius has got rid of one Zoroaſter, though one would think he has introduced another; ſince of the three Zoroaſtres which he admits to be ſpoken of in this paſſage, the firſt is ſaid to be an Ethiopian, or one coming from a country near the torrid Zone, for ſo Salmaſias expounds per igneam Zonam & ab interiore orbe, which Ethiopian or Lybian Zoroaſter Hermippus makes a Bactrian; the ſecond Armenius, nephew of Hoſtanes, of whoſe actions Cteſias gives us an account in the firſt book of his hiſtory; the third named Pamphilus, friend to Cyrus. Urſinus, from the ſame words, is poſitive, that Arnobius mentions but two, exploding the Bactrian Zoroaſter of Hermippus, and ſhewing from Cteſias that Zoroaſter was not ſo antient as Eudoxus more. Of theſe we ſhall ſpeak as ſuccinctly as we can; the firſt is thought to have been a Chaldean, Suidas calls him an Aſſyrian, and ſays alſo, that he was ſtruck dead by fire from heaven [t]. It is very probable, that this is the ſame Zoroaſter ſpoken of by Dion Chryſoſtom, and ſaid to have appeared in fire [u]. The ſecond was a Bactrian and a king, whom Juſtin and the authors who follow him make cotemporary with Ninus the Aſſyrian, by whom he was vanquiſhed in battle and ſlain [x]. He is reputed to have been the inventor of magic, and is ſaid by Arnobius to have conteſted with Ninus, not only with ſteel and ſtrength, but by magical force and the occult ſciences of the Chaldeans [y]. The third was a Perſian, as Laertius informs us [z]. Clemens Alexandrinus ſtiles him a Mede, doxus fancied, but that he lived in the time of Cyrus (21). We are afraid our readers are already fatigued enough with theſe dry reſearches as to the Zoroaſter of the Greeks; we hope, however, they will have patience enough to hear what we have to offer by way of apology for this profuſion of quotations, of which in the other parts of this Perſian hiſtory we have been as ſparing as poſſible. Our reaſons are theſe; firſt, in order to gain any credit for the hiſtory of Zerduſht, as written by oriental authors, there was a neceſſity of deſtroying the credit which has been ſo long given to the Greeks; and to do this, the beſt and ſhorteſt method was to ſhew what the Greeks had ſaid, and what from their writings the moſt able of their diſciples had been able to collect, which we preſume to ſay is very little or nothing. 2dly, We thought it neceſſary to ſhew the reader, that in order to make ſome ſenſe of the varrying ſtories of the antients in relation to Zoroaſter, who by the way is called by a greater variety of Greek names, than he is in the oriental languages, though in them, as we have ſhewn, the orthography of this name is far from being ſettled? I ſay, we thought it convenient to ſhew that ſeveral Zoroaſtres have been ſuppoſed, in order to the diſtribution of the ſeveral ſtories about him. After all, the candidates for the honours beſtowed on the true Zoroaſter may be reduced to two, the Chaldean and the Perſian, and the very ingenious Mr. Stanly has, with great impartiality, divided theſe honours between them. But, thirdly, our hiſtory of Zerduſht will ſet this matter in its true light, by ſhewing, that there is in reality but one Zoroaſter. If it be enquired, (21) In Zoroaſt.

(16) Declam. cont. Gentes. (17) Comm. ſup. Orac. Zoroaſt. (18) Apolog. pour les Grand Hommes, &c. (19) Obel. Pamphil. (20) Exercitat. Plin.

[t] Sub voce Ζωροάστρης. [u] Orat Boriſth. [x] lib. i. [y] Decl. contra. Gent. [z] Laert. in Proœm.

a Mede, Suidas a Perſo-mede [b]; but they all ſpeak darkly and ambiguouſly. The fourth was a Pamphylian, commonly called Er, or Erus Armenius: concerning this Zoroaſter Clemens Alexandrinus quotes Plato, affirming that he began a book thus: "This wrote I Zo-"roaſter Armenius, by deſcent a Pamphylian, dying in "war, and being in Hades, I learned of the gods". He is reported by the ſame author to have riſen again after being ten days dead, and to have told ſtrange things which he had ſeen in that ſpace [c]. The fifth was a native of Proconneſus, mentioned by Pliny [d]. Some have imagined, not without reaſon, that he is the ſame with Ariſtæus the Proconneſian, mentioned by Suidas to have had an art of enquired, how the Chaldean magi came to derive themſelves and their doctrines from this Perſian; and how this is to be reconciled to that chronology, which hitherto has been approved by all the learned, and ſets the Chaldean Zoroaſter far higher. We ſhall anſwer, that in the firſt place we are not accountable for the miſtakes of others, the Greek writers knew not what to call him, or where to place him; for, as Mr. Stanly juſtly obſerves, "the ſame name it is, which ſome call Zabratis, "others Nazaratas, others Zares, others Zaran, others Zara-"das; all which are but ſeveral corruptions from the Chaldee "or Perſian word, which the Greeks moſt generally render "Zoroaſter (22)".

[b] In vocibus Μάγοι Αςρονομία & Ζωροάςρης. [c] Plato. Polit. lib. x. [d] Hiſt. Nat. lib. xxx. c. 1. & l. vii. c. 16.

What certainty can we expect from ſuch writers? But then, ſecondly, leſt this ſhould ſeem an evaſive anſwer, we alledge, that Zoroaſter was not the inſtitutor of the magi, nor the author of a new religion, which we ſhall ſhortly prove at large; and this, as we conceive, occaſioned the great confuſion about Zoroaſter; it was a receceived opinion, that he was the founder of magiſm; it was eaſily diſcoverable, that magiſm was as antient as the days of Abraham, and that it was the religion of Chaldea; it was natural enough therefore, for ſuch as looked upon Zoroaſter to be the inſtitutor of the magian doctrines to ſay with aſſurance, that he lived in theſe times, but then diſcovering from the Perſian records at what time he truly lived, they choſe rather than abandon their former opinion, to make two Zoroaſters; the firſt a Chaldean or Aſſyrian, cotemporary with Ninus; the ſecond a Perſian, flouriſhing in the reign of Darius Hyſtaſpis.

(22) Chaldiac. Philoſophy, p. 4.

of letting his ſoul go out of his body, and return as often as he pleaſed [e]. The ſixth lived at Babylon at the time Pythagoras was carried thither by Cambyſes, as we are told by Apuleius [f]. As the Greeks made ſeveral Zoroaſters, ſo they placed them in different ages of the world; Juſtin makes him thirteen hundred years older than Sardanapalus [g]. Eudoxus, cited by Pliny placed him ſix thouſand years before the death of Plato [h]. Plutarch makes him flouriſh five thouſand years before the wars of Troy [i]. Some authors, mentioned by Suidas, fix him at 500 years before the Trojan war [k]. Apuleius [l], Jamblicus [m], Porphyry [n], Clemens Alexandrinus [o], and Agathius, place him, where he ought to be placed, about the time of Cyrus; and Pliny, diſcourſing on this very ſubject, ſays, that the moſt accurate writers were of opinion he lived a little before Xerxes [q]. But however they might differ in circumſtances, they all agreed in paying him great honours. Plato [r], Ariſtotle [s], Plutarch [t], and Porphyry [u], acknowledge him to have been a perſon of extraordinary learning. Pliny tells us, that he laughed the ſame day he was born, that his brains beat ſo hard that they lifted up the hand laid upon them, which was a preſage of his future ſagacity; he adds what is very extraordinary, that he lived in the deſarts 20 years upon cheeſe, ſo mixed that it did not grow ſtale [x]. Solinus draws his character in few words; He was, ſays he, optimarum artium peritiſſimus, in the beſt arts ſkilful [y]. Apuleius ſtiles him omnis divini arcani antiſtes, the chief doctor in all divine myſteries, and adds, that he was the preceptor of Pythagoras [z]. Agathius tells us he lived under Hyſtaſpes, and that he was the author of magiſm among the Perſians, changing their old religion and introducing new opinions [a]. Dion Chryſoſtome ſays more of him than any of theſe writers, and from better authority, ſince what he delivered he had from the Perſians

[e] Sub voce Ἀριστηυς. [f] Florid. ii. [g] Ubi ſupra. [h] Hiſt. Nat. l. xxx. c. 1. [i] De Iſide & Oſiride. [k] Sub voce Ζωροάστρης. [l] Florid. ii. [m] In vit. Pythag. [n] In vita Pythagoræ. [o] Stromat. l. v. [p] Hiſt. lib. 2. [q] Ubi ſupra. [r] In Alcibiade. 1. [s] In libro de Magia citante Laertio in Procem. [t] De Iſide & Oſiride. [u] In vita Pythagoræ. [x] Hiſt Nat. l. xxx. c. 1. [y] Cap. 1. [z] Florid. ii. [a] Hiſt. lib. 2

Perſians themſelves, as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to ſhew [h]. Cteſias, an author univerſally condemned, was in all probability more in the right about Zoroaſter than thoſe who have anſwered him, ſince we know from Arnobius, that he affirmed him to have lived under the reign of Darius Hyſtaſpis, and ſpent the firſt book of ſix, which he wrote on Perſian affairs, in delivering his hiſtory [b]; the ſum and concluſion of all we have hitherto ſaid is this, that, except Cteſias and Dion Chryſoſtome, all the antients, who have written concerning Zoroaſter, knew little about him more than this; that he was a very learned and wiſe man, and the principal of the magi, in reſpect to which Euſebius indeed ſays, that he wrote a book, which, from the citations he has given us, ſeems to have contained the chief doctrines of the Perſian religion [d],

THE oriental writers are ſomewhat better agreed in relation to this wonderful man, whom they called Zerduſht, Zaraduſht, Zaratuſht, and Zard-huſht, for they generally ſpeaking, acknowledge, that he flouriſhed in the reign of Guſhtaſp. The author of Lebtarikh indeed ſays, that ſome old writers confound him with Dohak or Zohak, one of the Piſchdadian princes [e]; but all the Perſian hiſtorians, who are to be ſuppoſed beſt acquainted with the affairs of their own nation, ſpeak of him, not as the author, but as the reformer, of the magian religion, which, they ſay, he performed by the aſſiſtance of Guſhtaſp (L). With reſpect to his family, the common opinion of the Perſian and Arabick writers is, that he either was a Jew, or went very early into Judea, where he received his education,

[b] Orat. Boriſthen. [c]. Contr. Gentes [d]. de præpar. evangel.
[e] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Zerduſc.

(L) Some Arabian writers have endeavoured to inſinuate, that what they call the religion of the fire-worſhippers is not of great antiquity; but all impartial authors agree in rejecting this notion, and admit, that magiſm began very early, nay, even before the time of Abraham; certain it is, that the oldeſt book extant in the world favours this opinion; for thus ſpeaks Job in his proteſtation of his integrity, and his fervent declarations that he had always held the true faith, and done all the good he could. If I beheld the ſun when it ſhined, or the moon walking in brightneſs, and my heart hath been ſecretly enticed, or my mouth hath kiſſed my hand, this alſo were an iniquity cognizable

cation, under one of the prophets with whom he lived as a ſervant, and, emulous of his glory, ſet up for prophet afterwards himſelf [f]. Who this prophet was, is not well agreed; ſome ſay Elias, others Ezra, and ſome again one of the diſciples of Jeremiah. Doctor Prideaux thinks Elias was too early, and Ezra too late, he therefore fixes upon Daniel [g]. Dr. Hyde inclines to Ezra [h]. How true the whole of the ſtory is, is hard to ſay, ſince the Mohammedans are all great enemies to Zerduſht, and if we take a part of their evidence we ought to take the whole, and cognizable by the judge, for I ſhould have denied the God who is above (2) ". Nothing can be clearer than this, nor can any thing more fully prove, that this hereſy was as old as the Perſians make it, who affirm, that Keyomaras, their firſt king, was the author of their religion, and therefore of old they affected much to call themſelves Keyomarſians, or Keyomarthites. But the point they chiefly laboured in reſpect to antiquity was, the perſuading of themſelves and others, that their religion was the religion of Abraham. It would be no difficult matter to ſhew the probable ſource of this opinion which we have alſo alſo touched elſewhere; but as this work is intended for a body of hiſtory, and not a collection of critical enquires, we chuſe to inſert here ſome extracts from a celebrated Arabian hiſtory of the religions of the eaſt, rather than to amuſe our readers with conjectures of our own. " The Perſian kings in general, ſays this " writer, adhered to the religion of Abraham, and their ſubjects " were always of the religion of their prince; there was likewiſe " a chief or high-prieſt, reputed the wiſeſt of wiſe men, from " whoſe mandate there was no appeal, and whoſe ſentence was " never reverſed, the ſame reverence being ſhewn to them as we " heretofore ſhewed unto our caliphs". A little after he ſays, " The peculiar doctrine of the magi was the quality of the " ſpiritual nature, which they affirmed to be good and evil, " virtuous and wicked, benevolent and deſtructive; theſe natures " they diſtinguiſhed, by calling the one light and the other " darkneſs, or rather in their own terms Yezdan and Ahreman. " Hence it came to paſs, that their whole religion, and all the " queſtions of the magi, turned on theſe two points, the " explication of light being mixed with darkneſs, and of light freeing and then it will ſtand thus; he quitted the ſervice of the Hebrew prophet, becauſe having deceived and cheated him, the holy man prayed God to ſtrike him with a leproſy, which accordingly followed; if ſo, then Zerduſht muſt have been the ſame with Gehazi, the ſervant, not of Elias, but Eliſha, and conſequently the credibility of the whole tale will be deſtroyed. The Perſees in India pretend, that Zerduſht was originally a Chineſe, that his father's name was Eſpintaman, and his mother's Dodo; but in this they are miſtaken; for as to his genealogy we are not at all at a loſs, ſince it is thus ſet down in the book Sad-der; Zarataſht was the ſon of Purthaſp, who was the ſon of Piteraſp, the ſon of Hitcheraſp, the ſon of Thechſhuneſch, the ſon of Eſpintaman [i]; hence Zerduſht, being frequently called the ſon of Eſpintaman, the Perſees in India miſtook him for his immediate parent, whereas indeed he was only his remote anceſtor. He firſt took upon him the

[f] Abu Mohammed Muſtapha in vita Guſhtaſp. ap. Hyde, R. V. P. p. 313 Megjdi in Zinato l'Magjalis. ap. Hyde, p. 315. [g] Connection of Old and New Teſtament, vol. i. p. 331. [h] Relig. V. P. c. xxiv. p. 314.

(2) Job xxxi. 26.

[i] Hyde. R. V. P. p. 312.

"freeing itſelf from darkneſs". Some pages farther the ſame author ſpeaks thus: "Though the magi affirm theſe two principles, "yet the moſt antient of them did not think themſelves under a "neceſſity of affirming that both exiſted from eternity; on the "contrary, they held only light ſelf-exiſtent, and that darkneſs was produced; but in accounting for this they were ſometimes at a loſs: however, they conſtantly aſſerted, that they "received theſe doctrines from wiſe men and prophets among "their anceſtors; firſt, from Keyomaras; ſecondly, from Zervan "the great; thirdly, from another prophet whoſe name was "Zerduſht. The Keyomarthites inſiſt, that Keyomaras is the "ſame with Adam, wherein they agree with ſome Indian and "Perſian chronologers; yet they are contradicted by others "ſkilful in that art. The Keyomarthites alſo affirm, that their "great maſter eſtabliſhed the opinion of two ſpiritual beings, "Yezdan and Ahreman, acknowledging the former to be eternal "and ſelf-exiſtent, and owning the latter to be produced and "created, and that after this manner: Yezdan, i. e. God, ſaid "in himſelf, unleſs I am oppoſed, how ſhall it be? i. e. how "ſhall my glory ariſe? which thought produced darkneſs which "is oppoſite to light, and then began the controverſy which "has ſince ſubſiſted between them (3)". We are informed by the ſame author, that Zerduſht himſelf owned Keyomaras to have inſtituted that religion he came to reform, ſo that it may paſs for a point tolerably well eſtabliſhed, that the religion of the Perſians is as antient as their monarchy.

(3) Shariſtani ap. Hyde Rel. vet. Perſar. c. xxii. p. 294.

character of a prophet in the province of Aderbayagjan, which was always the reſidence of the fire-prieſts, as we have already ſhewn. Khondemir gives us this account of his turning prophet; he ſays, that Zerduſht, from his great ſkill in aſtrology, diſcovered, that another prophet was to ariſe, not inferior to Moſes, whoſe voice all the world was to obey; he from thence took it into his head that he muſt needs be that prophet; upon this, retiring into a cave and revolving theſe things in his mind, a light ſuddenly appeared, being no other than an illuſion of the devil, who converſing with him out of the midſt of the fire, Zerduſht no longer doubted, that he had received the miſſion of prophecy, but immediately ſet about a book, containing a ſyſtem of diabolical doctrines, which he called Zend, and having finiſhed it, he made it his buſineſs to go about the world, teaching this new religion, and erecting fire-temples [k]. There is certainly a great deal of truth in what this writer ſays, but we preſume his notion of the devil's appearing in the fire, and dictating diabolical doctrines to Zerduſht, is a ſtroke of Mohammedan zeal, and not much to be depended on. That Zerduſht really retired into a cave, and there ſtudied, and compoſed his Zend-aveſtâ, is certainly true; and that in this cave he gave himſelf up to prayer and contemplation, embelliſhing it with a great number of curious ſymbols, is acknowledged, and may be proved; but that he was either prompted by the devil, or acted from a ſpirit of impoſture, is what we dare not aſſert, ſince his doctrine, if we except his permiſſion of inceſt, which, however, is no where found in his writings, and is fixed on him only by his enemies; we ſay, his doctrines, if we except this, do not ſeem calculated at all for ſupporting the empire of Satan; and if we may believe the divines, and a greater than all divines, the devil is too wiſe to do or teach any thing which may deſtroy his own kingdom. We ſhall content ourſelves therefore with obſerving what has not been obſerved before, that the Almighty had a peculiar favour for the Perſians, and even for Darius Hyſtaſpis the patron of Zerduſht, and ſpoke many things by his prophets, as we ſhall prove at the bottom of the page, inſinuating his care, that they ſhould not be deceived in the firſt and principal point of a religion, which, it is agreed greed, Zerduſht made it his buſineſs to fix beyond diſpute (M). How long he remained in this cave, or how many books he wrote there, is not very certain; we

[k] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Zerduſcht.

(M) We have already given our reaſons for referring our thoughts on the chronology of the Perſian hiſtory, till we have deduced it as low as the reign of the laſt monarch of the Perſian nation. But this hinders not our applying the prophecies recorded in the ſacred ſcriptures, relating to the Perſian kingdom, and therefore, for the ſake of clearing the memory of Zerduſht, we ſhall in this note ſhew, firſt, that the Almighty ſpoke of and to Cyrus, as of and to a prince acquainted with him the true God, and never reproaches either him or his people with idolatry; thus the prophet Iſaiah, having with wonderful eloquence diſplayed the power of God, and aſſured his countrymen, that after all their ſufferings, which their ſins would bring upon them, he would yet turn again and remember them in mercy, and raiſe up a deliverer for them, which was Cyrus king of Perſia; this, ſaith the prophet, is the God, that ſaith to Jeruſalem, Thou ſhalt be inhabited; and to the cities of Judah, Ye ſhall be built; and I will raiſe up the decayed places thereof. That ſaith to the deep, be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers. That ſaith of Cyrus, He is my ſhepherd, and ſhall perform all my pleaſure; even ſaying to Jeruſalem, Thou ſhalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation ſhall be laid. Thus ſaith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whoſe right-hand I have holden to ſubdue nations before him, and I will looſe the loins of kings, to open before him the two-leaved gates, and the gates ſhall not be ſhut; I will go before thee, and make the crooked places ſtreight; I will break in pieces gates of braſs, and cut in ſunder the bars of iron. And I will give thee the treaſures of darkneſs, and hidden riches of ſecret places, that thou mayeſt know that I the Lord, which call thee by thy name, am the God of Iſrael. For Jacob, my ſervant's ſake, and Iſrael, mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name, I have ſurnamed thee, though thou haſt not known me (4)". This remarkable prophecy, which does ſo much honour to Cyrus, was ſpoken of him a hundred years before he was born, and ſurely, if language can prove any thing, the ſtile of this prophecy will be ſufficient to ſhew that Cyrus was no idolater. We are very well aware, that there is an expreſſion at the cloſe of what Iſaiah ſays of this glorious monarch, which has been conſtrued in this ſenſe; but we can eaſily, and, at the ſame time, fully prove, that it ought not ſo to be underſtood, the expreſſion is this, I have ſurnamed thee, though thou haſt not known me; the meaning of which, we ſay, is this; that God gave him the title of his ſhepherd and anointed, and actually employed him as the miniſter of his will, before Cyrus knew any thing of the matter; but how does this are told indeed, that he brought twelve volumes to Guſhtaſp, each of which contained a hundred ſkins of velom; but this will be the leſs wondered at, if we conſider, that the antient Perſian character took up a great deal of room this ſhew, that he was an idolater, or that he worſhipped not the true God, though he was unacquainted with the Jewiſh diſpenſation, and knew not that God by the name of Jehovah? After the taking of Babylon, Daniel certainly explained all theſe prophecies to Cyrus, and ſhewed him, that while he believed himſelf acting only in conſequence of the ſchemes he had formed, he was indeed fulfilling what God had told of him; in all which he was furthered and aſſiſted by the divine power, particularly in his amazing ſtratagem for taking Babylon, by altering of the great river, which, in the prophecy before quoted, Iſaiah had diſtinctly foretold, making the Almighty ſpeak thus: That ſaith to the deep be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers. As ſoon as Cyrus was acquainted with theſe prophecies, he readily teſtifyed his obedience to Jehovah, and his ſincere belief that he was the only true God, as appears by his edict for reſtoring the Jews, which begins with theſe remarkable words; Thus ſaith Cyrus king of Perſia, Jehovah, God of heaven, hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth, and he hath charged me to build him an houſe at Jeruſalem, which is in Judah; who is there among ye of all his people, his God be with him, and let him go up to Jeruſalem, which is in Judah; and build the houſe of Jehovah, God of Iſrael, he is God who is in Jeruſalem (5)? We ſuppoſe there needs no commentary to prove, that Cyrus was now acquainted with Jehovah, who revealed himſelf to the Hebrews, was the only true God, or, as Cyrus himſelf ſtiles him, God of heaven. The very king, of whoſe reign we are now ſpeaking, viz. Guſhtaſp, knew all this as well as Cyrus, for in his decree, relating to the temple of Jeruſalem, we find theſe words, That which they have need of, young bullocks, and rams, and lambs, for the burnt-offerings of the God of heaven, wheat, ſalt, wine, and oyl, according to the appointment of the prieſts which are at Jeruſalem; let it be given them day by day without fail, that they may offer ſacrifices grateful unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king and of his ſons (6). But the cloſe of this decree is yet ſtronger: God, who hath cauſed his name to dwell there, i. e. at Jeruſalem, deſtroy all kings and people that ſhall put their hand to alter or to deſtroy this houſe of God at Jeruſalem. I Darius have made a decree, let it be done with ſpeed (7). But let us return a little to Iſaiah, and mark what God ſays of himſelf, after the long deſcription given by him of the power and empire of Cyrus. I am Jehovah, and none elſe;

(4) Iſaiah xliv. 26. xlv. 1—6.

there

(5) Ezra i. 2. (6) Ezra vi. 9. (7) Ezra vi. 12.

room, and Zoroaſter did not only deliver the principles of his religion, but alſo his own hiſtory, and the rudiments of moſt ſciences therein, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew hereafter, when we come to ſpeak particularly of that book and of its contents. In the mean time, we

there is no God beſides me, I girded thee, i. e. Cyrus, though thou haſt not known me, i. e. by my name Jehovah, that they may know from the riſing of the ſun and from the weſt that there is none beſides me; I am Jehovah, and none elſe; I form the light, and create darkneſs; I make peace, and create evil; I, Jehovah, do all theſe (8). It is moſt evident, that this declaration was made in regard to the errors which had crept into the magian religion, in reſpect to light and darkneſs, and the powers preſiding over them. That Zerduſht rectified theſe errors, and expreſly taught what is declared in that text, that there was one ſelf exiſtent being, author of light and of darkneſs, of good and of evil, is acknowledged by ancient and modern authors, by the friends and enemies of Zerduſht, nay by dean Prideaux himſelf, who yet loads him with reproach, and never mentions him but by the opprobrious name of impoſtor (9). Impoſtor in what? In teaching that there was but one God, and that men ought not to erect images in his honour, or pretend to reſtrain him within the narrow bounds of temples; that, inſtead of ſuch mean notions of -he Deity, they ought to look up to the firſt, and moſt glorious creature with their ken, i, e. the ſun, and before him, as the witneſs of his Maker, and the expreſſive ſymbol of his omniſcience, teſtify their gratitude, thankfulneſs, and reverence, for all the favours conferred on them by the Creator and and Ruler of all things, reſolving with themſelves to make a right uſe of his bleſſings, by living temperately, and doing good, and not hurt, to their neighbours; till in his own due time God ſhould inſtruct them farther, by the miſſion of the Great Prophet who was to come, concerning whom Zerduſh as well as Moſes, ſpoke; ſurely theſe are no ſigns of impoſture. If it ſhould be aſked, How comes it then to paſs, that the Perſes have not acknowledged Chriſt? we may anſwer, by aſking another queſtion; Why have not the Jews acknowledged him? theſe are ſecrets which God hath reſerved to himſelf, teaching us, however, plainly enough, that it is our duty to endeavour the converſion of both, and of all the nations of the earth, not by the ſword, though that was an allowable argument of old, and as ſuch put into the hands of Moſes, Joſhua, David, and Cyrus, but by milder methods, expreſſive of the chriſtian ſpirit, by reaſoning calmly and by living we need not wonder, that he retired ſo long from the world, or choſe a cave for his abode, ſince works of this nature require ſilence and compoſure. The antient prophets reſided much in deſarts, that is, in unfrequented places. Epictetus and other philoſophers had their cells, whither they retired to avoid the noiſe and tumult of the world, and they did all this without reproach; but Zoroaſter's cave is made the ſtrong proof of his being an impoſtor; nay it is ſaid, that his living in a cave was a precedent for other impoſtors, particularly his ſcholar Pythagoras, who, as Iamblichus, informs us, had his cave as well as Zoroaſter. Nay, Mohammed borrowed this notion too from Zerduſht, and wrote his Koran in imitation of the Zend-aveſta. After all, there is a good deal of prejudice in this, every inſtitutor of a new religion, at leaſt, that we ever heard of, hath collected his doctrines into a book, or directed them to be collected, and left them to his diſciples; Moſes did this; Zerduſht did this; and Mohammed did this; does it follow, that Mohammed had in view Zerduſht rather than Moſes, or that he retired to a cave in imitation rather of Zerduſht than of the antient prophets? This is certainly doing him great honour, and even attributing more to him than is his due. We have already ſhewn, that this retirement to a cave

(8) Iſaiah xlv. 5, 6, 7. (9) Connection of the Old and New Teſtament, vol. i. p. 303.

living piouſly. It may be juſtly ſaid, that the greateſt impediment to this beſt of all works is the lazineſs of chriſtians, their neglecting to ſtudy the grounds of their own religion, and the ſources of thoſe errors which blind the minds of others, and hinder their ſeeing the truth of the goſpel. Many learned Jews have been converted, nay, and are daily converted in Germany, not by the antichriſtian proceedings of an inquiſition, but by proving to them, that, according to the maxims of their own doctors, the Meſſiah is come, and conſequently the obligation to their laws is removed. Might not the ſame thing be done with reſpect to theſe Perſees? would they not be ſooner invited to chriſtianity, if we ſhould ſtudy and explain the writings of Zerduſht, with impartiality at leaſt, if not with reſpect: we ſay, Would they not ſooner be invited by this method, to conſider the arguments in favour of the goſpel, than by calling him whom they eſteem a prophet an impoſtor, and charging them with idolatry, of which we are morally certain they are not guilty. But our note begins to exceed all bounds, and is already of a length which nothing can excuſe, except its ſubject.

cave was natural and reaſonable; at the bottom of the page we ſhall prove, that, as far as we know any thing of it, there is no juſt ground to ſuſpect, that it was not innocent, nay laudable, if the inſtructing of mankind may be eſteemed ſo. This we do not ſay out of prejudice in favour of Zerduſht, ariſing from the pains we have taken in compiling his hiſtory, but becauſe we are afraid of deceiving our readers, and of complying with popular opinions, at the expence of truth. If we err, it ſhall be through defect in our abilities, and not from any biaſs of our inclinations, we therefore make no queſtion, but even ſuch as differ from us in ſentiment will be ſatisfied with our conduct, and approve of our intentions, though they cenſure our opinions (N).

As

* Connection of the Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, vol. i p. 312.

(N) There cannot be a more difficult taſk aſſigned any man, than to reduce into order, and make ſenſe of what Greek authors have delivered in relation to oriental affairs; ſometimes they ſpeak truth and are not believed; at other times they tell the moſt arrant falſities with ſuch an air of knowledge, that ſuch as are not acquainted with theſe matters readily take for granted all they ſay; the Latins copy, generally ſpeaking, after the Greeks, and therefore are as little to be depended upon as their maſters, or rather leſs; ſometimes, however, they tell us truths, and truths which deſtroy in a line or two all the romantick ſtories that are told us elſe where. For example, Porphyry has quoted an oracle, which, he ſays, was pronounced at Delphos, of a very extraordinary nature; it runs thus:

Chaldees and Jews are wiſe in worſhipping
A ſelf-begotten God, of all things king.

Theſe Chaldees were the Magi, which we can eaſily prove from another learned writer, viz. Laertius, who ſpeaks thus (10): It is ſaid, that philoſophy had its original from the Barbarians, ſince among the Perſians were the Magi; among the Babylonians or Aſſyrians the Chaldeans; among the Indians the Gymnoſophiſts, and among the Celtes the Druids. For this Laertius quotes Ariſtotle; nay, Porphyry himſelf had the higheſt eſteem for the magi, ſince he deſcribes them thus; Among the Perſians thoſe wiſe perſons who were employed about the divinity, and ſerved him, were called magi; Laertius, on the authority of Ariſtotle, or (10) In Proœm. Hiſt. dogm. & vit. Philoſoph.

As our deſign in this ſection is to follow the oriental hiſtorians, we think it neceſſary to inſert here what is delivered by the Perſian hiſtorians, relating to the appearance of Zerduſht, when he firſt took upon him the character of a prophet, and demanded from Guſhtaſp and his ſubjects the obedience to a meſſenger from God. In regard to this we have a copious relation written by a Perſee, from the authentic memoirs of antient times, preſerved by or the author of the treatiſe of magic, ſpeaks of the manner in which they lived; They refrain, ſays he, from rich attire, and from wearing gold; their garments are moſtly white; their beds the ground; their food nothing but herbs, cheeſe, and bread; their chief employment is praying to God and exhorting men to live uprightly. Dion Chryſoſtome, the moſt polite writer among the Greeks, corrects the errors of his countrymen with reſpect to theſe magi, in theſe words: "The Perſians calledthoſe magi who "were employed in the ſervice of the gods; but the Greeks, "being ignorant of the meaning of that word, apply it to ſuch as "are ſkilled in magic, a ſcience unknown to the Perſian ſages (11)". Theſe magi were not only the ſcholars, but the maſters, of Zoroaſter or Zerduſht; they flouriſhed long before his time, and he doubtleſs acquired the rudiments of that knowledge, which he afterwards ſo much improved, from them. Dion Chryſoſtome has very happily ſet down what from good authorities he learned in relation to Zoroaſter. "It is reported, ſays "that admirable writer, that through love of wiſdom and Juſtice, "he, i. e Zoroaſter, withdrew himſelf from men, and lived "alone in a certain mountain; that afterwards leaving the "mountain, a great fire deſcending from above continually "burned about him. Upon this the King, with the prime no-"bility of Perſia, came and prayed with him to God. That he "was unhurt by the fire, delivered himſelf in terms which diſ-"covered more than human wiſdom, exhorting the people to "be chearful, and to offer certain ſacrifices, as if God had come "with him to that place; thenceforward he converſed not with "all men, but with ſuch only as were moſt addicted to truth, and "by reaſon of their ſtudies more capable of the knowledge of the "gods, whom the Perſians ſtile magi (12). Having thus learned from an unbyaſſed author, what it was that led Zoroaſter to mountains and deſarts, let us next ſee, what we can diſcover as to his employment in his cave. But, before we proceed to quote authorities on this head, let us obſerve, that, according to all the accounts we have hitherto had of the magi, they were very indifferently fitted to act in ſubſerviency to an impoſtor, ſuch as Zerduſht has been reported; for they were ſpiritual people, who fought by the judicious Dr. Hyde, the ſubſtance of which, as it never appeared before in our language, we hope will be well received, though doubtleſs it ſtands in need of great allowances, as to the miracles mentioned in it and other things. However, the fabulous hiſtory of the Perſians is at leaſt as well worth knowing as the conjectures of weſtern authors on this ſubject, which are often as improbable, and always as uncertain. Thus then proceeds our ſought not power and wealth, but wiſdom and truth; they reſembled rather the baptiſt in his coarſe cloathing and ſimple diet, than thoſe who are to be ſeen in the courts of kings, proſtituting religion to private ends, and unworthily taking the name of God in vain, to grafify the pride of mortals. In our account of the Perſian religion, we have given Zerduſht's rules for the clergy of all ranks, and from thence it evidently appears, he thought not of erecting an empire over the conſciences of men for the aggrandizing of the prieſthood, which among the Perſians was hereditary, but endeavoured to make his prieſts ſuperior to other men, by the ſingle method whereby one man can excel another, viz. through purity of mortals and improvement of the underſtanding (13). Such a ſcheme as this needed neither conjuring nor fanaticiſm to recommend it, and therefore, prima facie, it ſhould ſeem, that a man of Zerduſht's character retired to a cave for the ſake of privacy and ſilence, and not to raiſe devils or coin lying fictions; theſe are fit works for illiterate and ambitious men, ſuch as Mohammed was, but not for Zerduſht. It ſo happens, however, that we have ſome proof of this great man's employment in his cell; Porphyry tells us, "that Zoroaſter, firſt "among the Perſians, did conſecrate a natural cave in the moun- "tains in honour of Mithra, the king and father of all, ſignify- "ing by this cave the world framed by Mithra, by the other "things diſpoſed within it in fit diſtances the elements and "quarters of the world (14)". The very learned Celſus, as we find him quoted by Origen, gives us alſo an account of theſe caves in theſe words, "The Perſians, ſays he, in their Mithrian "rites, repreſent ſymbolically the two-fold motion of the ſtars, "viz. of thoſe ſtiled fixed, and of the planets, and the paſſage "of the ſoul through them. To demonſtrate this, they ſet up a "ladder, on the aſcent of which there were ſeven gates with the "eighth at the very top; the firſt of lead; the ſecod of tin; the "third of braſs; the fourth of iron; the fifth of a mixed maſs; "the ſixth of ſilver; and the ſeventh of gold. They attributed "the firſt to Saturn, the ſlowneſs of that planet's motion being "intimated by the lead; the ſecond to Venus, on account of the "ſoftneſs

(11) Orat. Boriſthen. (12) Ubi ſupra.

(13) Univerſal Hiſtory, vol. v. p. 49. (14) In Antr Nymphar.

our author: " in this reign flouriſhed Zerduſht the pro" phet. He coming into the preſence of Guſhtaſp, in" formed him of his commiſſion in theſe terms. I am a " prophet, ſent to thee by the moſt wiſe God, and this " book, viz. the Zend-aveſta, I brought from Paradiſe;
" alſo he gave me this caſſock and this girdle, ſaying, Put
" on this caſſock, and gird thyſelf with this girdle, that " thy ſoul may be delivered from Gehenna, and that " thou mayeſt find ſalvation; go alſo and propagate the true " religion throughout the world. When Guſhtaſp had " heard this meſſage from the prophet, he ſaid, But how
" ſhall I know that thou art really a prophet, and come " to me from the moſt high God? For without a ſign the " truth of what you ſay cannot be known, neither ought
" a religion to be received, till it be ſupported by mira" cles. If therefore thou art truly a prophet, ſhew us
" ſome ſign, that I may know and be aſſured thou art a
" meſſenger

" ſoftneſs and brightneſs of tin; the third being of braſs, than
" which nothing is more ſolid or durable, to Jupiter; the fourth
" to Mercury, becauſe, like iron, he is ſuited to all ſorts of la" bours, from whence profit may be drawn; the fifth, becauſe
" of its mixture, variableneſs, and irregularity, to Mars; the " ſixth to the moon, and the ſeventh to the ſun, becauſe of the
" likeneſs in their colour to ſilver and gold (15)". Here is a great deal of philoſophy, but no witchcraft or enthuſiaſm in theſe repreſentations; and if Zoroaſter be condemned, either as a magician or an impoſtor, on account of the furniture of his cave, what will become of our makers of Orreries? we will conclude this very note with obſerving, that the moſt judicious Dion Chryſoſtome, whom we have ſo often quoted and commended, knew well the folly and falſhood of the Greeks, in what they reported of the religion of the Perſians, and of their conſecrating horſes to the ſun (16). They were far, ſays he, from fancying the chariot of the ſun, the moſt ſublime ſpectacle in nature they were acquainted with, the ſupreme charioteer who put the univerſe into motion, and ſtill guides it. Of this ſubject, not Homer, not Heſiod, but Zoroſtaer, and the magi, his diſciples taught by him, have ſung in ſtrains worthy of the glorious theme. But all their diſcourſes are to be interpreted in a very different manner, nay directly oppoſite, from the comments of our writers. They acknowledge, that the director of univerſe is inacceſſible and inſcrutable; they compare the motions of the ſun and moon to horſes under direction, but as to horſes conſecrated to them, the Greeks have reported numberleſs fables.

(15) Celſus ap. Orig. cont. Celſ. lib. vi. (16) Orat. Boriſthen.

" meſſenger of God. When Zerduſht heard what the " king demanded, he in compliance therewith wrought
" the following miracle. He planted before the gate of " the palace a cypreſs tree, which grew in a few days ſo
" wonderfully, that it was near ten fathoms in girt and " full ten in height; and in the top of this tree he erected " a ſummer-houſe. when the king had beheld this mira" cle, he was convinced, and determined in his mind to " embrace the religion of Zerduſht. He was, however,
" adviſed to call for certain wiſe men who might diſpute
" with Zerduſht. This was accordingly done, but they " could not convince him; on the contrary Zerduſht pre" vailed. Theſe, however, hating him, deviſed this me" thod for his deſtruction. Zerduſht had his lodgings in " the palace, and as often as he went out he left his keys
" with the porter. This porter they corrupted, and en" gaged him to be ſilent and not diſcover any thing they " did. They then made uſe of him to gain entrance into " the lodgings of Zerduſht when he was abroad, and " when they had ſo done, they threw into his wardrobe,
" put into his book Zend, and into his cloak-bag, all
" ſorts of unclean and impure things, ſuch as the bones of " cats and dogs, and the hair and nails of dead bodies; " theſe they ſcattered amongſt his things; which when
" they had done, they went out, ſhut the doors carefully,
" and returned the keys to the porter. Zerduſht in the " mean time walked in the ſimplicity of his heart, praiſe-
" ing God, but his enemies conſidered not this. They " immediately addreſſed themſelves to the king to this pur" poſe: This wicked man, viz. Zerduſht, is employed
" every night in diabolical practices, by which, O king,
" thy heart will be inevitably inſnared, unleſs thou wilt
" inſtantly ſend ſome of thy guards to ſearch his apart" ments, that thou mayeſt be terrified whether theſe
" things be ſo or not. The king ſent hereupon his guards
" to the apartments of Zerduſht to ſearch them, and to " bring all things they found in them before him. This " accordingly was done, and all ſorts of unclean things,
" ſuch as the bones of dogs and cats, the hair and nails of " dead bodies were found in his cheſt of cloaths, his book
" of Zend-aveſta, and in his cloak-bag. The king ſee-
" ing all this, turned to Zerduſht, and ſaid in a high
" paſſion, How is this, thou profligate, and what is it
" thou haſt been doing? Zerduſht heard his accuſers and

" the

" the king patiently, and without emotion. At laſt he
" thus anſwered for himſelf; O king, all that thou ſeeſt
" I know nothing of, neither belongeth it to me. Then
" the king called for the porter, and having examined him,
" the king threw from him the book Zend, and com" manded Zerduſht to be ſhut up in priſon. Thus, not-" withſtanding his innocence, Zerduſht was thruſt into " confinement, which he endured chearfully, ſtanding all " day in one poſture, praying to and praiſing God, with" out receiving any ſuſtenance whatever. It happened
" ſhortly after, that a black horſe, of which the king
" was particularly fond, was taken in an odd manner, its " four feet ſhrinking up to its belly in ſuch a way, that
" the creature fell down to the ground, and could no way
" be raiſed up. The maſter of the horſe, called in the " Perſian language Mih-mard, when he came, as he was " wont, into the ſtables, and perceived what had befallen
" the king's favourite ſteed, went immediately and acquaint" ed Guſhtaſp. The king no ſooner heard it than he " went in perſon to the ſtable, and, having viewed the " horſe, called for the wiſe men who had engaged him to
" impriſon Zerduſht, and deſired them to contrive imme" diately ſome remedy for this extraordinary malady of the " horſe, which they were unable to do, and confeſſed as " much to the king. When Guſhtaſp found this, he grew " very uneaſy, becauſe he valued his horſe extremely.
" On the fourth day the porter went to ſee Zerduſht in " priſon. Of him Zerduſht enquired news, and why he " came not before to viſit him. The porter told him the " court was much diſturbed, on account of a misfortune
" which had befallen the king's black courſer. Zerduſht
" bid the porter tell the king, that, when he ſhould be " releaſed out of priſon, he would quickly reſtore his " horſe. The porter ran with this news to the king, who,
" as ſoon as he was informed thereof, ſent for Zerduſht
" out of priſon, and carried him with him to the ſtable.
" Zerduſht, ſeeing the condition the horſe was in, turned " to the king, and ſaid, Sir, this is no eaſy matter, but,
" on the contrary, a cure very difficult to be performed.
" One thing, however, I have to deſire, that what you
" wiſh may be performed; it is this; That you believe " with your whole heart, that the religion I taught you is " true and came from God, which if you do ſincerely, I
" ſhall be able to reſtore your ſteed, otherwiſe it muſt re" main in the ſtate it is in. Then the king, ſtruck with

" the

" the awful ſteadineſs of Zerduſht, believed according as " he deſired. Upon which the prophet advancing to the " black horſe, ſtroked his right fore-foot with his hand,
" whereupon the fore-foot immediately withdrew out of
" the belly of the horſe, and hung in its natural poſition.
" Then Zerduſht, turning to the king, ſaid, It is neceſ-
" ſary, Sir, that both your ſons come hither, embrace
" the religion I have taught, and promiſe to make war on " infidels for the propagation of this religion. Then " came inſtantly Baſhuten and Iſphendiyar, the ſons of " Guſhtaſp, and embraced the religion of Zerduſht, as " he had deſired. Upon this the prophet went again to " the horſe, and with his left-hand ſtroked the horſe's left
" fore-foot, which immediately the creature extended in " its natural ſtate. Then turned Zerduſht to the king,
" and ſaid, Sir, it is ſtill neceſſary, that Ketayun the mo" ther of Iſphendiyar ſhould embrace this religion. Then " Guſhtaſp ſent one of his attendants with Zerduſht to
" the palace, and the prophet, being come into the queen's " preſence, addreſſed her thus: O thou matron of ma" trons, whom God hath preferred above all women,
" and raiſed high above your ſex, by giving thee Guſh-
" taſp for thine huſband, and Iſphendiyar for thy ſon,
" like whom there is none upon the earth, Behold now
" the king of kings and thy ſon Iſphendiyar have embraced,
" and with their whole hearts believe the truth of, the re" ligion I have taught: it is neceſſary, O queen, that " you alſo receive and believe it. Then anſwered Ke" tayun, Whatſoever my huſband and my ſon believe,
" that alſo will I embrace and believe. Then Zerduſht,
" returning to the black horſe, put up his prayers, and
" ſtroaking with his right hand the right hind-foot, it was " reſtored to its natural ſtrength: then Zerduſht, turning " to the king, ſaid, You ſee your horſe has recovered three " legs; it is neceſſary for the recovery of the fourth, that " you interrogate your porter, and get the truth out of " him, that the innocent may not be blamed, ſeeing if " he the porter told the truth, then the horſe will fully " recover, or otherwiſe remain in the ſtate it did; the " king thereupon ordered the porter to be brought, and
" cauſed him to be ſeverely threatened, that he might diſ" cover the truth, as to the ſcattering unclean and abomi-
" nable things in the lodgings of Zerduſht; the porter,
" dreading the king's anger, moſt humbly b.ought hini
" to grant him his life, which the king having promiſed,

" he then opened the whole conſpiracy in theſe words: Four
" of theſe wiſe men, who are ſo much in your favour, that " I was afraid of refuſing them any thing, gave me a " bribe, and, taking the keys from me, did all that your " majeſty has heard and ſeen. When the king had heard
" all that the porter had to ſay, he was extremely ſorry,
" and made a long apology to Zerduſht for the injury he " had done him in cauſing him to be ſo long impriſoned,
" without any grounds at all, beſeeching him to paſs by
" and forgive it. Then the four wiſe men were hanged
" on a gibbet, and Zerduſht, having lift up his hands in " prayer, ſtroaked with his left hand the left hind leg of " the horſe, which immediately fell from his belly, and
" reſted on the ground as it uſed to do, ſo that quickly af" ter the beaſt roſe and ſtood upon all his feet. At this
" the king greatly rejoiced, treating Zerduſht with greater
" honour and reſpect than ever, cauſing him to be placed " on a golden ſeat, himſelf, i. e. the king believing the " book Zend-aveſta, and living in exact conformity to its " precepts. It is reported, that ſome time after this king
" Guſhtaſp applied himſelf to Zerduſht, and ſaid, there " is one thing that I deſire of thee, and I deſire it ſo ear-
" neſtly, that I hope you will not refuſe it, ſince if you
" grant me this requeſt, then ſhall I be thoroughly ſatisfied,
" that thou art a prophet ſent unto me by the moſt high
" God. Zerduſht deſired the king that he would explain
" himſelf, that he might apply to God for the gratification " of the king's will. Then king Guſhtaſp ſaid, My de-" ſire is this, that while I am yet alive my ſoul may be " ſatisfied as to its future ſtate, by beholding the joys of " heaven, that it may be certain concerning them, and at
" eaſe. Moreover, I deſire, that I may know all things " that ſhall paſs till the day of judgment, with the ſame
" exactneſs as I know things preſent. 3dly, I deſire,
" that in all the wars I wage on account of religion, my " body may remain as it is, and I become invulnerable.
" 4thly, I deſire, that my ſoul may continue to exiſt to " the day of reſurrection, and that I die not at all. The " prophet of God hearing this, anſwered, I will certain" ly put up my prayers to the creator of all things, nei" ther doubt I at all, that the moſt high God will grant
" what you have deſired. But your four requeſts muſt be " yielded to four different perſons, ſince it belongs to God
" alone to enjoy them all at once. Do you therefore con-
" ſider who theſe perſons ſhall be, and I will put up

" prayers that one of your requeſts may be granted to " each. Then king Guſhtaſp deſired for himſelf, that he " might be permitted to behold his place in paradiſe, and " take a diſtinct view of all that was therein. He like- " wiſe mentioned three other perſons on whom the re- " maining bleſſings ſhould be beſtowed. Then Zerduſht " being ſatisfied, retired to his own lodgings, and ſpent the " whole night in prayers and praiſes to God, beſeeching " him, that if it were poſſible all theſe things might come " to paſs. The next day when light appeared, and the " ſun diſplayed his beams on the tops of the mountains, " it came into the mind of Zerduſht to conſecrate the " four following things, viz. wine, a roſe, a cup, and " the kernel of a pomgranate. And after he had conſe- " crated theſe by prayer, having the ſacred twigs in his " hand, he preſented the wine to Guſhtaſp, and as ſoon " as the king had drank thereof, he fell down as if in a " deep ſleep, and continued for three days and three nights " in the ſame poſition, his ſoul within that ſpace aſcend- " ing into heaven, and beholding there the joys of the " bleſſed. At the end of three days he awaked, and go- " ing to Zerduſht beſeeched him to pardon his incredulity. " Then the prophet gave to Gjamaſp the roſe which he " had conſecrated, which he no ſooner ſmelt, than he " knew all things that paſſed, all that had happened " from the beginning, and which were to happen, and " which ſhould happen to the day of reſurrection. Then " Zerduſht gave milk in the cup to Baſhuten, the ſon of " Guſhtaſp, who by drinking thereof was made immor- " tal. As to the fourth thing, Iſphendiyar, having eaten " the kernel of the pomgranate, had his body rendered as " invulnerable as braſs. After this the religion of Zer- " duſht ſpread, and was propagated every-where, all men " readily yielding belief thereto, excepting Argjaſp, king " of Touran, who embraced it not [1].

The great deſire all people have to magnify the princes who have ruled, and the prophets who have taught them, hath doubtleſs encouraged the Perſees to propagate a multitude of ſtrange things in relation to Zerduſht; the foregoing long quotation is ſufficient to ſhew the nature of their notions, and to excuſe us from making any farther tranſerits from their books. Let us return therefore to the ſtory of his propagating his doctrines, and let us endeavour to put our materials together, as ſuccinctly as we may.

[1] E libr. rariſſim: cui titul. Shah nama-nefr.

THE two reigning hereſies before the birth of Zerduſht were Zabiiſm and Magiſm; the latter was far leſs groſs than the former, and conſequently there required more care to keep its profeſſors from going over to the oppoſite religion. For hiſtory informs us, and the experience even of our own times renders it manifeſt, that the bulk of mankind embrace more readily ſuperſtition than truth. Hence it came to paſs, that the Zabians gained ground in Perſia, and multitudes, eſpecially of the common people, were fallen into wrong notions of the deity, and into groſs errors in their manner of worſhipping him, living alſo in continual fear of that evil ſpirit, whom they conceived to be the enemy of their ſpecies and the continual diſturber of the world. Zerduſht took pains to root out all theſe notions, and to make the people eaſier than they had been, by inſpiring them with reaſonable opinions; he taught them, that the ſupreme being was independent and ſelf-exiſtent from all eternity, that light and darkneſs, good and evil, were continually mixed, and in a continual ſtruggle, not through any impotency in the creator, but becauſe ſuch was his will, and becauſe this diſcordancy was for his glory; that in the end there would be a general reſurrection and a day of retribution, wherein ſuch as had done well, and lived obedient to the law of God, ſhould go with the angel of light into a realm of light, where they ſhould enjoy peace and pleaſure for evermore; and thoſe who had done evil ſhould ſuffer with the angel of darkneſs everlaſting puniſhment in a land of obſcurity, where no ray of light or mercy ſhould ever viſit them; that thenceforward light and darkneſs ſhould be incapable of mixture to all eternity. He took great pains to perſuade his diſciples of all the attributes of the divinity, eſpecially of his wiſdom and his juſtice, in conſequence of which he aſſured them, that they had none to fear but themſelves, becauſe nothing could render them unworthy of the divine favour but their vices. Of all virtues he eſteemed what the Greeks called philanthropy, and the apoſtles brotherly love, the greateſt; for which reaſon he exhorted all his followers to acts of charity and beneficence; ſometimes alluring them by promiſes, at other times driveing them as it were by threatenings. The credenda of his religion were not numerous nor perplexed, though,

according

according to the mode of the eaſt, he ſometimes made uſe of parabolic relations; for example; when he taught, that on the fourth day after death the ſoul came to the bridge Tchinavar, and was there met by the angels Mihr-Izad and Reſhu-Izad, who weighed in the balance the good and evil actions of the ſoul attempting to paſs; and in caſe the former prevailed, then it went ſafely over the bridge, if the latter, it was thrown thence into Geheuina, that is into the region of darkneſs, where the ſouls of the wicked are puniſhed [m]. That this is really a parabolic deſcription, and not a literal account, of what is to happen after death, we ſuppoſe, appears from the very face of the relation; for it cannot be ſuppoſed, that Zerduſht, who was indiſputably a very wiſe and learned man, and who took pains to make all his diſciples ſo, ſhould nevertheleſs attempt to impoſe upon them ſo abſurd a thing as this, taken in a literal ſenſe, viz. that a ſpirit diveſted of matter ſhould travel over a bridge, lying acroſs hell and leading to heaven; and that, after weighing his actions in a pair of ſcales, the good angel ſhould either lead him over ſafe, or the bad one puſh him down; this is abſolutely incredible. But that he ſhould make uſe of theſe terms to inſinuate, that the effects of our good and evil deeds tranſcend the grave, and either lead us to ever-laſting reſt, or project us into never-ending miſery, is eaſy to be underſtood, and might as eaſily have been believed. In the book Sad-der, which is a compendium of the doctrines of Zerduſht collected in his own words, this deſcription of the ſtate of the dead is placed in the firſt chapter; and in the ſecond it is thus applied; men who believe the religion of Zerduſht will be afraid not only of great but of ſmall ſins; for ſince all are weighed and numbered, and according to the preponderating of this or that ſcale the ſoul is to be happy or miſerable for ever, whoever thinks of this will be afraid of adding weight to the left-hand ſcale, and earneſtly deſire to heap meritorious actions in that on the right-hand, becauſe his all reſts on this trial. This is very ſound divinity, and very intelligible, where the mind is unprejudiced, otherwiſe it is eaſy to redicule the ſoul-ſupporting bridge, and the action-weighing angels, and conſequently to expoſe Zerduſht, not only as a wicked, but a weak impoſtor. But to proceed; he carefully inſtructed thoſe who heard him, and directed them to inſtruct all who would believe in his religion, that no man ought to deſpair of the mercy of God, or ſuppoſe that it was too late for him to amend; he declared, that though we had a faculty of diſtinguiſhing between good and evil, yet that man has no conception of the value which God ſets on our actions, nor how far the intention may ſanctify even a trivial act, wherefore even the worſt of men may hope the divine favour from repentance and good works; this he exemplified by another parable, which is alſo recorded in the book Sad-der, and which runs in theſe words: "It is reported of Zerduſht, the "author of our religion, that one day, retiring from the "preſence of God he beheld the body of a man plunged "in Gehenna, his right foot only being free, and ſticking "without. Zerduſht thereupon cried out, What is this "that I ſee, and wherefore is this man in this condition? "He was anſwered, This man, whom you ſee in this "condition, was formerly the prince of thirty-three ci-"ties, over which he reigned many years, without do-"ing any one good action; for beſides oppreſſion, in-"juſtice, pride, and violence, nothing ever entered his "mind; and though he was the ſcourge of multitudes, "yet, without regarding their miſery, he lived at eaſe in "his palace. One day, however, as he was hunting, he "beheld a ſheep caught by the foot in a thicket, and "thereby held at ſuch a diſtance from food, that it muſt "have periſhed; this king, moved at the ſight, alighting "from his horſe, releaſed the ſheep from the thicket, "and led it to the paſture; now for this act of tender-"neſs and compaſſion his foot remains out of Gehenna, "though his whole body be plunged therein for the mul-"titude of his ſins. Endeavour therefore to do all the "good thou canſt without fear or apprehenſion; for God "is benign and merciful, and will reward even the "ſmalleſt good thou doeſt[n]." Theſe hints of his doctrines, compared with what has been already delivered in ſpeaking of the religion of the antient Perſians, cannot but be ſufficient to ſhew the general import of Zerduſht's ſcheme of religion; as to exterior rites, he altered the old method of burning fire on the tops of mountains, and in other places under the open air, engaging his followers to erect Pyræa or fire-temples throughout all the dominions of Perſia, that this ſymbol of the divinity might not at every

[m] Sad-der, Port. 1.

[n] Sad der. Port. 5.

every turn be liable to be extinguiſhed. He gave them likewiſe a liturgy, which they hold to have been brought to him from heaven, and therefore refuſe to make any alterations therein, though the language in which it is written is long ago grown obſolete, and is very little underſtood by the prieſts themſelves. The prieſts, or, as we ſtile them, the magi, were, according to his inſtitution, of three ranks. The firſt conſiſted of the ordinary or parochial clergy, as Dr. Prideaux very ſignificantly terms them; their duty was to read the holy offices daily in the chapels, and at certain ſtated and ſolemn times to acquaint the people with the contents of Zerduſht's books, and to paraphraſe on and explain them. In theſe parochial chapels there were no fire-altars, but lamps only, before which their devotions were performed. The next degree of their clergy had the ſuperintendance of theſe ordinary prieſts, and were to them what biſhops are to us; theſe too had their churches, in which were altars, whereon fire was continually kept, there being a certain number of the inferior clergy appointed to attend them, who, by four at a time, waited conſtantly near the altar to provide it with fuel, and to aſſiſt ſuch devout perſons as reſorted thither, with their advice and their prayers. Above theſe was the archimagus, i. e. the high prieſt, or, as the Perſians ſtiled him, the Mubad Mubadan. Zerduſht himſelf aſſumed this office and reſided in the city of Balch, where he governed his magians, and inſtructed them in all ſorts of learning. As the auſterity of his own life and his extenſive knowledge ſupported him in the high reputation he had gained among his cotemporaries, he recommended, as we have ſeen in the rules given by him for the conduct of the archimagus, the ſame behaviour and the ſame application of ſtudy unto his ſucceſſors. Theſe injunctions were for many ages purſued by them, and was the reaſon that they were admitted into the king's councils, ſate with him in judicature, and had the education of the heirs of the crown, inſomuch, that Pliny tells us, in his time, this religion was received by many nations, and bore ſway in the eaſt over the king of kings. It remains now, that we give an account of the book of the laws ſtill extant among the Perſees, and indubitably written by Zerduſht, whether he was prophet or impoſtor, for as to the remaining actions of his life and his immature death, they belong to the reign of Guſhtaſp, and ſhall be accordingly taken notice of therein.

ZERDUSHT's book, containing the inſtitutes of his religion, is ſtiled Zend or Zend-avaſta, uſually pronounced Zund and Zundavaſtaw, which is not a Perſian but an exotic word, ſignifying a Tinderbox; its author, in compliance with the oriental cuſtom of giving all important treatiſes allegorical names, having pitched on this to expreſs the nature of his book, which was to inſpire its readers with divine zeal; he likewiſe cauſed it to be ſtiled the book of Abraham, intimating, that it contained the doctrines held by that patriarch. It is written, not in the ordinary Perſian character, but in the old Perſic, called from thence, among the ordinary Perſees, the Zund character. The very learned Dr. Thomas Hyde propoſed to the world the publiſhing a correct edition of it with a Latin tra nlation, but meeting with no encouragement to undertake ſo laborious and expenſive a work, the world had been deprived of the ſight of this great curioſity [o]. It was originally written in twelve hundred ſkins, and conſiſts of one and twenty parts, or different treatiſes, all comprehended under the general title of Zend or Zend-avaſta, which is the reaſon, that we have had in Europe ſo many different accounts of this book and its contents. For the ſake of the people who profeſs this religion, and who have notwithſtanding no knowledge at all either of the Zund character, or of the language in which that book is written, a very learned prieſt has taken the pains to make a compendium thereof in modern Perſian, which is the book Sad-der, ſo often quoted by us from the Latin verſion publiſhed by Dr. Hyde, and annexed to his impartial hiſtory of the religion of the antient Perſians. This learned critic is of opinion, that Zerduſht did not originally intend to have made this book conſiſt of any more than two parts, viz. the Zend and Pazend, reſembling the Miſhna and Gemara in the Jewiſh Talmud; the firſt containing the liturgy and principal doctrines of his religion; the ſecond a commentary on them, explaining and ſhewing the rationale of them; but as new adverſaries roſe up daily, and other occaſions required new treatiſes, Zerduſht continued to write them, and to add them to his Zend-avaſta, which ſtill retained the general title of the volume. Amongſt the pieces comprehended under that title, there is one bearing the title of Zeratuſht-nama, i. e. the hiſtory of Zerduſht, which is no other than his life written by himſelf. This, that it may be more generally known, has been rendered into the common Perſian by the prieſts, who publiſhed the [o] Hiſtor. veter. Perſar. p. 25.

the book Sadder [p]. The celebrated Dr. Prideaux, ſpeaking of this book, acknowledges, that the rules and exhortations to moral living are written very preſſingly, and with ſufficient exactneſs, excepting only in one particular, which is that of inceſt; for this, he ſays, is wholly taken away by Zerduſht, who teaches, that nothing of this nature is unlawful, but that a man may not only marry his ſiſter or his daughter, but his mother; and he very juſtly obſerves, that this is ſuch an abomination, that, though all things elſe were right in that book, this alone were ſufficient to pollute it. But in ſupport of all this, the doctor does not quote either the book itſelf, or its compendium the book Sad-der, or any other treatiſe written by an avowed Perſee, but the authorities of Diogenes Laertius, Strabo, Philo Judæus, Tertullian, and Clemens Alexandrinus [q]. It is but reaſonable, that we ſhould ſuſpend our belief till we have a deciſive account of this matter, eſpecially if we conſider, that in other reſpects theſe authors are frequently miſtaken. It may indeed be urged, that inceſt was commonly practiſed by the Perſian kings (if we give intire credit to the Greek hiſtorians); but admitting this to be ſo, it is no direct proof, that Zerduſht allowed it, any more than the contrary practice of the Perſees at this day is a demonſtration that he did not allow it. As to the reſt of the contents of this book, we ſhall not inſiſt farther on them here, becauſe it would lead us into too long a digreſſion from the thread of our hiſtory; but the inquiſitive reader will find at the bottom of the page ſome farther memorandums relating to the works of Zoroaſter (O).

W E

[p] H. R. v. P. c. xxv, xxvi. [q] Connection of the hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, vol. i. p. 320.

(O) In this note we ſhall ſpeak largely of Zerduſht's writings, that is, as largely as the nature of this work will allow; and, that we may do this clearly, we will coſider them, firſt, as they are known to the Perſees and oriental nations in general; ſecondly, as they are known to the Greeks.

The Zende-vaſta, as we have ſaid in our text, is divided into one and twenty treatiſes, each called by the Perſees Neſick, or broadly pronounced Nuſk, i. e. a part. Every one of theſe treatiſes has its proper title ſuited to the ſubject of which he treats. Thus Pazend, which is the name of the ſecond treatiſe ſignifies, the prop or buttreſs of the Zend, becauſe it comprehends, the reaſons ſupporting the doctrines delivered in the firſt part, called ſimply

We will conclude our account of this extraordinary perſon, with obſerving, that he is ſaid by credible authors, to have predicted the coming of the Meſſiah, and this not in dark and obſcure terms, ſuch as might have been applied as well to any other perſon, but in plain and expreſs words, and ſuch as could not be miſtaken; nay farther; it ſimply the Zend; the ſixteenth treatiſe is that called Zeratuſht-nama, or the life of Zerduſht, mentioned in the text. Dr. Hyde, who, like a generous man, deſired, that all the world ſhould partake of the treaſures he had in his hands, publiſhed the contents of this book, in hopes they might ſo far move the curioſity of the public, as to enable him to publiſh the book itſelf. It contains forty chapters and about a hundred and forty pages, wherein the whole myſtery of Zerduſht's character as a prophet, and the methods made uſe of by him for the propagation of his religion, are ſet forth at large (17). The twentieth treatiſe in the Zende-vaſta is called Bimaſhk-naz, i. e. the Book of Phyſicians, becauſe it treats of the virtues of drugs, and how they may be applied. Thus the writings of Zerduſht contain not only the religion, but the learning, of the magi, and therefore he recommended it to all his ſucceſſors in the office of high prieſt to be perfect maſters of all uſeful learning. As the book Zend is the bible of the Perſees, ſo to expreſs a right or juſt thing, they ſay Zend-aver i. e. permitted by the Zend, and an evil action they call Na-Zend-aver, i. e. not permitted by the book Zend. Zend-Laph, ſignifies a zealous Perſee, but Zend-chuan, which literally rendered is a reader of the Zend, ſignifies not a common reader, but him who reads it in the pariſh church, ſo that it is equivalent to what the Jews call Chacham, and the Mohammedans Imam. As to the notion of Curtius, of the magis ſinging their prayers it is not, ſtrictly ſpeaking, true, though they have a particular tone of voice proper to the recital of their prayers, in which they agree with the modern Jews, and perhaps with many other nations (18). Dr. Prideaux is very ſevere on this method of devotion, and compares it to the manner of popiſh prieſts celebrating their maſs (19; but in reſpect to thoſe things which are regulated by cuſtom, perhaps thoſe cenſures ſhould be ſpared, ſince it is hard to find the reaſon, why the cuſtom of one country ſhould render ridiculous the cuſtom of another.

As to what the Greeks knew of Zoroaſter's writings, it is difficult to ſay what ought to be believed; Euſebius ſpeaks of a collection of Phyſics written by this great man, and quotes from thence (17) Hiſt. veter. Perſ. c. xxiv. p. 329, 330. (18) Ibid. p. 342. (19) Connection of the the Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, vol. i. p. 309.

it is affirmed, that the wiſe men out of the eaſt, recorded by the evangeliſt [r] to have come to Bethlehem, and there worſhipped our Saviour on account of his ſtar which they had ſeen in their own country, were the diſciples of Zerduſht. Some of the learned indeed, ſlighting this relation, have fixed on Balaam's prophecy [s], in order to account for that event; and hence without doubt it happened, that ſo learned a man as Hornius was of opinion, that Zoroaſter might have been the ſame perſon [t]. Far be it from us to thence the following deſcription of God's attributes, affirming them to be the expreſs words of Zoroaſter; "God hath the "head of a hawk, he is the firſt incorruptible, eternal, unbe- "gotten, indiviſible, moſt like himſelf, the charioteer of every "good, one that cannot be bribed, the beſt of things good, the "wiſeſt of things wiſe; he is moreover the father of equity and "juſtice, ſelf-taught, ſelf-exiſtent, infinitely perfect, omniſcient, "and the ſole ruler of nature (20)". Suidas aſcribes to him four books of nature, one of precious ſtones, five of the wiſdom of the ſtars (21). Pliny ſays he wrote two millions of verſes, on which Hermippus wrote commentaries, a treatiſe on agriculture, and a book of viſions (22). But of all the works mentioned by the Greeks his oracles are the moſt conſiderable, becauſe of them there are ſtill ſome remains, could we be ſure they were genuine; but Porphyry ſays expreſly, that ſome chriſtian heretics, boaſting of the ſecret works of Zoroaſter, attempted to deceive the world, and, if they believe what they ſay, are deceived themſelves, ſince theſe treatiſes are no better than forgeries (23). The famous prince of Mirandula gave the oracles yet extant ſome reputation by the following account of a manuſcript in his own poſſeſſion; "I was, ſays he, forcibly taken off from other things, "and engaged to ſtudy the Arabian and Chaldean learning by "certain books in both thoſe languages, which came to my hands, "not accidentally, but, queſtionleſs, by the diſpoſal of God in "favour of my ſtudies; hear the inſcriptions and you will be- "lieve it. Theſe Chaldaic books, if I ought to call them books "and not treaſures, are the oracles of Zoroaſter, Aben-Eſra, "and Melchior, magi, in which thoſe things which are faulty "and defective in the Greek are read here perfect and entire. "There is alſo an expoſition by Chaldaic wiſe men on theſe "oracles, conciſe, and ſomewhat obſcure indeed, but full of "rare to contenance any superstitious stories, and as far be it from us either to conceal or to detract from truth, or what has the appearance of truth; we are writing the life of Zerdusht from such authors as have come to our hands, we ought not therefore to omit mentioning a circumstance of such consequence and supported by various testimonies. If the distrust which critics affect to shew of all things reported by oriental writers should be sufficient to overtorn the credit of these predictions, in the judgment of an impartial reader, it is not our fault; we are to relate, but in cases of this nature every man must determine for himself (P). On the whole, we may be permitted to say, that

[r] Matth. ii. 1. [s] Hyde, H. R. vet. P. p. 384. [t] Hiſt. Philoſoph. lib. ii. c. 4. p. 80.

(20) Euſebius de præpar. evangel. (21) In voce Ζωροάστρης. (22) Hiſt. Nat. lib. xxvi. c. 1. (23) In vita Plotini.

" rare mysteries, and curious learning. There is besides a book " of the Chaldaic theology, with a copious and admirable " discourse of the wisdom of the Persians, Grecians, and Chal- " deans (24)". Ficinus to whom he directed this letter found these books after his decease, but so worn and illegible, that nothing could be made of them. Some of these oracles, which escaped the injuries of time, were first published at Paris by Lewis Tillet in 1563, with the commentaries of Gemistus Pletho, the same were afterwards translated, and with the comment of Psellus published at Paris 1607. But Franciscus Patricius, having greatly enlarged them by excerpts from Proclus, Hermias, Simplicius, Damascius and Arnobius, sent them into the world with an accurate translation of his own. From him our ingenious countryman Mr. Stanley took them, and published them with the commentaries of Pletho and Psellus, at the end of his Chaldaic philosophy in 1661 (25).

(P) The wisdom of the east was not only a scripture phrase, but used also by the best profane authors, who knew very well, that, notwithstanding the boasting of the Greeks, science came originally from that corner of the world. It is a common, but no very probable, opinion, that they were kings who visited our Saviour in his cradle; tho' they might indeed come from a king, that is from the king of Persia, to enquire for the Messiah. That they might come, as some have insisted, from Arabia is true, because Arabia lay in their way; but that they magi came from another country than Persia, in which they always flourished, is what cannot easily be believed; but that these magi or wise men went into Judea in pursuance of Zerdusht's prophecy, is a point to be proved, not by us indeed, who have not seen the Zende-vasta, but even without seeing it we shall be able to justify what we have said in the text, and defend ourselves from the imputation of superstition, if we can but produce probable authorities that on a view of what different authors have delivered concernirg Zerduſht and his writings, he ſtands fairly entitled to the character we have given him of an extraordinary perſon, eſpecially when we reflect, that his miniſtry authorities. Shariſtani, whom we have more than once quoted, in his hiſtory of the religions of the eaſt, ſays expreſly, that Zerduſht prophefied, in his Zende-vaſta, that in latter times there ſhould ariſe a man called Oſhanderbegha, i. e. Homo Mundi, which differs little from the title Chriſt often gives himſelf of the Son of Man, of whom Zerduſht propheſied, that he ſhould teach the world true religion and juſtice, that for a time his kingdom ſhould be oppreſſed by the devil; but in the end this righteous perſon ſhall triumph, and ſhall eſtabliſh peace and happineſs upon earth (26). To this let us add a very extraordinary paſſage from the travels of Mr. Tavernier: "They give, "ſays he, three children to their prophet, and though they "have not hitherto appeared in the world, their names are however ſettled. As he paſſed the river, ſay they, ab ipſo cecidit "tres feminis genitalis guttas, which are preſerved to the end of "the world. That God ſhall ſend a virgin for whom he has a "favour into the ſame water, who, per receptionem primæ "guttæ, ſhall be impregnated, and bring forth a ſon, who ſhall "be called Ouſhider, he ſhall appear in the world with great "authority, and ſhall oblige it to receive the law of his father, "and ſhall diſcourſe with much eloquence, and confirm what he "ſays with miracles. The ſecond, who ſhall be called Ouſhi-"derma, ſhall be conceived in the ſame manner, he ſhall ſecond "his brother in his deſigns, and ſhall aſſiſt him in preaching, he "he ſhall ſtop the courſe of the ſun ten days, to force by that "ſign the belief of the people whom he teaches. The third ſhall be "conceived by the ſame mother in the ſame way; his name "ſhall be Sennoiet-hotius, he ſhall come into the world with "greater authority than either of his brothers, that he may re-"duce all nations to the true religion; after which ſhall be the "general reſurrection, when the ſouls in heaven and in hell "ſhall return and take poſſeſſion of their bodies, the mountains "and all the metals ſhall then melt, and ſinking into the gulph "of hell ſhall fill it up, ſo that the manſions of the devils ſhall be "ruined. After this great change the earth ſhall be plain and "pleaſant, and men ſhall live happily therein, praiſing God and "his prophet (27). Dr. Hyde obſerves very judiciouſly, that theſe three ſons repreſent the three ſtates of the Meſſiah His nativity, when his coming was publiſhed to the world by various means; his miniſtry while he continued upon earth, preaching and doing miracles; and his ſecond advent when he ſhall judge the niſtry was of no long continuance, according to the moſt authentic accounts not above five years, that is from the time of his preſenting himſelf to Guſhtaſp to his being ſlain at the ſack of Balch ; but it is now time for us to return to the hiſtory of Guſhtaſp, and of the remarkable events which happened during his reign (Q).

(24) Epist. ad Ficinum. (25) Vide Preface to the Chaldaic Oracles.

(26) Shariſtani ap. Hyde Rel. vet. Perſar. c. xxxi. p. 383.
(27) Tavern. Voyage. tom. i. lib. iv. p. 485.

THE

the world in righteouſneſs, and his ſaints ſhall rejoice and ſing (28). But the ſtrongeſt evidence of this matter is the teſtimony of the famous Abul Pharajius, who writes thus: "Zorodaſht "or Zerduſht, the preceptor of the magian ſect, began to teach "in Aderbayagjan, or, as ſome ſay, in Aſſyria. He taught the "Perſians, that our Lord Chriſt would manifeſt himſelf, com- "manding them to carry him gifts, telling them, that in the "latter times a virgin ſhould conceive without the help of "man, and that when ſhe ſhould bring forth, a ſtar ſhould ap- "pear ſhining in the day-time, in the middle of which the "figure of a virgin ſhould be ſeen. You therefore O! my "children, have notice of his birth before all other nations, "when ye ſee that ſtar, follow it, which will direct you to the "place where he is born, adore him, offer him your gifts, for "he is that word which eſtabliſhed the heavens (29)". This paſſage is quoted by Dr. Hyde, but there is another in the ſame author which he has not mentioned, which we therefore ſhall from that excellent author exhibit to our readers; "The ſame "year Cæſar the emperor ſent Cyrenius into Judea in order to "tax it. Joſeph the huſband of Mary, going up upon this oc- "caſion from Nazareth to Jeruſalem, that he might give in his "name, when he came to Bethlehem in the way Mary did "bring forth a ſon. The magi brought their gifts from the "eaſt, and offered to Chriſt gold, myrrh, and frankincenſe. "Being queſtioned on this head by Herod in their paſſage, they "anſwered thus: A perſon of great fame among us, in a book "which he left us, hath thus admoniſhed us: There ſhall here- "after be born in Paleſtine a male child deſcending from heaven, "whom the greateſt part of the world ſhall obey; now the "ſign of his appearance ſhall be this; Ye ſhall ſee a ſtrange "ſtar which ſhall direct you till it ſtops, which when ye ſhall "behold, take ye gold, myrrh, and frankincenſe, and offer "them to him, and adore him, then return ye, leſt great evil "ſhould overtake ye. Now therefore this ſtar appearing, we "come to do as we were commanded (30)", a noble teſtimony ſurely.

(Q) The death of Zerduſht was violent indeed, but we cannot call it unhappy, ſince his religion did not periſh with him, which

(28) Hiſt. Rel. vet. Perſ. c. xxxi. p. 383. (29) Abul Pharajius in Hiſtor. Dynaſt. p. 83. (30) Ibid. p 110.

THE old animoſities between the inhabitants of Touran and Iran broke out in a freſh war, while Guſhtaſp ſat on the throne of his anceſtors; it is not eaſy to ſay, whether this monarch or Argjaſp, who then reigned at Touran, was the aggreſſor. Mirkhond inclines to the former opinion, and makes this a war of religion, undertaken to reduce Argjaſp and his ſubjects to the faith of Zerduſht, that prince being, according to Dr. Prideaux, a zealous Zabian [u], which if he was, we know not how to account for it, ſince it ſhould ſeem, that the old religion of Perſia flouriſhed there in the days of Phridun; and, as we have ſeen, Zerduſht was not the which certainly it would have done, if he had been as bungling an impoſtor as ſome would make him, A Perſian hiſtorian tells us, that Argjaſp overturned the Fire-Temples erected by Zerduſht in Balch, and ſlew ſeventy prieſts, putting out the ſacred fire with the blood of the magi (31). Whether this muſt be underſtood literally or figuratively, it would be difficult to tell, if another hiſtorian had not related it more at large. "Notice, "ſays this writer, being given to the king of Touran by "certain merchants, that there were no ſoldiers left in Balch, "all of them having repaired to the army of Guſhtaſp, and that "his father Lohraſp was left alone in that city, with ſuch as "attended on the Pyræa and eighty prieſts; Argjaſp on this in-"formation drew together an army of fifteen thouſand men, "ſending his ſon Kehram before him, and following with all "expedition himſelf. It is ſaid, that when Argjaſp entered Iran, "Loraſp receiving advice thereof came out of his retreat, and "put himſelf at the head of a ſmall troop, with whom he "killed many of the enemy, but in the end Lohraſp with the "eighty prieſts before mentioned was ſlain and the holy fire ex-"tinguiſhed with their blood; with theſe prieſts alſo fell Zer-"duſht the prophet, who then reſided at Balch (32)". Hence it came to paſs, that Suidas affirms of the Aſſyrian Zoroaſter, that he deſired to die by fire from heaven, and adviſed his countrymen to preſerve his aſhes, aſſuring them, that while they were kept their kingdom ſhould never fail (33): All which the Alexandrian chronicle refers to the Perſian Zoroaſter or our Zerduſht (34). Of theſe fables we have ſaid enough, perhaps too much, already.

[u] Connection of the Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, Vol. I. p. 321.

(31) Megjdi ap. Hyde Hiſt. Rel. vet. Perſ. p. 312. (32) In Shahnama-neſr. ap. Hyde Rel, vet. Perſ. p. 325. (33) ubi ſupra. (34) Chron. Alexand. p. 89.

the inſtitutor of a new, but the reformer of the old, religion; however it was, Mirkhond informs us, that Guſhtaſp having aſſembled the whole forces of his empire, marched with them into Touran, and meeting Argjaſp in battle he vanquiſhed him, ſlew his ſon in the field, and, before the Turkiſh monarch could aſſemble a new army, poſſeſſed himſelf of his capital, and gave the plunder of it to his ſoldiers, after which returning triumphantly into Perſia, he, on ſome jealouſies or ſuſpicion, impriſoned his ſon Iſphendiyar in a ſtrong caſtle, ſeated on the top of a high mountain, called Ghird Kouch, i. e. the round mount; but he had ſoon reaſon to repent the ill uſage of ſo deſerving a prince; for Argjaſp, irritated by the uſage he had met with, raiſed all the forces of Touran, and making a ſudden inroad into the province of Choraſan, he ſacked the city of Balch, where he killed Lohraſp, the father of Guſhtaſp, in his cloyſter, ſlaughtered Zerduſht with all his prieſts attending there on the chief Fire-temple, which he likewiſe overturned, committing all the outrages, that a mind ſtung with the remembrance of what the Perſian king had done in his own country could ſuggeſt [w]. Elate with this conqueſt, he advanced ſo briſkly into the dominions of Iran, that Guſhtaſp did not think fit to meet him in battle, but choſe rather to conſider how an army might be drawn together able to fight that of Argjaſp on his return. His counſellors adviſed him to ſet his ſon Iſphendiyar at liberty, and to intruſt him with the management of the war. Neceſſity compelled him to take their advice, and he accordingly ſent his brother Gjamaſp to Iſphendiyar, not only to releaſe him, but alſo to aſſure him, that his father would reſign to him the throne, in caſe he proved victorious. As ſoon as Iſphendiyar arrived in the army, the Perſians took new courage, and numbers reſorted to his ſtandard, though they had declined following his father. The young prince failed not to make uſe of theſe advantages, and coming ſuddenly on Argjaſp, he defeated entirely all his numerous army, obliging him to retire out of Perſia, and make all the haſte he could into his own dominions. After this glorious victory Guſhtaſp received his ſon with all imaginable marks of kindneſs and eſteem; however, he declined putting him in poſſeſſion of the crown, and, in order to amuſe him, he obſerved; that it would be unbecoming unbecoming so brave a prince to put his father's crown upon his head, while his sisters, who were taken prisoners at the sack of Balch, remained still in captivity. Isphendiyar was piqued at this pretence of his father, which shewed that he did not think the prince had thoroughly humbled his enemies, and made that noble youth immediately determine to undertake a new expedition, that his father might have no excuse left for the non-performance of his promise. With this view he selected out of his army 12,000 foot and as many horse, with whom he advanced towards the frontiers of Touran, accompanied by his brother Bashuten, who was elder than himself. Having received intelligence, that Argjasp was retired to one of the strongest places of his dominions, to which there were three different roads, the one plain and easy fit for the caravans, but so round about, that it required no less than six months time to reach the place; the second pretty difficult, but so direct, that by it a man might reach the court of Touran in a month; the third which was hardly passable, lay through woods and morasses, and afterwards over high mountains covered with snow. Isphendiyar having directed his brother to advance as expeditiously as he could through the second of these roads, he with some resolute friends threw himself into the third. They were all habited like merchants, and carried with them jewels and other curiosities of great value. The instructions he gave his brother were these, that when he drew near the residence of Argjasp, he should post his army with all the silence imaginable in the neighbourhood of certain meadows which lay near the city, and that as soon as he should perceive a great number of fires lighted in those meadows, he should order his horse to advance, and execute the orders which should then be given them. Isphendiyar and his retinue, making the best of their way, reached in seven days the court of Touran. The prince being introduced to Argjasp as a merchant who fled from the severity of Isphendiyar, and was desirous of selling his goods in the dominions of Touran; the king received him and his companions with all imaginable courtesy, and accepted very kindly the magnificent present which the prince thought fit to make him. This lucky beginning was followed by a train of success answerable to Isphendiyar's wishes, for in a short time he wrought himself into the highest degree of confidence with the king and his principal courtiers. When there-therefore he was apprized, that his brother with his forces was arrived at the place appointed, he invited the king and court to a grand collation, in the meadows adjoining to the town. Thither they came in the evening, and great fires being lighted for dreſſing the proviſions, theſe ſerved as ſignals to Baſhuten, who at the head of his horſe ſuddenly charged the Turks, and made themſelves maſters of the city. Iſphendiyar, and thoſe who were about him, diſpatched without delay the moſt conſiderable of the nobility, the prince killing with his own hand Argjaſp king of Touran. Then putting his ſiſters, whom he had releaſed out of captivity, into the hands of his and their brother Baſhuten, he adviſed him to retire with part of his forces into Perſia while he with the reſt marched againſt ſeveral Indian princes, in order to force them and their ſubjects to abandon idolatry, and receive the religion of Zerduſht, in which expedition Iſphendiyar had prodigious ſucceſs, and returned afterwards into Perſia, crowned with laurels. When he arrived at Iſtachr, he expected, that his father would without delay perform the promiſe, he had ſo ſolemnly made and ſo often repeated, of reſigning to him his dominions; but the politic Guſhtaſp intended nothing leſs. He received his ſon as before with all the tokens of amity and tenderneſs; but inſtead of putting the crown upon his head, he entertained him with a ſtudied diſcourſe on his own great abilities and the laudable obedience he had hitherto paid to all his commands. After this the crafty old prince complained, that there was ſtill one enemy left to be ſubdued, even in the heart of his dominions, viz. Ruſtans, who, having fortified himſelf in the provinces committed to his charge, abſolutely refuſed to obey the king's commands, or receive the religion of Zerduſht. Guſhtaſp inſinuated, that it was neceſſary for Iſphendiyar to reduce this nobleman before he aſſumed the diadem, ſince otherwiſe he would receive from his father but half a kingdom. Piqued at this behaviour, the generous Iſphendiyar ſet out for Sigjiſtin, carrying with him his ſon Bahaman; on their arrival there Ruſtan met him and conferred with him at firſt with great civility and reſpect; but when the prince inſiſted on his yielding obedience to his father's commands, and profeſſing immediately the faith of Zerduſht, Ruſtan grew angry, and from hard words they quickly came to blows. As they were both men of great ſtrength and agility of body, as well as of high ſpirit and unconque-unconquerable valour, the combat was long and doubtful; at laſt it inclined to Iſphendiyar, but Ruſtan collecting all his force into one blow, gave the prince ſo deep a wound that he died upon the ſpot, having only time to recommend his ſon to Ruſtan, and to deſire his brother Baſhuten to take care of his body; both his requeſts were exactly complied with, Baſhuten carried back his body into Perſia, where it received the higheſt funeral honours, and Ruſtan carefully ſent home his ſon. Guſhtaſp was inconſolable for the death of ſo deſerving a prince. His grief, however, was forced to give way to the neceſſity of the ſtate, for the new king of Touran no ſooner heard what had happened in Perſia, than raiſing a great army he invaded that kingdom, and waſted it without mercy with fire and ſword. Guſhtaſp, having collected as great an army as the time would permit, marched with all poſſible diligence to oppoſe him, and, after having encountered and entirely routed his forces, conſtrained him to retire into his own dominions. The public peace being now reſtored, Guſhtaſp, to ſhew the reſpect he had for his ſon's memory reſigned the crown to Bahaman the ſon of Iſphendiyar, and, according to the example ſet him by his father, retired from the world to a magnificent pleaſure-houſe he had erected not far from Schiras, a palace of ſuch ſuperb architecture that in after-times, as Mirkhond tells us, it was attributed to Solomon, the ſon of David, to expreſs its excellence [x]. In all probability it ſtood in the neighbourhood of that mountain, which, lying behind the famous palace of Perſepolis, is held to be the ſepulchre of the antient Perſian kings. We have ſeen from various inſtances, that it was a common thing among the Perſian monarchs to quit their thrones, when they found their health and ſpirits decay, and to ſpend the laſt years of their life in contemplation. If we admit that Guſhtaſp was the Hyſtaſpes of the Greeks, then we may apply what Ammianus Marcellus ſays of the latter to this retreat. "Hyſtaſpes, ſays this hiſtorian, was a moſt wiſe perſon, who "boldly penetrating into the inner parts of upper India, "came to a woody deſart, whoſe calm ſilence was poſſeſſed by thoſe high wits the Brachmans; from theſe he "learned the true ſyſtem of the heavenly bodies and their "motions, and the pure rites of true religion, with which "knowledge he returned into Perſia, and taught it to the "magi, amongſt whom it has by tradition been preſerved

[w] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xvi. Lebtarik.

[x] Mirkhond. hiſt. xvi.

" even to this time " [y]. But perhaps, admitting Guſhtaſp and Hyſtaſpes to be one and the ſame perſon, we ought to refer this expedition to his junior years, when he fled from his father into Touran, from whence his journey into India was not difficult. There are ſome Perſian writers, however, who give a very different account of this matter, of which the reader will have a clearer apprehenſion, if he recollects what from an antient Perſian hiſtorian we cited, as to Zerduſht's promiſing king Guſhtaſp to fulfil his extraordinary requeſts. Theſe hiſtorians ſay, that not Guſhtaſp, but his ſon Baſhuten, addicted himſelf to divine meditations; and that this Baſhuten, in conformity to the prophet's promiſe, was tranſported to the mountain Dunbavand or Damavand, with thirty of his guards, where they yet live in the moſt quiet and happy manner, the approach of all living creatures to their ſacred retreat being prevented by thick ſteams of ſal-armoniac iſſuing from all ſides of the mountain [z]. Our famous traveller, Sir Thomas Herbert, aſcended this mountain, and paſſed directly over it without meeting any ſuch ſteams; he acknowledges, however, that there are vaſt quantities of ſulphur thereon, and that in the night ſome luminous vapours are ſeen thereabouts, which he thinks proceed from the ſulphur [a]; but the learned Dr. Hyde is for the old opinion, and is for attributing them rather to ſal-armoniac, but the doctor confeſſes, not only that the hiſtory of Baſhuten is fabulous, but that ſome ſtories of the ſame ſort related of Guſhtaſp are likewiſe unworthy of belief [b]. We may with tolerable certainty affirm, that the reign of Guſhtaſp was the reign of learning in Perſia. In his time flouriſhed a celebrated aſtrologer whoſe name was Gjamaſp, ſurnamed, according to the oriental cuſtom, Al Hakim, i. e. the wiſe or the ſage. That ſuch a perſon there was, and that he flouriſhed about this time, is pretty clear, but who he was is very far from being certain; ſome have made him the ſon of Daniel the prophet [c]; others the counſellor of king Guſhtaſp; but the greater number, and thoſe too of the moſt credible writers, ſay, that he was the brother of that prince, and not only ſo, but his confident and chief miniſter [d]. The ſcience for which

[y] Ammian. Marcel. hiſt. lib. xxiii. [z] Hyde, hiſt. rel. vet. Perſ. c. xxiii. p. 306. [a] Herbert's Travels. p. 112.
[b] Hyde, R. vet. P. ubi ſupra. [c] Chalil. Suph. ap. Hyde, R. vet P. p. 385. [d] Mirkhond. ubi ſupra. Leb. Tarikh.

which he was particularly famous was aſtrology, and from his ſkill therein he is ſaid to have predicted the coming of the Meſſiah. Some treatiſes under his name are yet current in the eaſt, of which the reader will meet with ſome account at the bottom of the page (R).

(R) Dr. Hyde, ſpeaking of the philoſopher mentioned in our text, cites a paſſage from a very antient author, having before told us, that this author aſſerted, there had been among the Perſians ten doctors of ſuch conſummate wiſdom, as the whole world could not boaſt the like; then he gives the author's words, to the ſenſe following: "Of theſe the ſixth was Gjamaſp, an "aſtrologer, who was counſellor to Hyſtaſpes. He is the au-"thor of a book entitled, Judicia Gjamaſpis, in which is con-"tained his judgment on the planetary conjunctions. And "therein he gave notice, that Jeſus ſhould appear, that Moham-"med ſhould be born, that the Magian religion ſhould be aboliſh-"ed &c. nor did any aſtrologer ever come up to him (35)". Of this book there is an Arabian verſion, the title of which runs thus: The book of the philoſopher Gjamaſp, containing judgments on the grand conjunctions of the planets, and on the events produced by them. This verſion was made by Laii, the title he gave it in Arabic was Al Keranat, and he publiſhed it A. D. 1280. In the preface of his verſion it is ſaid, that after the time of Zoroaſter or Zerduſht reigned Guſhtaſp the ſon of Lohraſp, a very powerful prince, who poſſeſſed not only Iran, but Touran and Habaſchia, i. e. Ethiopia, that in his reign flouriſhed, in the city of Balch on the borders of Choraſſan, a moſt excellent philoſopher, whoſe name was Gjamaſp, author of this book wherein is contained an account of all the great conjunctions of the planets, which had happened before the time of this aſtrologer, and which were to happen in ſucceeding ages, and wherein the appearances of new religions, and the riſe of new monarchies, were exactly ſet down. This author, throughout his whole piece, ſtiles Zerduſht, or Zoroaſter, our Prophet (36). That aſtrology, by which we mean foretelling future events, or pretending to foretel them, by contemplating the heavenly bodies, was a ſcience, if we may be allowed ſo to call it, very early in vogue among the Perſians, might be eaſily proved if this were a proper place. To ſay the truth, the very terms in uſe among aſtrologers are irrefragable proofs of it, for they are moſt of them either Arabic or Perſic; and for this reaſon Chaldea, the miſtreſs of our weſtern aſtrology, was in antient times always in the poſſeſſion either of the one or the other of theſe nations. The notion of predicting the riſe and progreſs of religions

(35) E. Lib. Mucj. p. 227. ap. Hyde. R. vet. P. cap. xxxi. p. 384. (86) D'Herbelot. Bibl. orient. Art. Giamaſb.

Bahaman. BAHAMAN, the ſon of Iſphendiyar, ſucceeded his grandfather Guſhtaſp in all the mighty empire he had acquired. Before we enter upon the reign of this prince, it is neceſſary that we ſhould ſettle his name. Mirkhond calls him as we do Bahaman, and ſays, that he had two ſurnames, the ligions from the grand conjunctions of the planets has been likewiſe propagated in our weſtren parts; Cardan was a bold aſſerter of this doctrine, and if he did not intend it himſelf, we are pretty certain that his ſcholar Vaninus actually thought of ſubverting the belief of the goſpel diſpenſation, by pretending that all religions owed their force and predominancy to the influence of the ſtars (37). The modern Perſians are ſtill great votaries to this ſort of knowledge, but they diſtinguiſh between aſtronomy and aſtrology, they ſtile the former Elm-nejoum, i. e. the ſcience of the ſtars, and the latter Eſte-Krag, i. e. the revelation of the ſtars; they have, however, but one word to expreſs aſtronomer and aſtrologer, viz. Manegjim, which is exactly equivalent to the Greek word Aſtrologos. Of all the provinces of Perſia, Choraſſan is the moſt famous for producing great men in that art, and in Choraſſan there is a little town called Genabed, and in that town a certain family, which for 6 or 700 years paſt has produced the moſt famous aſtrologers in Perſia; and the king's aſtrologer is always either a native of Genabed, or one brought up there. Sir John Chardin affirms, that the appointments in his time for theſe ſages amounted to ſix millions of French livres per Annum, which ſhews how highly theſe ſort of people are yet eſteemed in that country. As to the notions they have of the tranſcendent ſkill of the antient profeſſors of that art, the author juſt now mentioned gives us a ſingular inſtance in the hiſtory of Alkendi, a Jew, who was profeſſor of judicial aſtrology at Bagdad in the caliphat of Almamoum. Againſt this Jewiſh aſtrologer all the Mohammedans had a very great ſpleen; one more hardy than the reſt reſolved to attack his reputation, and to endeavour to diſpoſſeſs him of the caliph's eſteem; to this end he repaired to Bagdad, and finding Alkendi in the caliph's preſence, he aſked him why he took upon himſelf to know more in aſtrology than other people? Becauſe I know, replied Alkendi, what you know not, and you know not what I know. This provoked the Mohammedan doctor ſo much, that he would needs make a trial of his boaſted knowledge in the ſight of the caliph. In order to this each drew a circle about himſelf, and ſat down therein with his books and inſtruments. The Mohammedan doctor at laſt took a piece of paper and a pen, and after ſeeming to write a good deal, folded it up, and gave it the caliph, deſiring Alkendi to give the one Dirazdeſt, i. e. long-hand, becauſe his right hand was longer than his left, and the other Ardſhir on this account; when his mother was big with this ſon, there came a great aſtrologer to the court of Guſhtaſp his grandfather, and addreſſing himſelf to Iſphendiyar, preſented him a ſmall baſket, which he told him was for the uſe of the ſon that ſhould be born to him, upon opening it there was

(37) In Amphitheatr. & Dialog.

give a proof of his ſkill, by telling what was written in this paper; to which the other after a little time anſwered, You have wrote but two words in your paper, one is the name of a plant, the other of an animal. The caliph opening the paper found this to be true. And this adventure ſpread the fame of Alkendi throughout all the eaſt. It happened there was then reſident in the college at Balch a young ſtudient of bright parts, who had been ſcholar to the Mohammedan ſage, over whom Alkendi had triumphed: He was ſo much piqued at the diſhonour done his maſter, that as ſoon as he heard this ſtory he bought himſelf a poignard, and took a journey of twelve hundred Engliſh miles from Balch to Bagdad on purpoſe to murder Alkendi. When he arrived at this laſt-mentioned city, he enquired the time when Alkendi taught in the public ſchools, which when he had learned, he went thither with his poignard under his gown, as if he had been a ſtudent come to hear him. Alkendi was in the midſt of his lecture when he entered the room, but he immediately made a full ſtop, and turning his eyes on this ſtranger, addreſſed him thus; I know who you are, and to what purpoſe you come. Your name is Albumazar (the true orthography is Abu Ma Shar) and you will become one of the greateſt aſtrologers of your time; but then you muſt lay aſide the bloody deſign which brought you hither, and you muſt throw into the midſt of the ſchool that poignard which you carried on purpoſe to kill me. Albumazar, ſtruck at this ſpeech, firſt threw down his poignard, and then himſelf at the feet of Alkendi, thenceforward he applied himſelf ſtrictly to the ſtudy of Aſtrology, and became, as that ſage had predicted, wonderfully famous, being known to the learned world by the name of Albumazar of Balch (38). The reader may perhaps think this a long and unneceſſary digreſſion; but we had our reaſons for inſerting it. We were ſpeaking of Gjamaſp's predicting the coming of Chriſt. A very learned countryman of our own has reported the ſame thing from Albumazar, his words are theſe: "In the ſphere of Perſia, ſaith Aben-Ezra, there "ariſeth upon the face of the ſign Virgo a beautiful maiden, "ſhe holding two ears of corn in her hand, and a child in her "arms, ſhe feedeth him, and giveth him ſuck, &c. This maiden, found a veſſel full of milk and a little flour, the perſon who brought it alledging by way of excuſe, that his circumſtances did not allow him to bring any thing better. Iſphendiyar and his ſpouſe were ſo much ſatisfied with the preſent, that they took from thence the name of their ſon, Ard ſignifying Flour, and Shir Milk, in their antient language; hence it came to paſs, that this prince was better known by his ſurnames than by his proper name, being generally called in the oriental hiſtories Ardſhir Dirazdeſt, and by the Greeks Artaxerxes Longimanus. He is repreſented by Mirkhond as one of the wiſeſt and beſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſcepter; he was ſo ſollicitous for the impartial diſtribution of juſtice to all his ſubjects, that he ſent ſome favourites of his own privately into the courts of all his governors, that they might bring him exact informations of their behaviour; and when the time of their governments was expired, he ſent for them into his preſence, and either rewarded and commended their virtues, or elſe puniſhed what they had done amiſs according to the nature of the offence. In a year after his acceſſion to the throne, he ſummoned the ſtates of his kingdom, whom he addreſſed in terms full of tenderneſs and love, he told them, that he had aſſumed the regal dignity, not to gratify his own ambition, but to do good to them; he therefore intreated them, if they knew any wrong ſteps he had taken, or any vices that he had, which were detrimental to the public, that they would freely cenſure and reprove them; nay,

(38) Chardin. Voyag. tom. iii. p. 203.

" den, ſaith Albumazar, we call Adrenedeſa, the pure virgin. " She bringeth up a child in a place which is called Abrie (the " Hebrew land) and the child's name is called Eiſi (Jeſus). " This was enough to make Albertus Magnus believe, that " our Saviour Chriſt was born in Virgo, and therefore cardinal " Alliac erecting our Lord's nativity by his deſcription, caſteth " this ſign into the horoſcope. But that was not the meaning " of Albumazar, His meaning was (ſaith fryar Bacon) Quod " beata Virgo nata fuit, quando ſol fuit in Virgine, & ita habetur ſignatum in Calendario, & quod nutriet filium ſuum in " terra Hebræorum. That the ſaid virgin was born, the ſun " being in that ſign, as alſo we have it ſet down in the calendar, " and that ſhe was to bring up her ſon in the Hebrew land (39)". The reader is to obſerve, that Albumazar wrote expreſly from the antient Perſic aſtrologers, it may be from the very works of Gjamaſp which induced this note.

(39) Mr. John Gregory's notes on various paſſages of ſcripture, p. 152.

nay, if they held him utterly unworthy of the empire, he exhorted them to depoſe him, for he ſaid, that kings ought to be public bleſſings, and that ſuch as were not ſo ought not to wear the title. The ſtates, after highly commending the king's zeal, and receiving from him whatever they deſired, ſeparated, and going into their reſpective provinces, carried with them the higheſt ſentiments of duty and reſpect for ſo deſerving a prince. Ardſhir or Bahaman took care to repair all the cities, fire-temples, and public edifices, which, during the wars in Iran, had either been beaten down, or through the injuries of time had fallen to decay; this being done, and his empire every-where in a flouriſhing condition, he thought it a proper time to revenge the death of his father, and to reunite the provinces of Sigjiſtan and Kabul to his eſtates; and to this end he raiſed a conſiderable army, and marched into the territories of Ruſtan, whither he was no ſooner come, than he was informed, that this great warrior was dead, but that his ſon Feramorz had taken poſſeſſion of his government, and was marching to oppoſe him with a great army. The king of Perſia, being deſirous that the war ſhould have a ſpeedy determination, did not decline a battle, in which he had all the ſucceſs he could deſire, the enemy being entirely defeated, and Feramorz killed upon the ſpot. He took likewiſe Zal-zer, the father of Ruſtan, priſoner, and returned triumphantly into Perſia, after obliging the inhabitants of thoſe provinces to acknowledge him for their lawful Lord. Mirkhond gives us a very extraordinary account of the death of Ruſtan, which happened a little before this war commenced, he had, according to this hiſtorian, a brother whoſe name was Chajal, whom he ſent to collect his revenues in Kabul, where it ſo happened, that Chajal fell deſperately in love with the governor's daughter, who was a woman of moſt accompliſhed beauty and of the rareſt qualifications; the governor, obſerving how much the young man was ſmitten, gave him all the interruption poſſible in his amour, until he promiſed to do for him whatever he deſired, provided he might have his daughter; Chajal having promiſed this, the governor propoſed to him the putting of his brother into his hands, that he might ſecure to himſelf the abſolute poſſeſſion of his own territories by putting him to death, to which Chajal, for the ſake of his miſtreſs, aſſented. On his return home, diſcourſing with his brother, he informed him, that the governor of Kabul, whom he

truſted

truſted ſo much, was indeed a very tyrant, and grievouſly oppreſſed the people under his juriſdiction. Ruſtan, highly inflamed at this, threatened to put that governor to death, and to extirpate his family, to which end he aſſembled his forces; but his brother, laying hold of the predominant quality of vanity, which was always prevalent in Ruſtan's temper, perſuaded him, that his preſence alone was ſufficient to fright the governor of Kabul into ſubmiſſion, whereupon he ſet out, attended only by a friend and this treacherous brother. As ſoon as they arrived in the neighbourhood of Kabul, the governor with a very few of his attendants came and made his ſubmiſſion, and having moſt humbly beſought Ruſtan's pardon, which Ruſtan having given him, the governor entreated him to reſt that night at his houſe, which was but a ſmall diſtance from them; when they came near its gates, Chajal rode on his brother's right, and the governor on his left, when on a ſudden the ground gave way, and Ruſtan and his horſe fell into a deep pit, which had been prepared for him, and ſo artfully covered with earth and leaves, that he did not perceive it. Ruſtan, being apprized of their treachery, intreated one of the governor's attendants to give him a bow and arrows, that he might not be devoured alive by wild beaſts; the man touched with his misfortunes, put them immediately into his hands, whereupon Ruſtan drawing the bow with all his ſtrength, let fly too arrows with ſuch dexterity, that he ſtruck the treacherous governor and his perfidious brother each to his heart, dying a little after himſelf of the wounds he received on his fall. Such, if we yield an implicit belief to the Perſian hiſtorians, was the end of this mighty warrior, the glory and ſupport of his country and of its kings; but we ſhall ſhew in the note below, that this ſtory of the life and adventures of Ruſtan muſt not be underſtood exactly as they have related it (S). After

(S) The title of this ſection is the hiſtory of Perſia, according to the oriental writers. It is therefore our duty to report whatever we find in authentic hiſtorians; but it does not follow, that we muſt either believe ourſelves, or obtrude on our readers, all things contained in them for matters of fact. We are as ſenſible as the moſt inveterate critics can be, that there is much of fable perhaps in the beſt Perſian hiſtorians, and it is not impoſſible, that we may ſometimes miſtake their meaning. For example, we know that Apheraſiab, king of Touran, muſt have lived ſeveral hundred years, if what we have ſet down in our ter the reduction of the provinces formerly held by the hero we have juſt now mentioned, Bahaman or Ardſhir, extended his empire on all ſides; ſome hiſtorians ſay, that Kireſh, i. e. Cyrus, was his governor in Babylon; but this is a palpaple miſtake grounded on a real fact, viz. the great kindneſs which this prince expreſſed for the Jews; ſome have reported, that his mother was of that nation; however our hiſtory be true, or elſe for a long ſeries of years the princes of that country were ſtiled Apherafiab, as the kings of Egypt were called Pharoah, and the kings of the Philiſtines were intituled Abimelech. But then the ſame difficulty recurs as to Ruſtan. His father Zal-zer lived to be carried away priſoner by Bahaman, of whoſe reign we are now ſpeaking, he muſt then have been near ſeven hundred years old, and Ruſtan who was lately dead, muſt have been greatly upwards of ſix hundred, theſe are incredible things, and therefore we muſt ſuppoſe, that, notwithſtanding the Perſian Hiſtorians ſpeak all as of one man, there was a ſucceſſion of heroes in that family, who were hereditary governors of the province of Sigjiſtan, and called from their famous anceſtor Ruſtan. Something of this ſort we meet with in Scripture, where not only two kings of Gerar are called Abimelech, but both the captains of their hoſts are ſtiled Phicol (40). What renders our conjecture ſtill the more probable is, that the provinces governed by this family took their name, which is more likely to have happened after a ſucceſſion of governors, than in the time of one man. We mention this merely to prevent a ſuſpicion, that we ſwallow without conſideration all that oriental writers have delivered. When we ſhall have cloſed our hiſtory of the Perſian kings, natives of that country, we ſhall, as we have promiſed, give a large account of the chronology of theſe times, and make it as intelligible as we can. In the mean time, let us add a few circumſtances, which we have not had occaſion to inſert in the text, as to the family of which we we were juſt now ſpeaking. The author of the Guliſtan tells us, that Zal-zer gave his ſon Ruſtan this caution. Never deſpiſe an enemy, however impotent he may ſeem at preſent, for a ſtream which will ſcarce bear a ſtraw at its ſource, grows in its courſe ſtrong enough to carry away a camel and its burden (41). We have frequently taken notice of the mighty encomiums beſtowed by the oriental romance-writers on our hero Ruſtan. Of all his exploits none, however, furniſhes them with ſo much room to expatiate on, as his two days combat with Iſphendiyar. Theſe ſtories were ſo pleaſant in themſelves, ſo agreeably embelliſhed by thoſe who took them for their theme, that it was, we may be assured, that he had a very great regard for the chosen people, and did them great kindnesses. This prince had a son whose name was Sassan a man much addicted to learning, and especially to astrology, whence it came to pass, that either through his own modesty he pretended not to the empire, or was precluded therefrom by his father on account of his studious life, which that active prince thought incompatible with the duties of a sovereign; however it was, historians are agreed that he did not that they gave no small interruption to Mohammed in his settling his new religion. It seems there was one Nesser who had been in Persia about his concerns as a merchant, and there picked up the relation of Rustan's combats with Isphendiyar, he vehemently opposed Mohammed, and laughed at his pretended mission, and the better to carry his point, he diverted the people with these stories, which had such an effect, that when Mohammed brought them a new chapter of the Koran, they would frequently cry out, This is an old story; there is no great matter in this; it is not half so pleasant, as the stories of Nesser, which provoked the pretended prophet very much, and put him upon cursing this Nesser violently as an enemy to God and the true religion (42). It is to these stories of Nesser's, and to the behaviour of the people thereupon, that Mohammed alludes in the following passage of his koran: "There is with God great "reward for the righteous. O ye that believe, if ye fear "God, he shall remove your enemies far from you, and pardon "your sins, his goodness is infinite. The wicked have conspi- "red against thee to punish and slay thee, or drive thee from "Mecca; but God hath rendered their conspiracy ineffectual, "he knoweth all the designs of conspirators. When his mi- "racles were related to them, and his commandments taught "them, they said we have heard them; we had said the "like things, had we so inclined; it is but a song and a fable "of old men: Remember thou how they said, My God, if "what Mahomet declareth be true, cause a shower of flint "stones to fall upon us, and rigorously chastise us; he shall "not chastise them when thou art with them, neither when "they beg pardon of him; who is he that is able to hinder "God to punish them? they are not in his grace when they "hinder true believers to enter the temple of Mecca, he pro- "tecteth only such as have his fear before his eyes, but most of "them understand it not. Their prayers are very light, they "go hand in hand in the temple, but shall one day feel the "punishment of God because of their iniquity (43)".

(40) Geneſ. xxi. 22. xxvi. 26. (41) D'Herbelot. Bibli. orient. Art. Zal.

(42) Ibid. Art. Alcoran. (43) Coran. cap. Alsan. i. e. Of the booty.

not ſucceed, nor did pretend to the ſucceſſion, on the demiſe of his father, but led contentedly a private life, though his deſcendants afterwards recovered the kingdom, as will be ſhewn in the next period of our Perſian hiſtory from oriental hiſtorians. After a long and glorious reign, wherein he ſo far extended his dominions, that ſome will have his ſurname of Dirazdeſt derived from thence, Bahaman or Ardſhir died, and left his empire to his wife Homai, whom ſome writers alſo affirm to have been his daughter, and who at the time of his deceaſe was big with child. The favourite ſaying of this prince was, That the gate of a king ought never to be ſhut [c].

HOMAI or Khamani, about five months after her acceſſion to the throne, brought forth a ſon of wonderful beauty. According to the cuſtom of thoſe times, the aſtrologers were conſulted as to the fortune of this young prince. They, it ſeems, were unanimouſly of opinion, that his fate would by no means correſpond with his face, but on the contrary he would bring great misfortunes on his country as well as himſelf, for which reaſon they adviſed that he ſhould be immediately deſtroyed. The tenderneſs of a mother would not permit Homai to follow their counſels, and yet her love for her country extended ſo far, that ſhe determined at any rate to prevent his bringing on it thoſe miſchiefs the aſtrologers had threatened. With this view ſhe cauſed a little wooden ark or cheſt to be made, and having put the child in it, covered him with precious ſtones, and then ſuffered the veſſel to ſail down the Gihon or Oxus. The floating cradle came at laſt within the view of a poor man waſhing linen, who was by trade a dyer. He ſtruck with the novelty of beholding a cheſt on the water, took pains to draw it on ſhore, and was mightily ſurprized on finding therein a child with things of ſuch value, not doubting but it was the deſcendant of ſome great family. He carried it with the precious ſtones which were in the cradle with it to his wife; who concurring with him in opinion that it was the ſon of ſome perſon of diſtinction, bred it up with as much tenderneſs and care as if it had been her own; the dyer giving him the name of Darab, from the vehicle in which and the element wherein he was found, Dar ſignifying a wooden veſſel, and Ab water. When this child was grown up up to ſuch an age as required its learning ſome trade, the dyer would willingly have taught him his own; but the boy ſhewed a viſible reluctancy thereto, and appeared to have a ſtrong genius for war. The good old man who had brought him up, far from checking his inclinations, ſtrained his abilities to the utmoſt to furniſh the young Darab with an equipage neceſſary to his ſerving in the army, then raiſed for the reduction of Roumeſtan, into which the young hero readily went. This war was of no very long continuance, but Darab performed therein ſuch extraordinary feats of arms, that they rung through the whole army; wherein, though the flower of the Perſian nobility had ſerved, yet none had attained to ſo high a reputation as this unknown youth. At their return therefore from the war, the commander in chief reported ſuch favourable things of him to the queen his miſtreſs, that ſhe would needs ſee him. Darab upon this was introduced into the royal preſence, where, after ſome diſcourſe about the war and the great things he had done therein, the queen demanded of him what was his name, and who were his father and mother. He anſwered as to the firſt, that his name was Darab, but that as to his parents he was able to ſay nothing; that the perſons he lived with, and whom he acknowledged for his father and mother, were a dyer and his wife; that the man had taken him out of the water, where he floated in a little cheſt, and that from thence they had given him the name of Darab. The queen, having conſidered and inquired into this ſtory, owned him for her ſon, and declared him her ſucceſſor with the general approbation of her people [f]. This princeſs, all the oriental writers who ſpeak of her agree, had a prodigious capacity, and was wonderfully careful in ordering all things for the good of her people. Above all things ſhe ſtudied the adorning of the glorious capital of her dominions Iſtachr; to this end ſhe erected a noble palace therein, the ruins of which are glorious even to this day, and are the ſame which the Perſians call Chilminar, and in the palace of Perſepolis. We will not take upon us to affirm, that theſe authors are in the right, but we may ſafely ſay, that, in all human probability, this palace was built about this time; and the reaſon which the eaſtern writers aſſign for queen Homai's chuſing to erect it here is neither abſurd nor incredible; they alledge, that Guſhtaſp having erected ſeveral veral Pyræa or Fire-temples, and cut for himſelf and for his ſucceſſors, ſuperb tombs in the rock which lies behind this palace, Homai was tempted to build a royal houſe in their neighbourhood, that all theſe marks of Perſian magnificence might appear together, and ſet off each other; to her alſo are attributed ſeveral other monuments of a royal mind and a deep deſire of fame, ſuch as a multitude of pyramids, ſmaller but not unlike thoſe in Egypt, ſcattered throughout all Perſia, and every where overturned by the ſoldiers of Alexander the Great. This princeſs is likewiſe ſaid to have built a city called Semrim or Semirah, whence a famous Perſian author hath been led to think, that the Homai of the Perſians was the Semiramis of the Greeks; but in this perhaps there is more of criticiſm than ſolidity [g]. The author of another Perſian chronicle is ſo far from thinking her either the Semiramis of the Greeks, or ſo famous a queen of Perſia, as other authors make her, that he has totally omitted her name in his hiſtory of the Perſian monarchs of the dynaſty of Caianides [h]. Mirkhond, however, aſſures us, that ſhe reigned thirty-two years, and then reſigned the crown to her ſon Darab [i] (T).

[c] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xvii. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Bahaman.

[f] Mirkhond. Hiſt. ſect. xviii. D'Herbelot. Artic. Homai.

DARAB,

[g] Tarik. Montekebh. [h] Tarikcozideh. [i] Mirkhond. ubi. ſupra.

(T) The oriental hiſtories mention various queens who flouriſhed and did great things in their reſpective countries, and yet are little known to us in the weſt. If we conſider what the Perſian hiſtorians ſay of her building the glorious palace at Iſtachr, we ſhall find it not ſo improbable as at firſt ſight it may ſeem. We have ſhewn before from authorities of all kinds, that in the reign of Guſhtaſp arts and ſciences flouriſhed exceedingly in Perſia; his grandſon and ſucceſſor Bahaman muſt have carried them ſtill higher, for he was very ſucceſsful in all his wars, and after he had finiſhed them applied himſelf to the adorning of his country with ſtately buildings, as Mirkhond expreſly informs us. That his widow therefore, who was alſo a potent and ſucceſsful prince, ſhould endeavour to eſtabliſh her fame by erecting ſo magnificent a pile, has nothing in it unlikely or incredible; ſhe might adorn this new-raiſed palace of hers with the ſpoils brought by her immediate predeceſſors out of Egypt and Syria; and as to the grand proceſſion which yet appears on the walls of that palace, if one might be indulged to conjecture, why may it not be ſuppoſed to repreſent the homage paid to Bahaman or Ardſhir by the ſtates of Perſia, when he aſſembled

Darab. DARAB, as we have already heard, was educated by a poor dyer, or fuller, who took of him all the care that could be expected from a man in his low condition. It is reported by a Perſian writer, that the young Darab, being one day at the water-ſide with his ſuppoſed father, addreſsed himſelf thus to the dyer: "I ſhould be very glad if "you would tell me the truth as to my birth, for I begin "to imagine, from the averſion I have to this buſineſs and "from my contempt of all manual labour, that I am not "really your ſon, as you have hitherto made me believe". "Whoever, ſaid the dyer, beheld a ruby and ſuppoſed it "dropt from a common ſtone, might conceive, that a "youth of your ſhining parts was what till this time you "have paſſed for, the ſon of a fuller". "Whatever my "parts may be, returned Darab, I ſhould be much pleaſed "to hear, without either allegories or metaphors, who "I am to ſuppoſe myſelf, and whether that ſpirit of am"bition which I feel in my breaſt ought to be checked or "cheriſhed; upon this the honeſt old man related to him "all he knew, which as ſoon as Darab heard, he demand"ed the jewels, and having received them went directly "to the army, and applying himſelf to the commander in "chief, told him all that his reputed father had related". The general was at that very time about to give battle to the aſſembled them in the firſt year of his reign, and ſubmitted his conduct, and even his qualifications for the royal dignity, to their cenſure. That he did this, Mirkhond affirms, and that they were profuſe in their expreſſions of gratitude and loyalty on that occaſion. What more noble tranſaction could this princeſs chuſe, than this recognition of her huſband's right to his crown, from virtue as well as deſcent, by a generous and wiſe people. But let this proceſſion be what it will, it may as well be placed here as any where elſe, and till the learned by dint of their enquiries and criticiſms can furniſh us with a better account, we may as well accept of this from the Perſian hiſtorians. As to the modern Perſians, they, as we have here before obſerved, ſpeak very tenderly on this head; and if we bar their tales of king Solomon and the fairies, have nothing to offer againſt queen Homai's being the founder of that ſtupendious fabric, the ruins of which are now called Chilminar, i. e. forty pillars, though if we may truſt Dr. Hyde, its old Perſic name was Hazar ſutun, i. e. a thouſand columns (44).

(44) H. R. Vet. P. cap. xxiii. p. 440.

the Greeks, he therefore gave no anſwer to Darab, but adviſed him to keep his own counſel, and to ſerve the queen valiantly in the approaching engagement. Which inſtructions of his he exactly purſued, and behaved with ſuch prudence and vivacity in the battle, that the general gave eaſy credit to what he had told him, and, on his return from the war, preſented him to the queen, and gave it as his opinion that he was her ſon. Which of theſe ſtories is true, or which comes neareſt the truth, we pretend not to determine. All hiſtorians agree, that he aſcended the throne as the ſon of Bahaman or Ardſhir and that he gave the higheſt proofs of his royal deſcent by his wiſe and gentle adminiſtration. His valour had been ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed before he aſcended the throne, he ſuffered it not to ruſt after he aſſumed the royal dignity; at the ſame time he loved juſtice, and took care to have it exactly adminiſtered throughout all his wide dominions; he was likewiſe a munificent patron of arts and ſciences, eaſy of addreſs, eloquent in ſpeech, and one of the moſt humane princes that ever ſwayed a ſceptre. On ſome account or other he found it neceſſary to turn his arms on Filikous, that is Philip, king of Macedon; at firſt by his captains, and at laſt in perſon with ſuch ſucceſs, that Philip, being driven to extremities, was obliged to accept ſuch terms as Darab thought fit to impoſe; and they were theſe; that the king of Macedon ſhould pay yearly the ſum of forty-thouſand pieces of gold by way of tribute, and ſhould give his daughter, one of the handſomeſt princeſſes in Greece, to Darab for wife, which was accordingly done. The very firſt night that Darab paſſed with his new ſpouſe, he found her breath ſo offenſive, that he reſolved to ſend her back to her father, notwithſtanding that, as ſome writers ſay, ſhe was with child. After the Macedonian war was over, Darab applied himſelf wholly to the arts of peace, and to ſettling ſuch things as were ſtill in diſorder, and inventing new methods for giving eaſe and ſatisfaction to his ſubjects. Amongſt other wiſe and glorious acts of this good prince, the ſettling of poſts throughout all Perſia is particularly recorded, which he executed with ſuch ſkill, that he had news brought him from every corner of his empire, by couriers ſetting out regularly twice a day. He was the founder of a pleaſant and beautiful city in proper Perſia, on which he beſtowed his name, calling it Darabgerd, i. e. Mount-Darab, in the middle of which roſe a hill in ſhape of a tent or a pavilion, and without its walls lay a circle of hills, producing salt of various colours, transported from thence into all the provinces of Persia; he likewise erected another city called Khourch, and after a reign of four years, according to Mirkhond [k], of fourteen, says another writer [l], and of twelve, says a third [m], he died universally lamented, and left the crown to his son (V).

Darab. II. DARAB the second, or the younger, surnamed Darab Kuchek, came very young to the crown, and what was much worse, came to it without any of the qualities of a prince; he was of an ill disposition, haughty, brutal, false, and cruel, properties which rendered him in a short time hateful to his people, and obnoxious to his neighbours. The Persians, unused to such treatment, entered into private negociations with Ascander, the son of Filikous, that is Alexander the Great, the son of Philip, whom many of the Persian writers believe to have been the son of Darab the first by the daughter of Filikous, whom he sent

[k] Hist. sect. xix. [l] Tarikh Montekebh. [m] Lebtarikh.

(V) It is certainly no bad caution to an historian, that in his writings he should forget his country, or rather, that he should lay aside that partiality which a man naturally has for his country; the Persian historians, as we have said in our text, represent Darab moralizing in his last moments, and reading a lecture on the vicissitudes of this world with his expiring breath closing all with passionate intreaties, that Alexander would use his subjects kindly, and take his daughter Rouschengh to wife. Who can avoid admiring a prince, so truly a prince, even in the sight of death? The Greek writers on the other hand make Darius moralize too, but then it is in favour of their hero; he was so struck with the virtues of the Macedonian, that he yielded to him his sceptre rather with admiration than disgust. Let us hear what Plutarch puts into the mouth of Darius on this subject, and we shall be constrained to own, that the desire of making all facts contribute as far as possible to the glory of one's country is not peculiar to Persian writers. Plutarch, having long expatiated on the virtues of Alexander, tells us, that Darius was a long time of opinion that he owed his successes to fortune; but when he understood the truth, he said, "Well, "I do not yet perceive the condition of the Persians so deplo- "rable, since the world can never tax us now with imbecillity or "effeminacy, whose fate it was to be vanquished by such a per- "son. Therefore my prayers shall be to the gods for his pro- "sperity, and that he may still be victorious in war to the end "that in well doing I may surpass Alexander. For my emulaſent back becauſe of her ſtinking breath, and perſuaded him to enter Perſia with an army, promiſing him to join with him as ſoon as he arrived with a force ſufficient to protect them, and to put him in poſſeſſion of an empire, of which they held Darab to be unworthy. As a pretence for making war, they adviſed Aſcander to refuſe payment of the tribute which his father had agreed to ſend annually into Perſia; and with theſe negotiations the king of Macedon readily fell in. Darab, finding that Aſcander did not ſend his tribute as uſual, ſent an embaſſador to demand it; to whom Aſcander anſwered, that thoſe who paid tribute in his country were dead; but others ſay, that the pieces of gold in which the tribute was payable, being called by a name which ſignified at once a piece of corn and an egg, Aſcander anſwered Darab's embaſſador in deriſion, when he demanded a mighty ſum of gold for the tribute in arrear, that the bird which had laid thoſe eggs was flown into another world, alluding to his father's death, who had burthened his ſubjects with this tribute. This anſwer terribly provoked Darab, who, to ſhew at once his reſentment and contempt of ſo weak an enemy, ſent a ſecond

"tion

" tion and ambition lead me in point of honour to ſhew myſelf " more cordial and friendly than he. If then the father have
" otherwiſe determined of me and mine, O Jupiter, preſerver
" of the Perſians, and you his equal deities, to whom the care of " kings belong, hear your ſuppliant, and ſuffer none but Alex" ander to ſit upon the throne of Cyrus (45)". One may ſafely ſay, that here is a juſt ground to ſuſpect this paſſage of forgery as any of the romantic ſtories in the Perſian authors. Darius worſhipped no God but the true God; he was utterly unacquainted with the Jupiter of the Greeks; and it does not appear, that even after Alexander conquered Perſia, he eſtabliſhed the ſuperſtitions of the Greeks there. That Darius might recommend his kingdom or his daughter to Alexander, or that he might intreat him to uſe his ſubjects well, is credible; but that Darius fell in love with the virtues of an enemy, who came unprovoked to lay waſte his empire, is a ſtroke of Greek eloquence which may pleaſe us well enough in an oration, but can hardly be digeſted for hiſtory. We muſt therefore bear with the Perſians as well as the Greeks, ſeek truth in the writings of one as well as the other, receive her kindly as oft as we find her, aud not charge one people more than another with concealing or diſguiſing her to ſerve a turn.

(45) Plutarch. de Fortuna Alexand.

ambaſſador with a harſh meſſage, accompanied with a preſent, more expreſſive of his maſter's ſentiments than any ſpeech or letter could have been; this preſent was a little caſguet, containing a dibble, or planting ſtick, a bag full of ſmall ſtones, and another full of ſmall coin; the firſt to intimate that he was young and inconſiderate, and that he had better employ himſelf in his gardens than in matters of ſtate; the ſecond ſhewing the power and ſtrength of the Perſian nation; and the third their riches; the whole implying, that it was a raſh imprudent thing for ſuch a petty prince as he to oppoſe ſo great and powerful a monarch. However, this ambaſſador with his preſent found Aſcander on the point of going into the field, and had therefore no opportunity of carrying back to his maſter any anſwer. The troops of the king of Macedon were not very numerous, but they were all choſen men, ſuch as were valiant in their perſons, and at the ſame time enured to hardſhips. On his entering Aſia he met with little oppoſition, partly through the hatred which the people had conceived againſt Darab, and partly from the generoſity of Aſcander's behaviour, who treated them not as enemies, but ſubjects. When he arrived in Armenia, he received a letter from Darab, wherein that monarch pretended great concern for his welfare, adviſed him not to hazard a battle, but rather to conſent to a peace while it was yet in his power, adding ſome menaces at the cloſe. Aſcander returned him for anſwer, that empires were beſtowed by God alone, who changed them as he thought proper. After this he continued his march till he entered the province of Aderbayagjan, where he defeated one of Darab's captains, who endeavoured to oppoſe his paſſage, and having done this, he advanced into Ghilan; this province, according to Mirkhond, was in old times a flouriſhing kingdom, called by its inhabitants Endſafet, i. e. the White Indies, in alluſion to the beauty of the country, which is far preferable to that of the Indies properly ſo called; its ſituation alſo being remarkably happy by reaſon of the Caſpian ſea on one ſide, and an eaſy correſpondence with Tartary, Perſia, and Armenia, lying round them. This country Aſcander quickly ſubdued: from thence he marched into the heart of Perſia, where, in the province properly called by that name, Darab met him with a prodigious army; after an obſtinate and bloody battle,

Aſcander

Aſcander carried the victory, and Darab was forced to fly, leaving his camp, his wives, and his daughters in the power of the victor. In their flight the Perſians met with a river, wherein many entering heedleſly were drowned; at laſt a ford was diſcovered, through which Darab, attended by the principal perſons in his army, paſſed; but of the ſoldiers, who followed him, crowding one another, the weakeſt were thrown down, and periſhed miſerably in the water. As ſoon as the king was come to a place of ſafety, he ſent once more ambaſſadors to Aſcander to treat of peace, offering in caſe he would ſend back his wives and daughters, and retire with his troops back to Greece, he would renounce all right of tribute, and make ſome other conceſſions; at the ſame time, that he entered into this treaty, he diſpatched ambaſſadors alſo to the kings of India and Macherek, intreating them to yield him aſſiſtance, that they might be able to drive the Greek out of his dominions; which they furniſhed with ſuch readineſs, that in a ſhort time he had an army on foot more numerous and potent than that which he had loſt. As for Aſcander, he treated the offers made him by Darab with deriſion, making all the haſte he could to engage the Perſian forces a ſecond time, notwithſtanding he was well informed of the great reinforcements they had received. It was not long before he brought him to a battle, in which the Greek gained another complete victory, Darab flying with a few of his captains to a ſtrong fortreſs, where, before he could well recollect himſelf, ſome of his own ſubjects moſt treacherouſly put him to death; that is, they gave him ſeveral mortal wounds with their poignards, and then fled to the camp of Aſcander, leaving their unhappy prince weltering in his blood. Aſcander no ſooner received the news, than he went with the utmoſt expedition to Darab's fortreſs, and found him in his laſt agonies, which ſight ſo touched the Greek, that, melting into tears and holding up his hands o heaven, he proteſted, he had neither knowledge of, nor pleaſure in, ſo execrable a deed. The dying king expreſſed great ſatisfaction thereat, aſſured him, that he thoroughly believed all he ſaid, beſought him to chaſtiſe the traitors by whoſe hands he died, and intreated him to eſpouſe his daughter Rouſchengh, and not to put the ſeveral provinces of the empire under the direction of ſtrangers, with all which Aſcander promiſed to comply. Then Darab, after making many pitiful complaints of the miſery of human life and the inconſtancy of fortune, all of which are repeated by Mirkhond, yielded up the ghoſt after a reign of fourteen years. Thus far we have followed for the moſt part the author laſt mentioned. An author mentioned at the bottom of the page informs us, that in compliance with Darab's laſt requeſt, Aſcander or Alexander appointed for the governors of Perſia natives of that country; but that afterwards he had it in his head to have changed this diſpoſition, and to have appointed Greeks in their room; but that Ariſtotle, whom this writer calls his viſier, adviſed him to leave things as they ſtood, and not to remove any of the Perſian lords, to whom he had given the direction of provinces [n]. It is very certain, that this circumſtance is not, ſtrictly ſpeaking, agreeable to truth: Ariſtotle neither accompanied Alexander in his expedition, nor took upon him to dictate to him in matters of ſtate, except in general terms; otherwiſe it is not at all improbable, that he would have given him the advice mentioned by this author, ſince it would evidently have contributed to the keeping of the people quiet and eaſy; and would alſo have been very conformable to the temper of Alexander, who, when in a right frame of mind, always profeſſed a generous regard for mankind in general, and a deſire of behaving as an univerſal parent towards thoſe over whom as a univerſal monarch he ſought the power of ruling; at leaſt, this is the idea Plutarch [o] would give us of him, and of Ariſtotle, who, though a philoſopher, was a great politician, and had perhaps better conceptions of this conqueror's intentions, than moſt of the writers who have taken upon them, not only to record, but to criticize, his actions (W). The reader might very well expect, [n] Iahiaal Caſvini in Lebtarikh. [o] De fortuna Alexand.

(W) That Alexander ſhould promiſe a dying monarch whatever he demanded ſeems perfectly agreeable to his character, as drawn by eaſtern and weſtern authors; he was fierce in battle, but full of pity towards the vanquiſhed. That Ariſtotle gave him general precepts as to government we may eaſily believe; and if the authority of Plutarch had due weight, we ſhall conceive the expedition of Alexander againſt the Perſians to have been no other than an attempt made by an active philoſopher to civilize all mankind. It would be, however, a difficult matter to ſwallow this; we ſhall therefore, inſtead of preſſing it farther, produce the paſſage from the Greek author laſt mentioned, to which pect, that we ſhould here put an end to this ſection, eſpecially ſince he has already ſeen the hiſtory of Perſia, according to the Greek writers, concluded at the death of Darius. But ſo it is, that in order to purſue the ſcheme which we alluded in the text, and which will ſufficiently ſhew, that the Perſian writers are not abſolutely in the wrong when they aſcribe ſome points of Alexander's conduct to the influence Ariſtotle had over him, tho' they are groſly miſtaken in making him his viſier. " If philoſophers, ſays Plutarch, aſſume to them-

" ſelves their higheſt applauſe for cultivating the moſt fierce and " rugged conditions of man, certainly Alexander is to be ac" knowledged the chiefeſt of philoſophers, who changed the " wild and brutiſh cuſtoms of ſo many various nations, reducing
" them to order and government. 'Tis true indeed, that ſo
" much admired common wealth of Zeno, firſt author of the " ſtoick ſect, aims ſingly at this, that neither in cities nor in " private houſes we ſhould live under laws diſtinct one from ano" ther, but that we ſhould look upon all men in general to be
" our fellow countrymen and citizens, obſerving one manner of " living, one kind of order, like a flock feeding together with " equal right in one common paſture. This Zeno wrote, fan-
" cying to himſelf as in a dream a certain ſcheme of civil order,
" and the image of a philoſophical common-weal. But Alex" ander made good his words by his deeds: For, as Ariſtotle
" ſagely adviſed him, he did not rule the Grecians like a mo" derate prince, and inſult over the barbarians like an abſolute
" tyrant; neither like one that took particular care of the firſt
" as his friends and domeſtics, but ſcorning the latter as mere " brutes and vegetables; did he fill his empire with fugitive in" cendiaries and perfidious tumults. But believing himſelf ſent
" from heaven as the common moderator and arbiter of all na" tions, and ſubduing thoſe by force whom he could not aſſoci-
" ate to himſelf by fair offers, he laboured thus, that he might " bring all reigions far and near under the ſame dominion. And " then as in a feſtival bowl, mixing converſations, manners,
" cuſtoms, wedlocks all together, he ordained, that every one
" ſhould take the whole habitable world for his country, of " which his camp and army ſhould be the chief metropolis and " garriſon; that his friends and kindred ſhould be the good and " virtuous, and that the vicious only ſhould be accounted fo" reigners. Nor would he, that the Greeks ſhould be di-
" ſtinguiſhed from the Barbarians by their long garments, by " their targets, by their ſcimitars, or turbants; but that the " Grecians ſhould be known by their virtue and courage, and
" the Barbarians by their vices and their cowardice. However,
" that their habit, their diet, their marriages, and cuſtom of " converſe, ſhould be every where the ſame, engaged and " blended together by the ties of blood and pledges of off-

" ſpring

laid down in the title of this ſection, we are bound to carry on our hiſtory to the death of Alexander; for, as we have ſhewn before, the oriental writers, in order no doubt to ſave the credit of the Aſiatics, have pretended, that the empire of Iran, with its dependencies, which were then very great, came into the hands of Alexander, not ſo much by conqueſt as by right; in this light therefore Alexander was the laſt monarch of the Dynaſty of the Kaiânites, and his reign conſequently ought as much to be taken notice of here as the reigns of any of his predeceſſors [P].

ALEXANDER, ſon of Philip, king of Macedon, is by the Perſian writers ſtiled Iſcander Ben Filoukous, which ſignifies the ſame thing, only they pretend, that it was a kind of ſurname beſtowed on him for the following reaſon; they will have it, that he was the ſon of Darab the firſt by the daughter of Filikous, whom he ſent home becauſe of her ſtinking breath, but that Philip bringing him up as his own ſon, and leaving to him the kingdom, he called himſelf out of gratitude Alexander the ſon of Philip, though he put in his claim to the kingdom of Perſia as heir to Darab his father (X). The oriental writers in general beſtow

[P] Mirkhond. ſect. xx, xxi. D'Herbelot. Bibl. orient. Art. Darab, Eſcander.

" ſpring (46). How glorious a reputation would Alexander have obtained, if his actions had been uniform, and apparently founded on ſuch notions as are attributed to him by the philoſopher? His burning of Perſepolis is a little inconſiſtent with the idea given us by Plutarch; but it is very probable, that great man meant no more than to ſhew us what Alexander would have done, if he had always acted up to the heroic maxims laid down by his tutor Ariſtotle. On the whole, it may be juſtly ſaid, that it was the paſſions of Alexander only which ſpoke him a man: in his cooler moments, and when he acted without their impulſe, he ſeemed ſomething more than man; ſuch are the effects of an excellent education, and of ſuch importance it is, that thoſe who are to govern multitudes ſhould be ſuperior in knowledge to the multitude they govern.

(X) The hiſtory of Alexander the Great has not only been intermixed with fables by the Perſian writers; the eaſtern authors in general, even thoſe moſt eſteemed, abound with very extraordinary circumſtances relating to that conqueror. Joannes Malala, a very celebrated writer, to whom we are indebted for

(46) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

beſtow another ſurname upon him, viz. that of Dhoul-carnein, or rather Dulcarnein, which ſignifies literally with two horns, in alluſion to the two ends of the world, the

for a very curious hiſtory of the Conſtantinopolitan emperors, hath given us ſome ſtrokes in his account of Alexander, which do not very well agree with what the Greek writers have delivered, though he follows them in the main: For example, he makes Roxana the daughter of Darius, in which he joins with the Perſian hiſtorians, who, as we have ſeen, alledge, that the emperor of Perſia, in his laſt moments, intreated Alexander to marry his daughter Rouſchengh; whereas Arrian makes Roxana the daughter not of Darius, but of Oxyartes; but this is a ſmall matter: we have in the ſame author a ſtory of ſome length, which is quite in the oriental taſte: "It was the cuſtom, ſays "he, of Alexander the Great, in the expeditions he made af-"ter the conqueſts of Perſia, to go in diſguiſe with ſuch am-"baſſadors as he ſent to the courts of neighbouring princes, "that in this ſituation he might make ſuch obſervations as "might facilitate his deſigns. Of this it ſeems Candace, queen "of the inner or higher Æthiopia, had notice, whereupon ſhe "made ſtrict inquiry as to the form and preſence of this con-"queror; the reſult of this was, that ſhe was told, he was low "in ſtature, had large broad teeth, ſome of which ſtood out; "that of his eyes, one was of a light grey the other quite black, "which marks ſhe carefully remembered. When therefore Alex-"ander appeared with his ambaſſadors in her preſence, ſhe in-"ſtantly fingled him out, addreſſing herſelf to him in theſe "words; You, O Alexander, have been too wiſe for all the "world, and yet one woman has been too wiſe for you, to "which he replied, I therefore grant you and your ſubjects my "protection, as a reward for your extraordinary capacity; I al-"ſo accept you for a wife, to which Candace readily yielded. "After this marriage Alexander went into Æthiopia and ſe-"veral other countries (47)". If we were critically to enquire into the origin of ſuch ſtories, we ſhould perhaps find it no difficult thing to ſhake of all romantic circumſtances, and leave only the naked truth; but the compaſs of theſe notes neither admit of ſuch diſquiſitions, nor indeed does the nature of this work allow them. Our preſent buſineſs is to ſhew what oriental writers have ſaid of affairs mentioned in the text; and this therefore leads us to cite what is recorded by Abul-Pharajius. This celebrated hiſtorian calls Nebuchadnezzar by the name of Bochtanſer as the Perſian writers do, and in his ſhort account of the Perſian kings preſerves exactly the names recorded by Mi-khond; I mean the latter race of kings, the deſcendants of Guſhtaſp, who ſucceeded after the Greek power ceaſed to have dominion the east and the west, both of which the eastern writers affirm to have been conquered by two Alexanders, to whom therefore they have given this firname. The first Alexander dominion in Persia; he calls the last king of Persia Darab, the son of Darab; of Alexander he speaks thus: "Alexander, the "son of Philip, reigned six years after the death of Darius, "having also reigned six years before his death. He subdued "many nations, so that his dominions extended even to India, "and the frontiers of China. He was called Dhul Karnain, "i. e. two horned, because he seemed to have passed from one "horn of the sun to the other, i. e. from east to west. Five-"and-thirty kings he slew, and twelve cities he founded; two "of these in the province of Chorasan, viz. Hera and Marwa; "one in the region Alsogd, viz. Samarchand, and in Egypt "Alexandria; when he returned out of India he went to Ba-"bylon, where he died of poison, and his body being put in-"to a chest of gold, was borne on the shoulders of kings "and nobles to the Egyptian Alexandria, where it was inter-"red. It was Alexander who began the wall Yajuji, which "was composed of stone and iron, the iron being let into the "stone to fasten it by the help of fire, each of the stones be-"ing twelve cubits in length, and eight broad. This wall "when it was finished came down to the place called Babo l' "Abwah, in the vallies of the region of Kaphjak, from whence "it was carried over and through the mountains as far as the "sea of the Greeks; nor were there wanting many of the Per-"sian kings, who to defend their dominions from the incur-"sions of the Turks, sought to find the foundations of this wall; "at last they were found by Yazdejerd, the son of Bahram "Jur, who began to carry on the work, but did not live to see "it finished; several succeeding kings prosecuted the same "design, but none of them with effect, till God rendered it "easy to Chosroes Nusherwan, who built it strongly, uniting it "to the mountains, and at last brought it down to the sea, place-"ing iron gates at the end, so that a hundred men were then "able to defend what would otherwise require an army of "an hundred-thousand (48)". Of this wall, as it nearly concerns the history of Persia, it is necessary that we should give some farther account. The famous Abu l'Ghazi Baliader Khan of Khowarazm, in his genealogical history of the Tartars, has given us the following account of it; "Those of Kitay have built a "great wall to cover their country, in which there are two iron-"gates for the passage of the merchants and other travellers. This "wall is called Sat in Arabick, which signifies Fortress; in the "antient Turkish language it is called Turk-urga; and in the "language

(47) Chronographia, p. 249.

(48) Historia Dynastar. p. 97.

ander, if any credit could be given to the authors who have writen about him, ought to be preferred far before the " language of Kitay Ungu. Alexander the Great cauſed a like " wall to be raiſed to cover the frontiers of his dominions; but " it was compoſed of all ſorts of metals. His deſign by this " wall was to hinder the nation of Jadſutz Madzuth, i. e. of " Gog and Magog from carrying their ravages into the lands un- " der his dominion, where they had done great miſchief in times " paſt. 'Tis a general tradition with the Tartars, that thoſe " people have the muzzle of a dog; and this wall being made " up of all ſorts of metals, they did all in their power to make " a paſſage through it by dint of licking, but they could not " ſucceed. That nevertheleſs before the day of judgment, they " ſhall come and lick their way through the wall, and that then " they ſhall do a great deal of miſchief in the world. Nauſhir " Wanadill, ſultan of Samachy, cauſed in like manner a wall " of earth to be built round about his kingdom (49)". On this paſſage the ingenious editor of that curious work has added the following remarks; " The remains of this wall, which the " Perſians pretend their king Naw-ſhirwan cauſed to be drawn " from the Caſpian to the Black ſea, are at this day to be ſeen " upon the confines of the province of Shirwan and Georgia: " it begins at the higher town of Derbend, and extends thence " north-eaſtward acroſs the mountains of Georgia towards the " Black-Sea. Theſe remains are every where three feet thick, " but its height is very unequal; for in ſome parts it is ſtill " ſix and ſeven feet high, in others only one or two, and in " ſome places it is quite beaten down. It appears at firſt ſight " to be built of ſtone, but when one comes to examine it near, " it proves to be only a kind of petrified earth, ſand, and ſhells, " which has formed ſo ſolid a body, that there is no free-ſtone " better than it; and it is on this account that our author thinks " it might be called a wall of earth. The late emperor of " Ruſſia, in his Perſian expedition, had the curioſity to go ſee " the remains of this wall, ſo far as the ſituation of the coun- " try and his affairs would permit him; and he could not but " admire the ſolidity of that compoſition, which he found " every where ſo exceeding hard, that there was no breaking " off any pieces of it without employing a good deal of ſtrength. " He found alſo ſome leagues within the mountain a ſkirt of " it which ſeemed to be intire, and was about fifteen foot high. " In all probability, this wall had ſtood intire to this day if " it had nothing to fear but time; but the hands of men which " built it have alſo deſtroyed it; and moſt of the towns, bur- " roughs, and villages of the country thereabouts are built with " the ruins of this wall (50)".

(49) Geneal. Hiſt. of Tartars, Vol. I. p. 42. (50) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 722.

the latter, ſince he ſtretched his conqueſts to the very extremity of the globe, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, and built a brazen wall in the north in order to hinder the deſcendants of Gog and Magog from pouring down like a torrent upon their ſouthern neighbours. It is pretty difficult to diſcover at what time this mighty hero lived, and as difficult to know when he died. Some writers place him in the days of Abraham, and ſay, that he lived ſixteen hundred years; but then they give him for his chief counſellor the prophet Khedher, who it is ſaid found out the fountain of life, and having drank thereof rendered himſelf immortal; which prophet, according to others, was cotemporary with Keykobad, of whom we have ſpoken ſo much already. As to the latter part of this ſtory, it is eaſily cleared up, ſince it is certain, that they confound Khedher, the counſellor of this mighty monarch, with a latter prophet of the ſame name, or rather ſirname, who is no other than the prophet Elias, whoſe tranſlation to heaven in a fiery chariot is by them changed into a diſcovery of the fountain of life, and gainning immortality by drinking its waters [q]. But enough of this elder Dulcarnein, unleſs we could ſay more of him with certainty, or even with probability. Our Alexander received the ſame ſirname from his being monarch both of the eaſt and weſt. The eaſtern writers, and eſpecially the Perſian hiſtorians, pay him great honours, and tell a multitude of things concerning him, which are not to be met with in the Greek or Latin hiſtories; for example, they tell us, that this monarch being aſked why he paid greater honours to his tutor than his father, he anſwered, that it was but juſt, becauſe his father made him deſcend from heaven to earth, whereas the inſtructions of his maſter had made him to riſe from earth to heaven [r]. One day he ſaid to a counſellor of his who had been long about his perſon, I am not ſatisfied with your ſervice, for this reaſon, I know that I am a man, and that as a man I am liable to errors and miſtakes, for which you have never reproved me; if this happened for want of perceiving them, then you muſt be ignorant and unworthy of your office: but if you

[q] Mirkhond. ubi. ſupra. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Dhoulcarnein, Khedher. [r] Vit. Rabialakiar.

you did know them, and yet were ſilent, it was treaſon [s]. It is likewiſe reported of him, that to make an experiment of a courtier's temper, he removed him from a higher to a lower office, and afterwards took occaſion to aſk him how the latter agreed with him, and how he brought himſelf to diſcharge its functions; Very well anſwered the courtier, ſince it is not any office or dignity that does honour to a man, but the man that does honour to it, ſince every poſt requires ſenſe and honeſty to execute it well, and he who poſſeſſes theſe cannot fail to diſcharge his duty with reputation. Alexander, having heard this, commended him highly, reſtored him to his former employment, and gave him a great reward [t]. Somebody wondering, in the preſence of Alexander, at his aquiring, ſo young, ſo large an empire, and adding it was ſtill ſtranger he preſerved it, he thereupon turned about, and ſaid, By two maxims I have done all this, I have taken care to treat my enemies ſo well, that they have found it their intereſt to become my friends; while, on the other hand, my care of my friends has been ſuch, as to raiſe out of gratitude a double affection for my ſervice. Khondemir, the famous hiſtorian, ſpeaking of Alexander the Great, informs us, that a perſon in a very bad apparel preſented him one day a petition admirably well penned, the king having read it with great pleaſure, and admiring greatly both the thoughts and the ſtyle, looked next on the perſon of the man, and then anſwered him thus: Friend, if you had taken care to appear before me in a habit as neat and decent as that which you have cloathed your thoughts, I ſhould have been much better pleaſed with you than I am; to which the man readily anſwered, Your ſervant has received from nature that capacity of ſpeaking and writing which you are pleaſed to commend; but it is to you, great monarch, who are ſo much famed for your bounty and generoſity, that he muſt be indebted for ſuch a garment as may render him worthy of your regard. Alexander was ſo well pleaſed with the modeſty and juſtice of this anſwer, that he ordered a magnificent habit to be brought, and with a conſiderable ſum of money gave it to this wiſe man in neceſſity, whoſe learning till then had left him in rags. In the Nighiariſtan, i. e. a book ſo called, the word ſignifying literally a gallery or place to walk walk in; we are told, that a certain flagrant rebel being brought bound hand and foot into the preſence of Alexander, that monarch generouſly reſtored him to his freedom; which ſurprizing thoſe about him, one of his favourites had the boldneſs to ſay, Sir, if I were in your place, I would not have extended mercy to ſuch a man; and I, replied Alexander, who am not in yours, have pardoned him; then after a ſhort ſilence, he added, I the more readily pardon my enemies, becauſe there is no compariſon between the pleaſure one taſtes in an act of clemency and in an act of vengeance. Khondimer, ſpeaking of the death of Alexander, aſſures us, that finding his laſt moments approach, he wrote to his mother two verſes to conſole her to the purport following; Your ſon, after having counted ſome moments of life, is delivered to death, he is gone like a flaſh of lightening, and has only left behind him matter of diſcourſe [u]. It may be ſuppoſed, that the intent of theſe verſes was to put his mother in mind, that as human life, ſo human glory was a mere nothing, and that therefore ſhe ought not to grieve at his being ſnatched ſo ſoon from an empire ſo lately acquired, ſince, if he had lived longer, it would have been of no great conſequence to himſelf, and would have furniſhed only more matter of ſpeculation to thoſe who amuſe themſelves with repeating the actions, and ſometimes cenſuring the conduct of others. On what authority theſe ſtories are grounded is difficult to ſay; they are chiefly recorded by moral and political writers, who aim rather at inſtructing men by paraphraſing on remarkable actions and wiſe ſayings, than at delivering a dry detail of facts, which without ſuch reflections inſtruct very little. A Perſian author of great genius hath related a remarkable ſtory of the hero we are now ſpeaking of, which is in all probability founded on what the Greeks tell us of his ſparing Thebes, becauſe it gave birth to Pindar. The Perſian ſtory runs thus: "Alexander having given orders after the reduction of a "very ſtrong place, that it ſhould be given up to the "mercy of the ſoldiers, ſome of his courtiers informed "the king, that there was in this place a philoſopher of "great note who deſerved his majeſty's notice; the king "ordered, that he ſhould be immediately ſent for; when "he appeared, it ſo happened, that he made but a very "indifferent figure; upon which Alexander, turning to "thoſe who had ſent for him, ſaid, with a ſmile of con"tempt.

[s] Hafez. in Bahariſtan. [t] Moiannabi. ap. D'Herbelot. Biblioth. orient. Art. Eſcander.

[u] D'Herbelot. Biblioth. Orient. Art Eſcander.

" tempt, What ſtrange figure have you brought me here?
" Which ſo piqued the philoſopher, that he repeated im" mediately the following lines, which he made upon the " ſpot.

O! prince of manners void, though great in fame,
Why ſhould'ſt thou ſlight my perſon, tho' uncouth?
Doſt thou not know, that man's exterior form
Is but the ſcabbard of the enliv'ning mind?
Why ſhould'ſt thou judge then of the weapon's edge,
When yet you've nothing ſeen except the caſe?

He added to this poetical reproof the following words in proſe: " One may ſay of a man unendued with virtue,
" that his body is no better than a priſon, ſince the ſoul
" muſt find itſelf ſo penned up therein, that any other " confinement would ſeem liberty in compariſon thereof.
" The vicious man is tortured continually, there is no
" occaſion for a hangman and guards to puniſh or diſtreſs
" him, the very ſkin which covers his body is at the ſame
" time the unſurmountable wall of a perpetual priſon"
The ſame philoſopher added, " There is nothing more
" unreaſonable than to envy others thoſe gifts which God
" and nature have beſtowed upon them. The boſom of
" the envious man is continually full of anger and ſpleen
" againſt his creator, he thinks every thing amiſs which " is given to others, and at the ſame time covets whatever " is not deſigned for him. As it is thus the cuſtom of the " envious to oppoſe conſtantly the conduct of him who " governs the world with infinite wiſdom, ſo the mouth
" that thus murmurs againſt providence deſerves no other
" anſwer than to be filled with earth. One of this diſ-" poſition exclaims at every thing he ſees in the hands of " his neighbour; For what reaſon ſhould this man have " more than I"? At theſe words he ſtopped, but Alexander, admiring the boldneſs as well as prudence of the man bad him go on, aſſuring him, that he took all that he ſaid in good part; the philoſopher on this proceeded in his harangue: " Wiſe men, continued he, are liberal of " their wealth, and give part of it to their friends while " they are alive, while the covetous are ſuch fools as to " fatigue themſelves in laying up riches for their enemies.
" The railleries thrown out by the great againſt ſuch
" as are in low condition tarniſh the luſtre of their high " qualities, and take off that deference which other-
" wiſe would be paid them. Whoever wearies him-
" ſelf with ſtriking thoſe who dare not ſtrike again,

" will

" will be eaſily beaten when he meets one who dares
" oppoſe him ; and he who puts to the ſword without pi" ty, will one day feel without pity the edge of a ſword."
Alexander at this ſtopped him, revoked his reſolution, pardoned the citizens whom he had deſtined to deſtruction, and rewarded the philoſopher for his timely advice [w]. It may very poſſibly happen, that ſome rigid critic may object to the inſerting of this dubious relation in our hiſtory ; but we hope, though it ſhould be exploded as a fact, it will yet be received as a proper inſtance of the Perſian mode of writing hiſtory, and at the ſame time we remark this, let us be indulged another obſervation, that the writings of Xenophon, who was very well acquainted with the antient Perſian learning, correſpond nearly with the manner of thoſe authors we have lately cited ; for he reaſons on all the facts which he delivers, inſomuch, that his moral and political reflections have in the opinion of many removed him, as well as the Perſian writers, from the claſs of hiſtorians into that of romance writers. But as his excellent treatiſe of the education of Cyrus has within theſe few years found many warm and learned defenders, ſo, it may be, the time is near, when we ſhall ſee apologies writen in favour of oriental hiſtorians, who, like Herodotus, may have their credit perhaps reſtored, when the ſubjects they treat of come to be examined to the bottom (Y). The Perſians

[w] Farez in Bahariſtan.

(Y) It is a common miſtake which reigns in Europe, that the eaſtern nations, and particulary the Perſians, are in the groſs very illiterate, and abſolutely paſſive under a heavy tyranny, which they either believe to be eſtabliſhed jure divino, and therefore not to be contradicted, or elſe ſtupidly drag the yoke, without daring to enquire by whom or how it is impoſed. One would imagine, that the frequent revolutions which have happened in the eaſt, and in Perſia particularly, would have overturned this notion, becauſe there could be no ſuch thing as a rebellion or a revolution among abject ſlaves ; there muſt be ſome reaſoning to perſuade people to take arms on the one ſide, and ſome arguments offered to prevent an immediate and total defection on the other ; of conſequence therefore, there muſt in ſuch countries be politicians, nay, and there muſt have been always politicians, ſince rebellions and revolutions are no new things. But the truth is, the people of good ſenſe in Perſia have in all ages had as rational ideas of government as we can pretend to, though it muſt be allowed, they have unanimouſly preferred

Perſians are not only much charmed with the character of the great Alexander, they are alſo wonderfully pleaſed with that of his vizir as they call him, or, as he was in truth, his preceptor Ariſtotle; this wiſe man they call ſometimes by the name of Ariſthathialis, but commonly by preferred monarchy to all the other forms, or rather have profeſſed a diſlike of any form of rule but it; it is likewiſe true, that they have a profeſſed fondneſs for that patriarchal right of kings, which has been turned into ſuch high ridicule by ſome of our great politicians; but after all, though they allow their kings to be abſolute, yet they do not think they have any right at all to be wicked; they acknowledge, that we owe them the ſame duty we do our parents; but then they will have their kings act like parents too, on pain of forfeiting that reſpect; they own, that the prince is to be looked upon as god's vicegerent, this was the old and catholick opinion among the Perſians; but at the ſame time they were far from paying him divine honours, or the king from hiding himſelf, as the Greek writers would perſuade us, from the ſight of the people, that they might conceive extraordinary ideas of one who dwelt in ſuch ſtate; the truth of all this will appear from an antient cuſtom in uſe among the kings, of whom we have been ſpeaking, on the firſt day of April, called from thence, that is, from this cuſtom, Chorrem-ruz, i. e. the day of mirth, on which, as a very antient writer informs us, the king deſcended from his trhone dreſſed in a white garment; afterwads riding abroad on a white horſe, accompanied by his nobility, he and they gave open and indiſcriminate audience to all who approached them, laying aſide all diſtinctions, and acting as if they were equals; huſbandmen and clowns ſat down at the ſame table with the king, without ceremony told him their minds, and without fear made ſuch requeſts as they thought fit. The king on the other hand addreſſed them in theſe terms; I am one of you, and notwithſtanding the elevation of my ſtation, I know that all I have ariſes from your labour, and that kings could not be without you, any more than you could be without kings; let us then agree like brothers, ſince nothing but union can preſerve us (51). The foregoing hiſtory hath ſhewn us, that the Perſian kings in antient times were really as wiſe, as humane, and as condeſcending as any that have reigned in the north or weſt; it would be invidious to ſay more ſo. If we look for the reaſons which occaſioned this, we may find them even in a Greek writer: "At fourteen years "old, ſays this excellent writer, thoſe who were called the royal "preceptors among the Perſins take charge of the children of the "crown;

(51) Hyde H. R. vet. P. c. xix. p. 253.

by way of abbreviation Ariſtou; they report, that h. was wonderfully ſagacious even in his childhood, that he addicted himſelf very early to the ſchool of Plato, and continued therein upwards of twenty years, till he ſet up for

" crown; they are in number four, the moſt renowned perſons " in the kingdom for wiſdom, juſtice, temperance, and valor; " the firſt of theſe teaches the magick of Zoroaſter, the ſon of " Oromazes (he ſhould have ſaid the worſhipper, for Oromazes " was the name of god), and teach alſo the royal inſtitutions, " &c." As to the modern Perſians, on whoſe credit we are now forced to take the hiſtory of theſe early times, they too are wiſe enough to abhor ſlavery, and to ſpeake and write as freely about government as we. For example, the famous poet Sahdy wrote an expreſs treatiſe on this ſubject, called an advice to kings; among other wiſe and prudent admonitions, he delivers theſe: " " It is the wiſdom of kings to be kind to the poor, and not to " oppreſs the rich; the felicity of a ſtate depends on the good " ſenſe and right diſpoſition of the ſovereign. The ſecurity of " his country depends on his adminiſtring juſtce impartially, " proſperity follows ſecurity, and will be where that is. If a " country is once known to be ſecure, merchants will reſort " thither; the gain from thence will be large, and all temporal " bleſſings will abound. If the country become rich, the king " cannot well be poor, and beſides, at the laſt day he ſhall be re- " compenſed amply by god for ſo well diſcharging his duty, " whereas he who acts in a contrary manner will in every reſpect " meet with a contrary fate. Be always kind to merchants and " publick miniſters, that ſtrangers being well received may carry " a good report of you into their own country; ſoon will that " kingdom fall wherein the ſouls of ſtrangers are afflicted; be " wiſe therefore, uſe the traveller well, that whereſoever he goes " he may ſpeak well of you.——A prince ought always to have " before his eyes this maxim, dominion really belongs to god, " and he has no certainty how long it ſhall be delegated to him; " he ought likewiſe to remember, that the country he rules was " given by god to the people who inhabit it, to the end he may " not be miſled by falſe ideas of things that have no ſolidity, " and place his truſt on joys that may not perhaps laſt five days. " It is reported of the caliph Aron Keſchid, that he one day ſaid " to the famous Beloul his brother, give me ſome good advice; " he anſwered, there i snothing to be carried out of this world into " the other but good and bad works; it is in your power to carry " which load you pleaſe.——This Beloul was a very knowing " man, who, that he might have the more leaſure to attend his " ſtudies, would never marry. The caliph his brother aſked " him another time for his advice, how he might govern his peo- " ple for their advantage and his own; the ſage anſwered, let for himſelf, and became author of the ſect of Maſchai-oun, i. e. the Peripateticks; they affirm likewiſe, that he died very old, and in high reputation throughout all Greece. They are very poſitive, that he was prime miniſter to Alexander, the ſon of Philip, and, in conſequence of this notion, they report a multitude of fine ſayings and moral maxims under his name. Ben Caſſan informs us, that Ariſtotle compoſed above a hundred different treatiſes on various ſubjects, aud amongſt the reſt mentions one which is neither found among his works as we have them at preſent, nor is at all taken notice of by any of the Greek writers. Its title runs thus; A diſcourſe on the conduct which a great general ought to obſerve after the gaining or loſing of a battle; which, Ben Caſſan ſays, he dedicated to Alexander the Great. As to his philoſophy, we cannot find that it was thoroughly ſtudied by the antient Perſians, though in after-times it came to be in high credit with the Arabians *. But to return to Alexander; Mirkhond, who has wrote very copiouſly of his conqueſts, affirms, that he reduced many nations to the eaſt of Perſia under his dominion, and that he advanced as far as the Indies, that he was the founder of many glorious cities, particularly

" you

* D'Herbelot. Bibl. Orient. Art. Ariſthalis.

" your deciſions become laws through their apparent equity,
" and never make reaſon yield to your will; prevent as far as " you can requeſts, give little to ſuch as aſk, but think of giving
" in time to ſuch as merit and do not aſk; the king is the head;
" the people are the body of the ſtate; if the king is either ig" norant or wicked, the head will devour the body with its teeth.
" —The government of an empire is an affair which requires a " genius attentive and collected, and a heart which turns itſelf
" continual towards the moſt high god to invoke his aid, that its " owner may turn his fect, his hand, his tongue, and his pen
" aright; and the king who acts thus god will undoubtedly endue
" with grace to conſerve his empire and his piety (52)". It is evident from theſe citations, that the Perſians have at preſent and have always had very rational ſentiments as to the reciprocal duties of governors and ſubjects; and it is likewiſe plain, that the diffuſe manner of writing peculiar to the eaſt is not without its advantages, ſince the intent of hiſtory is not tiring the memory, but directing the judgment, which is perfectly anſwered by the oriental mode of delivering the wiſe ſayings as well as great actions of the famous kings.

(52) ap Chardin Voyages, tom. iii. p. 253.

of Heri, or Herat, and Samarkand; he reports likewiſe, that this prince being mightily taken with the Perſian learning, cauſed three celebrated treatiſes written in that language to be tranſlated into Greek; the firſt relating to phyſick, the ſecond to aſtrology, and the third to natural philoſophy (Z), he divided, ſays the ſame hiſtorian, his ample

(Z) At firſt ſight it may ſeem, that Mirkhond might have inſerted this ſtory of Alexander's cauſing books to be tranſlated out of the Perſic language into Greek, merely to do honour to his country; but it would be unreaſonable to ſuppoſe this, when we have good grounds to believe, that the fact was really as he reports it. Theſe grounds are, firſt, that Alexander was a very learned and inquiſitive prince; and ſecondly, that it was his cuſtom to tranſmit whatever he thought might be uſeful to the commonwealth of learning in Greece; as for inſtance, the aſtronomical obſervations which were found in Babylon. But as Mirkhond has ſet down the ſubjects of the books, which he alledges were tranſlated by that conqueror's command, the matter ſeems to be put out of diſpute, ſince all the ſciences he mentions were indiſputably better underſtood in Peſia than in Greece. Firſt, as to phyſic, if we conſider the preſcriptions of Hypocrates and other antient phyſicians, we ſhall find that the drugs then in uſe were moſt of them brought from the eaſt, and not a few from Perſia; and if they had their drugs from theſe places, why ſhould we queſtion their learning from the inhabitants of theſe places how to uſe them? But farther ſtill; among the works of Zerduſht, there is a treatiſe which bears the title of Biziſhk-nama, i. e. the book of phyſicians, which is ſaid to treat intirely of the virtues of herbs, and how they ought to be applied; nay, he is reported to have been ſo very ſkilful in theſe matters, that Shariſtani in his treatiſe of the religions of the eaſt, which we have ſo often quoted, attributes expreſly all the miracles Zerduſht is ſaid to have done to his ſkill in ſimples only (53). Now take it either way, if he was inſpired, he knew all things, if not, he knew ſo much of ſimples as to paſs himſelf for a prophet; conſequently there might be treatiſes on phyſic among the Perſians well worth Alexander's directing to be put into Greek. Secondly, as to aſtronomy and other mathematical ſciences, we have proved in our note N. that they were well known to this people, when they were very little known to the Greeks, and that from the teſtimony of the Greeks themſelves; it is true, that the modern Perſians ſtand indebted for moſt of their knowledge in theſe ſciences to the writings of the Greeks, which are tranſlated into Arabick and Perſian; but the reaſon of this is plain, becauſe the antient books

(53) Shariſtani ap. Hyde, R. vet. P. c. xxii. p. 300.

mple dominions into ninety governments; and, after a ſhort and glorious life, ended his days at Babylon in the thirty-ſixth year of his life, and ſeventeenth of his reign[y], leaving his conqueſts to be divided among his captains, who are diſtinguiſhed by the Arabians and Perſians with the title of Molouk al Shaovaif, i. e. the kings of nations or families. The Perſians likewiſe take notice of Alexander's brother Aridœus, whom they ſtile Ardous, and generally ſpeak-

[y] Mirkhond. hiſt. ſect. xxi.

books relating to theſe abſtruſe ſciences were not ſo carefully preſerved as thoſe which regard hiſtory and morality; theſe being valuable in the ſight of many; thoſe precious only in the eyes of few. As to moral philoſophy, which was the ſubject of the third book mentioned by Mirkhond, it was the darling ſtudy of the antient Perſians, if we may venture to credit any thing which oriental writers have delivered. Morality is the ſubject of the book, intituled Gjouidan Chrad, aſcribed to Huſhang, a king far older than Zerduſht. Morality was the ſubject of moſt of Zerduſht's writings, as we gather from ſuch fragments of them as we have ſeen, and eſpecially from the book Sad-der, which, though written ad captum vulgi in verſe and in a ballad ſtile, contains as many moral ſentences as are to be found in Diogenes Laertius's lives of the philoſophers. To theſe arguments in favour of the learning of the antient Perſians we may add the amazing love of ſcience viſible in the modern Perſians; for we can hardly account for it any other way than by their mixing with the antient inhabitants of this country, and borrowing from their ſtores, ſince they far exceed the Turks, and indeed all the eaſtern nations, except the Chineſe, in their affection for learning; as a proof of which we ſhall alledge the reigning maxims in their ſchools, not unworthy perhaps of being ecchoed in our univerſities: Doubting is the beginning of ſcience: he who doubts nothing diſcovers nothing: he who examines nothing diſcovers nothing: he who diſcovers nothing is blind, and muſt remain blind. An extraordinary affection for myſterious theology ſeems to have been the reigning paſſion of the antient Perſees, and of the Perſians at this day. Among the latter there is a ſect ſtiled Suphi or Sophi, who profeſs themſelves admirers of the Pythagoric philoſophy. Pythagoras, as we have ſhewn, is generally, and not without good grounds, ſuppoſed to have been the ſcholar of Zoroaſter, and is thought to have learned from him thoſe refined notions with which theſe men are charmed. To deſcribe the notions of the uphi in few words, we muſt ſay, that according to their own account, they are quietiſts, or enthuſiaſts; in the opinion of the vulgar atheiſts. They faſt often and to exceſs, they pretend to ecſtacies and converſations with God. They profeſs themſelves friends alike to all men, and believe that the good in all religions are ſa-ſpeaking make him the ſon inſtead of the brother of that monarch; they agree, however, with the Greeks, in repreſenting him as a prince little qualified for empire; but they ſoften this account, by pretending that he deſpiſed grandeur for the ſake of wiſdom, having learned from Ariſtotle to think thoſe goods only valuable, which neither fortune nor force can take away.

We have now conducted the hiſtory of the Perſian empire from its origin to its diſſolution after the death of Alexander the Great; in our next period we ſhall ſee it revive again, under a prince deſcended from their antient kings and of the magian religion. We have referred our reſearches into the chronology of the writers from whom we have taken this hiſtory, till we come to the utter extinction of the monarcy of the native Perſians in Yezdegherd; but before we cloſe this ſection, it will be proper to obviate ſome objections to the bulk of the foregoing hiſtory, which may ariſe from the very tenour thereof. For firſt it may be ſaid, that there is ſo much of confeſſed fable in almoſt every reign of theſe Perſian monarchs, and the years generally ſpeaking aſſigned for the reign of each are ſo incredible, that a prudent man will be tempted to reject the whole, rather than take up with a tale full of apparent abſurdities. To this we anſwer, that if it once becomes an eſtabliſhed rule to reject every hiſtory which carries in it a mixture of fable, all the antient hiſtorians muſt be condemned in the lump. Beroſus, if we may judge from the fragments which ſtill remain of his work, inſerted many fabulous narrations in his Babyloniſh antiquities. Manetho, the Egyptian hiſtorian, can expect no ſaved. They have a remarkable averſion for church-men, which is owing perhaps to the outrageous antipathy the clergy ſhew towards them. Sir John Chardin gives us a whimſical inſtance of this; he ſays he was preſent, when a preacher at Spahawn told the people in his ſermon that the Suphis were atheiſts, that they deſerved to be burnt, and that he who killed one of this ſect did an action more pleaſing in the ſight of God, than if he ſaved the lives of ten other men. As ſoon as he came out of the pulpit, five or ſix Suphis who were among his audience cudgelled him heartily; and when our author interpoſed and begged them to give ear to the poor man's cries, one of them anſwered briſkly, What! Ought a fellow who preaches up murder complain of a beating? (54)

(54) Chardin. Voyages, tom. iii. p. 1. 12

no mercy if once this law be owned. Herodotus, Cteſias, Xenophon, and innumerable others [z] will ſhare the ſame fate with Mirkond andthe reſt of the Perſian writers. But after all, there is ſo tolerable an account to be given of that mixture of fable which is interwoven with the Perſian hiſtory, that if a critic's ſtomach be not very nice, he may, after a little conſideration, be brought to digeſt it. We opened this ſection with obſerving, that the antient Medes and Perſians were very curious and exact in ſetting down all matters of conſequence in their chronicles, and in preſerving thoſe chronicles through a long ſucceſſion of time; the truth of this fact we prove from indubitable authorities ſacred and profane. As to the ſtile of theſe records, we may form ſome judgment of it from the edicts remaining in the ſacred ſcriptures, and from the paſſage cited in relation to a conſpiracy againſt Ahaſuerus in the book of Eſther; and from all theſe it is plain, that though it was noble and ſententious, it was far from being hyperbolic or romantic [a]. But theſe records are no more; what we have now is taken from Mohammedan writers, who have certainly altered the old Perſian hiſtory, and digeſted it according to their own taſte; nay, what is ſtill worſe, many of theſe writers, neglecting the more antient and plain accounts of the old Perſian empire, have taken up with the romance written long after, to tickle the ears of the people, and perhaps to ſerve other purpoſes, which at this diſtance of time we are unacquainted with. Can we wonder after this at the fables recited in the foregoing hiſtory? Can we ſuppoſe, that ſtrangers, born with a contempt for the Perſees, the deſcendants of the old inhabitants of this country, will do their anceſtors ſtrict juſtice? Can we believe, that thoſe who, in conſequence of the religion themſelves profeſs, are inveterate enemies to that religion which was held by the kings of whom they write, will ever ſpeak of it with impartiality and truth? Or can we doubt, that theſe writers have made many other alterations, when we find them aſſerting of ſuch kings as they report to have lived wiſely and piouſly, that they were not Magians, but true believers, i. e. of their own religion; whereas nothing can be more certain, than that the Perſian monarchs from Keyomaras to Yezdegherd were all of one religion, allowing for ſuch alterations in that religion as are incident to all religions in ſo long a tract of time? But the egregious length of the reigns of the kings of Perſia remains yet untouched. To this charge there is indeed no reply, we admit it to be juſt, but at the ſame time we can ſafely ſay, the ſame charge may be brought againſt every antient hiſtory extant among the orientals. To give but one inſtance from the hiſtory of the Tartars written, by Abu l' Ghazi Bahader Khan of Khowarazm, from records the moſt antient and authentic, if the royal author is to be believed, and yet he places but ſeventeen Khans between Bertizena Khan and Kabul Khan, though, according to his hiſtory, there intervened 2550 years between thoſe princes, and in another part of his hiſtory he allows a thouſand years for the reigns of ſix princes [b]. Theſe are miſtakes as great as any that are to be met with in the hiſtorians we have cited, and it would be no difficult thing to draw together many examples of the like nature, if this were a proper place. But this ſingle one is ſufficient for our purpoſe; we do not pretend to ſay, that the numbers ſet down in our catalogues of kings are right, or capable of being defended; we only allege, that they are not more prepoſterous than the numbers which are met with in other oriental hiſtorians, who are notwithſtanding allowed to have ſome truth in their works. This confeſſion we hope will procure us ſome favour, and pave the way to thoſe amendments which we ſhall offer in due time. But, ſecondly, It may be objected, that our Perſian hiſtory from the oriental writers, being in moſt reſpects directly oppoſite to the hiſtory in the foregoing ſection, which is extracted from the Greek writers, one of the two muſt be rejected, ſince oppoſites can never be alike true. To this we may ſay, that we would be glad to compound the difference, and to allow, that the Perſian hiſtory from the Greeks is frequently to be preferred to this, and that this is in other places frequently to be preferred to that. Something in ſupport of this demand has been already ſaid on account of Xerxes's expedition, the life of Zoroaſter, and the death of Darius. Beſides, as we have before obſerved, the Greeks differ among themſelves, nay, there is not one author amongſt them, who in ſpeaking of the Perſian affairs may not be proved to have been miſtaken in ſeveral points, even from his own works. As for inſtance, Herodotus, who in one part of his hiſtory makes makes them worſhippers of the elements, and in another polluters, in a third chaſtiſers of them; add to this, that the Greeks, like all other writers, were notoriouſly partial to their country and countrymen, as indeed were the Perſians; ſo that on the whole what we aſk will not appear very unreaſonable, eſpecially when we refer it to the judgment of the reader to compare, to weigh, and to decide as he pleaſes. But, thirdly, It may be objected, that theſe accounts, being oppoſite to what is recorded by the Greek writers, and having no authority to ſupport them but their reputed antiquity, ought for this reaſon to be rejected, ſince true hiſtory is always ſupported by concurrent teſtimonies of natives and foreigners, the latter of which is wanting here; the ſtrength, however, of this objection, which is the laſt, and perhaps the moſt plauſible of all that can be offered againſt the foregoing ſeries of facts, will be effectually weakened from the following conſiderations, which we had no opportunity of inſerting in the body of the work. Firſt, amongſt thoſe writers which are beſt known to the learned, there are none which come near the times contained under the beginning of this period. Among the Greek hiſtorians the hiſtory of the Medes and Perſians aſcends, as we have ſhewn, very little higher than Cyrus, if we except what Diodorus Siculus has tranſcribed from Cteſias (A), which has

[z] Stillingfleet. Origines Sacræ, lib. i. c. v. [a] vi. 2.

[b] Preface to the genealogical hiſtory of the Tartars, p. viii.

(A) We have ſo often mentioned Cteſias and his works in the courſe of this ſection, that there ſeems to be a neceſſity of our giving a ſhort account of this author and his works, to render thoſe remarks we have had occaſion to make perfectly plain and clear. Cteſias lived °thirty or forty years after Herodotus; he was by profeſſion a phyſician, and ſeems to have been very eminent therein; he was taken priſoner by Artaxerxes Mnemon, whom he cured of a wound, which he received in the battle which he fought againſt his brother Cyrus. He reſided ſixteen or ſeventeen years in the Perſian court, and, though the favour he was in there, had leave to peruſe the royal chronicles and thoſe authentic hiſtories of which we have ſo often ſpoken. From theſe he compiled in XXIII books the hiſtory of the antient empires of Aſſyria, Media, and Perſia; which hiſtory of his he brought into Greece, where it was received with the greateſt applauſe. Diodorus Siculus, to whom we are as much indebted as to any antient author whatever, has tranſcribed into his bibliothec the ſubſtance of Cteſias's firſt ſix books, after having given us the following character of their author; "Cteſias the Cnidian was later than Herodotus, for he flouriſh-has been generally exploded by the critics [c]. With reſpect therefore to writers of great antiquity, if our hiſtory be unſupported by them, it is likewiſe uncontradicted. The firſt race of Perſian kings are to be placed in a void, where if we do not fix them, we know not whom to fix beſides, unleſs we take up with the feigned catalogue of Aſſyrian monarchs contrived by Annius of Viterbo; and as to writers of a later date, our Perſian hiſtory is not deſtitute of friends amongſt them, ſuch as are unbiaſſed, and againſt whoſe credit there is nothing to be ſaid. The royal author of the hiſtory of the Tartars, ſpeaking of the original of his nation, which he derives, as moſt of the oriental writers

" ed

[c] Univerſal Hiſtory, Vol. iv. ch. 10. ſect. 3.

"ed at the time of Cyrus's expedition againſt his brother Ar"taxerxes, in which being taken priſoner, he was, for his "ſkill in phyſic, received into Artaxerxes favour, in whoſe court
"he lived in much honour and eſteem ſeventeen years. During "that ſpace he digeſted into a regular hiſtory whatever he found
"worthy of notice in the Perſian chronicles, wherein, by a "fundamental law of the empire, all remarkable actions were "exactly regiſtered; and this hiſtory he brought with him into
"Greece (55)". Diodorus in the very place from whence we have quoted this paſſage, prefers Cteſias to Herodotus, as he does in moſt other places of his book where he cites either of them. Xenophon, ſpeaking of the death of the younger Cyrus, quotes this writer with applauſe (56). Plato agrees with him as to the power of the antient Aſſyrian empire (57). Ariſtotle alſo commends him (58), and in a word almoſt all the antient authors who have written in Greek prefer him to Herodotus. The very learned patriarch of Conſtantinople Photius has preſerved in his bibliothec an abridgment of this author's Perſian hiſtory, before which he premiſes, that this writer differed not a little from Herodotus, and even from Xenophon, who was univerſally held to have written more knowingly on the affairs of the eaſt, and particularly of thoſe of Perſia, than any of the Greeks; but ſo it is, that Xenophon, as well as Cteſias, has been ſuſpected of mingling fiction with true hiſtory, becauſe he has not repreſented the Perſians as an ignorant barbarous people, plunged in ſenſuality and ſloth, according to the uſual cuſtom of his countrymen. Beſides his Perſian hiſtory, Cteſias wrote alſo an indian hiſtory wherein, it is generally agreed, there are a great many ſtrokes of fable; this indian (55) Biblioth. lib. ii. p. 109 (56) In Exped. Cyri. p. 226.

(57) In. leg. (58) Hiſt. Anim. lib. viii. c. 28.

ters do, from Turk the eldeſt ſon of Japhet; he proceeds thus: "Turk was a man of ſuperior genius, having been "the firſt who invented many of the conveniencies of "life; he made himſelf tents, and pitched upon a fixed "reſidence in a place called at preſent Iſachkoll, he had "four ſons; 1. Taunak; 2. Zakale; 3. Benſazar; 4. "Amlak. At his death he appointed his ſon Taunak for "his ſucceſſor, who became a very rich and ingenious "prince, author of many fine inventions. It happened "one day, that Taunak having gone a hunting and killed "much dian hiſtory of his has exceedingly hurt the credit of his other writings, and ſeems to be the true ſource of thoſe ſevere cenſures, which many, and eſpecially modern, authors have paſſed on this famous hiſtorian. Photius at the end of his abſtract gives us this character of the writer we are ſpeaking of; "The "ſtile of Cteſias, ſays he, though it is extremely plain and ſim-"ple, is far from being unpleaſant; he uſes the Ionic dialect, "not every where as Herodotus does, but in ſome words only, "for the ſake of varying his language; what is objected to him "of his frequently running into fabulous ſtories, is not without "grounds, eſpecially in what he has written concerning India. "The delightfulneſs of this hiſtory ariſes chiefly from his diſ-"poſition of facts, which are ſo placed, as continually to ſur-"prize the reader, and keep his attention engaged: even his "moſt fabulous accounts being adorned with a pleaſant and "eaſy eloquence (59)". Beſides theſe large exracts, there are various fragments of this author to be met with in the works of Athenæus (60), Apollonius (61), Plutarch (62), Ælian (63), Stephanus Byzantius (64), &c. It would conſtrain us to draw this note into too great a length, ſhould we ptetend to ſhew wherein this author differs with the Greek writers, or wherein he agrees with the oriental authors, treating of the Perſian hiſtory; for the ſatisfaction, however, of the inquiſitive peruſer, we ſhall ſubjoin a ſhort account of thoſe reigns which interfere with the foregoing ſections of the Median and Perſian empires.

Cyrus is by him ſaid to have married Amythis, and to have had two ſons Cambyſes and Tanyoxarces; he allows him to have reigned thirty years, and ſays, that he died of a wound received in battle.

Cambyſes, according to him, married Roxana, and, after a reign of eighteen years, died of a wound which he caſually gave himſelf in the thigh.

The

(59) Phot. Biblioth, Art. lxxii. p. 106. (60) Deipnoſophiſt. x. (61) Hiſtor. Mirab. xx. (62) In Vita Artaxer. (63) De Animal. Natura, lib. vii. c. 1. (64) Voce Δυρεαιοι

" much game, ordered a piece to be roaſted; but when " he was juſt going to eat ſome of it, he by chance let a " bit drop upon the ground, and having taken it up and " put it to his mouth, he found it delicious by reaſon a " grain of ſalt had ſtuck to it; which having given him
" to underſtand, that this land was impregnated with ſalt,
" he ſet himſelf to improve this diſcovery, and became
" the firſt inventor of the uſe of ſalt, no one before him
" having known what ſalt was, or that it could ſeaſon
" victuals. Cotemporary with him reigned a prince in " the country of Iran, called Cajumars or Keyomaras.
" Taunak lived 240 years, and at his death left his throne
" to his ſon Ielza Chan, who lived many years, and be" fore his death appointed his ſon Dibbakin Chan to ſuc" ceed him. Dibbakin Chan lived alſo a long time, and
" diſpoſed of the ſucceſſion before his death to his ſon
" Kajak Chan, who reigned a great length of years, and " had for his ſucceſſor after his death his ſon Alanza Chan.
" From the days of Japhin and his deſcendants to the time
" of Alanza Chan, the true religion was preſerved, and
" during

The Magian, ſtiled by the Greek writers Smerdis, is by him called Sphendadates; he computes his reign to have laſted only ſeven months, and to have been ſlain by ſeven conſpirators.

Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, reigned thirty-one years, died of a ſickneſs which laſted thirty days, and left his empire to his ſon Xerxes.

Xerxes had to wife Amyſtris; his children were Dariæus, Hyſtaſpes, Artaxerxes, Achæmedides, Artarius, Amytis, and Rhodoguna; this king was ſlain by Artapanus and Spamitres.

Artaxerxes, his wife's name was Damaſpia; he reigned forty-two years, left but one legitimate ſon, viz. Xerxes, but ſeventeen by concubines, of whom Secyndianus and Ochus afterwards ſucceeded him.

Xerxes the ſecond he held the regal dignity forty-five days and was deſtroyed by a conſpiracy.

Secyndianus, after a reign of ſix months and twenty-five days was ſmothered in aſhes.

Ochus, called alſo Dariæus, married Pariſatis, he reigned thirty five years, and had the following children, viz. Arſaces, Cyrus, Artoſtes, Oxendras, and thirteen others; he died of a languiſhing diſeaſe at Babylon.

Arſaces, this is the ſame prince whom the Greek writers ſtile Artaxerxes Mnemon; he overcame his brother Cyrus, his wife's name was Stateira; and in his time Cteſias reſided in Perſia, and compiled his hiſtory (65).

(65) Photii. Biblioth. p. 135, 136.

" during the reign of this prince his ſubjects lived in a " profound peace, having great abundance of all ſorts of " riches [d]." From this paſſage it is evident, that the records of Tartary mention this Keyomaras juſt where the Perſian hiſtorians place him; and it is likewiſe plain, that the belief of the true religion is reported by the ſame records to have remained untainted in theſe countries, which is exactly what our Perſian writers ſay; the ſame author agrees with them in many other things, ſuch as making Sam, i. e. Shem, and his deſcendants the original inhabitants of Iran or Perſia, and in acknowledging Huſhſhangh, the grandſon of Keyomaras his ſucceſſor: he relates likewiſe the wars carried on by the deſcendants of Turk againſt the monarchs of Iran, and proportions the reigns of thoſe Khans to the reigns of the kings of Perſia mentioned in the foregoing hiſtory. In Dr. Hyde's learned book of the religion of the antient Perſians, there are many Arabic and other hiſtorians quoted in ſupport of ſuch paſſages of the antient Perſian hiſtory, as he has occaſion to touch on in that work. It is true, that learned and judicious writer is far from conceiving, that all theſe oriental hiſtorians have delivered ought to be taken on truſt; on the contrary, he points out many of their errors, as he does alſo thoſe of the Greek writers, whence he argues, as we do after him, that intire credit ought to be given to neither, but that the likelieſt method for attaining truth is to read and compare both [e]. Secondly, the whole ſeries of antient hiſtory teaches, that in the moſt remote ages of the world theſe countries were very populous, and under the dominion of potent monarchs; this is exactly conformable to what our writers of the Perſian hiſtory and other oriental authors affirm; ſo that we muſt either renounce that opinion, which has hitherto been generally entertained, of theſe eaſtern countries being firſt and moſt fully peopled, or we muſt admit, that theſe accounts are probable, if it were in reſpect only to this point. Thirdly, there remain of the antient Perſians, thoſe poor diſtreſſed creatures who are now ſtiled Perſees, as ſo many living witneſſes of the truth of this hiſtory. We can no way avoid affording our belief to this propoſition, that the religion they profeſs is the very ſame which their anceſtors held in the reign of Yazdegherd; and if ſo, we muſt trace this religion from their their accounts, thoſe of their conquerors, and ſuch as are to be met with among their neighbour nations. Now the the Perſees, as well thoſe in India as thoſe which ſtill remain in their own country, affirm ſteadily, that it was ſettled by Keyomaras, reformed by Zerduſht, and ſo continued till the diſſolution of the empire of the native Perſians. The modern Perſians and the Arabic hiſtorians acknowledge theſe facts to be ſo; they are likewiſe admitted by ſuch of the oriental chriſtian writers as have come to our knowledge: we may therefore conclude, that there is not ſo much in this third objection as at firſt ſight there may ſeem; but that, conſidering the nature of the thing, this hiſtory has as ſtrong evidence in its favour as any other hiſtory of equal antiquity, excepting that of the Hebrews; a propoſition which we long ago undertook to prove, and which we have hitherto proſecuted with no ſmall pains. The reader will no doubt take notice of ſome deviations in this ſection from our extraordinary method, and of frequent recapitulations of facts, which have drawn this ſection to an extraordinary length; but at the ſame time we hope it will be obſerved, that this is a ſubject that hath hitherto been untouched, a ſcene of confuſion, wherefrom little was expected; if therefore it has coſt an unuſual trouble to give it ſome form, it ought to be excuſed, ſince tranſactions of this nature agree with the old mode of reducing Chaos, wherein there was firſt motion, and then light. The firſt is here, the latter may come in time; hitherto oriental hiſtories have been confined to the learned languages, and, like books of alchimy, been deſpiſed as trifles by ſome, and eſteemed as treaſures by others. Of their value we pretend not to decide, it was our buſineſs to bring them here, to place them in the view of our Engliſh reader in the beſt method we could; and having done this, we are to leave them to the judgment of the public.

[d] P. 1. ch. ii. p. 6. [e] Hyde, H. R. vet. P. in Præf.

CHAP.

A MAP of the MIGRATION

the Forn

A MAP of the MIGRATIONS and SETTLEMENTS of the CELTES, OR GOMERIANS, and SCYTHIANS; the Former in EUROPE, and the latter in ASIA.

S. W. Sculp.t

CHAP. XII.

The Hiſtory of the Scythians and Gomerians, their Migrations into Europe, under the ſeveral names inſerted in the Margin *.

* viz. the former of Scythians, Celto-Scythes, Sarmatians, Maſſagetes &c. the latter of Gomerians, Cymmerians, Celtes, Galatians, Gauls, Titans, Sacks, and Celtiberians.

SECT. I.

An Inquiry into the Origin, Antiquity, Migrations, and Settlements of the Scythians and Gomerians, conſidered as two diſtinct Nations, by way of Introduction to their Hiſtory.

Celtes and Scythians deſcended from Japhet.

THESE two nations are ſo blended in antient hiſtory, that it would be next to impoſſible to aſſign their different territories, or give their hiſtory with any tolerable clearneſs, without previouſly tracing them to their diſtinct originals, taking a curſory retroſpect of their migrations and ſettlements, and conſidering each of them under thoſe various names, by which they are mentioned by antient hiſtorians. We have already ſeen at the beginning of this hiſtory, that they were both deſcended from Gomer †, the eldeſt ſon of Japhet. This laſt we have alſo proved to have been the eldeſt ſon of Noah *, and to have received this peculiar bleſſing from his father, that God would enlarge his borders [a], upon which account Moſes obſerves immediately after, that the iſles of the Gentiles, by which is underſtood Europe, was divided by, or among his poſterity [b]. This perhaps is what induced Beroſus and thoſe who have followed him, to make ſuch deſperate haſte to ſettle Gomer's children in Italy, Aſturia, Biſcay, and other parts of Europe, even ſo early as 142 years after the flood. Hence others, no leſs ſanguine, have ventured to bring Gomer

† See Vol. I. p. 467. & ſeq. * Ibid. p. 348. [a] Genes. ix. 27. [b] Ibid. x. 5. See Vol. I. p. 467.

Gomer intoGaul, Tubal, unto Spain, Aſkenaz intoGermany, and Magog into Sweden or Denmark [c]. Theſe precipitate migrations ſtand ſufficiently confuted by their palpable impoſſibility [d] (A), were there nothing elſe to diſprove them. But nothing appears more certain, than that thoſe patriarchs never came out of Aſia. On the contrary, we find their deſcendants making a conſiderable figure in that cradle of the world, and ſettling themſelves as near as they conveniently could to one another, till ſcantineſs of room, want of paſturage, accidental diſcords, or ſome other reaſons, obliged them to branch out further on all ſides towards Europe and northern Aſia, whilſt the deſcendants of Shem and Ham enlarged their territories in their ſeveral allotments, in the ſouthern parts of Aſia and Africa, as we have already ſeen in their ſeveral hiſtories.

To make the ſame appear the more clearly with reſpect to the ſons of Gomer, let us now take a ſhort retroſpect of their firſt ſettlements in Aſia, their migrations thence into Europe, their ſucceſſive ſtations before they came into thoſe parts in which they ſettled themſelves into regular kingdoms and governments; and from which ſome of them returned again into Aſia in proceſs of time, where they gave names to countries, cities, mountains, and rivers, which have cauſed ſuch a confuſion in antient hiſtorians, for want of rightly diſtinguiſhing between thoſe two diſtant migrations. This circumſtance makes it very neceſſary to examine, in the firſt place, whether the Scythians and the Gomerians, properly ſo called, were originally the ſame ſame, or two diſtinct nations. Without ſuch a previous inquiry, we ſhall find their names, countries, and exploits ſo confuſed, that it would be next to impoſſible to ſettle their geography, or underſtand their hiſtory, with any ſatisfactory clearneſs.

[c] Pezron. Antiq. Celt. chap. 3. [d] Vid. int. al. Rawl. hiſt. p. i. c. 8. ſect. 3. Bochart. Phaleg. lib. iii. c. 8. & ſeq. Pezron. ubi. ſup.

(A) Nothing indeed were more abſurd, than to ſuppoſe, that they ſeparated themſelves from the reſt before the general diſperſion at Babel; and if immediately after, how little time ſoever be allowed for the building of that ſtupendous fabrick the remainder will be vaſtly too ſhort for a migration of near 3000 miles, thro' woods, foreſts, and deſarts; and with all the incumbrance of their families, cattle, and other luggage; for ſo far Sir Walter Rawleigh has proved it to be by land, in the place above quoted. It were ſtill more monſtrous to ſuppoſe, that they could come into Europe by ſea, with ſuch a numerous retinue, ſo long before any thing of navigation, even by coaſting, was known.

WE have formerly hinted at the different opinions of the learned concerning this point *, which ſeems chiefly to be owing to theſe two cauſes. 1. That none of the ſacred hiſtorians mention theſe two nations by any other names than that of their progenitor [e]; and 2. That prophane authors have been ſo confounded by their variety of names, migrations, and exploits, in ſeveral parts of Aſia as well as Europe, and particularly by the affinity of thoſe names which they gave in both places, to towns, rivers, mountains, and the like, in their driving one another out of their territories, which they often did by turns; that it is not eaſy to know whether they ſpoke of the ſame nation under different names, or of two diſtinct ones. Sure it is, that if they meant the latter, they have moſt egregiouſly confounded them, by aſcribing names, places, and exploits to the one, which belonged to the other, which makes it extremely difficult to diſcover when they ſpeak of the Scythians, and when of the Celtes or Gomerians. At leaſt it is evident, that Herodotus, Ptolemy, and Juſtin [f], to name no more, have called the Scythians, who remigrated into Aſia, by ſome names, and attributed ſome actions and places to them, which, upon cloſer examination, are found to have belonged to the Celtes or Gomerians, whom they had driven thither out of their European territories. An accurate antient geographer tells us [g], that the old Greek hiſtorians gave the name of Scythians and Celto-Scythians to all the inhabitants of the northern regions, though it is plain, that a conſiderable part of them were properly Celtes or Gomerians [h]. And in the ſame book he adds, that thoſe people who inhabited beyond the Caſpian ſea, which ſhould be the Scythians, were by the ſame Greek hiſtorians called ſome Sacks, and others Maſſagetes, ſagetes, though the former of theſe names, at leaſt, belonged only to the Celtes, as we ſhall ſhew in its proper piace.

* Vol. I p. 467. 468. & ſeq. [e] Vid. int. al. Ezek. xxxviii. 2. 3, 6. [f] See Ptolem. Geogr. lib. vi. c. 11. & 13. Herodot. lib. i. & 4. Juſtin. lib. 1. c. 8. & ſeq. [g] Strab. Geogr. lib. ii. [h] Vid. Genebr. 1949. Lewis's Introduct. in Hiſt. Britan. cap. iii. Pezron. ubi ſup. Jun. in Geneſ. x. 2.

For theſe reaſons, many learned men have choſen to reckon them as one people, branched out into that variety of names and characters, under which they are diſtinguiſhed in hiſtory. Notwithſtanding which, and the ſilence of the ſacred books, Joſephus's authority has been more univerſally received both by antient fathers and modern authors; who affirms, the Celtes and Gauls to be deſcended from Gomer, and the Scythians from Magog his next brother [i]; and we think very juſtly too. As to the firſt, there is not the leaſt reaſon to doubt of it; for, beſides the teſtimony of the Jewiſh hiſtorian, we have this undoubted proof, that, notwithſtanding all the various denominations which they have undergone, and which ſeem rather to have been given to them by any other nations than aſſumed by themſelves (B); they have ſtill preſerved

[i] Antiq. l. 1. c. 7. Vid. Hieron. Theodoret. & al. in Geneſ. x. 2. Bochart. Phaleg. l. iv. c. 38. Rawl. ubi. ſup. p. 1. c. 8. ſect. iv. Jun. Le Clerc. Patric. in Geneſ. x. 2. Pezron. ubi ſupra, c. iv. & al. mult.

(B) By theſe names we mean, not only thoſe which were a palpable corruption of their original one, ſuch as Cymbrians, Cymmerians, Cammerians, and the like; but thoſe of Celtes, Gauls, Galatians, Titans, Sacks, and perhaps alſo thoſe of Scythians, Celto-Scythians, Celtiberians, and ſome others; all which, if we may gueſs at them by their etymons, ſeem to have been given to them, ſome out of compliment and on account of their valour, and others out of contempt and in revenge for their incurſions, plunders, and conqueſts. Thus the word Celtæ, in Greek κελται or κελτοι, ſignifying horſemen in Homer and Pindar, might be given them on account of their great expertneſs in horſemanſhip (1).

Another author (2) derives that word, and that of Gaul, from the Celtic, in which both ſignify a warlike man. Bochart conjectures, that they were called Gauls and Galatians from the redneſs of their hair (3).

That of Titans may either allude to it, as it was a name of the ſun, whoſe etymon can no where be ſo appoſitely found as in the Celtic, which Ti or Ty, ſignifies a Houſe, and Tan, or Taen, Fire, and both together, The houſe of fire. Some, however, fetch it from the Celtic Tit, which in that as well as in the Hebrew, ſignifies duſt or dirt; ſo that Τιτανες ſhall ſignify

(1) Vid. Goodwin. Not. in Comm. Cæſar. lib. i. c. 1. Not. 3.
(2) Pezron. Antiq. Nat. Celt. chap. 3. (3) Phaleg. lib. iii. c. 6.

ſerved their original name of Gomro, or Cymro, or deſcendants of Gomer; and retain it to this day in all thoſe countries where the Celtic or Gomerian language is preſerved; which is therefore called Gomeraeg or Cymbraeg, that is, the language of Gomer [k].

To all this we may add the concurrent teſtimony of Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, Dionyſius of Alexandria, or rather Charax, Mela, and others, who mention them under the names of Comarians, Camarians, Chomarians, Cymbrians, Cymmerians, and ſuch like; all which do plainly appear to be a corruption of their original name of Gomerians [l]. We have likewiſe the authority of ſome antient fathers, who agree, that Gomer was the father and founder of the Gomerians, called afterwards Celtes, Galatians, and Gauls [m]. And if all this be not enough to prove the Celtes to be derived from Gomer, we ſhall add another pregnant argument out of Cluverius, who proves, that the antient Celtic nation, which according to him included the regions of Illyria, Germany, Gallia, Spain, the Britannic and other northern iſles, did all ſpeak the ſame language [n], which could be no other nify the ſame as terrigenæ, or children of the earth or dirt. This laſt etymon, if admitted, may be ſuppoſed to have been given them in ſcorn, and to imply the baſeneſs of their origin, as that of Sacks, which ſignifies thieves and plunderers, was given them on account of their living chiefly by that trade.

[k] Pezron. Lewis, & al. ubi ſupra. [l] Ptolem. lib. vi. c. 11—13. Mel. ubi ſupra. Plin. lib. vi. c. 16. Dion. per. v. 700. [m] Hieron. tradit. hæbr. in Geneſ. Euſtat. Com. in Examer. Isidor. orig. lib. ix. c. 2. Zonar. Bed. & al. [n] Antiq. German. lib. i. c. 6. & ſeq. & Introd. ad Geogr. l. ii. c. 5. & ſeq.

That of Celtiberians, or inhabitants of Celtiberia, or Spain, might be deſigned to diſtinguiſh thoſe Celtes on that, from thoſe of this, ſide of the Pyrenees, as we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew in another note. For thus we find Gallia or Gaul divided into Cis and Trans alpina, and the word Iberia ſeems derived from the old Celtic and Teutonic Iber, which ſignifies over (4); and thus Spain, which is ſometimes found in the plural number, was divided into Citerior and Ulterior.

Other etymologies of their names we omit, becauſe authors have been too apt to fetch them from other languages, in order to make them ſquare with their own hypotheſes, becauſe they were ignorant of the Celtic, from which it is moſt natural to derive them, as ſhall be further proved in due time.

(4) Vid. Cluver. lib. ii. c. 3.

than the Gomeraeg, or the language of Gomer, which had been univerſally preſerved among all his deſcendants, as we ſhall ſhew more fully when we come to ſpeak of their language and hiſtory. To all theſe we ſhall add at the bottom ſome authentic monuments, which the warlike deſcendants of Gomer and his brethren have left in their various ſettlements, which ſtill more corroborate what we have ſaid concerning their origin, migrations, and ſettlements (C).

WERE we as well acquainted with the Scythian nation, with reſpect to theſe two particulars, it would not be difficult to trace it to its fountain-head, and to diſpel that obſcurity which we find in antient authors concerning them, who, as we hinted before, have too much confounded them with the Gomerians. However, we are not without ſome additional proofs to the teſtimony of Joſephus, who affirms them to be deſcended from Magog above-mentioned, and for which he has been followed by many of the fathers and by a greater number of moderns [o]. For firſt

[o] Hieron. Auguſt. Euſtat. Theodor. Bed. Joſeph. Ben-gor. Judæi fer. omn. Jun. Bochart. Rawleigh. Munst. Heylin. Patric. & al. innum.

(C) Thus the Gomerians left their name to the Albanian mountains, when they exchanged them for the more pleaſant plains of Phrygia; and to a city of this province, which in Pliny's time was ſtill called Cymmeris. Aſkenas Gomer's ſon gave his to the Sinus Aſkanicus, to a lake and river of the ſame name, and in the leſſer Phrygia to a city and province, and to the Inſulæ Aſkanicæ.

From Riphath, another of his ſons, we have the Riphean nation and country, ſince called Paphlagonia, and from Togarma, his youngeſt ſon, whom the Greek verſion calls Θοργαμα and Τοργαμα. the Trogmans or Trocmans of Cappadocia and Pontus; all theſe the reader may further ſee in the learned Bochart (5).

In like manner Magog, Meſhech, and Tubal, whoſe bands are joined together by the prophet (6), have left their names to ſeveral countries bordering upon thoſe of Gomer; as Magog to the Gogarens, Meſhech, or, as he is called by the ancients, Moſoch, to the mountains Moſchici between Colchis and Armenia; and mentioned by Ptolemy, Piiny, and Mela; as the reader may ſee it further proved in Bochart above quoted.

(5) Phaleg. lib. iii. c. 8. & ſeq. Rawleigh, Heylin, Pezron, & al. Vid. & ſup. Vol. I. p.467, 468. & ſeq. (6) Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. 1.

firſt, we find ſome antient monuments of that patriarch, and of his two brothers Meſhech and Tubal, in the neighbourhood of his brother Gomer, in the regions of leſſer Aſia, where they planted themſelves after the diſperſion (D). Secondly, As they ſpread themſelves towards Europe, and Gomer's deſcendants turned towards the north weſt, ſo thoſe of Magog may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have ſpread themſelves towards the north-eaſt into both Scythias, where we find ſome plain foot-ſteps of their progenitor, beſides the name of Mogli, which was that of the antient Moſcovites and Tartarians (E); and ſeems only a eorruption or abbreviation of Magogli, the ſons of Magog. To theſe we may add, Thirdly, that there is ſcarce a nation under heaven that ſo fully anſwers the warlike, bloody, and dreadful character, which the ſcriptures

(D) Of this kind are the provinces of Mongog or Mongug, Congigo, Gigwi, and ſome others; and the cities of Gyngui, Angui, Gorgangoi and Goigui in Tartary †.

(E) Accordingly, we do ſcarcely find any part of Europe in which ſome of theſe are not mentioned by antient geographers and (7) hiſtorians, under the names of Gomerians, Cymbrians, Celtes, Celtiberians, Celto-Scythians, and ſuch like, as we ſhall more fully ſee in the ſequel.

As for Iberia or Spain, Joſephus doth indeed affirm, that it was firſt peopled by the Thobalines, or ſons of Tubal or Thobal, as he calls him (8), who was the fifth ſon of Japhet (9). On the other hand, Sir Walter Rawleigh thinks it more probable, that it was firſt inhabited by the Africans, who did from thence conceive ſuch fondneſs for it, that they have been ever ſince ſtriving from time to time to regain it (10). But we ſee no reaſon for preferring either of theſe opinions to the concurrent teſtimony of the authors above quoted; to which we may add, that the firname of Celto, given to that province, and that of Celtiberians or Celt-iberians to its inhabitants, doth make it much more probable, that the Celtes were the firſt peoplers of it, eſpecially if we conſider, that the name of Iberia ſignifies in the old Celtic and Teutonic, over, or on the other ſide, as we hinted in a former note. So that the Celtiberians might mean only Celtes on the other ſide of the Pyreneans, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe on this ſide (11).

† Vid Bochart. ubi ſupra. & al. ſup. citat. (7) Vid. Joſeph. Antiq. i. c. 7. Ptolem. Geogr. lib. vi. c. 11. & 13. & alib. Mela. lib. i. c. 2. iii. c. 2. Cæſ. Comm. c. i. Plin. lib. vi c. 16. Strab. D. Sicul. & al. (8) Ant. lib. i. c. 7.. (9) Geneſ. x. 2. (10) Hiſt. chap. 8. ſect. 3. & ſeq. (11) See above Note B.

give us of Gog and Magog, as that of the barbarous Scythian; upon all theſe accounts therefore we hope, we may venture with Joſephus to derive them from that patriarch.

HAVING thus far cleared the way, and diſentangled, as much as poſſible, the intricacy of antient authors concerning theſe two nations, we ſhall now proceed to add ſomething of their different migrations from Aſia into Europe, which will ſtill give a further light to what has been ſaid already. The reader may remember, that we formerly ſettled Gomer, their common progenitor, with his deſcendants about him, in the province of Phrygia [p]: Aſknenaz his eldeſt ſon, or, according to the Armenians, Togarmah his youngeſt, or, it may be, both of them, in Armenia; and Riphath the ſecond ſon in Cappadocia; or, in ſome province in the neighbourhood of Phrygia [q]. For the condition the young world was then in would not permit them to go far from each other at firſt; and when their increaſe made it afterwards neceſſary to enlarge their territories, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that they kept a correſpondence with each other, by means of thoſe rivers along whoſe banks both they and their deſcendants were forced to pitch their tents, for the convenience of paſture for their numerous herds [r]; even when they began to ſpread themſelves further and wider into Europe, they ſeem to have moved regularly, and in columns, without interfering one with another, and as it were, by a ſettled contract. For in proportion to their advancing northward, we find the Gomerians, who had taken the left hand, inſenſibly ſpreading themſelves weſtwards, towards Poland, Hungary, Germany, France, and ſo quite up to Spain, whilſt the Scythians, or deſcendants of Magog, moved to the right eaſtward, towards Moſcovy and Tartary, as far as the borders of Cathai, if not beyond.

THUS

[p] See vol. i. p. 469. &c. Bochart. ubi ſupra. l. iii. c. 8.

[q] Vid. Euſeb. Loc. Hebr. &

[r] See Rawl. hiſt. ubi ſup. ſect. vi.

It is likewiſe more natural to ſuppoſe, that the warm ſituation of Spain might invite the Celtes thither from the more northern climates of Europe, than that the Africans could come thither ſo early by ſea; unleſs we can ſwallow that ridiculous Spaniſh tradition, which makes Tubal to have croſſed over thither, and to have built the town of St. Vaal, which is ſtill ſtanding at this day (12).

(12) Hiſt. of the world, ubi ſup. ſect. 4.

THUS was all Europe, and the far greater part of Aſia, their utmoſt extent northward, peopled by thoſe two famous nations, the former almoſt wholly by the Celtes or Gomerians, that is from the utmoſt parts of Spain to Scythia Europeana eaſtward, and the latter from thence almoſt to the territories of China, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. So that the whole extent of theſe two nations reached from the 10th degree weſt to the 8th eaſt longitude, and in latitude from the 40th degree quite up to the artic circle.

UPON the whole then, it appears, that the firſt rank belongs to the noble Celtic nation, as deſcended from the elder brother, tho' the preference has been given to the Scythians by the univerſal vote of profane authors, who were unacquainted, that their progenitor was Gomer's younger brother. Scytharum gens antiquiſſima was even a proverb among them; upon which account we gave them the firſt rank in the plan of this hiſtory. But being now convinced of the contrary, and we hope that our readers are ſo by this time, we ſhall reſtore it to its right owners the Celtes, who claim it on account not only of their elderſhip, but much more on that of their ſuperior merit; as will appear more fully from the hiſtory of both.

SECT. II.

The Hiſtory of the Celtes, under the names of Gomerians, Cymmerians, Cymbrians, Celtes, Gauls, Galatians, Titans, Sacks, &c.

WE have already ſpoken of the migrations of theſe ſons of Gomer, from Aſia into Europe, and endeavoured to account, as well as we could, for their variety of names in the laſt ſection; wherein we obſerved their regular progreſs from Phrygia their firſt ſettlement, through Thrace, Hungary, Germany, Gallia, Italy, till they had ſpread themſelves to the utmoſt borders of Spain. In this large European tract it was, that, having fixed their boundaries between the Scythians and themſelves, they began to appear a powerful nation under a regular monarchy, and gave their country, or others for them, the name of Gallia and Gallatia, whilst themselves did retain their own antient name of Gomero, or Gomerians. As for those of Cymmerians, &c. which seems only a corruption of that, it is observable, that it was given to none of the Celtes, but those who inhabited the more northern regions of Europe, above the Euxine sea and the north of the Danube, where they were less known and intermixed. Thus that part of Germany now known by the name of Holstein was called Cymbria Kersonesus. The names of Titans and Sacks were given only to those of lesser Asia, so that they seem to have been only known in this part of Europe by those of Celtes and Gauls (A). The name of Galatians, γαλαται, was given them also by the Greeks, but it is plain, it meant the same with the Gauls, and accordingly antient authors make them descended from the same father, namely Gomer. It was not, however, in this tract of ground they began to be famous for their warlike exploits; they had already signalized their names in several parts of the both higher and lower Asia, where, it is likely, they began very early to be governed by several valiant princes of their own, and this is the reason that we find the name of Gomerians and Gomarites, as well as those of Sacks and Titans, in those parts among antient geographers, which names were afterwards changed to that of Celtes, after their spreading themselves into Europe,

The various names of the Celtes.

[a] See Pezron. Ant. Celt. Nat. c. 2.

(A) Cæsar, in his commentaries, doth indeed tell us, that they took the name of Celtes to themselves, whilst the Romans did give them that of Galli or Gauls (1), not knowing in all likelihood, that they both signified the same thing in the old Celtic, namely warriors (2). We would not depend too much upon uncertain etymologies, though we have ventured to give some other sense of these two names; as they are fetched from other languages, and indeed there is nothing more easy than to find in all languages such likeness of sounds as Gauls and Galli, Celtes and κελεται, though of such different meanings, as to make it very dubious, which is the right etymon. At least those are the most likely to be the truest, which are derived from the language itself unto whom the name belongs; excepting, however, such of them as, we observed there, were given in contempt and by way of reproach, as that of Sacks or Robbers. But here it is certain, that the Celtes made too great a figure in the world, long before Gæsar's time, to have been called Galli in derision.

(1) lib. 1. (2) Vid. Pezron, Ch. ii.

Europe, as will more fully appear by the ſequel. But thoſe early exploits are ſo intricate, and built ſo much upon conjecture, that it would be dangerous to rely too ſtrenuouſly upon them. At the moſt, it is plain, that theſe Aſiatic conqueſts did not remain long enough in their poſſeſſion to deſerve a place in this geography of their country. Thoſe exploits will be beſt reſumed in the hiſtory of thoſe nations with whom they had to do. Whilſt we confine their territories at preſent within thoſe limits of Europe in which we can ſpeak of their actions with much greater certainty (B).

Their Territories.

It is not eaſy to fix the exact boundaries, which divided the Celtes from the European Scythians, for the reaſons given in the laſt ſection. We may perhaps be more particular, when we come to the geography of the latter. At preſent we ſhall only obſerve, that the former extended from the Danube, their ſuppoſed boundary, to the fartheſt part of Spain and Portugal, reaching at leaſt three degrees from eaſt to weſt, that is from that famous river

[b] Comp. Joſeph. Ant. Jud. l. i. c. 7. Euſtat. Comm. in Examer. Hieron. tradit. hæbr. in Geneſ. ix. Iſidor. Origin. l. ix. c. 2. & Pezron. ubi. ſup. [c] Vid. Ptolem. Strab. Mela. & al.

(B) We muſt not, however, omit taking notice, that when the prophet threatens the Jews with bringing Gomer and his armies againſt them from the north quarters (3), he ſeems to intimate, that there were ſtill ſome of the deſcendants of that patriarch ſettled in ſome of the northern parts of higher Aſia even in his time, and that they continued there till the fulfilling of the prophecy, that is, till ſome years after the Babyloniſh captivity, when they made the terrible irruption into Paleſtine, of which we ſhall ſpeak in its proper place.

Accordingly we find Ptolemy placing the Chamarians and Comarians as two diſtinct nations, though originally the ſame; the firſt with Chamara, their ſuppoſed metropolis, in Bactria along the ſouth banks of the river Oxus; and the latter a little further north in the province of Sogdiana (4). Mela, though he differs ſomewhat from Ptolemy in their ſituation, doth agree in placing them in the northern provinces of Aſia (5), where we may have occaſion to viſit them again in the ſequel of this hiſtory, as well as the Sacks another branch of the Celtes, whom Strabo, (6) places a little farther weſtward in Cappadocia along the ſouth coaſt of the Euxine ſea.

(3) Ezek. xxxviii, 6. (4) Ptol. lib. vi. c. 11. & 13. (5) Libi, c. 2. (6) Lib. xi.

river to cape Feneſtre. It was bounded on the ſouth by the Mediterranean ſea, and weſt and north-weſt by the weſtern and northern ocean. How far it extended full north, whether to the Hyperborean or frozen ſea, or only to the Baltic, we preſume not to ſay. The laſt, however, ſeems moſt probable, for reaſons we ſhall give in the hiſtory of Scythia. For it is probable, they did not advance towards Sweden, Denmark, and the other more northern regions, till they found themſelves too ſtreightned in the more pleaſant climates of the ſouth; which did not happen in all likelihood till many centuries after their migration into Europe. However, it is certain, that in the time of Julius Cæſar, not only they, but alſo the northern iſlands of Britain, Ireland, and even Iceland, were inhabited, and made part of the Celtic Gallia. As for the ſouthern iſlands on the Mediterranean, ſuch as Sicily, Corſica, Majorca, and others, we need not doubt, but they were much ſooner peopled than thoſe on the northern ocean.

Geography.

So conſiderable was the Celtic nation, even in Auguſtus Cæſars time, though greatly abated of its former grandeur and ſhrunk into much narrower limits; that it contained no leſs than ſixty great people diſtinguiſhed by the names of cities or diſtricts according to Strabo. Tacitus ſays 64 [d], but this is nothing to Joſephus, who reckoned the number of theſe nations about 315 [e], or to Appianus, who made them amount to 400, and their cities, if the greateſt part of them were not really villages, to 1300. But how much greater a figure they muſt have made before that time, may be gueſſed by that notable expedition they made into Italy, in the time of Tarquin the elder, that is almoſt 600 years before Chriſt, when Belloveſus, having penetrated through the Alps, with a numerous army, did in a ſhort time invade a great part of Italy, called from them Gallia Ciſalpina. For this and their ſucceeding exploits againſt that province, and their conqueſt of its metropolis, we may juſtly look upon it as part of the Celtic or Gallic territories, tho' we ſhould grant it to have been originally peopled by ſome other nation than the deſcendants of Gomer. But this doth not ſeem to us to be the real cauſe, for though we have already ſufficiently diſcountenanced the fable of Beroſus, who brings Gomer into Italy

ſo

[d] Annal. l. 3. [e] Bell. Jud. l. 2. c. 16. [f] Vid. Reynecc, ap. Rawley hiſt. lib. ii. c. 24. Sect. 1, 2.

ſo ſoon after the flood ; yet it is much more likely, that his deſcendants were the firſt that peopled it with the reſt of Europe, it being impoſſible ſo fine a country ſhould eſcape them in their progreſſive migration, than to ſuppoſe, that either Kittim the ſon of Javan or his deſcendants were got thither before them. To make this ſtill more probable, we muſt remind our readers of two things, namely, that the Umbrians were by many antient authors eſteemed the moſt antient people in Italy *. And Pliny in the place laſt quoted tells us, that when the Hetrurians entered that country, and made war againſt the Umbrians, they deſtroyed 300 of their cities ; which proves, that they muſt have been there a conſiderable time. Our next obſervation is, that the Umbrians are affirmed by other antient hiſtorians to have been the deſcendants of the Gauls or Celtes †. And if it be ſo, it will be more reaſonable to believe, that theſe Gauls or Umbrians had already paſſed the Alps and ſettled themſelves in Italy, long before Saturn's time, ſince we find, that he made no ſcruple to go and take refuge amongſt them, and was courteouſly received by them, than to imagine, that the country was inhabited by the ſons of Javan, or, as others pretend, that the Arcadians, their ſuppoſed deſcendants, could come thither ſo early by ſea ; they who are only famous for their paſtoral life, and conſequently ſo unacquainted with navigation (C). If ever

* Florus lib. i. c. 17. Plin. l. iii. c. 14. Dionys. Halic. l. i. c. 8. com. Serv. in Virgil. † Solin. ex Bocho. Iſidor. & al. ap. Pezron. c. 10.

(C) We need not obſerve further to our readers, how fond the Arcadians were of vaunting their antiquity above all other nations, and how much they valued themſelves for their aſſumed name of Aborigines every where. Whether the Celtes did take that of Tytans or Τυτανες, one ſignification of which is almoſt of the ſame import with that of Aborigines or Terrigenæ, out of the ſame oſtentation, we would not venture to affirm after Pezron, ſeeing it is capable of another ſignification, as we ſhewed in a former note. We may ſay in general, that the etymons of the various names of Italy are manifeſtly forced, as Latium from lateo to be hid, becauſe Saturn ſheltered himſelf there, and Italy from the Greek Æolia or the Arcadian Elatus (7). Upon the whole then, thoſe who will not allow it to have been peopled at firſt by the Umbrians above mentioned, and theſe to have been a colony of the Celtes or Gomarians ; muſt be contented to remain in the dark about it.

(7) Reynecc. ub. ſup. Camden. Heylin. & al.

ver therefore either of theſe did poſſeſs themſelves of Italy, as ſome have conjectured from uncertain etymologies and ſome intricate teſtimonies from antient authors, it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe it to have been of later date, and that they drove the greateſt part of the Celtes out of it over the Alps; and this may be the reaſon of their making ſo many brave attempts to recover it out of their hands.

PLUTARCH, indeed ſpeaking of the Gallic or Celtic nation, tells us, that ſome of them paſſing over the Riphean mountains, went and dwelt towards the northern ſea, the extreme or the northern parts of Europe, whilſt others remained in the ſouth parts, between the Pyrenees and the Alps [g]. Where he adds, that having taſted of the wine that came out of Italy, they marched over the Alps, under the conduct of a malecontent, named Arron, and conquered thoſe territories which had been till then held by the Tuſcans. But the name of Celtiberia, by which Spain was antiently known, and that of the Celtic promontory, now Cape Feneſtre or Finiſter, the utmoſt verge of Spain weſtward on the one hand, and of Gallia Togata or Ciſalpina on the other, including near one third part of Italy [h] weſtward, ſhews nothing leſs than their having confined themſelves within the limits of thoſe two ridges of mountains (D). It is likely, that our author either knew nothing of theſe Celtic names, or if he did, that he thought the Celtes had been only the invaders of thoſe two provinces, rather than the firſt inhabitants of them, the contrary of which, we hope, we have ſhewn by this time to be at leaſt the more probable of the two.

UPON

[g] In vit. Camill. [h] Vid. Ptolem. ub. ſup. Mela. lib. iii. 1. 2. Cluver. & al.

(D) We could further confirm this by multitudes of names of cities, towns, rivers, mountains, capes, promontories, &c. both in Spain and Italy, which are to be met with in all the antient geographers, and many of them even extant to this day, all which, being plainly of Celtic origin, do ſhew them to have been given to them by that nation; but we ſhall refer our readers for them to the authors quoted in the margin (8).

(8) De his vid. Wott. Archæol. Lluid. lexic. Cambrobrit. Hick. lexic. Breerw. de orig. ling. Hackew. orig. nat. ſeptent. Lewis hiſt. Mag. Brit. Pezron. ubi ſup. & al mult.

UPON the whole then, the antient territories of the Celtes extended themſelves eaſt and weſt, from the head-ſpring Iſter or Danube, which divided them from the European Sarmatia (E), quite croſs Europe into Cape Finiſter and the ſtreights of Hercules now Gibraltar, and contained the following provinces, namely Iberia, now Spain and Portugal; Gallia [i] or Celto-galatia, now France, with the low countries; Germany as far as the Danube eaſtward and Denmark northward; Rhetia, Vindelicia, and Noricum, ſince Swiſſerland, Savoy, and Lombardy, and the Gallia Ciſalpina or Togata, containing that part of Italy, now Piedmont, the dutchies of Milan, Parma, Mantua, &c. and the republicks of Venice and Genoa, beſides the ſouthern and northern iſlands of Europe, which we have lately had occaſion to mention.

THESE extenſive territories had, however, been very much curtailed long before Julius Cæſar's time, having been reduced within the boundaries of the Alps and Pyrenean mountains from eaſt to weſt; by the Mediterranean on the ſouth; and by the Rhine and Britiſh ocean on the north and north-eaſt. In Cæſar's time we find it ſtill leſſened by all that tract which lies between Geneva and the Alps, which had been ſometime before added to the Roman empire, over and above the Gallia Ciſalpina lately mentioned, which they had invaded in Tarquinius Priſcus's time, and advanced almoſt as far as the middle of Italy. This Gallia, thus curtailed, was called Comata. Cæſar divided it into three nations, namely Belgæ, Aquitans, and Celtes or Gauls [k] (F). But by this time a great part of the Celtes territories had been diſmembered from it; as Spain, which had paſſed from the Carthaginians to the Romans; the Gallia Narbonenſis, which was become

[i] Vid. Polyb. lib. iii. [k] Bell. Gal. lib. i. c. 1.

(E) Herodotus ſays much the ſame thing, though in other words, when he tells us (9), that the Iſter hath its ſpring in the land of the Celetes, and traverſing the European regions enters obliquely into the borders of Scythia.

(F) Probably from the inhabitants wearing their hair long, contrary to the cuſtom of the Romans. Thus we find alſo the Gallia Citerior called Togata from the long robes, and the Ulterior or Tranſalpine Braccata from the breeches which were worn by its inhabitants.

(9) Comm. lib. ii. c. 4. & ſeq.

become a grovince of the Roman empire [1], and included all the ſouthern provinces of Gallia along the Mediterranean from the Pyrenees to the Alps: this laſt contained at leaſt Gaſcony, Languedoc, Province, and Dauphine. Nevertheleſs, theſe three diviſions were far from being all that the Celtes had left in Europe, though Cæſar has made the moſt of them in his account of that war (G). Other diviſions

[1] Bell. Gallic. lib. iii. c. 20.

(G) By which diſtinction it is plain, that he ſpeaks only of the Gallia which he conquered, and not of the whole territories of the Celtic or Gallic nation, which ſtill ſpread themſelves vaſtly further, at leaſt towards the north; and therefore, when he comes to explain himſelf, and to give the particular names of each people belonging to each of thoſe three nations, it appears, that he goes no further than his own conqueſts (10), ſo that it ſhould ſeem, as if he had affected to compliment himſelf with the ſubduing of a numerous and powerful nation, of which the Celtes, ſo famous both in Europe and Aſia, were but the third part.

It was probably out of the ſame oſtentation, that he ranks, for inſtance, 16 people under the name of Belgæ; namely the Bellovaci, or thoſe who belonged to the city or diſtrict of Beauvais; the Sueſſones thoſe of Soiſſons; Nervii now Cambraiſians; Atrebates or Artois; Ambianes or Amiens; Morini whoſe capital was Terouana; Menapii, or the Gantines, Antverpians, and Brabantines; Caletes or thoſe of the diſtrict of Caux; Velocaces, now Vexinois; Vero-manduos, or Vero-mandois, now St. Quintin; Aduatici, now not known, and variouſly gueſſed at; the Condruſi, Eburones, Cæræſi, and Pannones, concerning which we are alſo much in the dark. Now it is plain, that all this pompous liſt did take up little more than the north part of France and the Netherlands.

The ſame may be ſaid of another third, viz. Aquitain, among which he reckons twelve diſtinct people, making up in all the Gallia Armorica, ſo named from the Celtic word Armor, which ſignifies thoſe countries which are upon the ſea coaſt; this province was afterwards called by the Romans Aquitain from its mineral waters (11). And this contained at moſt the weſtern provinces of France from the river Ligeris, now Loire, to the Pyrenees, according to his own account of it in another place (12).

As to the Celtæ, to whom Cæſar tells us the Romans gave the name of Gauls, their country extended only north and ſouth from the Ligeris or Loire to the Sequana or Seine, and eaſt and weſt diviſions of Gallia, which were made by Auguſtus and other Roman emperors (H), after the conqueſt of it, will be beſt ſeen in the Roman hiſtory.

(10) Vid. Godvin. annot. in Cæſ. Comm. ibid. (11) Vid. Plin. l. iv. c. 17. (12) Comment. lib. i. c. 1. & alib.

SEAS

weſt at moſt from Burgundy to Low Britanny, including the Gallia Lugdunenſis, part of which laſt was already under the Romans. But how ſhort did all theſe three come of the Celtic territories, when ſome authors tells us, that they extended from the Pyrenees and Alps quite to the Scythians (13)? When another tells us, that all the inhabitants on each ſide of the Rhine were ſtill called Celtes (14)? ſo that all that were on the other ſide of that river were out of the boundaries of the Gallia Belgica, and much more ſo out of thoſe of the other three. Whether or no this Gallia Celtica was ſo called, and its inhabitants Celtes, in Cæſar's time, by way of excellence above the reſt, as the province of Holland is commonly taken for all the ſeven, and whether or no the other Celtes were unknown to that conqueror, we will not pretend to determine. Only it is plain, that the three Gallic provinces which he ſubdued, one of which only he diſtinguiſhes by the Celtic name, were but about one half of the whole nation even in his time,

(H) This may perhaps be thought a proper place to have ſpoken of the iſles of Great-Britain, both as they were firſt inhabited, and are ſtill in ſome parts, by the Celtes or Gomerians, which laſt name, as well as the antient language of that nation, is ſtll preſerved amongſt them, eſpecially in the north part of Wales. But as they make ſo great a figure in antient hiſtory, from their being firſt planted by ſome colonies of that nation, their hiſtory will be better referred to another book, wherein we ſhall reſume that of the weſtern and northern empires according to our firſt plan of this work.

However, it will not be amiſs to hint ſomething here concerning the name of Britain, which has been confounded by Camden and others with that of Gomro, as if they had both belonged to the ſame people; for it is certain, that the former is only to be found among the Britains in France, who call themſelves Britained, and are as great ſtrangers to the name Gomro, as the Gomros or Welſh are to that of Brithained or Briton. It ſeems therefore, that thoſe antiquaries have too lightly rejected the ſtory of Brutus coming into England and conquering the gigantic inhabitants of it, from which conqueſt that part was afterwards called Britania or Britain, which Camden and his followers will have to be derived from Brit painted and Tain region; becauſe the Britains painted their bodies, and were upon that account called by the Romans Picts or Painted.

It

(13) Diodor. l. v. c. 9. Plutarch. in vit. Camil. vid. & Mel. Cluver. & al. (14) Dio. Caſſ. l. xxxix.

SEAS of note were the Mediterranean, the weſtern, Britiſh, and northern occean, and the Baltic. Their principal lake in theſe territories is that of Geneva, which is upwards

It doth not appear at all probable, that if the Britains, who went out of England into France, had been the ſame with the Gomros, or antient inhabitans of Britain; they would have changed their original appellative, in which all the other deſcendants of Gomer did ſo pride themſelves, for the nickname of Britained or painted; much leſs, that they ſhould have quite obliterated the former, which was ſtill ſo carefully preſerved by their neighbours. But if the Trojans were themſelves a colony of the Gomerians or Welſh, as a modern author ſeems to have nearly proved (15); and theſe after the deſtruction of their city, came under Brutus, or Trotus, as he is called by Vitus, and by others Brito, and from him they were called Britains, and invaded a conſiderable part of this iſland; it will at once account for the name, and for the great affinity there is between the Gomeraes or Welſh, and the Britained or Britiſh, which laſt is objected by the antiquaries againſt the probability of the firſt.

It is therefore not only more for the honour of this nation, but alſo more reaſonable to ſuppoſe with Sir John Price (16), that theſe iſles were at firſt peopled by the antient and warlike Gomerians, than by the conquered and fugitive Trojans; for who can think, that they ſhould have been ſo long unknown to the former as 1000 years after the diſperſion; for ſo long at leaſt it was before the latter can be ſuppoſed to have come from Troy hither, by which time the others had ſpread themſelves all over Europe. And is it not alſo more probable, that theſe gave it the antient name of Albion, which in their language ſignifies white, from the whiteneſs in which the Cliffs of Dover appeared clad from the other ſide of the water, than that it received it from Albion, the brother of Borgion, the ſon of Neptune?

We may add, that Beroſus and thoſe who have followed his ſteps (17) have given us a liſt of 20 kings of Celtes who reigned in Gaul, and the greater part of them alſo over Gomeros on this ſide of the water, before Brutus. The reader will ſee by the following liſt of their names how ſeveral Cantons of Gaul might probably receive theirs from them, as Longobards from Bardus and Longus, their fifth and ſixth monarchs. Gallia Narbonenſis from Narbo; Lugdunenſis from Lugdus; the Belgic from Belgius; the Allobroges from Allobrox, &c. they run as follow:

1. Samothes

(15) Lewis Introd. in. hiſt. Britan. c. iv. & lib. ii. c. 14.
(16) Deffen's hiſt. Brit. (17) Vid. Vitus Baſinſt. hiſt. Brit. lib. i. not 25. & auct. ab eo citat.

upwards of twenty miles in length and about eight in breadth, and by its navigableneſs inriches both the city of that name and all the countries about it. To this we may add that of Serviere in high Dauphine, very remarkable upon another account. It is a good day's journey up to the Alps, and yet has been found to have a communication with another much ſmaller at eight or nine miles diſtance, and is calculated to ſtand near a half mile perpendicular lower than the former without being overflowed, or ſending out more water than a very inconſiderable ſtream, ſcarce ſufficient to turn a mill. Chief mountains are the Pyrenees and Alps, otherwiſe called Apenine, which are of very great length, and of ſuch prodigious height, that they are always covered with ſnow of incredible hardneſs. The latter we ſuppoſed by Livy and others to have been called Apenine from Hannibal. Peninus, but much more probably from the old Celtic word Pen a head, by reaſon of the exceeding height and whiteneſs of them. So that Apenine may be only a contraction of A Pen Ghwin, white heads, as the word Alps may be derived from the Celtic Alp or Alb, white.

THE chief rivers are the Iſter, which runs into Scythia and empties itſelf into the Euxine or Black Sea. The Rhine which ſprings from the mountains of Switzerland and runs through Germany and Holland into the Britiſh ſea. The Seine, Loyre, and Garonne, of which we have lately had occaſion to ſpeak, as they divided the Gallia Celtica, Belgica, and Aquitana from each other. The Durius

1. Samothes, by others called Dis & Diſcelta. 2. Magus. 3. Sarron. 4. Druis. 5. Bardus. 6. Longus. 7. Lucus. 8. Celtes. 9. Galates. 10. Narbon. 11. Lugdus. 12. Belgius. 13. Jaſius. 14. Allobrox. 15. O Egyptus. 16 Paris. 17. Olbius. 18. Galates. II. 19. Namnes. 20. Franicus.

It is true, this liſt ſeems rather to be that of the princes of ſeveral cantons of the Celtes, than a regular ſucceſſion of the kings of the whole nation, which it is not likely was governed by one ſole monarch. Nevertheleſs as they reigned either in Gaul or Britania, long before this Brutus (ſuppoſe him to have come from Troy, as will be further ſeen when we come to that part of our hiſtory) the moſt that can be ſaid of him is, that he invaded and took a great part of the latter from the Gomeros, its original inhabitants, who were thereby forced to retire further weſtward, where they have continued ever ſince.

Durius now Duero, which deſcends from the mountains of Sierra in Aſturia into the Atlantic ocean at Oporto. The Tagus or Tajo, which croſſes great part of Spain and Portugal, and falls into the ſame ocean below Olyſipon or Liſbon. The Anas now Guadiana; the Bœtis or Tarteſſus now Guadalquivir; theſe two empty themſelves in the gulph of Cadis. The Iber now Ebro, which deſcends from the ſame mountains of Sierra with the Durius, but taking a contrary courſe from it, runs eaſtward into the Mediterranean, and empties itſelf into the gulph of Valencia. The Rhodanus or Rhoſne, which hath its ſpring from the mountains of Switzerland but deſcends a contrary way, and croſſing the lake of Geneva, runs through the ſouth part of France and empties itſelf into the Mediterranean about Marſeilles; the Padus or Po, and Adeſis now Adige, which deſcend, the former from Piedmont and the latter from Switzerland, and fall at a ſmall diſtance from each other into the gulph of Venice. Thoſe of Italy and of the European iſlands will be ſeen in another chapter.

We ſhall only add, that the greateſt part of the names of theſe and of other ſmaller rivers are certainly of Celtic extraction, and agreeable to their properties. Thus Garunna from Garw, rough, expreſſes its great rapidity. Rhodanus from Rhedog, to run ſwiftly, implies its ſwift courſe. Arar now Saon is ſo called from its ſlowneſs, its deſcent into the Rhoſne being ſcarce perceptible. Durius or Duori from Dour, water or river, whence the names of a great many cities and towns ſituate near the water-ſide ended in Duro and Durum. Thus likewiſe the names of counties and diſtricts which end in Tan, or Tain, and in the Latin Tania, as Aquitain, Britain, Luſitania, &c. are formed from the Celtic Tan and Stan, a region [m], and imply the country of waters, of the Britons, and Luſians, which laſt were a Celtic people from whom came the Portugueſe. We omit a multitude of cities, towns, mountains, and other antient names which are palpably of the ſame extraction, concerning which the curious may conſult the authors above named.

Natural and artificial rarities in ſo ſpacious a field would take up too much room in this hiſtory, and are ſo well known to the curious, that we think, they may be ſafely

[m] Vid. Camden, Brit. Lewis introduct. in hiſt. Britan. Pezron. antiq. lib. iii. ſub. voc. tan. & alib.

ſafely omitted, thoſe only excepted as have ſome immediate relation with ſome remarkable facts as ſhall fall in the courſe of this hiſtory, when we come to reſume it in another chapter. One thing only we beg leave to mention here, namely the Littus Lapideum, otherwiſe the Campus Lapideus, or ſtony ſhore or field, of above a mile in length upon the coaſts of the Gallia Narbonenſis or Languedoc, where Hercules is ſaid to have fought the giant Albion, the ſon of Neptune; which place is ſtill called by the inhabitants Les Craux, from the multitude and largeneſs of ſtones with which it is covered; that word being derived from the Celtic Craig or Craic, which ſignifies rocks or ſtones [o].

[n] Hiſt. Delphinial. Lugdun. 1498. [o] Vid. Lewis Introd. in hiſt. Brit. c. iv.

SECT. III.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, cuſtoms, learning, and trade of the antient Celtes.

THO' the Celtes exceed all other nations in antiquity, their deſcent being, as we have ſeen, from Gomer the eldeſt ſon of Japhet, the eldeſt ſon of Noah, in which reſpect they outgo the Egyptians, Phrygians, and even the Scythians; yet it muſt be owned, that our knowledge of their government comes vaſtly ſhort of the two firſt, whether it be owing to the want of records, or rather to the ſlowneſs and length of their migrations into Europe, where we find them firſt ſettled, into a ſpacious and regular polity. A late antiquary [a] hath indeed attempted to prove, that upon the diſperſion of Babel, Gomer and his immediate deſcendants did preſently enter into Armenia, thence into Phrygia and Cappadocia, till at length, under the conduct of Acmon, and afterwards of his ſon Uranus, two warlike princes, they ſpread themſelves further, and ſent their colonies from leſſer Aſia even into Sparta. Chronus or Saturn, Jupiter, and Mercury or

[a] Pezron. antiq. Na. Celt. paſſ. & ch. 15.

Teutat, were their three next ſucceſſors; and it was this laſt, according to our author, who ſettled the Gomerians then called Titans in Europe into a regular government, gave them laws, and there they changed their name into that of Celtes and Gauls. According to this ſyſtem then this Gomerian polity muſt have begun about the time of Terah, Abraham's father, or even of Nahor, if Maneus be admitted to have been, as ſome hiſtorians think, the father of Acmon; tho' Saturn was the firſt who took the title of king.

ALL this our author brings proof for from antient authors, which would carry us too far to repeat; we ſhall find a proper place for the hiſtory of thoſe princes, ſince deified by a great part of the world; for the preſent we ſhall only obſerve, that nothing is more likely, than that their government was originally monarchical as well as that of other nations, ſince we find it in the ſame form even in Cæſar's time, when they had ſpread themſelves all over Europe. Only by that time they had ſo far altered the form of their government, if we may believe that hiſtorian, that inſtead of one monarch they were divided into ſeveral petty kingdoms, and did not yield the abſolute command to any one, except when their territories were threatened with invaſion from a common enemy [b]. This is further confirmed in part by another hiſtorian [c], who tells us, that the Cimmerians or northern Gomerians, being invaded by the Scythians their neighbours, called a council of their kings and people, whoſe diſagreement about defending or abandoning their country occaſioned the loſs of it, as well as the lives of thoſe who reſolved upon oppoſing the invaders. It is indeed heard to conceive, how ſo warlike a nation, extended over ſuch large tracts of ground, and in ſuch a difference of climates, ſhould continue long under one head, without ſplitting itſelf into ſeveral kingdoms; ſo that it is rather a wonder to find, that they preſerved ſo much of their antient affinity and government in Cæſar's time, as to unite themſelves under one head in caſes of common danger.

WHAT their laws were, whether reduced into a body, or depending upon the will of their ſovereign, we cannot find. We are indeed told by the antiquary abovementioned, that Mercury did poliſh and give them laws, and

[b] Comment. l. 6. &. al. Herodot. l. iv. [c] Pezron. ubi ſup.

and by others [d], that Samothes, otherwiſe called Dis and Diſcelta, a man of ſingular learning and wiſdom, and the firſt founder of the Celtic monarchy, gave them a body of laws and diſcipline, which he wrote in the Hebrew tongue but in the Phœnician character; and that the Greeks did borrow the latter from the Celtes when they re-entered Aſia. The miſtake of theſe authors in affirming, that he wrote in Hebrew, and retained that tongue above all other nations, the deſcendants of Heber excepted, may be eaſily accounted for from the great affinity there is between the Celtic and it, of which we ſhall have further occaſion to ſpeak; and as to his uſing the Phœnician character, there is nothing extroardinary in it, ſince it was the moſt univerſal at that time, and is now allowed to have been the ſame with the Samaritan or antient Hebrew. The reader may ſee what has been heretofore ſaid upon that ſubject †. It is added, that he was therefore called the Saturn of the Celtes, and that their learned men, ſuch as their divines and philoſophers, were called from him Samothei. But if ever he wrote ſuch a body of laws, it is certain we have nothing left of them, neither can we find any footſteps of either his or any other's in any author, but what are too recent to be mentioned here. However, as they very much deviated from the ſimplicity of their brethren the Scythians in their manner of life, they can no more be ſuppoſed to have been without ſome for the preſervation of property, than their warlike genius could be without martial diſcipline.

Their government.

The Curetes, of whom we ſhall ſpeak by and by, were the interpreters of their laws, judged all cauſes whether criminal or civil, and their ſentence was reckoned ſo ſacred, that whoever refuſed to abide by it was by them excluded from aſſiſting at their ſacred rites; after which no man dared converſe with him, ſo that this puniſhment was reckoned the moſt ſevere of all, even more than death itſelf.

Religion.

Their religion was very like that of the Scythians. They worſhipped the ſame gods, as Jupiter under the name of Taran, which in the Celtic ſignifies thunder. Mercury, whom ſome authors call Heus or Heſus, probably from the Celtic Huad which ſignifies a dog, and might be the Anubis latrans of the Egptians. But Mars was held in the greateſt veneration by the warlike, and Mercury by the trading part, as we ſhall ſhew in its proper place. It will not, however, be eaſy to reconcile the greateſt part of theſe Celtic deities with what Pezron ſays of them with great probability, that they were originally kings of that nation, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel. All that need be ſaid at preſent on that head is, that the Celtes after having dwindled into idolatry, like other nations, did like them deify their kings and heroes after their deaths. Thus we find the Cretans at once worſhipping Jupiter, and ſhewing his ſepulchre at the city of Gnoſſus; for which reaſon, whilſt Callimachus calls them lyars, for forging a tomb for that god, others, eſpecially the chriſtian fathers, juſtly blamed their folly for adoring him as a deity, whom they acknowledged to be interred among them. How theſe gods, or at leaſt their names, came to be adopted by other nations, will be ſhewn, when we come to ſpeak of the fabulous and heroic times; and it would be labour loſt to enquire what gods or religion the Celtes had before they deified their kings; but ſince that time we find them very much addicted to all kind of ſuperſtition, divination, aſtrology, magic, and other kinds of witcheries. The care of religion was immediately under their Curetes, ſince known by the name of Druids and Bards (A). Theſe were, as Cæſar

[d] Vid. Lewis hiſt. Brit. cap. 2. & auct ab eo citat. † See before, Vol. iii. ch. 7. ſect 4. Of the language writing, &c. of the Jews.

(A) The Curetes were among the Titanic Celtes what the Druids were afterwards among the Gauls, and were had in the ſame reverence and eſteem, inſomuch, that the education of Jupiter was committed to them, and Cres one of his ſons was of their ſociety. It is not eaſy to trace their original; and Strabo, exact and learned as he was, doth not ſeem to be ſatisfied with all he has ſaid about them (1). Their name of Curete ſeems derived from the Celtic word Curo, to ſtrike or beat one thing againſt another, whence the Greek κρουω, by the tranſpoſition of a letter, which ſignifies the ſame. And this ſeems to have been given them on account of their ſtriking their ſhields with their javelins, which an antient author tells us they did (2), when they kept young Jupiter concealed in a cave, that his jealous father might not hear his cries. But whether they went heretofore to the wars, and encouraged the combatants with this their noiſe and dances, or were exempt from that duty like the Druids, as ſome pretend (3), we will not determine. If the Druids

(1) Geogr. lib. x. (2) Apollod. Bibl. lib. i. c. 1. ap. Pezron. (3) de Bell. Gall. vid. & Lewis hiſt. Brit. c. v. Pezron. c. xiii. Heylin & al.

Cæſar tells us [e], the performers of ſacrifices and all religious rites, and expounders of religion to the people. They alſo inſtructed youth in all kind of learning, ſuch as philoſophy, aſtronomy, aſtrology, the immortality and tranſmigration of the ſoul from one body into another, which was both an incitement to virtue and an antidote againſt the fear of death. Theſe they taught their diſciples by word of mouth, eſteeming them too ſacred to be committed to writing. Learning.

OTHER more common ſubjects, ſuch as their hymns to their gods, the exploits of their princes and generals, and their exhortations to the people in time of war, and eſpecially before a battle, all theſe were written in elegant verſe, and recited, or rather ſung, by them upon all proper occaſions. Diodorus, ſpeaking of the Celtes, tells us farther, that theſe poets uſed to accompany their ſongs with inſtrumental muſic, ſuch as that of organs, harps, and the like, and that they were had in ſuch veneration, that if an army was engaged in battle, if one of theſe poets or Bards appeared, both ſides immediately ceaſed fighting, ſo that their fury gave way to wiſdom, and Mars to the Muſes.

[e] De Bello Gal. lib. vi. c. 12.

ids were exempt from that duty, they muſt have been different from the Bards, who, though in all other reſpects of the ſame order with them, yet were obliged to go and encourage the people to war with their poetic and muſical compoſitions. Upon this account it is, that theſe Bards are affirmed by Cæſar (4) to have been the inventors of muſick and poetry, or rather to have received it from their king Bardus, whom Beroſus affirms to have reigned over the Gauls and Britains, or Cymbri (5), from whom they were called Bards.

The Druids, ſome think, were ſo called from Beroſus's Druys, the 4th king of the Celtes, a man of uncommon learning for thoſe days (6); but we think with Camden, that Pliny's is far more probable, who thinks, that they were ſo called from the Celtic and Greek word Dros or Droſs, an oak (7), which tree was held ſo ſacred by the Celtes as well as Scythians, that they performed moſt of their religious rites near ſome large oaks, if not in oaky groves, and offered no ſacrifice without ſome leaves of that tree. As we ſhall ſhew more fully in their hiſtory.

(4) Vid. Caius ant. Cantab. Perion, Baſinſtock. (5) Nat. hiſt. lib. vid. Camden, Lewis; Pezron. (6) Bell. Gall. l. vi. (7) Vid. Caſ. ubi ſup. ex Beroſ. & Cæſar. Com.

But the true reaſon was, that they were univerſally believed to be prophets as well as poets, ſo that it was thought dangerous, as well as injurious, to diſobey what they ſuppoſed came from their gods.

THESE prophetic philoſophers kept academies, which were reſorted unto by a great number, not only of their own youth, but even of other countries, inſomuch, that Ariſtotle ſays, that their philoſophy paſſed from thence into Greece, and not from Greece thither [f]. Other authors add many things in praiſe of their virtue and morality[g]. But a Roman hiſtorian [h] makes no ſcruple to call their religion an impious one, and as ſuch to have been forbidden by Auguſtus and aboliſhed by Claudius. Lucan is no leſs ſevere againſt them; and this might indeed be partly attributed to the hatred which the Romans bore to them; yet it muſt be owned, that they had ſome barbarous cuſtoms, ſuch as ſacrificing human victims to their gods, as more acceptable to them than thoſe of anyother animals [i]. And Diodorus tells us of another inhuman cuſtom they uſed in their divinations, eſpecially in great matters, which was done by killing a man with a ſcymetar, to draw their augury from the running of his blood from his mangled limbs.

Cruel cuſtoms.

BUT though they reſembled the Scythians in ſome of their barbarous cuſtoms and warlike temper, yet they were far enough from imitating them in their paſtoral life. They built large cities where-ever they came, they fortified and adorned them with ſpacious walls, towers, and ſumptuous edifices. They were upbraided by the Romans with following the oldeſt law in the world, which ever leaves to the ſtrongeſt what the weaker cannot defend [k]. And indeed ſo greedy were they of conqueſt and plunder, as well as of keeping what they had gained, that they ever fought with ſuch ſtrength and fury, that nothing could withſtand them. And ſo ſudden and violent were their onſets, that, like fire and ſtorm, they drove all before them. They ſeldom gave quarter to their enemies, which made them be looked upon as a cruel people [l]. As for the priſoners they took in war, they ſold them to their great men, who made ſlaves of them, and appointed the moſt ſightly ſightly of them for their retinue. Inſtead of the ſkins of their enemies worn as ornaments by the more ſavage Scythians, theſe choſe to adorn themſelves with their ſpoil. They wore gold rings, and bracelets, and chains about their necks; and were very neat in their dreſs, as we have had occaſion to hint a little higher.

[f] Ap. Laert. de vit. Philoſ. c. i. [g] See Vitus Baſinſtok, Camden, Lewis, & al. [h] Sueton. in vit. Claudi. [i] Mela. lib. iii. c. 2. [k] Vid. Plutarch. in vit. Camil. [l] Id in vit. Mar. Vid. & Strab. Taciţ. Dio. Herodian, Mela, & al.

Warlike diſcipline.

We have alſo obſerved, that they were expert horſemen, ſo that, conſidering their martial genius and diſcipline, their cavalry ſeldom failed of doing execution. They were no leſs famed for their armed chariots and their dexterity in managing them. In other reſpects we do not find, that they had any thing but what was common to moſt all other nations, and ſo ſhall not dwell longer upon them. Their other arms were bows and arrows, darts, javelins, and ſcymetars, daggers, and bayonets; they had likewiſe ſhields and head-pieces, and as they were divided into petty kingdoms or tribes, they divided their armies in the ſame manner in time of war, that the valour and merit of every tribe might be the better known, and that every man might be thereby ſpurred to advance the honour of that to which he belonged. As a further encouragement to their bravery, it was the buſineſs of their poets to record the actions of thoſe that ſignalized themſelves in ſongs and ſtories, which were afterwards ſung at their games and other ſolemnities, as well as when they went to engage an enemy; and this had ſuch an effect upon them, that they choſe to die with their weapons in their hands, rather than to be made priſoners. It was alſo their cuſtom before a battle to obſerve the moon, and, if poſſible, to avoid fighting till after the full of it. And this was not ſo much with a view of having a longer time for execution, as from a ſuperſtitious belief, that it would prove more fortunate; in this they were afterwards imitated by the Lacedæmonians. They uſed alſo, like other nations, to conſult their prieſts or augurs upon all emergencies, but eſpecially before an engagement, and if the augury proved good, theſe prieſts uſed to march before them with ſongs, and dances, and muſical inſtruments, till the onſet was begun; but if their augury proved otherwiſe, they gave ſuch heed to it, that nothing but abſolute neceſſity could prevail on them to fight. Their martial laws uſed likewiſe to be written in verſe, and ſet to ſome warlike tunes, which they were obliged to learn by heart, and to ſing upon proper occaſions, ſo that their very youth were verſed in them, and knew the theory of military diſcipline, long before they were of age to bear arms. They ſeem, in a word, to have omitted nothing that could inſpire them with a deſire of conqueſt and glory, and cheriſh the warlike temper for which they have been ſo famed in hiſtory. How much their valour was dreaded, both by the Romans and other European nations, will be ſeen in another chapter, and we ſhall ſhew in the ſequal of this, that they ſignalized themſelves no leſs in Aſia, both before and ſince their migration into Europe.

were

Language. THEIR language, which we have already had occaſion to ſpeak of, was the old Celtic or Gomerian, preſerved ſtill by the Welſh. This has been ſo fully proved by numberleſs antiquarians, that we ſhall content ourſelves with referring our readers to them, without entering into ſo ſpacious and intricate a field [m]. Thoſe who are acquainted with it muſt readily own, that no tongue, either antient or modern, carries greater marks of antiquity than this Gomroeg; and that, though it muſt be ſuppoſed to have been very much blended with the Greek, Latin, and German in proceſs of time, yet it retains ſtill ſo much of the admirable ſimplicity of the Hebrew grammar and conſtruction (B), that one would be apt to conclude them only dialects of [m] De his vid. Camb. Brit. Joach. Perion. orig. ling. Celt. Brierw. inquir. in Orig. ling. Lluydd. Davies & Robert. Gram. Wooton, Hick. lexic. Lewis & Pezron. ubi ſup. & al. mult.

(B) With reſpect to the Hebrew, we refer our readers to what has been ſaid of it in the hiſtory of the Jews *, and it would be endleſs to enumerate in how many inſtances the Gomroeg, now the Welſh, doth imitate it. We ſhall, however, give our reader ſome few inſtances of it by way of ſpecimen, and refer him for further particulars to the authors quoted above.

1. The Gomroeg is ſo near akin to the Hebrew, that an antiquary (8), who was maſter of both, has given the learned world a ſpecimen of a conſiderable number of phraſes out of the Old Teſtament, which are ſo alike in both, that they ſeem to have been originally the ſame, and their difference to be only owing to diſtance or time and place, and other ſuch like cauſes, by which a language is naturally altered. It diſtinguiſhes the caſes like the Hebrew, not by different terminations as the Greek and Latin, but by prepoſitive articles, 3. It often changes the radical or primitive letter of a word according to the prepoſition, adverb of the ſame tongue, from which the other languages above named, and even the Arabic, ſeem to have emanated (C). The only wonder in all this would be, that the Gomerians ſhould be the only people that have preſerved their own in ſuch purity, whilſt the Jews, and all other nations, have ſuffered theirs to be corrupted and blended with thoſe of their neighbours, and eſpecially of their conquerors. But may not this be owing to the former having ſtill preſerved themſelves from foreign conqueſts and bondage, chuſing rather to leave their fertile abodes and retire into countries ſtronger by nature and leſs tempting to a conqueror, than to ſubmit adverb, pronoun, or article it is affixed to, giving it ſometimes a harder, ſometimes a ſofter ſound, more for the ſake of melody than grammar. 4. It hath its aſpirations and gutturals, which are more or leſs denſe like thoſe of the Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldaic, &c. 5. In verbs it retains the root in the third perſon ſingular, as Car, he loves; Cari, thou loveſt; Cara I love; Carwn, we love; Caruch, ye love; Carant, they love.

* See before, Vol. iii. ch. 7. ſect 4. Of the language writing, &c. of the Jews & ſeq. (8) Ch Edwards's ſpecimen printed An. 1675. Vid. & Lloyd Gram. & al.

With reſpect to its genius, it is ſtrong, maſculine, very poetical, and figurative, and though, perhaps more thro' corruption than primitive orthography, it ſeems harſh in the pronunciation by reaſon of its vaſt number of conſonants, yet when put into verſe, and ſpoken with its genuine pronunciation, it is like the Hebrew, very ſoft, melodious, and muſical.

(C) This is indeed, what a learned antiquary has endeavoured to prove from a great number of etymologies, and confirmed alſo by hiſtorical facts (9). But we dare not be ſo ſanguine as he in ſo delicate a point, leſt we ſhould be thought to write rather the panegyric than the hiſtory of that antient nation and tongue.

Here, however, the reader may find the moſt rational account for that ſurprizing affinity which the learned have found between the Celtic, Greek, Latin, Arabic, Perſian, High-Dutch, and ſome other European and Aſiatic languages, which had never till then been tolerably accounted for by any other author, nor indeed could be, without having recourſe to antient hiſtory; in which it ſeems at leaſt highly probable, that all theſe were tribes or colonies of the Gomerians, and uſed the ſame language, till in proceſs of time, being parted from their brethren and intermixed with Scythians and other nations, it ſplit, itſelf into that variety of dialects in which we find it, without loſing the greateſt part of their primitive words, which are ſtill the ſame in them, as may be ſeen by the vocabulary at the end of our author's work, and by the hiſtory itſelf.

(9) Pezron. Ant. ling. Celt. paſ. & p. 3.

ſubmit to their yoke? And as this at once inſpired them with an over-weening value of themſelves and natural hatred to other nations, might not this be an effectual means of preſerving them from ſuffering their original tongue to be corrupted by thoſe of their neighbours?

It were labour loſt to endeavour to find out what their antient poetry was, in which their Curetes and Druids recorded all the exploits of their heroes; and our only reaſon for mentioning it here is, to obſerve, that as theſe poets were their only hiſtorians, and their tongue abounded, like the Hebrew and other eaſtern ones, with bold allegories and figures, as we obſerved in the laſt note; this might probably enough adminiſter matter ſufficient for that variety of wonderful events, with which the fabulous and heroic times have been ſince ſtuffed, as we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew when we come to ſpeak upon that head. As to their muſic, of which we have already hinted ſomething under a former head, they are ſuppoſed to have brought it from Crete, where having found an iron mine on mount Ida, they began to forge themſelves tools, then arms, and ſhields, and armour; hence ſprang not only the trades of ſmiths and armourers, but even the firſt notions of muſic are ſaid to have been taken from the ſound of their hammers, the clattering of their armour, and the beating of their ſhields, eſpecially when the Curetes were nurſing up young Jupiter, of which we have ſpoken already [n]. How far they improved theſe, and what other arts they cultivated, muſt be only gueſſed at from their manner of life; for ſince their warlike diſpoſition did neither hinder them from building cities and magnificent edifices, nor from affecting ſome grandeur in their equipages, dreſs, and houſhold furniture, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, all thoſe arts and manufactures that tended to it to have been likewiſe encouraged amongſt them. To theſe we may add agriculture and feeding of numerous herds, which they committed to the care of their ſlaves and inferior ſort of people. Whatever luxury they might be guilty of with reſpect to dreſs and equipage, we do not find, that they uſed any in their food. Pulſe of all ſorts was their common diet, eſpecially that which the Greeks called Elimos, which we take to be the ſame with Lim, which in the Celtic ſignifies millet, and is a very nouriſhing grain. Milk was alſo a conſiderable part of their diet; and as to

Poetry.

flesh

[n] See Newton's Chronol. p. 14.

fleſh, they eat very ſparingly of it, if we except that of ſwine, called in the Celtic Souckh, whence perhaps the Greek Ξυκα or Ξικα, and the work Sick, uſed by the country people in ſeveral parts of Europe to call their hogs.

CONCERNING, their antient traffick we have not much to ſay, only when Mercury the ſon of Jupiter had obtained the empire of the weſt, that is of Europe, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place, he is ſaid to have poliſhed them very much, both by his laws and learning, and by the great improvements he made in trade and commerce (D), of which, after he was deified, he was worſhipped as the patron and protector, and had every where ſtatues reared to his honour, as Cæſar himſelf aſſures us †. Thus from a wandering, conquering, ravaging, and barbarous people, like the Scythians their younger brethren, he ſo poliſhed them by degrees, as to vie in moſt reſpects with all other nations in learning and politeneſs, as will further appear by what we have to ſay of that deity under the next ſection.

† Comment. l. vi. ch. xvi.

(D) Hence the name of Mercury ſeems to have been given him from the Celtic Merc, merchandiſe, and Ur, a man, as if he had been called by way of excellence the man, maſter, or founder of merchandiſing. That of Teutat, which he is ſuppoſed to have taken at his going or returning from Egypt, ſeems likewiſe to be of Celtic extraction, Teut Tat, ſignifying the father of the people, ſuch as he was upon this and many other accounts.

SECT. IV.

The chronology and hiſtory of the Gomerians or Celtes.

IT muſt be owned, that all that has been ſaid concerning the time of their migration from Aſia, as well as of their moſt famous exploits in that part of the world, is built upon mere conjecture, not to ſay fancy; and that it would be a mad attempt to ſettle it upon a better foot. We are as much in the dark about theſe as we are about the Scythians, nothing being more confuſed than the the hiſtory of thoſe two nations. Sir Iſaac Newton [a] thinks that theſe two nations had already ſpread themſelves over leſſer Aſia and Europe, long before the year of the flood 1220, that is about the latter end of the Iſraelitiſh judges. But before that time they had ſignalized themſelves in Aſia, under the names of Sacks and Titans, and had a ſucceſſion of kings. The firſt of which was, according to the author whom we chuſe to follow, contemporary with, if not before, Terah, the father of Abraham, that is about the year of the flood 1070, according to the chronology of this hiſtory. The perſon we mean is the learned Pezron [b], who has taken greater pains, and made more conſiderable diſcoveries, concerning the Celtic nation, than any hiſtorian we know of. It were indeed to be wiſhed, he had built leſs upon conjectures, and yet we hope our readers will find, that they are not without ſome ſolid teſtimonies from antiquity, and that his hiſtory of the Celtes carries a greater ſhare of probability, than any that has been attempted, concerning this ancient and populous nation, under their various denominations, conqueſts, and ſettlements. We ſhall upon the cloſe of this hiſtory make ſome kind of apology for preferring his notion, that Uranus, for inſtance, and Saturn, as well as their predeceſſors and ſucceſſors, were Celtic princes reigning in Aſia, about the times of Terah and Abraham, to that of Biſhop Cumberland, who ſuppoſes his Sanchoniatho's Chronus, or Saturn, to have been Ham the ſon of Noah, and ſo on; becauſe it will we hope fully appear by that time, how much more evidence his ſyſtem carries from ancient writers, than that of our learned prelate. Here the reader will find a probable hiſtory at leaſt of thoſe heroes, and of the Celtic and Titanic nations, diveſted as much as poſſible from the fable, and that there is at leaſt more reaſon to believe, that there really were ſuch men and nations, than to reject them as altogether fabulous.

But in order to open a way to their hiſtory, it will be neceſſary to mention what is previous to it, with reſpect to the migrations and exploits of the Gomerians in the ſeveral parts of Aſia, before their ſpreading into Europe. For though they are mentioned by antient geographers and hiſtorians under other names, ſuch as Titans, Sacks,

[a] Chronol. p. 10. [b] Ant. Nat. Celt. ch. viii. & ſeq.

Sacks, Parthians, Celtes, and the like, yet it is plain, they were really the ſame people and the deſcendants of Gomer, and that theſe names had been given them by other nations, as we have hinted heretofore, whilſt they not only preſerved ſtill that of their progenitor, but were even known by it to thoſe very authors, who mention them under their other names (A).

THUS

(A) This really holds true with reſpect to all except the name of Titans. with this difference, however, that they ſometimes confounded them with the Scythians, as has been obſerved more than once, which was doubtleſs owing to their affinity in blood, manners, language, and ſuch like, as well as to their regular progreſs, and ſpreading to the right and left of north Aſia and Europe, ſo that there is no other way to diſtinguiſh them but by thoſe countries through which each of them took its way towards Europe. Accordingly we find Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, and others ſpeaking of them in thoſe reſpective provinces of Aſia under the name of Sacks, Celtes, Celto-Scythians, Curetes, Comarians, Chomarians, and Cymbrians. Thus Ptolemy tells us, that the Saccæ, who lived near the river Jaxartes, were of the Curetes and Comarians (1). Pliny likewiſe ſeems to mean the ſame thing, when, ſpeaking of them, he ſays (2), Beyond are the Scythians, whom the Perſians did in general call Sacks, from their next neighbouring nation, à proxima gente, &c. which nation could be no other than the Celtic, becauſe, as Pliny obſerves elſewhere, the Chomarians in Bactriana, who were a more civilized ſort than the Scythians, had a capital city called by their name Chomar (3), whereas the Scythians were known to live in the open fields at large, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel.

Thus then it is plain, that, bating their confounding them with the Scythians, they were not ignorant of their primitive name of Gomerians, though they uſed in the main the other appellatives by which they were better known to the world, which is what we obſerved in the firſt ſection, had been done by Herodotus in his account of the Scythians. But as to the name of Titans, as it was both leſs known to the antients, and conſequently with leſs probability applicable to the Celtic nation, our author has taken a different way to prove it, but which we own is not altogether ſo clear as could be wiſhed.

He firſt ſuppoſes, that the Gomerians, or, as they had been ſince opprobriouſly called, Sacks or Robbers, exchanged that odious name for the more pompous one of Titans, which, as we have ſhewn, is of Celtic extraction, upon their removing farther

(1) lib. vi. c. 13. (2) Nat. hiſt. l. vi. c. 17. (3) ubi ſup. l. xi.

THUS then from Phrygia, the place of their first settlement, we find them under the name of Comarians, fixed along the river Jaxartes, beyond the Caspian sea, quite up to the province of Bactria [c]; These Ptolemy expressly calls Sacks, Comarians, and Curetes [d]; his words are, the Saccæ, which inhabited along the Jaxartes, were the Comarians and Curetes. And as we find the Saccæ in the more fruitful plains of Armenia, Cappadocia, Gallogrecia, and all those provinces which lie along the Euxine farther into upper Phrygia. Here it seems they built a city which they called Acmona, from Acmon the son of Maneus the founder of it (4). Acmon being by the Greeks reckoned the father of Uranus, who is therefore called Acmonides; our author supposes him to be the same with Sanchoniatho's Eliun or most high, because this first is there affirmed to be the father of Uranus; from whom he deduces his genealogy of the other Celtic princes.

[c] Mela. lib. 1. c. 2. [d] Geogr. lib. vi. c. 13.

These conjectures he endeavours to corroborate with that passage in Judith, where the Titans are mentioned as synonymous with the Giants (5) and from another in Isaiah (6), which the septuagint renders γιγαντες οι αρξαντες τῆς γης the Giants who subdued the earth, which he thinks can be applied to none so well as to the Titans or Celtes, but the misfortune is, that the Hebrew doth by no means support that version, any more than that version doth the universal rule of the Celtes over all other nations: so that the most that can be inferred from all this is, that as the fable of the Titans seems to have been founded upon some antient facts, and that these since deified heroes being said to have signalized themselves for their wonderful exploits, in these very regions of which the Gomerians had made themselves masters under the name of Sacks, since absorbed into that of Titans; it is much more probable, that they were princes of that nation, than that they were altogether fabulous, or that they were of any other nation than the Celtic, especially considering, that the greatest part of their names and surnames, which were still retained by the Greeks and Latins, are plainly of Celtic extraction, as we shall see when we come to their history. To this may be added the tradition of the Cretans concerning the Titans and Curetes being contemporary in that island, the sepulchre of Rhea, Saturn's sister and wife, being shewn their, and their boasting, that several of the gods were born there, all which have been preserved to us by Diodorus Siculus (7).

(4) Vid. Steph. de urbib. sub voc. acm. Ptolem. Geogr. lib. v. c. 2. & Numism. Puper. ap. Pezron. c. 8.
(5) Ch. xvi. 7. (6) Isai. xiv. 9. (7) lib. v.

Euxine ſea, we may hence frame a kind of route how they ſpread themſelves through all that part of Aſia, till their courſe was ſtopt, (not by the Bactrians, who ſeem rather to have been of Celtic extraction, and are accordingly called Chomarians by Ptolemy, who makes Chomar to have been their metropolis,) but by the Sogdians, who, being of Scythian race, had probably poſſeſſed themſelves of that province long before the Chomarians reached that of Bactria, and had by that time ſpread themſelves much farther northwards from Armenia, either for want of room or through diſcord. Some of them probably paſſed over the vaſt mountains which lie on the ſouth of the Margiana, and entered into the country of Median Arii, where having fixed themſelves by main force, and being as it were divided from, or exiled by, the reſt, they were called in ſcorn Parthians, which ſignifies in the Celtic, parted or divided from. This is affirmed by Juſtin, only with this difference, that he makes them of Scythian extraction, according to the vulgar error of the ancient Greek writers, who, as Strabo tells us [f], called all the nations towards the north of Aſia, Scythians and Celto-Scythians. This origin of the Parthians is likewiſe confirmed by ſeveral other authors [g], though it doth not appear to us, that the Perſians were deſcended from them †.

That the Saccæ poſſeſſed themſelves of at leaſt the beſt part of Armenia, is expreſly affirmed by Strabo [h], who adds, that they called that country by their name Saccacena (B). It likewiſe appears from the ſame author, that they paſſed over the mountains, bordering upon Armenia, and penetrated into Cappadocia, that part eſpecially

† Id. ibid. lib. ii. [e] lib. xli. c. 1. [f] Geogr. l. xi.
[g] Vid. Arrian. in Parthic. ap. Phoc. Steph. Byz. in voc. Parthy. Jornand. de Reb. Getic. cap. 6. apud Pezron. c. iv.
† Vid. ſup. vol. iv. ch. xi. ſect. i. & ſect. 11.11. [h] lib. xi.

(B) Or rather perhaps Saccaſtena, as we find it more properly ſpelt by another author (8); from the Celtic Stan, which ſignifies region, and is ſtill preſerved by the Perſians, as in Indoſtan, Chuſiſtan, &c. which perhaps the Celtes ſoftned afterwards into Tan, as in Aquitan the country of water, Britania the country of Brits(9).

(8) Iſidor. ſeu Charax. Parthen. Stathm. ap. Pezron. c. v.
(9) Id. ibid.

ly which is upon the coaſts of the Euxine ſea [i]. This expedition ſeems to have been made under the conduct of Acmon, the father of Uranus, and of his brother Doeas, where they gave their name, the former to the capital city called Acmonia, in which we are alſo told was a grove dedicated to him after he was deified, and the latter to the ſpacious Doean plains near the city of Themiſcyra along the river Thermodon (C). From the Euxine ſea their progreſs towards the Palus Mœotis is very obvious; and here we find their name given to the Cymbrian or Cimmerian Boſphorus, from which they needed but to croſs the Tanais to enter into their European territories.

We muſt now leave thoſe colonies extending themſelves towards Europe, and return into Phrygia, whither Acmon is ſuppoſed either to have returned from Cappadocia [l], or, which is more likely, where he continued after his anceſtors. For here we find the like monuments both of him and his brother, namely another city called Acmona, and ſaid by the ſame authors to have been founded by him; likewiſe another grove dedicated to him, and ſome ſpacious plains called Doeantes from his brother Doeas [m] (D). From which one may reaſonably infer, that he

[i] Strab. ubi ſupra. [k] Apollon. Argonaut. lib. ii. Steph. Byzant. ſub voce Acmon. [l] Pezron. ch. viii. [m] Byzant. ubi ſupra.

(C) That theſe two were brothers, our author (10) not only proves from the teſtimony of the authors above quoted, but adds, that Themiſcyra means no more than the city of Themis. Kir in the Hebrew and Ker in the Celtic ſignifying a city. As for Themis, whom the Greeks made goddeſs of Juſtice, he ſuppoſes her to have been the grand-daughter of Acmon, and a famous magician or propheteſs; and that Doeas Acmon's brother was of the ſame profeſſion; his name in the Celtic ſignifying a diviner, from Ddoe or Duoc, God.

(D) If any ſuch monuments were really in two different provinces of Aſia; the one in Phrygia, as the authors above quoted expreſly affirm, and the others in ſome other parts, for they do not name Cappadocia, it will only follow, that both had been under Acmon's government, and there will be no neceſſity to ſend him into the one to bring him back into the other, ſince his colonies could eaſily atchieve the conqueſt of the latter, and leave thoſe monuments in honour of their prince.

But

(10) Ibid.

he both reigned, and was afterwards worſhipped here likewiſe; and conſequently, that it were abſurd to ſuppoſe him a fabulous perſon, any more than his deſcendants Uranus, Saturn, and the reſt of the Titan princes. And as for the Celtes being deſcended from them, we find it expreſly affirmed by a very antient author [n], who was no friend to the Celtes or Gauls, and yet ſays, that the κελτοι were οψιγονοι Τιτανες the deſcendants or late poſterity of the Titans. If it be objected, that the Druids in Cæſar's time did boaſt themſelves to be deſcended from Dis or Pluto [o], it will appear, that he alſo was a Titan prince, who had the weſtern part of the empire, that is Europe, to his ſhare, whilſt Jupiter kept the eaſtern part to himſelf; ſo that both Cæſar and Callimachus agree in the main point, Pluto being the great grandſon of Acmon, the firſt prince of note of the Gomerian or Titanic race.

THIS prince was the ſon of Mon, Man, or Maneus, his name Acmon, or perhaps rather Ack-man, ſeems to imply as much. He is ſuppoſed by our author to have lived in the days of Terah the father of Abraham. So that, including Maneus in the liſt, we have a ſucceſſion

[n] Callimach. hymn. in Delum. verſ. 170. & ſeq. [o] Vid. Cæſ. Comment. lib. vi.

But what induces our author to the contrary opinion is, that the name of Sacks is from that time wholly abſorbed into that of Titans; from which he concludes, that that warlike prince, at his return into Phrygia, exchanged that reproachful name into the more glorious one of Titans, which either ſignifies ſons of the ſun, or of the earth, as we ſhewed elſewhere †; whilſt that of Sacks ſtuck only to thoſe who went and dwelt in the more northern provinces of Aſia. It is not eaſy to ſay, when or why they aſſumed the name of Titans; but if we ſuppoſe with our author that word to ſignify ſons of the earth, which anſwers to that of Aborigines, it will be more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that they began to aim at it much earlier in Phrygia, becauſe it was the original ſettlement of their progenitors Gomer and his deſcendants, whilſt thoſe colonies, who were forced to leave that province and to go and ſettle by main force in other provinces already inhabited, muſt be contented to quit it for that of Sacks or Robbers, which the loſers gave to them.

† Vol. V. p. 386. Note B.

of six Titan princes, whose government, according to him, lasted about three hundred years [p]. And are as follows,

Man or Maneus	Saturn
Acmon	Jupiter
Uranus	Theutat

We have already mentioned how impossible it is to adjust the chronology of these princes, yet has our author, at the latter end of his 12th chapter, found means to give some light to it out of some antient writers; we shall give what he has there said in his own words.

I have taken no small pains to find out what antient authors have said on this head. I find, that Jupiter began to reign when Isaac had attained the one half of his age, or some years after Abraham's death, and this is what may be made out from antient historians, such as Evemerus, Ennius, Thallus, and some others, who all agreed, that Jupiter reigned in the time of Belus the first king of Assyria; which agrees exactly with the opinion of those who made the verses of the Sybils, which expresly say, that Saturn with his brother Titan and Japhet began to reign with the 10th generation after the deluge. They were those whom people called the children of heaven and earth, because they excelled all others in vertue and strength. Now the tenth generation from the deluge exactly answers to the time of Abraham. Saturn must therefore begin his reign many years before Abraham had been in the land of Canaan. Nay, his father Uranus must already have been very potent, both in Asia and also in Europe, in the time of Terah Abraham's father. All this seems plain to me upon examining those monuments of antiquity which are still extant. But the chronicle of Eusebius, which has been regulated from antient histories, and especially those which related to the island of Crete, leaves us no room to doubt of this matter. We are there informed, that about those times, Cres, one of the Curetes who took care of Jupiter's education, reigned in Crete, and that the island received its name from him. Eusebius by the words Κατα τϑς χρονϑς, about these times, points out the years between the 50th and 60th of Abraham's life. Now Jupiter, according according to his calculation, muſt have begun his reign about the latter end of Terah's life. But I have many reaſons to believe, that Euſebius was miſtaken in making him of ſuch old ſtanding, and that this Titan prince ought not to be placed higher than the middle, that is the 98th year of Iſaac's life, and that he could not precede Moſes above 300 years.

[p] Pezron. c. 15.

THUS far Pezron; according to whoſe account it might be eaſy to conjecture the times when Jupiter's predeceſſors reigned, by tracing ſo many generations back; eſpecially becauſe we have the length of Jupiter's life recorded, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place, to have been 120 years, which if it come ſhort of the number of his contemporary Iſaac, may be attributed to his living a quite different life from him.

WE have nothing recorded concerning Maneus, but that he is reported to have been the father of Acmon [q]. Maneus.

CONCERNING Acmon, if he be the ſame with the Eliun of Sanchoniatho, as this author makes him the father of Uranus, who was therefore called Acmonides, or the ſon of Acmon; we have nothing particular, except that he had a ſon named Epigeus Autochton, called afterwards Ouranus, and that being killed by a wild beaſt, whom he too eagerly encountered, he was afterwards deified and worſhipped by his deſcendants [r] (E). Acmon.

[q] Polyhiſt. ap. Byzant. ſub voce Acmon.

[r] Sanchoniath. lib. iii.

(E) If his deſcendants paid him thoſe divine honours preſently after his death, we have here, as Pezron obſerves, one of the antienteſt heathen deities in all antiquity. But we ſee no reaſon for departing from our former opinion, that the deifying of princes is of much later date †; thoſe groves which were conſecrated to him in Phrygia might be no other than monuments to his memory, not unlike perhaps to thoſe of the Scythian kings, of whom we ſhall ſpeak by and by, whilſt the idolatrous worſhip of them was not introduced till many ages after.

Theſe Titans of Sanchoniatho, whom the Greeks called πλεται or wanderers, ſuch as the Gomerians really were, are alſo ſuppoſed to have been of gigantic ſtature, like thoſe we have mentioned in the hiſtory of Canaan; the fable indeed reckons

† See before, Vol. ii. p. 287, Note E. Vol. iv. p. 261, Note W. & alib.

URANUS, according to the ſame ancient author, ſucceeded his father, and married his own ſiſter, Γη Ge, or the earth (F), by whom he had four ſons, the eldeſt of whom, called Itus or Chronus, aftewards Saturn, alſo ſucceeded him. Sanchoniatho obſerves, that he had two other names, and that that of Ouranus was not given him till afterwards; but tho' he knew not the reaſon of it, yet if we attend to the Celtic etymology, Ur or Our, a Man, and en Heaven, it will appear highly probable, that he was called Our-en, a man of heaven, from his being very much addicted to the ſtudy of aſtronomy and aſtrology. From this the Greeks might eaſily alſo call him Uranus or Ouranus, if not wholly derive that word from him. We paſs by many fabulous things, which have been invented of him by the Greeks and other writers, and ſhall only add, that his new conqueſts in Aſia and Europe ſeem rather to have been owing to his ambition than to his magic, to his policy than to his ſkill in aſtrological predictions. How long he reigned we are not told, but, after having inlarging his dominions, he had the misfortune to be bereaved of his kingdom and liberty, if not of his life, by his ambitious ſon and ſucceſſor Saturn, who, having intercepted him, put him into cloſe confinement, reckons them as ſuch. The apocryphal book of Judith (11) mentions the Titans and giants as ſynonymous, as we hinted before; and the ſeptuagint have tranſlated the words the valley of Rephaim, or giants; the valley of Titans (12). The Greeks, which called them Γιγας and Γιγαντες, ſeem to have borrowed that word from the Celtic Gugg, which ſignifies proud, fierce, arrogant, ſuch as we may reaſonably ſuppoſe their monſtrous ſtature might incline them to be, and ſuch as we find thoſe to have been, of whom mention is made in holy writ. And as the Titans, kings, and prieſts, as well as people, were extremely given to ſuperſtition, divination, magic, and all ſuch like vile practices, an antient father had reaſon to upbraid the heathen with placing giants, tyrants, and magicians in the number of their kings, and afterwards of their gods (13).

(F) It is obſervable, that the Greeks who have tranſlated this name have alſo retained the antient one of Titea, which is derived from the Celtic Tit, which ſignifies the ſame thing. We ſhall find many more ſuch Greek names in the ſequel, which are palpably of Celtic extraction.

(11) Chap. xvi. 7. (12) 2 Sam. v. 18. (13) Euſeb. de pr. evang. l. ii. c. 5.

ment, where he either died with grief, or was diſpatched by the order of that unnatural ſon.

SATURN, ſirnamed afterwards Chronos or Cronos, is ſaid by the Sanchoniatho to have been the eldeſt ſon of Uranus [s], whilſt other authors affirm him to have been the youngeſt of all [t]; and that his eldeſt brother, who was called Titan, did for a long while conteſt the crown with him, till he was at length over-powered and forced to yield to him. Saturn is ſuppoſed to have been the firſt, who took upon him the regal dignity; for we are told [u], that all his predeceſſors, down to Uranus, had contented themſelves with the title of princes; and an ancient father tells us [w], upon the authority of Pherecydes, that he was the firſt that wore the diadem, whence he is ſuppoſed to have been ſirnamed Cronos, which in the Celtic ſignifies crowned (G). He likewiſe tells us in another place, that he much delighted in wearing a red cloak, or a ſhort coat, of the Galatic dye, from which perhaps came alſo the royal purple, ſo much worn by kings and perſons of the higheſt rank (H). Saturn.

SATURN, though he was no leſs politic and crafty [x] than prone to ambition, could not ſo well conceal his treaſonable deſigns, but that Uranus had ſome ſuſpicion of them, and to be before-hand with him diſpatched his daughter

[s] Ubi ſupra. [t] Heſiod. in Theogn. Apollon. lib. i. c. 1. & al. vid. Pezr. c. x. [u] Vid. Enn. ap. Lactant. lib. i. c. 13.
[w] Tertull. de Coron. c. 17. [x] Heſiod. ubi ſupra.

(G) That of Saturn, which ſome have abſurdly derived from the Hebrew שָׂטַן Satar, to hide, becauſe he went and concealed himſelf in Italy from his ſon Jupiter, is more naturally deduced from the Phrygian Satorn, or rather Sadorn, which ſignifies ſtrong and potent; for ſo he really was, till weakened by his ſon's unnatural rebellion, as the hiſtory will ſhew immediately. Sanchoniatho gives him alſo the name of Il or Ilos, which may be properly enough derived from the Hebrew word אֵל El, which ſignifies ſtrong and mighty, and is in that tongue one of the names of God.

(H) Saturn being ſuppoſed to have dwelt in Phrygia, part of which was afterwards called Galatia; Pezron obſerves, that this country being very famous for dying that colour, the Greek κοκκος, and Latin Coccus, may naturally be derived from the Celtic Coch, which ſignifies red (14).

(14) Chap. 10. & lexic. Cel. Latin. ſub. voc. Coccus.

Rhea to make away with him by ſome private means. But Saturn, who perhaps was apprized of it by his mother Titea, whoſe jealouſy had ſo far tranſported her (I) as to encourage him, if not to inſpire him with the firſt deſign of this unnatural rebellion, ſoon found a way not only to divert her from her enterpriſe, but to bring her over to his ſide. This cauſed an open rupture, in which Saturn, after a conteſt of ſeveral years proving the ſtronger of the two, impriſoned his father, as we have ſeen above, and made himſelf abſolute; after which it is ſuppoſed, that, not being contented with the title of prince, he aſſumed that of king. And indeed if it be true, that he had enlarged his dominions, not only in Aſia but in Europe as far as Spain, and gained alſo ſome provinces in Africa, a leſs title than this could not well ſuit his ambitious mind.

He had two notable counſellors beſides his mother, the one from his youth named Hermes Treſmegiſtus, a great philoſopher and conſummate politican; ſome add, that he was alſo a great conjurer [y]; the other was his ſiſter Rhea, whom he afterwards made his wife (K). Theſe three did ſo far prevail upon the princes and grandees of the court, and eſpecially with his other brothers, what with their addreſs and munificence (L), that they all came into his party

[y] Sanchoniat. ubi ſupra.

(I) This jealouſy and reſentment, Sanchoniatho tells us, was occaſioned not only by the number of other wives which Uranus took, but becauſe though ſhe had left him upon that account, yet he would come and lie with her by force. But what moſt of all enraged her was, that he endeavoured to deſtroy all the children he had by her, which, if it be true, did not a little extenuate her and her ſon's rebellion (15).

(K) This cuſtom of marrying ſiſters had nothing extraordinary in thoſe days; we have ſeen in a former volume, that it was common to the Egyptians, Perſians, and many other great and polite nations. The name of Rhea is likewiſe of Celtic extraction, and ſignifies a lady, as Rhey ſignifies a lord (16).

(L) Among others of his brethren we find one called Japhet or Japet, a name preſerved only among the deſcendants of Gomer. Sanchoniatho likewiſe names Atlas, but he is more likely to have been his nephew and the ſon of Japhet. It is very ty, ſo that it is no wonder, if his dominions and conqueſts did ſo vaſtly exceed thoſe of his predeceſſors, and himſelf proved ſo ſucceſsful both at home and abroad. But his happineſs was ſoured many different ways: he was extremely miſtruſtful of his children: he had himſelf dethroned his own father, and could not be without fear, leſt his crime ſhould be puniſhed in the ſame kind. This made him ſacrifice them to his jealous guilt, as ſome think, or, as others believe, to the ghoſt of his father. He was extremely given to ſuperſtition and divinations, and it is not improbable, that his diviners might increaſe his ſuſpicions, by foretelling, that he would be in danger of being dethroned by ſome of them, as he really was by Jupiter. He had ſtill another private enemy to ward againſt, namely his brother Titan, who, though forced to yield to him, at leaſt in appearance, might in time find means to try his fortune again. But perhaps his mind was ſo intent upon his children, that he wholly neglected him; and this gave him at length an opportunity of ſurprizing him and his wife Rhea, whom he immediately conveyed into ſome province of Aſia, and kept them in cloſe confinement, till his ſon Jupiter came with a conſiderable army of Cretans, and reſtored his captive parents to their liberty and kingdom (M).

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) Pezron. ubi ſupra.

WHAT we have obſerved concerning Saturn's jealous temper and cruelty to his children, muſt in all probability have been the cauſe, why his wife Rhea took ſuch pains to preſerve ry probable. that Saturn, in recompence of their friendſhip to him, gave that part of his conqueſts in Mauritania to Atlas, and that the famous mountains of Africa received their name from him (17).

(M) This remarkable tranſaction has been preſerved to us by an antient father (18) upon the authority of Ennius, or rather of Evemerus, whoſe tranſlator he was; and as he produced it to prove againſt the heathen, that the gods they worſhipped had been meer men, he introduces it with this ſingular preface: Aperiamus ea quæ veris literis continentur, ne poetarum ineptias in accuſandis religionibus ſequi aut probare videamur. It ſhould ſeem by theſe words, that he had read the fables of the poets, as well as the more authentic teſtimonies of hiſtorians, and knew full well how to diſtinguiſh the one from the other, and to urge nothing but what was acknowledged for truth.

We

(17) Id ibid. (18) Lactant. Inſtit. lib. i. c. 14.

preſerve her youngeſt ſon Jupiter, by concealing her pregnancy from him, by being delivered of him in one place, and ſending him to be privately educated in another (N). This action therefore of Jupiter, pious and generous as it was, did rather increaſe than diſpel his jealouſy. His ſurprize to find himſelf over-reached by his wife, and to ſee his ſon, whom he did not dream of, not only grown into years, but of courage, and ſtrength ſufficient to overcome his enemies, made him fear, leſt he ſhould in time deprive him with the ſame facility of his kingdom and life. Lactantius adds, upon the authority of Evemerus, that he went to

We may add, that many other fathers and apologiſts have appealed to the like hiſtorical facts concerning Saturn, Jupiter, &c. which they would hardly have ventured to do, if they had not been acknowledged as ſuch by thoſe againſt whom they wrote (19).

(N) Authors are not agreed about the place of Jupiter's birth. The Cretans did pretend, that he was born in that iſland on mount Ida, and Callimachus (20), who gives them the title of liars for having forged his tomb there alſo, becauſe ſuch a god as he could not die, yet, abſurdly enough, owns him to have been born, and affirms the place to have been mount Lycæus in Arcadia. The latter may be the more probable of the two. The hymniſt adds, that the place was ſince held ſo ſacred that no women dared to approach it. It was alſo called by way of excellence the ſacred top, and the Puerperium, or place of Rhea's lying in: As for the Cretans, they might be eaſily led into the belief of his being born among them, becauſe he had been conveyed and brought up there with the utmoſt privacy from his very infancy. However that be, it is agreed, that his education was committed to the care of the Curetes, and theſe being men of great power and credit among the people, it is no wonder, that they procured him ſo powerful an army to go to his father's reſcue. And it is not improbable, that they were the perſons that inſpired him with that pious deſign, which might probably cure the father of his unjuſt ſuſpicion, and entitle the ſon to the ſucceſſion of his kingdom.

The ſtory of Saturn's cruelty, in ſacrificing ſo many of his children to his jealouſy, may alſo have given birth to what the poets have related of his devouring of them, as Jupiter's depriving him at length of his kingdom, may have given occaſion to their accuſing him of caſtrating him.

(19) Vid. inter al. Tertul. Apol. cap. x. & alib. paſſ. Athenag. Theophil. Antioch. Min. Felix, Arnob. Auguſt. Jul. Firmic & al. (20) Hymn. in Jov. ab initio.

to conſult the oracle and his diviners, who bade him beware of his ſon Jupiter, who would be likely in time to dethrone him. Upon this warning he loſt no time to try to put it out of his power. He entered into Crete with an army, for his ſon was again retired thither after he had atchieved his deliverance; but he ſoon found, that the Cretans were all in his ſon's intereſt, and that he was more likely to be intrapped than obeyed by them. This obliged him to return into that part of Greece ſince called Peloponneſus, whither Jupiter, enraged at his cruel deſign againſt him, followed him with an army, and forced him to retire into Italy. Janus was then king of the Aborigines, who, we obſerved before, may either have been of Celtic extraction, or upon ſome other account friends to the Titans (O). However, that good old king gave him a kind reception, and, as ſome affirmed, admitted him into a kind of

(O) We have already taken notice, that the Umbrians are affirmed by antient hiſtorians both to have been the oldeſt people in Italy, and to have been the deſcendants of the Celtes †; and it is hardly to be ſuppoſed, that Saturn would have truſted himſelf, in his deſperate circumſtances, to any but a friendly nation; but whether theſe were the ſame with the Aborigines, or another colony incorporated with them in proceſs of time, we will not decide. The reception, which he met with from Janus, ſcarce leaves room to doubt of their being allied, either by blood or by ſome other tie.

Some critics have found fault with Julius Firmicus for having affirmed (21), that this fugitive prince was concealed by the Spartans in Italy. Pezron has taken ſome pains to prove, that they were really in Italy, before that time and incorporated with other nations of that province; and that the Sabines were deſcended from them, and they from the Celtes or Gomerians. But if this ſhould not ſeem altogether ſo plain, as it is impoſſible to grope into thoſe dark and remote ages with any tolerable ſatisfaction, the words of Firmicus in Italia a Spartis abſconditur, if there has no error crept into them, may be underſtood proleptically. The nation that received Saturn, whatever they were, might in time, if not by Jupiter himſelf, be drove out of Italy, and go and ſettle in Sparta, or upon ſome other account be thenceforth called Spartans. At leaſt the author above named has made it very probable, that they originally came from Italy; though it doth not appear, that they were ever known by that name there.

† Vol. V. p. 395. Note. (21) Lib de Error profan. relig.

of partnership with him in his kingdom [z]; so that the region where Saturn reigned, and which is adjoyning to the Tyber was since called Saturnia from him. How long he lived there, and what became of him, is impossible to guess, except that his tomb being shewed in Sicily [a] may induce one to suppose, that he went and ended his days there.

JUPITER, or, as he was rightly called, Jou (P), because he was the youngest of Saturn's children, did not, however, enjoy his kingdom peaceably. His uncle Titan, or perhaps one of his sons, having probably found means to strengthen his party whilst he was taken up against his father, raised a war against him, which continued full ten years, and was carried on with the utmost fury on both sides, both by sea and land, and did not end but with the total overthrow of Titan and his army.

THIS war seems to be the truest original of the fabulous war of the Giants or Titans against the gods, which the poets have so interlarded with their inventions, that it is scarcely possible to discover it through them (Q). This final

[z] Tertul. Apolog. ubi sup. [a] Philocor. ap. Clem. Alexan. Admonit. ad Gent.

(P) The irregular inflexion of his name into Jovis, &c. shews it plainly. It is therefore absurd to derive it, as Cicero doth upon the authority of Varro, from Juvans Pater, which the inflexion will not admit of; when the Celtic Jou, or as we pronounced it, Joo, which signifies young, is on all respects so much nearer to it; and Jupiter seems plainly to be the same with Jou-pater, which last was added to his former name of Jou, when he came to be worshipped as the greatest of the gods.

Accordingly we find, that the antient Latins did not write his name Jupiter, but Jaopiter, Joupiter, and Japiter. But the Celtic has still preserved his antient name of Jou, and call Thursday, or the Dies Jovis of the Romans, Diz-jou, and Di-jou, the day of Jove (22). We shall have occasion by-and-by to speak of some of his other names.

(Q) We have deferred till now to observe how much this system of history, for we dare not venture to give it a stronger name, doth clash with that of our learned Cumberland, who, as we have fully shewn in the beginning of this history *, makes his Sanchoniatho's Uranus to have been Noah, Cronus Ham,

(22) Vid. Pezron. ch. xii. * Vid. sup. Vol. I. p. 387. & seq

final overthrow was given them near the antient city of Tarteſa in Spain, a ſea-port town a little to the north of Cadis [b] (R), whither it ſeems he went in perſon with a great

[b] Tertul. Apolog. Scholiaſt. in Iliad. viii. ad verſ. 479. ap. Pezron. c. 11.

Ham, Mizor Mizraim, Zadic Melchizedeck, and ſo on; that our readers might ſee which of the two carries the greateſt probability. They are both built upon conjectures, and both ſupported by ſome collateral kind of proofs, and upon a ſuppoſition, that this fragment we have left is the relic of a fuller hiſtory, and that its author is not a fictitious, but a real, antient, and credible one. We ſhall not repeat what we have ſaid elſewhere on this laſt head †, much leſs do we deſign to draw a parallel between thoſe two ſyſtems or their learned authors. Thus much, however, we hope we may ſay without partiality, concerning that of our Celtic antiquary, that it not only gives a great light to the dark and fabulous times, but that it is corroborated by a much greater number of antient authors, heathens as well as chriſtians. But the latter, eſpecially the apologiſts, ſeem plainly enough to have been generally of the ſame mind with him, and have made no difficulty to urge this genealogy of heathen deities abovementioned againſt their ſtupid worſhipers.

How far all this is further corrobrated by numberleſs Celtic etymons, the greateſt part of which are both eaſy and natural and confirmed by hiſtorical facts, muſt be ſubmitted to the reader's judgment. Of this number we beg leave to remind him of what has been ſaid concerning the names of Uranus and Titea, Cronus or Saturn, and Rhea, Jou or Jupiter, Theutat, and others, beſides a greater number which we have omitted, but which may be ſeen in our author, and ſome few which we ſhall have occaſion to mention in the ſequel; all which put together will, if not convince him, yet, at leaſt, juſtify our giving it a place in this hiſtory, as we have that of our learned biſhop in the former volume.

(R) This ſeems alſo confirmed by what Juſtin (23) adds, that the Curetes lived formerly in the foreſts about that city. Some of his commentators indeed have affirmed after Voſſius, that it ought to be read Cinetes, becauſe the Curetes were a people of Crete. We have already ſhewn, that the latter were the prieſts or ſoothſayers of the Titans and Celtes, and accompanied them in their wars. What wonder then, that ſome of them who had followed Jupiter in this expedition, and delighted otherwiſe in a kind of aſcetic life, ſhould be induced to make thoſe foreſts their abode?

† Ibid. p. 402, not. B. & alib. (23) lib. xliv. c. 4.

great fleet and a puiſſant army, and having brought over ſome of their confederates to his ſide, and gained this ſignal victory, he reigned very peaceably to the end of his life.

JUPITER, after the example of his predeceſſors, married his own ſiſter Juno (S). But as he was ſeldom without ſome amorous intrigues with other women, by whom he had a numerous iſſue, he was forced to bear with many rubs and mortifications from his jealous and revengeful queen. On the other hand, he did not follow his pleaſures ſo cloſe, but he allowed himſelf proper ſeaſons for the adminiſtration of juſtice throughout the many provinces of his kingdom, in rooting out robbers and banditti who ſheltered themſelves in the foreſts of Theſſaly, Macedonia, and Illyria, where they committed the vileſt outrages. But abode? But we ſhall have occaſion by-and-by to ſay ſomething further concerning them, which may convince one of the probability of there being men of that name and profeſſion in thoſe parts of Spain.

(S) This name is not unlikely to be of Celtic extraction, and to be derived from Ghuin, which ſignifies fair, white, and by way of excellence, beautiful; Such as Juno is ſaid to have been to a great degree. Hence perhaps it is, that the antient gloſſaries call her alſo Jolinta, a Jolly or fine woman.

Thus Jupiter had ſome other names among the Greeks which ſeem to flow from the ſame fountain, as Ζευς, from which they irregularly made their Διος δις δια, &c. in the oblique caſes. Now the Zeus, from which the Latins made Deus, ſeems more plainly derived from the Celtic Dhew, God, and the Dis and Dia from Di, bright. He was likewiſe ſurnamed Πειχος and Piccas, from the bird of that name, which Pliny tell us was then much uſed in auguries (24), which bird ſeems to be ſo called from his being continually pecking of walls and trees, and is known among us by the name of Woodpecker. Pliny indeed pretends, that he was called Picus from a king of Latium of that name; but it ſeems more probable, that both he and many other princes were, like Jupiter, ſo ſirnamed from the bird, from which they received their auguries; for the Celtic word peck or beak, ſignifies a bird's bill; and hence it is likely our verb to peck is delivered.

(24) Plin. Hiſt. Nat. l. x. c. 18.

But as he had made Mount Olympus [c] (T), one of the moſt delightful parts of Theſſaly, his chief reſidence, he was under a kind of neceſſity to rid thoſe countries of ſuch vermin, that his ſubjects might have the freer acceſs to his court.

BEFORE his death he is affirmed by the laſt quoted father, as a known truth, to have divided his kingdom, and to have given the weſtern, or European, part of it to his uncle Dis or Pluto, ſirnamed alſo Ageſilaus (U), whilſt himſelf kept the Aſiatic, or eaſtern, part of it. We obſerved alſo before, that he gave ſome part of Africa to his nephew Atlas, but having afterwards either conceived jealouſy of him, or detected him in ſome criminal deſign againſt him, he is reported to have cauſed him to be put to death.

THIS

[c] Evemer. ap. Lactant. Inſtitut. lib. i. c. 10.

(T) Hence the laſt quoted father obſerves, that after his apotheoſis the place of his reſidence came to be called by his ſuperſtitious worſhippers heaven, or to be ſynonymous to it (25).

(U) This laſt name which ſignifies a leader of the people, or Ageſander, as it is found in other writers (26), and ſignifies a leader of men, might be given him on account of his leading his nephew's colonies into Europe, and perhaps as far as Spain, where we obſerved a little above, there had been both Titans and Curetes in the neighbourhood of the ancient Tarteſa. Here likewiſe he is ſuppoſed to have found out ſuch rich mines of gold and ſilver (27), by which he grew ſo rich, that he got the name of Pluto, in Greek Πλουτον, which ſignifies rich, and was afterwards made the god of riches upon his being deified; and this probably induced Strabo to believe, that the Tartara of the Greeks and Latins came from the above-named Tarteſa, a country ſituate in the utmoſt parts of Spain weſtward (28).

Hence likewiſe, Jupiter having the dominion of the eaſt or ſun-riſing, and Pluto of the weſt or ſun-ſetting, came alſo probably the fable of the former being the lord of heaven, and the latter of the infernal regions. Perhaps, likewiſe, might the mythologiſts of thoſe fables think it very reaſonable to aſſign the government of riches, and of the infernal regions to the ſame deity; to put men in mind that the former were the ready road to the latter.

(25) Pezron. c. xii. (26) Æſchyl. Callimach. Athen. Heſych. ap. Pezron. ibid. (27) Vid. Strab. Geograph. l. v. (28) Ibid. (29) Euſeb. ap. Pezron. cap. xii.

THIS Atlas (W) had a daughter named Maia, or Flowry, whoſe beauty Jupiter was not proof againſt, but he could not obtain her upon any other condition than that of marriage. From her he had a ſon named Theutat, ſince Mercury, of whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. This marriage failed not to enrage Juno, who was ever plotting ſomething againſt him. We cannot gueſs whether Atlas had been unfortunately drawn into ſome rebellion by the jealous queen, but Jupiter is by ſome accuſed to have degenerated into a kind of tyrant through the continual ſeditions which ſhe raiſed againſt him, which yet he did find means to diſcover in good time [e].

ON the other hand, the Cretan hiſtorians extolled his virtues up to the ſkies. Diodorus Siculus and Ennius, upon their authority, beſtow the greateſt encomiums on him for his ſtrength, valour, prudence, juſtice, for his encouraging learning and virtue, and puniſhing injuries, violence, and robberies, and for his many wholeſome laws and regulations for the public good [f]. He lived 120 years, of which having reigned 62 [g], this great, and ſince deified, hero, reſigned his breath like other men, and was buried by the Curetes in the iſle of Crete, and in the city of Gnoſſus, where his ſons erected a ſtately monument, which was ſhewn many ages after by the inhabitants. [h]. The ſame authors adds, that he divide dhis kingdom among his relations and friends. His ſon Cres or Cret (from whom that iſland of Crete is ſuppoſed to have had its name, Cret in Celtic ſignifying bold and daring, was then at the head of the Curetes, and performed the laſt devoirs to his father, after which he took the government of that iſland [i] (X). How [d] Id. ibid. [e] Pezron. & auct. ab eo citat. [f] Diod. Sicul. lib. v. Enn. ubi ſupra. Callim. Hymn. in Jov. [g] Suid. ſub. voce Πιτας. vid. & Chron. Alexand. ap. Pezron. cap. xii. [h] Cicer. Evemer. ap. Lactant. lib. 1. c. 11. [i] Vid Pezro. ibid.

(W) He was alſo called by the Greeks Talamon, from the Celtic Tell-mon, or Man, on account of his high ſtature, and, as he was alſo a great aſtronomer, thence came all the fables which the poets have ſince made of him.

(X) This is at leaſt intimated by Lactantius's words out of Ennius, Curetes filii ſui (Jovis) eum curaverunt, for Cres was then a Curete, and probably the head of principal of that ſociety. Euſebeus ſeems alſo to confirm his having ſucceeded his father in the government of that iſle, when he makes him the

How the reſt of his kingdom was divided among the reſt of his ſucceſſors is not to be gueſſed at, only we find, that his ſon Theutat or Mercury, of whom we are going to ſpeak, had the weſtern part aſſigned to him, probably after the death of his uncle Dis or Pluto [k].

MERCURY is allowed by all antiquity to have been the ſon of Jupiter by Maia, as we have ſeen above. We have given already in a former note the etymon of thoſe two names †. The Greeks did likewiſe call him Ερμης Hermes, (Y) and the Latins Faunus (Z). He was famed for his learning and wiſdom, and eſpecially for his ſkill in auguries, magic, and philoſophy. He was active, courageous, and eloquent; and ſo prudent, that he always kept cloſe to his father's intereſt. For all theſe good qualities he became his chief favourite and counſellor, and was alſo by the fabulous writers affirmed to be the interpreter of the gods. An antient father tells us, that he went down into Egypt to penetrate further into their myſterious arts and ſciences, and that at his return he aſſumed the name of Theutat [l] (A). It was probably from the Egyptians that Mercury.

[k] Suid. ſub. voc. Πλατος. Chronic. Alexand. ubi ſup. † Vol. V. p. 413. Note. [l] Cyril. Alexand, lib. cont. Julian.

the firſt king of Crete (29); that is, as we underſtand him after Pezron, he was the firſt who reigned in that iſland, only whereas his father's kingdom is ſaid to have reached from Euphrates to Spain, beſides ſome parts of Afric, which he had given to Atlas, as we have ſeen elſewhere.

(Y) Which name comes probably from the Celtic Armes, which ſignifies divination. For Mercury ſeems to have outdone all his anceſtors in the knowledge and conſtant practice of that art, as we ſhall ſee by-and-by.

(Z) This is the only name for which no proper etymon can be found in the Celtic; nor can we gueſs upon what account it was given. But the chronicle above quoted calls him by both names of Faunus and Mercury; ſo that this Faunus muſt not be confounded with another of the name, who reigned many ages afterwards in Italy, eſpecially with Faunus the father of Latinus, in whoſe time Æneas came into that kingdom. Whereas our Mercury, according to this chronology of Titanic princes, muſt have lived at furtheſt about the time of Joſeph's being in Egypt (30).

(A) That father adds, that he took up that name in imitation of the antient Egyptian Mercury or Thout, who, as we

(29) Euſeb. ap. Pezron. cap. xiii (30) Idem, cap. xiv.

that he learned the art of melting, refining, caſting, and working of metals, which part he is ſaid to have firſt brought into Europe, whence it again dimanated itſelf into Aſia, as was ſhewn under another head.

He not only taught them the metallick trades, but how to make an advantagious traffick of them into other countries, for which he had the ſirname of Merk-ur or Mercury. This great improvement, which could not but endear him to his ſubjects, gave him an opportunity of poliſhing that rude and cruel nation, which till then ſeems to have made the trade of war and plunder their chief ſtudy and delight. He gave them a body of laws, encouraged the liberal arts and ſciences, and careſſed the foreigners who flocked into his dominions, eſpecially thoſe who brought any curious arts with them. Thus by his addreſs and powerful eloquence he did ſo civilize and improve his ſubjects, that his merit was ſtill dear to them in Cæſar's time, who tells us, that he was held in veneration above all other gods, and had ſtatues and altars reared to his honour in every town and village *.

Some attribute the invention of the olympic games to him, others to Hercules, but, if Pauſanius be right, they muſt have been much older, ſince he tells us, that Saturn and Jupiter had wreſtled together at them [m]. They may, however, be ſuppoſed to have made ſome conſiderable improvement to them, each according to his particular talent, and thereby eclipſed the memory of their firſt inventor. He reigned, according to the Alexandrian chronicle, 34 years; have ſeen in a former volume *, was worſhipped by the Egyptians for his great learning, wiſdom, and eloquence. So that by only altering the name by a letter or two, he made himſelf a more honourable one in the Celtic, Theu-tat, as we obſerved before, ſignifying the father of his people, ſuch as he really was, if what we read of him be true.

* De Bell. Gal. lib. vi. c. 16. [m] lib. viii. qui eſt Arcad.

This is not a proper place to enquire how theſe Gods, or at leaſt their names, came to be adobted by other nations. Such a curious ſubject doth well deſerve to be treated of in a treatiſe by itſelf, and we hope if we have not quite, cleared that point thro' the former parts of this hiſtory, we have at leaſt furniſhed the world with ſome conſiderable materials towards ſuch an enquiry, which is all that could be expected from ſuch a deſign as this.

* Vol. ii. p. 6.

years; but whether or not his life ended with his reign, is not eaſy to ſay, Suidas [n] and the above-mentioned chronicle ſay, that his brothers, being grown jealous of his ſuperior power and merit, formed ſuch a conſpiracy againſt his life, that he found himſelf under aneceſſity of packing up all his treaſure and retiring into Egypt, where he ſpent the remainder of his days in peace. On the other hand, Livy acquaints us [o], that there was a large tomb near new Carthage, in the time of Scipio and Hannibal, which was called the tomb of Mercury Theutat; and this would incline one to believe, that he died in his own dominions. We are no leſs in the dark about the condition of his kingdom from his death to its conqueſt by the Romans, except that the unweildineſs of ſo vaſt an empire did probably cauſe it to ſplit itſelf into many petty kingdoms under ſome of his ſucceſſors. This was at leaſt the caſe in which the Roman conqueror found them, when he invaded the Celtic territories, as we have hinted before. As for the changes which it received after it became a part of the Roman empire, this is not a proper place to ſpeak of them; they will be the ſubject of another volume, in which the hiſtory of the European kingdoms will be reſumed.

THESE inteſtine diviſions having once weakened the ſtrength of this large empire, not only the maritime parts did eaſily become a prey to their warlike neighbours, but their frontier provinces likewiſe. Among the firſt Iberia or Spain was diſmembred from it by the Carthaginians, from whom it paſſed to the Romans together with the ſouthern provinces, ſince called Gallia Narbonenſis, and the provinces on the other ſide of the Alps. The Scythians it is likely, did alſo incroach upon them on the north ſide, and very probably ſeized upon that part of their territories, which was afterwards called Scythia in Europe, and drove them quite to the hither ſide of the Danube. For it ſeems moſt natural, that in their firſt migrations the ſame boundaries, which parted Europe from Aſia, did alſo part the Celtic and Scythian dominions. However that be, and whether through the conquering ſword of their neighbours *, or through their inteſtine wars, or want of elbow-room, or whatever other motive might occaſion it, ſure it is, that ſeveral pow-powerful colonies of theſe Celtes or Gauls returned into leſſer Aſia, where, finding almoſt everywhere ſome antient monuments of their progenitors, they ſettled themſelves in ſeveral parts of it by main force, and gave ſome of their new-gotten names to them; ſuch as that of Galatia, Parthia, and ſome others, without which it would be impoſſible to diſtinguiſh theſe latter excurſions and exploits from thoſe by which they had ſignalized themſelves before their migrations into Europe. The firſt of thoſe, as far as it can be diſentangled from the latter, will be beſt ſeen in ſome of the following hiſtories, either of thoſe nations whom they there conquered, or of thoſe by whom they were driven out of their conqueſts.

[n] Sub. voc. εθνος. [o] Hiſt. lib. xxii. c. 44. * See Vol. iv. Hiſt. of the Medes, ſect. iv. parag. 17.

As for thoſe whom we have ſeen in Europe, we hope our readers are ſatisfied by this time, that if we have choſe to follow a new guide through thoſe dark and remote ages, he has at leaſt conducted us not only more agreeably, but with greater appearance of truth than any other we could have followed, and that the proofs he has taken the pains to extract out of all that we have left of antient records concerning that populous and warlike nation, joined to ſuch a vaſt number of Celtic etymologies, do at leaſt carry a much greater degree of probability than we could meet with any where elſe; and we may add, than we ourſelves could ever have attained, by all the antient monuments extant of that nation, without the help of the Celtic language. Theſe etymologies, which ſeem to ſtrike a light to every paſſage quoted from antient authors, and which we can aſſure our readers we did not take upon truſt, will, we hope, ſufficiently juſtify likewiſe our preferring our learned author's genealogy of the heathen gods to that of Sanchoniatho, which is at beſt but a confuſed medley of ſome dark and imperfect hints ſtolen out of the writings of Moſes, and jumbled with the hiſtory and fables of other nations in honour of his own (B).

We ſubmit, however, to our reader's judgment, whether this genealogy of the heathen deities be not more probable, and more agreeable to the teſtimony of antient authors, than that which our learned biſhop Cumberland has

(B) Though we cannot by any means give into the notion of many learned men, who have ſuppoſed his hiſtory to have been a forgery writ on purpoſe to invalidate the authority of Moſes, as has endeavoured to give us out of his Phœnician hiſtorian. As for ourſelves, we wiſh we could meet with ſuch another guide to conduct us through the next, but more dark and intricate, hiſtory, that of the Scythians. But hence we muſt be contented to grope in the dark, as all have done before us, who have written of that antient and remote nation, and to make the beſt of thoſe few fragments which antiquity has left us concerning them.

as if he had ſtolen his account of the creation out of the Phœnician Records *, yet we cannot but think it manifeſt, that he had copied that ſacred hiſtorian, and that very bunglingly too, beſides blending and adjuſting his coſmogony and theology with the hiſtory and fables of his time.

What elſe can we think of his dark and univerſal Chaos? his vehement wind-engendering Mot or Motion (for that is the Hebrew meaning of the word), which produced the ſeeds of all things animate and inanimate? the ſun, moon, ſtars, and Sophoſemin or ſpeculators of the heavens? what means his Colpias, but the Almighty word, which ſpoke all things into being, his Bau or Baut, but the Tohu and Bohu of Moſes.

Whoever compares alſo the hiſtory he gives us of the ſecond and third line with what we read in Geneſis, and with what has been quoted in the laſt ſection out of antient authors, concerning Elion Chronos, &c. will eaſily ſee, that it is a meer confuſed mixture of ſacred and profane hiſtory, interlarded with fable, and that if Jerombaal, prieſt of Jahvoh, from whom Porphyry pretends he received his information, be the Gideon of the Jews, who was ſirnamed Jerubaal (31), and might have been miſtaken for a prieſt of Jahvoh, becauſe he is recorded to have ſet up an altar and an ephod to him (32); it is plain, that he made no other

* Vid. int. al. Dodwell's diſſertat. de Sanchoniath. (31) Judg. vi. 32. (32) Ibid. xxiv. & viii. 27.

SECT. V.

The Geography of Scythia.

HOW this prodigious tract of land came at firſt by the name of Scythia, is not eaſy to determine. We have but two tolerable conjectures to offer concerning it, beſides beſides that monſtrous one which Herodotus gives us from the fabulous Greeks, and which we ſhall for that reaſon throw into the margin (A). The firſt is that which derives that name from the Greek σκυζεθαι, which expreſſes the fierceneſs of their countenance and natural temper; and the other, which derives it from the Teutonic Scheten or Schuten, to ſchool, at which art this nation is affirmed by Herodotus, Lucian, and others [a], to have been ſo ſingularly expert, that this name is ſuppoſed to have been emphatically given them on that account; ſo that according to this ſuppoſition the word Scythian did properly ſignify a great Schooter or Archer. We have, however, obſerved heretofore, that the Tartars and Muſcovites called themſelves Mogli, which we ſuppoſe only an abbreviation of Mogogly, the ſons of Magog. That of Scythian might be either given to them by other nations, or perhaps by the Celtes, whoſe language, as was before obſerved, did not originally differ much either from the Scythian or Teutonic.

THIS

[a] Vid. Gorop. Becan. Heylin. Pezron.

other uſe of thoſe Jewiſh memoirs than to put them in a phantaſtical Phœnician dreſs, ſuch as beſt ſuited the theology of the heathen world, and was moſt likely to challenge an antiquity and authority to the Phœnician records beyond all others, even beyond thoſe of the ſacred penmen, from whom he had his materials.

(A) That author tells, upon the credit of the pontic Greeks, that Hercules being got into Scythia then uninhabited, and the mares which drew his chariot having ſtraggled out of the way, whilſt he refreſhed himſelf with ſleep as he was in ſearch of them, he met with a monſter, half woman and half ſerpent, who promiſed to help him to them upon condition he would lie with her. The hero having performed the bargain, and ſtaid with her till ſhe was tired, ſhe aſked him at parting how he would have her diſpoſe of the three ſons ſhe had now got by him; whereupon he left her one of his bows and his belt, which had a golden cup hanging at the loweſt ſeam, and bid her, when the boys were come to age, to retain him with her that could draw his bow, and ſend the other two away. She followed his orders, and Scytha, who was the youngeſt and proved the ſtrongeſt of the three, became the firſt monarch of that country. And from him all the kings of Scythia bore that name, and wore a cup hanging at their belt (1).

(1) Herodot. lib. iii.

THIS vaſt teritory, which extended itſelf from the Iſter or Danube the boundary of the Celtes, that is from about the 25th to almoſt the 110th degree of eaſt longitude, was therefore divided into Scythia in Europe, and Scythia in Aſia, including, however, the two Sarmatias, or, as they are called by the Greeks, Sauromatias, now the Circaſſian Tartary, which did lie between and ſever the two Scythias from each other. Sauromatia was alſo diſtinguiſhed into European and Aſiatic, and was divided from the European Scythia by the river Don or Tanais, which falls into the Palus Mæotis, and from the Aſiatic by the Rha now Volga, which empties itſelf into the Caſpian ſea [b]. But the Sarmatians differed ſo little from the Scythians in their language, religion, and cuſtoms, if we may believe Herodotus [c], that we may reaſonably ſuppoſe them to have been originally a branch of them, if not their very deſcendants by the Amazons, with whom that author tells us they having intermarried, begot this Sarmatian offspring. But the former ſeems to us the moſt probable, when we conſider how eaſy, ſhort, and regular their migration into that country was from the place of their firſt ſetting out, and that we find in the very center between Armenia and Sarmatia a large province called Iberia, which is much more likely to be that which Joſephus tells us was peopled by Tubal, the brother of Gomer and Magog, than the Celtiberia of Spain. We ſhall not repeat here what we have ſo lately urged againſt this laſt opinion †.

UPON the whole then, we may ſafely venture to ſay, that the two Scythias were only parted by the two boundaries of Europe and Aſia, that is by the river Tanais, deſcending, as is ſuppoſed, from the Riphean mountains (B) into the Palus Mæotis. For beyond theſe mountains north-

[b] Ptolem. Mel. Strab. Cluver. & al.
[c] Herodot. l. iv.
† See before, p. 389. Note E.

(B) Some modern geographers (2), who prove plainly enough that theſe could not be thoſe of Siberia, which are at the diſtance of near ten degrees from the Tanais, are therefore of opinion that they were imaginary, and ſupplied by the fertile fancy of the ancients to furniſh a head to that river. The caſe is northward we find not that the Scythians advanced into any of thoſe remote regions, ſo that theſe were the proper confines of the Aſiatic Scythia on the weſt. The northern ones reached to the Hyperborean or Frozen ſea, called alſo by the antients, the Scythian ſea, the Cronian, Amalchian, or Almachian, the Dead ſea, and by ſome other names which expreſſed its extreme coldneſs and frozenneſs. On the eaſt they are ſuppoſed to have extended to the promontory of Tabis, and to have been bounded by the Caſſian mountains, which parted Scythia from the kingdom of Seres, now Cattai or northern China; and on the ſouth by the Eoum or Indian ſea, and by mount Caucaſus, and the Caſpian ſea [d].

(2) Well's Geogr. ch. ii. note r. & Bochart. ubi ſup. lib. iii. c. 10.

As to the northern parts of Scythia, their extreme coldneſs made them uninhabitable by any but wolves, bears, and other ſuch-like northern wild-beaſts; and this is probably the reaſon why they ſeem to have been unknown to the antients beyond the 50th degree north. All that reached farther than theſe was called terra incognita, and their notion of their being ſurrounded by the Hyperborean, or northern, ocean, they ſeem rather to have had from conjecture than from experience. But the ſouthern regions, with which they were better acquainted, they divided into three parts; namely Scythia within, and Scythia without, or beyond, Imaus, and Sarmatia, which lay between the former and the European Scythia, which, as we obſerved before, was either a branch of the Scythian nation, or had been by ſome means ſo blended with it, that it differed in little or nothing from it except the name.

THE Aſiatic Scythia did therefore comprehend in general great Tartary and Ruſſia in Aſia, and in particular the Scythia is hardly wroth diſputing: and yet ſince we find that Riphath was Gomer's ſecond ſon (3), whoſe migration may have been probably through this region and along this river; it ſeems more reaſonable to think he might leave his name to thoſe mountains S. E. of Moſcow, from which the Don takes its ſource, as moſt other geographers have ſuppoſed he did, than to believe that thoſe antients, who could know nothing either of Riphath or his migrations, ſhould yet ſo luckily hit upon this fictitious name.

[d] Ptolem. ubi ſupra. Mela, lib. i. c. 2, 3, 4. Cellar. Cluver. Wells, & al.

(3) Gen. x. 3.

Scythia beyond, or without, Imaus, contained the regions of Bogdoi, or Oſtiacoi, and Tanguti. That within, or on this ſide of Imaus had Turkeſtan and Mongal, the Uſbek, or Zagatai, Kalmuc and Nogaian Tartars, beſides Siberia, the land of the Samoiedes, and the Nova Zembla. Theſe three laſt being then uninhabited, as we ſuppoſe, were wholly unknown to the antients, and the former were peopled by the Bactrians, Sogdians, Gandari, Sacks, and Maſſagetes. As for Sarmatia, it contained Albania, Iberia, and Colchis, which make now the Circaſſian Tartary, and the province of Georgia.

OTHER ſeas, beſides the Frozen and Indian ocean, were the Caſpian (C), and the Euxine, or Black Sea, and the Palus Mæotis. Mountains of note were Taurus, Imaus, and Caucaſus: the firſt, beginning in the province of Aſia Minor called Pamphylia, runs eaſtward through Aſia, and divides it into two parts, the northern and ſouthern. The ſecond lies in Scythia or the greater Tartary: and the third is between the Caſpian and the Euxine ſea [e]. Its rivers, beſides thoſe we have occaſionally mentioned, namely the Rha or Volga, and Tanais or Don, are the Oby, Lena, Amur, and Helum; the latter of which is ſuppoſed to be the Quentung or Shengal; all theſe are in great Tartary. To theſe we may add the Jaxartes, now Jaick, and the Oxus; theſe empty themſelves into the Caſpian Sea: in this ſea there were likewiſe ſome iſlands not diſtinguiſhed by any particular names, but commonly called by that of the Scythian iſlands.

NATURAL rarities we cannot expect in this country, if we except what Herodotus tells us, that thoſe northern regions are altogether inviſible and impaſſable by reaſon of the vaſt quantity of feathers which fill the air and cover the ground, as he was informed by thoſe who inhabited the more ſouthern parts of, who, as he tells us in another place, did doubtleſs miſtake the large flakes of ſnow, which fall in abundance in thoſe cold and mountainous climates, for feathers. It were ſtill more abſurd to ſeek for

[e] Vid. ibid. vid. & Wells. ubi ſupra, c. xii. [f] lib. iv.

(C) Miſtaken by ſome antients for a gulph; but, as it has no viſible communication with the ocean, may be rather called a great lake, if ſea be thought too big a name for it *.

* See before, Vol. iv. ch. 10. ſect. i. parag. 10.

for artificial rarities here, among a people who were ſtrangers to every thing but the art of war and of feeding their cattle, as we ſhall ſhew in its proper place.

2. SCYTHIA in Europe, whoſe confines we have already fixed eaſtward from the Tanais, reached towards the ſouth-weſt to the Po and the Alps, by which it was divided from the Celtes, or Celto-Gallia, and by the Rhine northward. It was bounded on the ſouth by the Iſter, or Danube, and the Euxine ſea. As to its northern limits, though it is not eaſy to gueſs at them, they have been ſuppoſed to ſtretch to the ſpring heads of the Boryſtenes or Nieper, and the Rha or Volga, and ſo to that of the Tanais [g] (D).

THE antients divided this country into Scythia Arimaſpæa, which lay eaſtward, joining to Scythia in Aſia, and Sarmatia Europeana on the weſt; theſe two were contiguous to each other, and ſtretched ſome length from north to ſouth, but what divided them aſunder is not eaſy to find out. In Scythia, properly ſo called, were the Arimaſpœi on the north, the Getæ or Dacians along the Danube on the ſouth, and the Neuri between thoſe two. So that it contained the European Ruſſia or Muſcovy, and the leſſer Crim Tartary eaſtward, and on the weſt Lithuania, Poland, part of Hungary, Tranſilvania, Valachia, Bulgaria, and Moldavia. Sarmatia is ſuppoſed to have reached northward to that part of Swedland called Feningia, now Finland, in which they placed the Oœnes, Panoti [g] Vid. Mel. lib. ii. c. 1. Cluver. Cellar & al.

(D) This is upon the ſuppoſition, hinted before, that the firſt planters of the world did ſpread themſelves along the rivers for the ſake of paſturage and correſpondence; but it is plain, all theſe northern parts were ſo unknown to the antients, that all we can ſay concerning theſe boundaries is merely conjecture. It even appears by what we quoted a little above out of Herodotus, that they could not be inhabited very far north, ſince they were ſo afraid of, and ſo little acquainted with, ſnow.

Mela adds, that about the Riphean mountains, which are placed but between 52 and 55 degrees of north latitude, the ſnows fell in ſuch abundance, that thoſe parts were uninhabited and unpaſſable by any but wild beaſts (4).

(4) lib. ii. c. 1.

noti, and Hippopodes (E), this part they divided from northern Germany, now the weſt part of Sweden and Norway, by the Mare Sarmaticum or Scythicum, which they ſuppoſed ran up into the northern ocean, and divided Lapland into two parts, made the weſtern part of Sweden with Norway into an iſland, and Finland into another; ſuppoſing this alſo to be cut off from the continent by the Gulph of that name.

THIS Scythia had no other Sea than the Sarmatian mentioned before, now called the Baltic, with the Gulphs of Bothnia and Finland, and the white ſea joining to the northern ocean, all unknown to the antients, if we except the Euxine and Palus Mæotis, which bounded it on the South. Lakes of any conſideration we find not, except thoſe of Ladoga and Onega in Finland, which were therefore unknown to the antient Sarmatians. Their chief rivers were on the ſouth, the Donetz or little Tanais, Boryſtenes or Nieper, Bog, Tyras or Nieſter, and the Iſter or Danube, all which emptied themſelves into the Euxine, and on the north eaſt the great and little Dwina which empty themſelves, the firſt into the white ſea, and the other into the Gulph of Finland, and therefore not known to the antients; and the Viſtula on the weſt, which runs

(E) Theſe Oœnians, were ſo called for living moſtly upon the eggs of their ſea-foul, which they eat with oaten cakes. The Hippopodes were ſuppoſed to be ſo called from their having feet like horſes, or from their going barefoot and hardening their feet like horſes hoofs. The Panoti were ſo called from the largeneſs of their ears, which was ſuch that they could cover their whole body with them inſtead of other rayment (5). Some other monſtrous people and creatures are alſo mentioned by Herodotus: of the firſt ſort are the Arimaſpæans, ſo called from the Scythian Arima, one, and Spon, eye; not becauſe they had but one eye, as was abſurdly believed by ſome of the antients, but rather, as Bochart juſtly conjectures, becauſe they were ſuch excellent archers, at which exerciſe it is neceſſary to ſhut one eye, that the nick-name of one-eyed was given them upon that account. To theſe we may add the mountaineers, who are affirmed to have been bald from their infancy; and another ſort which had goats-feet, not unlike the fabulous ſatyrs, beſides ſome monſtrous animals, among which were reckoned the griffins, who digged up and guarded the golden oar or duſt (6), all which ſhews how little were known of theſe regions at that time.

(5) Vid. Mel. iii. c. 8. (6) Herodot. lib. iv.

runs into the Scythian ſea, and divided Sarmatia from Germany (F).

THE whole extent therefore of both Scythias, including the two Sarmatias, reached in longitude from the 20th to the 85th degree or even beyond, and from the Alps to the promontory of Tabis and ſtreight of Anian, and in latitude from Caucaſus to the artic circle above 28 degrees. Herodotus indeed tells us, that the Hyperboreans were not of Scythian race, but another kind of people, one ſort of which were Androphagi, or Men-eaters, fierce and cruel, and another, namely the Baldheads or Agrippeans, a wiſe and peaceable people, eſteemed ſacred by all their neighbours [h]; but he ſpeaks of all thoſe remote nations only by report, and with ſuch diffidence, that he rather confirms what he ſaid before, that thoſe regions were moſt likely unknown, if not uninhabited.

CITIES we find none in either Scythia, no not even a metropolis, though Herodotus mentions a branch of Scythians, called Royal Scythians, whom he places along the banks of Tanais, which river divides them, he ſays, from the Aſiatic Sarmatians [i]. Theſe, as ſhould ſeem from the ſequel of that author, were the only ones who had real kings among them, as we ſhall ſee in the next ſection, but ſuch was their ways of living, that they never choſe to [h] lib. iv. p. 356. & ſeq. Littlebur. Edit. vol. 2. vid. & Mel. lib. iii. c. 9. [i] Herod. ubi ſupra. p. 372.

(F) The ſame author (7) mentions ſeveral other rivers, of which he gives a curious deſcription, as well as of thoſe ſouthern ones which we have mentioned above; but we ſhall refer the reader to our author for thoſe particulars, as well as for the rivers we have omitted, becauſe they are either not taken notice of by our modern geographers, or at leaſt are not reckoned of ſuch great note and uſefulneſs.

We ſhall, however, take notice of what he ſays of the Boryſtenes, which he compares to the Nile in Egypt, and the next in greatneſs to the Danube. This noble river, ſays he, beſides the beauty and fertility which it gives to the adjoining lands, abounds with variety of excellent fiſh and pleaſant water, and doth breed a ſort of whale without ſpinous bones, which the Scythians uſed to ſalt for food. They called it Antachæus; he adds, that towards the mouth of it that river yields abundance of ſalt, which is inceſſantly made by the hand of nature.

(7) idem, ibid.

to dwell in cities or fortified places, but to range about as their convenience or ſafety required. So that we have not much further to add concerning their natural or artificial curioſities. Two things, however, are worth taking notice of under this head, the one was a large ſtone lying by the river Tyres, in which was to be ſeen the print of Hercules's foot, ſaid to have been two cubits long. The other was a brazen bowl of an extraordinary capacity, being ſix inches thick, and containing full ſix hundred amphoras or fifty hogſheads. The occaſion of caſting this monſtrous veſſel we ſhall have occaſion to mention in its proper place.

SECT. VI.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, cuſtoms, learning, arts, and trades of the antient Scythians.

government. ALL that can be met with concerning the antiquity and origin of this nation, hath been already mentioned in the firſt ſection of this chapter. How ſoon they began to ſettle themſelves into a regular government, is as impoſſible to gueſs, as of what kind it was. It appears, however, from what we have already hinted out of Herodotus, that one or two tribes at leaſt, that is the royal and free Scythians, were under a monarchical one, and that theſe two made a much greater figure than all the reſt. But whether the former was the eldeſt branch, whether it governed immediately over all the reſt, whether it appointed viceroys over the other provinces of that vaſt country, or whether every tribe had their own princes, as the Philiſtines, whether their ſucceſſion was hereditary or elective, whether deſpotic or ſubject to the laws, we are wholly in the dark. What ſeems moſt probable to us from the little remains we have left of their hiſtory is, that the royal dignity, which was confined to one tribe, might ſtill have a kind of authority over ſome of the reſt, whilſt thoſe who were more remote from the center had lords, laws, and cuſtoms of their own, eſpecially thoſe who inhabited the farther parts of it eaſtward and northward; and this may be the reaſon of that variety of names and characters, which we find in thoſe few ancient writings

we

we have left concerning them. Thus Herodotus tells us, that in proceſs of time, when the Scythians were like to be invaded by Darius, the king, finding himſelf unable to make head againſt the invader, invited all the Scythian princes, namely thoſe of the Taurians, Agathyrſians, Neurians, Androphages, Melanchlænians, Budians, and Sarmatians, to come to his aſſiſtance; all theſe ſeem to have been different branches of the ſame ſtock, and only degenerated from the royal one by diſtance of time and place. So that by this time they differed much in their manners and cuſtoms, as the ſame author there tells us †. The reſult of this ſummons was, that the three laſt named nations joined with the king of Scythia, but the others refuſed to aſſiſt him, under pretence that he was the firſt aggreſſor. Hence we conclude, that they had ſhaken off the yoke of the royal Scythians ſome conſiderable time before, though they might all have been originally under it. We ſhall ſpeak more particularly of theſe eight tribes or nations in another place; at preſent we confine ourelves to the two moſt conſiderable, the royal and free Scythians, as being the moſt conſiderable and the beſt known of all the reſt.

Laws. WHAT their laws were, we can only gueſs from the excellent character that is given to that nation by ancient hiſtorians. Such indeed ſeems to have been their juſtice, temperance, and contempt of riches and luxury, and ſo ſimple and primitive their way of living, that they could not ſtand in need of a great number of them. Juſtin [a] ſums up their character in words to this effect: The Scythians were a nation, which, though inured to labours, fierce in war, and of prodigious ſtrength, yet could ſo well maſter their affections, that they made no other uſe of their victories than to increaſe their fame. Theft among them was reckoned ſo great a crime and was ſo ſeverely puniſhed, that they could let their numerous flocks wander from place to place without danger of loſing them. Theſe they eſteemed their greateſt wealth, living upon their milk and cloathing themſelves with their ſkins. Inſtead of houſes, they uſed to convey their wives and children about in covered waggons, drawn either by horſes or oxen, and made capacious enough to carry all their other furniture for bedding and for the kitchen. Gold and ſilver were as much deſpiſed by them as they were eſteemed by

† lib. iv. [a] lib. ii. c. 2.

by other nations, ſo that they could not covet that which was of no uſe to them. Did the ſame moderation and diſintereſtedneſs reign among other nations, it would ſoon put an end to our deſtructive wars. What is ſtill more wonderful, theſe virtues, which the Greeks did in vain endeavour to attain by learning and philoſophy, were natural to them, and they reaped thoſe advantages from their ignorance of vice, which the others could not from their knowledge of virtue (A). A nation of this character and way of life could therefore want but few laws to ſecure their property, ſome others they had with relation to religion, cuſtoms, and polity, which forbad under pain of death, any alteration being made in either, which excluded their women from the benefit of marriage, and the men from aſſiſting at their royal feaſt, till they had killed an enemy (B). Some other of their laws we omit here

(A) This excellent character of the Scythians, how exaggerated ſoever it may ſeem in their praiſe, is nevertheleſs confirmed by ſeveral antient hiſtorians and poets; and if a late author (1) had but read the teſtimonies which the learned Bochart has brought to confirm it (2), he would not have ſo lightly accuſed Juſtin of flattering that noble nation at the expence of truth.

(B) With reſpect to the former, Herodotus tells us (3), that Anacharſis, a Scythian of no ſmall conſideration, having in his travels aſſiſted at a feſtival, which the Cizycians celebrated to the mother of the gods, made a vow that if he got ſafe back to Scythia he would introduce the ſame worſhip there. Accordingly after his return he retired privately into ſome woody part of that country, where he performed his vow; but he could not do it ſo ſecretly but a Scythian, who ſaw him at it, acquainted the king with it, who came immediately and ſhot him with an arrow upon the ſpot. And even one of their kings loſt his crown and life for barely attempting to introduce ſome of the Grecian rites and dreſs, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place.

With reſpect to the ſecond particular, the ſame author tells us, that it often happened, that ſome women, not having the good fortune to kill an enemy, were forced to pine away in a ſhameful celibacy (4). As to the men, he tells us, that every governor of a province, was obliged to make a yearly wine-feaſt to all thoſe who had killed one or more of their enemies, in which they were allowed to carouſe in cups made of the ſculls of the here, becauſe we ſhall have occaſion to mention them in the courſe of this hiſtory; upon the whole, what appears of them ſeems wholly calculated to prevent luxury, fraud, and covetouſneſs, and to cheriſh that martial ſpirit, for which they are ſo juſtly famed in hiſtory.

(1) Annotat. in Juſtin. Delphin. l. ii. c. 2. Note 8. (2) Phaleg. lib. iii. c. 9. (3) lib. iv. (4) Id. ibid. vid. & Mela. lib. iii. c. 9. D. Sicul. Strab. & al.

It ought not to be objected here, that ſome of the Scythian tribes bear a quite different character, ſome of them being of ſuch fierce and cruel diſpoſition, as even to eat the fleſh of their enemies. Thoſe, as was hinted before, were, if under the ſame government, at ſuch great diſtance from the center of it, as to be out of the reach of its laws. Add to it, that as the inclemency of the air in thoſe remote regions might probably incline them to cruelty; ſo the diſtance and barrenneſs of their country might make them leſs heeded, and probably more incapable of being reſtrained by the common laws. However, it muſt be owned, with reſpect to the warlike temper even of the true Scythians, that it was not without a great mixture of cruelty, if the Greek hiſtorians have not wilfully miſrepreſented them, as we ſhall ſee by-and-by.

If me may gueſs by ſome few ſucceſſions we find mentioned in hiſtory, it ſeems, their crown was hereditary, and yet their kings not ſo deſpotic as not to be depoſed, or even put to death, for the violation of their laws. This is plain from the inſtance we hinted at in the laſt note, where Scyles having been found celebrating the Bacchanalia of the Greeks, his ſubjects revolted from him, and elected his brother Octomaſades, who ſoon after took off his head. In all other caſes their kings ſeem to have been in high eſteem with the people, as we may gueſs from the following circumſtance out of Herodotus.

When any of their monarchs fell ſick, they ſent immediately for three of their moſt famous prophets (C), who the ſlain, and in proportion to the number of them; whilſt thoſe who had not as yet ſignalized themſelves like them, were forced to ſtand at a diſtance, beholding the feaſt and excluded from taſting of it.

(C) Theſe were only a kind of pretended conjurers, who conſulted certain omens, and divined, or made a ſhew of divining, by willow ſticks gathered up into bundles, which they looſened and ſpread upon the ground, and then taking and bundling them up again, uttering all the while ſome conjuring words. It was by this art that they pretended to dive into hidden cauſes and to prey into futurity. The Scythians ſeem to have been very much addicted who commonly told him, that some Scythian whom they named had perjured himself by swearing by the royal throne, which it seems was their most solemn oath. The accused person was thereupon seized, and accused before the king of having brought this distemper upon him by his perjury. If he denied the fact, more prophets were sent for; if they confirmed the evidence, the man was immediately beheaded, and his goods were divided among the three first accusers. But if they acquitted him, a new supply of them was to be sent for; and if the majority of them did absolve him, then the first accusers were tied hand and feet, and set in a cart loaded with faggots and drawn by oxen. And after they had stopt the false prophets mouths, as they then called them, they set fire to the wood, which consumed the cart and men, and seldom failed burning the oxen to death. Our author adds, that the male-children of those whom the king condemned to death seldom escaped the same fate.

Another instance of their great respect for their monarchs is the pompous solemnity of their funerals, which was performed as follows: the embalmers received the body covered with wax, they opened and cleansed the belly, and having filled it with bruised cypress, incense, parsley, and anise-seeds, they sewed it up again, and placed the corpse on a chariot, and conveyed it from one tribe to another through all the provinces of his kingdom. Every province, where they received the funeral procession, was obliged to imitate the royal Scythians in their mournful ceremonies, which consisted in cutting off one part of their ear, shaving their heads, wounding themselves in their forehead, nose, and arm, and piercing their left hand with addicted to this kind of superstition," by the great number of these sham diviners which they had amongst them. Nor was this trade confined to the men: the women had much the larger share of it; and as they did not pretend to prognosticate by means of those wands, or any other conjuring tricks, but rather by an immediate inspiration from some of their deities, they were held in the greatest veneration; and their oracles, which were consulted upon all emergencies, were received as the infallible answers or commands of the Gods, and obeyed with the same readiness †.

† Vid. Keysser. antiq. Septentr. Dissert. V.

with an arrow; and in this guise they accompanied the hearse to the next province, till it came at length to that of the Gerrians, which was the remotest in the kingdom, and was situate along that part of the Borysthenes where it begins to be navigable. Here the corpse was deposited into a large square hole made in the earth, upon a bed incompassed round with spears, which they covered with timber: and spread a canopy over the whole monument. In the vacant places of it they placed one of his concubines, a cook, a groom, a waiter, a messenger, some horses, all strangled, and a number of necessary utensils, and among others some golden cups. This being done, they threw the earth upon it, endeavouring to raise the mound as high as they could. As soon as the year was expired, they chose fifty young men of the king's officers, who were always to be Scythians, those monarchs having the power of chusing whom they pleased to their service, and never being attended by slaves. These young men, with an equal number of horses, were strangled, their bowels were taken out, and their bellies stuffed with straw. The bodies of the young men were set astride upon the horses, and fastened to them by an iron stake. The horses thus mounted were set upon semicircular boards supported by four pieces of timber, and placed at a convenient distance from each other round the monument, the horses having a loose rein fastened to another post set up for that purpose [b].

Religion. The Scythians worshipped a plurality of gods and goddesses, but that which they reckoned their principal deity was Vesta, whom they called Tabiti. The two next were Jupiter, whom they called Papeus, and Apia, or the earth, which they esteemed his wife. Jupiter, it seems, they challenged as their progenitor, and Vesta for their queen, as appears by the answer which one of their kings sent to Darius, when he came to subdue them to his Deities, empire *; besides these they worshipped Apollo, the celestial Venus, and Neptune, under the names Œtosyrus, Artimpasa, and Thamimasades. But their favourite god seems to have been that of war, to whom alone they de-

Mars, dicated temples, altars, and images. How his temples were built, which Herodotus speaks of, he doth not tell us, neither is it eaſy for us to gueſs. It doth not even appear from any other antient authors, or from any other monuments, that ever they built any properly ſo called. Groves indeed, and very ſumptuous ones too, they were famous for erecting to this deity. In theſe they affected to have one or more oaks of a monſtrous ſize, which were accounted ſo ſacred, that it was ſacrilege, and was puniſhed with the ſevereſt death, to lop ſo much as a branch or ſprig, or even to wound the bark. Theſe they never failed to ſprinkle plentifully with the blood of their victims, inſomuch, that the rind of ſome of the oldeſt of them was covered, or even incruſtate, with it †. We are therefore inclined to believe, that Herodotus, who learned theſe things by word of mouth, and had never ſeen them himſelf, might, for want of a good interpreter, miſtake them for temples, and ſuppoſe them to be built like thoſe of other nations.

[b] Herodot. l. iv.

* Id. ibid. See before, p. 20. Note L.

How ſpacious theſe groves muſt have been, may be ſeen in the laſt quoted antiquarian, or be gueſſed at by the vaſt extent of the altars, which, Herodotus tells us, they erected in them to that favourite deity, one of which at leaſt they were obliged to have in every precinct. It was to be made of ſmall wood tied up into bundles, and to cover three ſtades of land in length and breath, though it was not proportionable in its height. The top of it, which was quadrangular, had three ſides perpendicular, and the fourth had a gradual declivity to render the top of it eaſy of acceſs. One hundred and fifty loads of faggots were to be brought yearly to each altar, to ſupply thoſe which had been putrified by the inclemency of the winter. On the top of each of theſe heaps was erected an old iron ſcymetar, which ſtood there as the image, or rather emblem, of the deity. To him, beſides all other cattle, in common with their other gods, and in much greater number, they ſacrificed horſes, which were a martial creature; and, what was ſtill more ſhocking, every hundredth man they took priſoner from their enemies. This laſt bloody offering was made by pouring a libation of wine upon the captive's head, after which they cut his throat, and received his blood into a bowl, with which, aſcending to the top of the altar, they went and waſhed the deity's ſword. As to this victim, they only cut off his right arm cloſe to the ſhoulder, and throwing it up into the air they left it expoſed in the place where it fell, and the reſt of the body in that where it was killed.

Altars.

Human ſacrifices.

† Vid. Keyſler. antiq. Septentr. Diſſert. 3. & alib. paſſ.

As to their other victims, which they ſacrificed either to Mars or to any other deity, they obſerved the ſame rites every where without variation; they brought the beaſt and tied its four feet together with a ſlip-knot, and he who officiated as prieſt came behind, and at once looſed the cord and knocked the victim down. Whilſt it was falling, he called upon the deity to whom it was offered, and then ſtrangled it with a cord which he twiſted with a ſtick; and as ſoon as it was dead he ſet about flaying and dreſſing it, without any previous libation or ceremony. The fleſh was put into pots, and whenever theſe were not ready at hand into the paunch of the creature, mixing with it a proportionable quantity of water; and if wood could not be had, they burnt the bones inſtead of it. When the fleſh was ſufficiently boiled, the prieſt made an offering of part of the meat and inteſtines to the deity by throwing it before its altar, and the reſt was, we may ſuppoſe, beſtowed to feaſt the prieſt and votaries. Thus in caſes of neceſſity, as when they went out to war and the like, they made the victim furniſh them with all things neceſſary for the ſacrifice. Of all the beaſts the horſe was eſteemed the nobleſt, and conſequently the moſt acceptable victim. As for ſwine, they deteſted it, not only as unfit to eat, but even to be ſuffered to live among them. They took care alſo to offer to their gods the firſt-fruits of their cattle, ground, and of the ſpoil they took in war. Some conſiderable part of the latter they were wont to ſend to the Delphic Apollo: it was uſually conveyed thither by a number of their moſt honourable virgins, and under a ſufficient eſcort. But the length and difficulty of the way, and the dangers, and other obſtacles of the journey, our author tells us †, obliged them to diſcontinue it. This is all that we find remarkable concerning their religion.

But before we come to ſpeak of their manners, cuſtoms, and ſuch other particulars, it will be neceſſary to caution our readers once for all, that as we recieve a great part of our intelligence from Herodotus, Homer, and other Greek authors, who cannot be ſuppoſed to have been well affected to the Scythians, by whom their country

† Herodot. lib. iv.

try had been ſo often invaded, plundered, ravaged, and ſometimes almoſt deſtroyed; we muſt not give too implicit a credit to many things which they relate, very much to the diſhonour of that ancient and warlike nation. Some of them we ſhall have occaſion to confute in the ſequel of this hiſtory, and others are of ſo horrid a nature as to exceed our belief, eſpecially when we compare them with the character which Juſtin gives of them, and as it has been learnedly vindicated by Bochart, as we have lately ſhewn; this caution once premiſed, we hope our readers will the better judge of what we are now going to give out of thoſe authors concerning the cuſtoms of this nation, which are not to be found in any of them, without ſome mixture of barbarity.

Contracts. THUS we are told, that their alliances and contracts were ratified with the following ceremonies: they poured ſome wine into an earthen veſſel, into which the contracting parties were to mingle ſome of their own blood, which they drew by a ſlight inciſion made in ſome part of their body. They then dipped into the mixture the prints of ſome warlike weapons, ſuch as a ſcymetar, arrow, dart, javelin, or battle-ax. The parties then uttered ſome dire imprecations on the firſt breaker of the covenant, and having took each of them a draught of the liquor, they deſired ſome of the moſt conſiderable among the by-ſtanders to pledge them, and to be witneſſes of the contract, which being uſually complied with by them, the bargain was reckoned ſo ſacred, that they thought no puniſhment ſevere enough either in this life or in the next for the breaker of it.

Valour. THEIR warlike temper and exploits were ſufficiently known to the antients; ſcarce is there any nation to be met with in hiſtory ſo famous for conquering where-ever they carried their arms, even as auxiliaries, and themſelves remaining ſtill unconquered. Their frugal and ſimple manner of life may indeed be ſuppoſed to have been a great preſervative againſt ſuch invaſions, as other more opulent and luxurious nations were expoſed to. But 'tis plain, this was not always the caſe, ſince we find they were once invaded by the king of Perſia at the head of a moſt puiſſant army, from the power of which nothing but their valour and policy could have delivered them: but of this in its proper place, as well as of their conqueſt of greater Aſia, which could not be wreſted out of their hands but by the blackeſt treachery. But upon the whole, ſuch was their ſtrength and courage whenever they entered into an offenſive or defenſive war, that, as Thucydides himſelf tells us, no nation, either in Europe or Aſia, could equal them either for ſtrength, valour, or conduct; nor indeed any thing reſiſt their power, provided they were but unanimous among themſelves [b].

SUCH care they took to cultivate this martial genius among them, that even their women were inured to it betimes, inſomuch, that they could not be admitted into matrimony till they had killed at leaſt one enemy with their own hands [c], as we have hinted already. As for their youth, they were not without ſome conſiderable encouragements to inſpire them with martial valour, or indeed rather ferocity, if Herodotus doth not bely them: for he tells us, that they were wont to drink the blood of the firſt priſoner they took, and to preſent the heads of all the men they killed in fight to their monarch; theſe were either returned or regiſtered, and intitled the perſon to ſeveral privileges, ſuch as being preſent at ſome public feaſts, ſharing the ſpoil of their enemies, and ſuch like; to which no man was to pretend till he had killed at leaſt one enemy. As therefore the worth and merit of a man did riſe in proportion to the number of heads he had knocked off, they uſed to take the ſkins of the ſlain, to ſtretch, dry, and tan them, and then hang them at their horſes bridles, where they ſerved both for trophies and napkins to the owner; he being always moſt eſteemed who wore the greateſt number of them. Their pride, or rather barbarity, if we may believe our author, went ſo far with ſome of them, that they took off and dreſſed the whole ſkins of the ſlain, and covered both their quivers and horſes, and ſometimes decked their own bodies with them *.

HAD they only exerciſed this kind of ſavage pride againſt thoſe who came to invade them, it might indeed admit of ſome mitigation, as it would have been done not only in defence of their country and in determent to all invaders of it; but as they might naturally enough think ſuch men deſerved no better fate, who attempted the conqueſt of a country, which had nothing to tempt or ſatisfy fy the avarice or ambition of the conqueror (D). But it doth not appear from our author, that they gave much better quarters to thoſe whoſe territories they did invade. And it would have been cruel and impolitic in them to have condemned their young women to celibacy, till they were able to produce ſome ſuch trophies of their martial proweſs, if they were not to be gained in any but a defenſive war, which their poverty joined to their known valour will not permit us to ſuppoſe to have been frequent enough for that end. It is then more likely from what we quoted above out of Thucydides, that as they are affirmed to have lived moſtly upon plunder, inſtead of going out of their vaſt territories, they made mutual incurſions one tribe againſt another, which they again retaliated upon the firſt opportunity, without forgetting, however, their affinity ſo far, as not to joyn their forces againſt a common enemy or invader, whenever neceſſity required it.

[b] lib. ii. ſect. 97. [c] Vid. Herodot. ubi. ſupra. Plat. de leg. ib. vii. Hippocrat. N Damaſcen. Juſtin. & al. * Herodot. ubi ſupr.

How populous the Scythians were is not agreed. If it be allowed, that they made ſuch frequent and bloody inroads one upon another, we cannot but ſuppoſe, that it muſt have thinned them exceedingly. On the other hand, if we conſider their plain and laborious way of living, their climate, conſtant exerciſe, hardineſs, and other ſuchlike advantageous circumſtances, which rendered them luſty and ſtrong, prolific and long-lived, one can hardly conceive, they could be other than a populous nation: for we are told, that very few died of ſickneſs, but all in general lived to a good old age, inſomuch, that many of them being weary of the world before death took them out

(D) This was the argument which, Juſtin tells us (5), they made uſe of to diſſuade the king of Egypt from attempting a war againſt them, for, ſaid they to his heralds, it were madneſs for the opulent Egyptians to invade ſo poor a nation as ours, where they could get nothing but death and wounds: whereas the Scythians would fall upon them with utmoſt fierceneſs at the ſight of ſo rich plunder as victory would intitle them to. Such a meſſage they ſent afterwards to Darius when he had entered Scythia, that as they had neither cities, houſes, fields, vineyards, nor indeed any other valuable treaſures in their country, except their families, and the ſepulchres of their anceſtors, for which, however, they were always known to fight with uncommon bravery; the invader ran a much greater riſk than they (6).

(5) lib. ii. c. 2. (6) Vid. & Herodot. l. iv.

out of it; it was uſual with ſuch to haſten their exit by throwing themſelves from ſome eminence into the ſea or into ſome river [d]. Herodotus, however, who ſeems in doubt whether they were indeed ſo populous as ſome, or ſo thin as other, reports repreſent them, gives us an authentic inſtance and monument in favour of the former, which is as follows: they had it ſeems a cuſtom, not uncommon to other nations *, at their firſt taking of the field to muſter their fighting men, and to make every man caſt an arrow, or, according to our author, the head or point of one, into a proper receptacle, which at their return from the expedition was again taken up. By this they could eaſily compute not only the number of their men, but alſo that of their ſlain, or of thoſe who either ran away, or abſented themſelves from the war. It was at ſome ſuch muſter as this that one of their kings, whom Herodotus named Ariantes [e], being preſent, and obſerving theſe heads of arrows to amount to an immenſe bulk and weight, as he had indeed a prodigious army under him, ordered them to be melted and caſt, or made into that large capacious veſſel we have lately ſpoken of and which, our author tells us, was ſtill extant in his time, and though full ſix inches thick, yet was large enough to hold 600 amphoras, that is, about 50 hogſheads, and remained ſtill a monument of this prodigious army. There is indeed no making of an exact eſtimate from this ſtory, ſuppoſing it literally true: but might not this unwieldy veſſel have been at firſt deſigned only to keep the arrows which every ſoldier threw in, and the other part of the ſtory have been foiſted in proceſs of time. However, ſuppoſing the fact as related, and that it muſt have been a prodigious army that could furniſh metal enough for ſuch a monſtrous veſſel, yet might it not neceſſarily follow, that the Scythian nation was more populous than its neighbours, conſidering the vaſt extent of it. But what ſeems to be a ſtronger argument for it is, the colonies which they were continually ſending out, chiefly towards the ſouthern parts of the world, of which we ſhall have further occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel.

As they cultivated no art nor ſciences except that of war, nor ſcarcely any trade or commerce except paſturage, the reader muſt expect us to be very barren on theſe two heads heads. Thucydides in the place above quoted ſeems indeed to commend their induſtry and ſagacity in procuring all things neceſſary for life, in ſuch a manner, as would incline one to believe them to have been great encouragers of induſtry and manufacture: and another Greek author ſpeaks much of the trade and commerce which they carried on with all the ſea-coaſts of the Helleſpont *. But as to the latter, we are much inclined to believe, that, like ſome of his predeceſſors, he has miſtook them for the Celtes, who, as we have obſerved in a former ſection, were become great merchants both by ſea and land under their king Mercury. For as for the Scythians, their way of living was altogether incompatible with it, as will appear by-and-by. They do not ſo much as ſeem to have known any thing of writing, till they brought it with them from Aſia, after their twenty-eight years invaſion of it: neither do we find any footſteps of their having had ſuch poetic hiſtorians as were the Curetes among the Celtes, or the Bards and Druids among the Gauls. Herodotus, who has wrote ſo much concerning them, doth not ſo much as hint his haveing received his intelligence from any of their records, but barely from tradition; and that is one reaſon why we omit many fabulous things he has ſaid of them from the common report of their neighbours; ſince it is hardly to be expected, they either could, or would, give a true character of a nation, with whom they had no commerce except in a hoſtile way.

[d] Mela, lib. iii. c. 5. Herodot. & al.
[e] lib. iv.
* See before, p. 17.

THEIR language is ſtill more unknown to us, whatever diſcoverics ſome modern antiquarians may fancy to have made about it. The vaſt extent of their territories, together with their intermingling with other nations, could not but cauſe it to ſplit itſelf into a vaſt number of dialects, from which moſt probably have ſprung the Muſcovitiſh, Slavonick, Poliſh, Daniſh, Swediſh, Saxon, and many others; between which, one can but barely diſcover affinity enough to make us believe them ſprung from the ſame mother. This we may, however, venture to affirm, as more than a probable conjecture from a viſible vein of the Celtic ſtill preſerved, as we have ſeen to this day among us, and which runs through all thoſe various languages; that they did not antiently differ much more from it, than the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac. Neither is it ſo much Language.

to

* Dictys Cret. de bell. Troj. l. ii. c. 8.

to be wondered at, that they ſhould have branched out into ſuch a vaſt variety, as that they ſhould ſtill preſerve ſo much of their priſtine affinity as we find they do. We have in a former ſection endeavoured to account for the great number of words and phraſes that are found not only in thoſe northern languages, but alſo in the Latin, Greek, Arabic, and Perſic, which ſhew them to have been ſo many dialects of the old Celtic; if thoſe few relics of the Scythians, which we have left in the names of their kings, tribes, and diſtricts, do not ſo plainly appear to be of Celtic extraction, we muſt remember, they have paſt through ſo many different hands, and have ſo often changed their dreſs, eſpecially among the Greeks, that they may be eaſily ſuppoſed to have quite loſt their antient form. We may add, that ſome of them are perfectly Greek, or tranſlated from the Scythian into that language (F).

Manufactures.

THEIR chief manufactures ſeem to have conſiſted moſtly in building their waggons for their families and baggage, which being covered with the ſkins of beaſts, they muſt have had ſome notion of tanning them, as well as thoſe with which they covered their own bodies. We may likewiſe reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they fabricated their own weapons, which were ſcymetars, javelins, axes, but eſpecially bows and arrows, at which they are ſaid to have been ſo expert, that their very children were trained to ſhoot at a mark even as they rode on horſeback; inſomuch, that it became a common proverb, that the Scythians were as dextrous at their bow, as the Greeks were at their lyre. Hence Cyaxares, king of Media, is reported to have ſent his ſon to be brought up under them to learn the uſe of the bow. They were no leſs expert horſemen [f] (G), inſomuch, that we find them called ἱπποτοξόται by Herodotus

[f] Herodot. lib. i.

(F) Of this kind is the name of the Oœnes, a Scythian tribe, ſo called in Herodotus from their living upon the eggs of wild fowl, and comes from the Greek ωον. The Nomades were ſo called from νομὴ paſture. Of the ſame extraction, were the Hyppopodes, Androphagi, and ſeveral others, which we need not point out to the reader.

(G) This the learned Bochart obſerves the words of the prophet (7) to allude to, where ſpeaking of the army of Magog or Scythia, rodotus and Lucian. and their very women are affirmed to have been ſo well inured to riding and ſhooting, that they did not come one jot behind the men [g]. The antients obſerve, that they had neither mules nor aſſes; and the reaſon they give is, that the country was too cold for thoſe creatures. Experience has ſince ſhewn the contrary, at leaſt with reſpect to the latter; but the true reaſon ſeems to be, that their horſes, which they bred in great quantities, could anſwer all the purpoſes of the other two, and at the ſame time be more ſwift and expeditious than they, whenever occaſion required it.

(7) Ezek. xxxviii. 3.

As for agriculture, it doth not appear that they had any. Herodotus indeed tells us of one province of them, whoſe inhabitants called themſelves Olbiopolitans, and the Greeks Boryſthenians, as they lived on the north ſide of that river; and theſe he likewiſe called huſbandmen, becauſe they ſowed grain, not for food, but for ſale [h]. But the reſt of the Scythians wholly neglected it, chuſing rather to roam where they found the beſt paſture for their cattle, and contenting themſelves with the ſpontaneous product of the earth without being at the trouble of manuring it. And this is in all likelihood the cauſe why we read of ſo many deſarts, vaſt foreſts, and large uninhabited tracts of land between tribe and tribe, in the writings of antient hiſtorians and geopraphers. What they did with the wool of their flocks we read not, but by their cloathing themſelves with the ſkins of wild or tame beaſts [i], as we are told they did, one may conclude, they did not manufacture it. And as thoſe ſkins were of their own dreſſing, they wanted ſtill leſs the help of foreign manufactures. Smiths they muſt have had, both for their various arms, making their waggons, and other neceſſary tools; and as to their arrows, darts, javelins, and ſuch like weapons, if their heads were made of copper, as it is probable they were, if the ſtory we have thia, he calls their horſe סוסים פרשים לבושי מיכלול. Suſſim uparaſhim lebuſhe Miklol, horſes and horſemen, cloathed with perfection, or completely diſciplined and armed, or, as Kimki renders it, expert in all kind of weapons, and our Engliſh verſion cloathed with all kind of armour; for ſuch it appears the Scythian horſe were.

[g] Id. lib. iv. Lucian. in Toxar. & Hermot. Mela, lib. i. c. 21. iii. iv. Bochart. ubi ſupra, & al. [h] Herodot. ubi ſupra. Juſtin, lib. ii. c. 2. Mela & al. [i] Id. ibid.

have related above of the large copper veſſel that was made of them be literally true, there was ſtill leſs art required in making them, ſince they might eaſily caſt them in a mould. Their bows might alſo be made of the ſame metal like thoſe of other antient nations, though it is not improbable, they might alſo have ſome ſmiths to forge iron and ſteel weapons, beſides thoſe they might take from their enemies. It is indeed hardly to be ſuppoſed, they could make their waggons without the help of ſuch artiſts, though upon the whole it doth appear, that they wanted as few trades as any nation, and uſed none they could poſſibly do without:

THEIR chief riches and food conſiſting in their numerous herds, they entruſted the care of them to ſhepherds, who were a lower rank of Scythians below the martial men, and had ſlaves and captives under them. They uſed to move from paſture to paſture, with the perſons and families which were unfit to go to the wars. Theſe did chiefly live upon honey and milk, eſpecially that of their mares, from which creature, if Herodotus was rightly informed, they had a ſtrange way of forcing plenty of it by blowing wind into their privities. What proviſions the warlike ſort made, when they were abſent from their flocks, we cannot gueſs, and it is likely when they came into an enemies country, they took care to ſeize upon all the cattle they could meet with.

Shepherds and martial-men.

FROM an inſtance or two we read of their kings, it ſeems as if they allowed of polygamy, and were not over ſtrict in their marriages. Some we find took wives from other nations, and one of them we read of, who married his own father's widow, but whether the ſame liberty was allowed to private men we cannot affirm. The reaſon the Scythians gave for abhorring the bacchanalian feaſts of the Greeks, namely, that it was unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that a god ſhould drive men into all the violent tranſports of madneſs, ſeems to ſhew, that drunkenneſs was not common among them. And indeed we do not find, that they were much given to feaſting. One wine-feaſt they had, however, once a year in every diſtrict, for thoſe who, as we hinted before, had ſignalized themſelves by killing one or more of their enemies. Another we read of, which was uſed at funerals, and with which we ſhall cloſe this article, ſince we have no more to ſay concerning their other cuſtoms.

Polygamy.

Feaſting.

WE

WE have already ſpoken of the funeral obſequies which they paid to their monarchs. When any other perſon died, his neareſt relations cauſed his embalmed body to be carried in a chariot from houſe to houſe among his friends and acquaintance, who received and feaſted them in their turn, ſetting part of the ſame things before the deceaſed, which they did to their gueſts. This was continued forty days, after which the perſon was buried, and his attendants went and purified themſelves, not by any ablution, but by the ſmoke of ſome hemp-ſeed peculiar to the country, which, being thrown upon ſome burning ſtones, emitted a much more agreeable perfume than the frankincenſe uſed in Greece, and ſo tranſported the company as to ſet them a howling aloud. This ſerved inſtead of waſhing, which the Scythians, our author tells us, never practiſed. Not even the women, who uſed, inſtead of it, to anoint their bodies and face with a paſte, which they made with cypreſs, cedar, and frankincenſe, ground upon a rough ſtone, and ſoaked in water, which paſte, being taken off the next day, rendered their ſkins clean, ſhining, and ſweet [i].

Funeral obſequies.

How their women preſerved their beauty.

THERE remains, that we ſhould ſay a word or two of thoſe other petty kingdoms of Scythia, and of ſome particularities, wherein they differed from the royal Scythians. For whether they were all really deſcended from the ſame ſtock, as we ſuppoſed it in the beginning, or whether they did ſpring from ſome other of Magog's brethren, yet ſince they inhabited ſo conſiderable a part of Scythia, and made ſuch figure in the hiſtory of their wars in conjunction with the royal tribes, we cannot well omit at leaſt thoſe of the greateſt note.

THE Samaritans, we have already hinted, are affirmed by Herodotus, to have been the offspring of the Scythians (H) and Amazons. Theſe warlike women, or, as their Sarmatians.

Scythians

[i] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

(H) Some authors, however, from a paſſage in Pliny (8), where he tells us, that they were reported to be deſcended from the Medes; and another out of Juſtin, who tells us, that the language of the Parthians was a mixture of Scythic and Mediſh (9), have ſuppoſed, that the Sarmatians, who moſt reſemble the Parthians, were the offspring of the Medes; and that the name of Sarmatian was only a corruption of the Chaldee שראר גורי Sheer

(8) lib. vi. c. 7. (9) lib. xli

Scythian name Aior Patta imports, Man-ſlayers, in their flight from the Grecians having landed near the precipices of the Palus Meotis belonging to the free Scythians, and having been perſuaded to be married to them, did in their turn prevail upon them to leave that part of Scythia, where they pretended they could not conveniently live with them, and to paſs into the province of Sarmatia on the other ſide of the Tanais. Hence our author ſays, the Sarmatian women retained ſtill the Amazonian temper and way of life, being more warlike than the reſt of the Scythian females, and the language of the country became a corrupt Scythian, becauſe the Amazons never could perfectly learn that language, but taught it their offspring, corrupt as themſelves ſpake it. Here it chiefly was, that virgins were unqualified for matrimony till they had diſpatched an enemy in the field [k].

Taurians. THE Taurians had this inhuman cuſtom, that they ſacrificed to a virgin all that were ſhipwrecked, and all the Grecians which they caught upon their coaſts. This bloody offering was performed by knocking the perſon on the head with a club, after many dire imprecations, and flinging his carcaſs down the hill on which their temple was built, or, as others told our author, by burying the body, and reſerving only the head to be ſtuck on a pole. Theſe Taurians pretended, that the virgin Demon whom they thus worſhipped was Iphigenia Agamenon's daughter. They lived chiefly by war and rapine, and were very cruel

[k] Id. ibid. Mela, ubi ſupra.

Sheer Madai (10), a reſidue or ſprout of the Medes. We can affirm nothing certain about it, but yet we think Herodotus may be more relied upon than the other two, who ſpoke at a much greater diſtance of time and place than he. However, if what they ſay be true, it proves what we obſerved before, that the deſcendants of Gomer and his brothers did make their migrations as it were in columns, and only ſeparated by degrees from each other.

As to the Parthians, though their name in the Scythic and Celtic ſignifies ſeparated, it ſeems probable, that they were rather Gomerians or Celtes driven out by their own countrymen, who having forced themſelves into a country of the Medes, were by them called Parthians, or baniſhed (11).

(10) Vid. Mela, lib. iii. c. 4. & alib. Bochart. lib. iii. c. 14. (11) Vid. Pezron. Ant. Nat. ch. iv.

el to thoſe that fell into their hands. The Agathyrſians are ſaid to have had their women in common, in order to link the men more ſtrictly together, and to prevent jealouſies and other ill effects of matrimony. The Neurian province being infeſted with dangerous ſerpents, they were at length forced to leave it for that of the Budians. They obſerved the cuſtoms of Scythia in moſt particulars, only pretended to greater ſkill in magic than they, and were reported to be transformed into wolves for a few days, after which they reſumed their own ſhape [l]. Agathyrſians. Neurians.

THE worſt of all were the Androphagi or Men-eaters, who obſerved neither law nor juſtice, and had nothing in common with the reſt, but their dreſs and breeding of cattle. The Melanchœnians were ſo called for affecting to go always in black: they followed the Scythian cuſtoms, except that they fed upon human fleſh, which the free Scythians did not, nor indeed any other tribes, at leaſt as common food, but only on ſome particular occaſions, ſuch as we ſhall have occaſion to mention by-and-by. The Budians were a populous nation famed for blue eyes and red hair: in this province above all the reſt did they build them a city, and called it Gelonus, whoſe houſes and high walls were of timber, and each ſide of the walls was three hundred ſtades in length: it had temples and chapels dedicated to the Grecian gods; and here they celebrated the Bacchanalia triennially. The people of the province differed from that of the city, in that the former applied themſelves to the keeping of cattle, and theſe to till their land, plant gardens, and live upon the product of them and of their corn-fields; in a word, theſe Gelonians had ſo much better minds than the Budians, that they ſeemed, and in our author's opinion really were, another people. This province yielded otters, beavers, and other ſuch animals: their ſkins ſewed together were uſed for garments, and the teſticles againſt hyſteric diſeaſes. The Oœnes, Panoti, Arimaſpæi in Scythia Europeana we have ſpoken of in a former note, and have nothing more to add to it here, except that they did more reſemble the royal Scythians than any others, in moſt particulars, eſpecially in their warlike genius, and ſimplicity of living. Budians or Androphagi. Gelonians.

THE laſt two nations or tribes of Scythians worth our notice were the Scythian Nomades, inhabiting, as we have

[l] Id. ibid. [m] Id. ibid.

Scythian Nomadess

have ſeen upon the north-weſt of the Caſpian ſea, and the Maſſagetes on the eaſt. As for the Amazons, as they are accounted ſomewhat fabulous, we ſhall ſpeak of them in a ſeperate note (I.) The Nomades differed ſo little from

(I) Concerning theſe ſo famed and ſo much queſtioned female warriors, it were endleſs to trouble ourſelves with all that has been written on either ſide; thoſe ſeem to come neareſt the truth, who neither altogether reject what has been ſaid of them by the antients, nor altogether credit all the wonders that are recorded of them. If we compare the warlike genius of the Scythian women in general, and more particularly that of the Sarmatians, in whoſe neighbourhood lived theſe Amazons if they were not originally of the ſame blood, with the occaſion which gave birth to this ſtrange kind of government, namely, the treacherous murder of their huſbands, and their being in danger of becoming a prey to their murderers and in a ſtrange country; If, I ſay, we conſider all theſe circumſtances, there will be nothing ſo improbable in the brave and maſculine method they took to ſave themſelves from ſlavery and to revenge the ſlaughter of their huſbands. We may add, that the Scythian as well as Celtic women were anciently held in great authority and veneration, for their ſkill in divination above the men, inſomuch, that the latter are even upbraided by antient authors (12) for ſuffering them to aſſiſt at and ſteer their councils as they pleaſed, and to have even preſided in all courts of judicature and other aſſemblies; in which their judgment was generally reckoned deciſive, becauſe they were ſuppoſed to be divinely inſpired (13). Being therefore thus inured to council, execution, and warlike exploits, exaſperated by the treacherous butchery of their huſbands, and become, as it were, deſperate at the proſpect of their impending ſlavery; we need not wonder, that they ſo ſoon fell upon the moſt effectual means of making a noble defence, and like ſo many heriones, having choſen one or two of the wiſeſt and ſtouteſt among them to lead them to an offenſive war againſt their enemies, they carried it on with ſuch courage and conſtancy, and with ſuch ſuprizing ſucceſs. And if their warlike temper, their government, cuſtoms, valour, conduct, and atchievements, have been exaggerated beyond credibility, it is no more than hath been done with reſpect to other nations, governments, kingdoms, and conquerors, whom it were nevertheleſs abſurd to treat as fabulous upon that account. It is certainly more equitable to make the ſame allowance from the royal Scythians, except in this appellative, that we ſhall need ſay no more about them, than that they did, like them, follow a wandering life, living no longer in one lowance in both caſes, than to ſuppoſe, that ſo many hiſtorians, who have written of either of them, were guilty of wilful forgery, or too great credulity (14).

(12) Vid. Tacit. de Mor. German. cap. viii. & alib. Polyæn. in Stratagem. l. vii. Plutarch. lib de virt Mulier. Cæſ. Comment. l. i. c. 50. Strab. Geograph. lib. vii. (13) Vid. Keyſler. antiq Septentr. diſſert. 5.

The occaſion of this new female government was as follows: Two noble Scythian youths, whom our author calls Hylinos and Scolopitus (15), having been forced to yield to a contrary faction, about the time of the firſt irruptions of the Scythians into Aſia, and in the reign of Seſoſtris king of Egypt, retired into part of Cappadocia with their wives and families. They brought with them alſo a very conſiderable number of warlike youths, by whoſe aſſiſtance they got poſſeſſion of the region of Thermoſciria, on the river Thermodon, from which they uſed to make frequent incurſions into the neighbouring countries for ſeveral years, till they were at length all treacherouſly murdered by thoſe nations. Their wives were no ſooner apprized of it, than, partly through fear of ſlavery and partly through deſire of revenge, they put themſelves under the conduct of ſome of their greateſt heroines, and prepared for a bloody war againſt the murderers. That nothing might obſtruct their fury, they renounced all future marriages with mankind, calling it an unworthy kind of ſlavery, and deſtroyed the reſidue of their huſbands who had eſcaped the ſlaughter, that ſo, being all upon the ſame foot, they might purſue their deſigns with equal ardour and courage. The conſequence was, that they fell upon the conquerors with ſuch bravery and ſucceſs, that they totally overthrew them, greatly enlarged their own dominions, and made their neighbours ſue to them for peace. One of their conditions was, that they ſhould yearly have a month's intercourſe with each other, in order to keep up the breed, after which they brought up all their girls in their own way, cutting off their right breaſts, that they might be no obſtruction to their ſhooting, whence they came to be called Amazons; and as for the boys that were born to them, they either killed them, according to our author, or ſent them back to their fathers, according to Herodotus (16).

Theſe ſurprizing exploits were atchieved under the government and conduct of two famous queens, Lampedo or Lampeto, and Martheſia or Marpheſia, who boaſted themſelves to be the daughters one place than they found plenty of paſture for their cattle; after which they removed to freſh grounds, and when called to the wars, left their families and flocks with their ſhepherds till their return [p].

(14) Vid. S. W. Rawl. hiſt. lib. iv. c. 2. ſect. xv, (15) Juſtin. ex Trog. l. ii. c. 4.

THE

[p] Mela, lib. iii. c. 6.

daughters of Mars; and having carried their conqueſts into Aſia and built ſome cities there, this laſt, who had been left there with an army to ſecure their conqueſt, whilſt the former returned home loaden with ſpoils, was afterwards ſurprized, and cut off with the reſt of her female warriors by ſome bands of barbarians.

She was ſucceeded by her daughter Ortara or Orthya, whoſe valour, added to her living in perpetual virginity, did not a little raiſe the glory of the Amazonian name. To this ſucceeded Antiopha, whoſe ſiſters, Hypolite and Menalippe, are reported to have challenged Hercules and Theſeus, and to have been with great difficulty overcome by thoſe two heroes. 4. Penthefilea was another famous Amazonian queen, who is ſaid to have come at the head of an army of her viragoes to the aſſiſtance of Priamus king of Troy. 'Tis added, that ſhe was the inventreſs of the battle-ax, and was at length killed by Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles. Some other particulars related of thoſe heroines ſmell ſo much of the fable, that we ſhall dwell no longer upon them (16).

The bloody re encounter between Thomyris, another of their warlike queens, and Cyrus king of Perſia has been taken notice of in another chapter †; and the amorous one between Alexander the Great and the famous queen Thaleſtris ſhall be ſpoken of in its proper place. It is under this laſt that the Amazonian race and kingdom is ſaid to have received its final period.

We muſt not omit ſome other memorable occurrences concerning a colony of theſe female worthies, which happened in the reign of ſome of the foregoing queens; it is not eaſy to gueſs which; and which are mentioned by another author (17) in his hiſtory of the Scythians.

The Grecians, who had obtained a ſignal victory over the Amazons, near the river Thermodon, were carrying off the reſidue that had eſcaped the ſlaughter, in three ſhips, into their own country. While they were at ſea, the Amazons conſpired againſt them, and killed all the men they had on board with them; but being altogether unacquainted with navigation, even with the uſe of the rudder, ſails, and oars, they were driven by

(16) Vid. Juſt. ubi ſupra & Pauſan. in Attic. c. ii. † See before, p. 67. (17) Herodot. l. iv.

THE Maſſagetes did likewiſe imitate the free Scythians in their habit, manner of living, arms, and warlike genius; but they uſed, beſides bows and arrows, for which thoſe were ſo famed, javelins and ſcymetars. Braſs ſerved them inſtead of ſteel for making their offenſive weapons, and as to their defenſive ones, they added ſome ornaments made of gold, eſpecially in their helmets, belts, and armour. Their horſes were likewiſe fenced with a breaſt-plate of braſs, whilſt their bridles, and other furniture, were adorned with gold; for ſilver and iron were not uſed by them, becauſe their country did not produce them. Though every man was obliged to marry a wife, yet they held them all in common: ſo that when a man met with a woman to his liking, he took her into his charriot or waggon, and lay with her without any further ceremony, than the hanging up his quiver at the head of it. This cuſtom, Herodotus by the wind and tide, to the precipices of the Palus Meotis, in the territories of the free Scythians. Here they got aſhore, and marching up into the country, they ſeized upon the firſt ſet of horſes they could come at, and began to plunder the inhabitants. The Scythians, unacquainted with their language, ſex, and dreſs, could not tell what to make of theſe invaders: they took them at firſt to be youths, but after a ſkirmiſh or two, in which ſome of them were taken priſoners, had convinced them of the contrary; they reſolved not to kill them, but to ſend a party of youths to watch their motions, with orders, that if they were attacked by them, they ſhould flee from them; and as ſoon as they ceaſed their purſuit, encamp at the neareſt diſtance they could, reſolved if poſſible to have ſome children by theſe brave women. Theſe obſerving, that the Scythian youths did not come with any hoſtile deſign, ſuffered them to continue in their neighbouring ſtation, whilſt they, having nothing but their horſes and arms, lived in their old manner by hunting and plunder. It was their cuſtom to withdraw themſelves from the reſt about noon, either ſingle or by couples, to comply with the neceſſities of nature, which when the Scythian youths obſerved, they did ſo likewiſe: by this means one of theſe walking alone met with a ſingle Amazon, and though they could not ſpeak to each other, yet ſhe found a way to let him underſtand, that if he would meet her there on the next day, accompanied with another Scythian, ſhe would likewiſe bring a companion with her. The upſhot was, that both the camps were preſently joined into one, and every Scythian took to wife the Amazon, whom chance threw in his way. The women had no ſooner got a ſmattering of the Scythian language, than they were given to tells us, was unjuſtly attributed to all the Scythians by the Greeks, whereas it was peculiar to the Maſſagetes only [q]. A more inhuman cuſtom than this the ſame author tells us they had, that when a man had once attained to old age, which was not ſo much limited by law as inferred from concurring ſymptoms; all his relations met and ſacrificed him, together with a number of cattle of ſeveral kinds, and having boiled the fleſh all together, they ſat down to it as to a feaſt. This kind of death was accounted by them the moſt happy, as that of dying by ſickneſs was reckoned unfortunate, becauſe theſe laſt were to be buried, inſtead of coming to the honour of being ſacrificed to their gods, and feaſted upon by their neareſt relations and intimate friends. The ſun was the only deity they worſhipped, and to him they ſacrificed horſes, which being reckoned underſtand by their new huſbands, that they had their parents and poſſeſſions in that neighbourhood, to whom they had a deſire to return, inviting the women to follow them thither. But theſe replied, that as they had ever been uſed to draw the bow, dart a javelin, mount a horſe, and all ſuch warlike exerciſes, to which they ſuppoſed the Scythian women altogether unaccuſtomed; they could not bear the thoughts of going to live among them, and exchange their warlike way of living for their indolent one. They therefore exhorted them, if they retained ſtill the ſame conjugal affection for them, to go and receive their ſeveral portions of wealth from their parents, and to return to them, which they readily complied with. At their return, their wives acquainted them farther, that, ſince they had deprived them of their parents, and committed ſeveral depredations in that country, they thought it much ſafer to go and fix their habitation on the other ſide of the Tanais. This was likewiſe agreed to, and having croſſed that river, after three days march eaſtward of that river, and three more northward from the lake Meotis, they arrived and ſettled in the country of Sarmatia, where they continued ſtill in our author's time. Hence it is, that the Sarmatian women are by far the greateſt warriors of all the Scythians; and hence proceeds the corruption of their language; for the Amazons not having been able to learn, and conſequently to teach their children, the true Scythic, the Sarmatian became a mixture of that and of the Amazonic. Thus came the fame of thoſe female warriors to ſpread itſelf into Europe and Aſia; as for thoſe of America, they ſhall be ſpoken of in their proper place.

Some barbarous cuſtoms

[q] Herodot. lib. i. ad finem.

koned the nobleſt and ſwifteſt of all creatures, they thought moſt proper to be offered to the nobleſt and ſwifteſt of all the gods. They neither ſowed nor planted, but contented themſelves with the milk and fleſh of their cattle, and with fiſh, of which the Iaxartes did yield them a very great plenty [r]. In a word, the two forementioned cuſtoms excepted, they were eſteemed the nobleſt of all the Scythians [s], being equal to the royal tribe in valor and proweſs, and exceeding them in opulence. Their worth

[r] Mela, Cluver. & al. [s] Vid. Strab, l. xi. paſſ. Diod. Sicul. Mela, Cluver. & al.

SECT. VII.

The hiſtory of the Scythian kings.

Scythian chronology not to be attained.

WHAT has been obſerved in ſome of the foregoing ſections, concerning the barrenneſs of Scythian records, and of other hiſtorians concerning that nation, will eaſily convince our readers, that it would be a vain attempt to give any light to the chronology of it, or even to a regular hiſtory of their kings, whoſe names and exploits lie occaſionally ſcattered in Herodotus, and other more recent hiſtorians, without any order of time, or any indice, whereby one may give the leaſt gueſs into it, at leaſt till their invaſion of Aſia, and engaging in wars with ſome of the Aſiatic monarchs. Till then, it is probable, they confined their conqueſts to Europe, and made their incurſions only againſt their neighbours, which though perhaps originally deſcended from the ſame ſtock, yet, like a great many other nations, ſuch as the Ammonites and Moabites, Edomites and Iſraelites, and many more, had either quite obliterated, or were become regardleſs of, their former affinity. And this ſeems to have been moſt probably their caſe, becauſe they cultivated no arts, but that of war and plunder, without troubling themſelves about recording their acts and genealogies. The Celtes indeed had their Curetes; and other European nations their Bards and Druids, who celebrated their exploits in verſe, as we have ſhewn in a former ſection; but we do not find any footſteps of the Scythians having had any ſuch perſons among them; ſo that tradition, ſuch as it could be got, ſeems to have been the only fountain from which our antient hiſtorians have drawn all their intelligence concerning that nation, and which they have been forced to convey to us in as confuſed and irregular a manner as they had received it.

THE following is a liſt of Scythian kings, as we find them mentioned by Herodotus, Juſtin, Diodorus, Strabo, and Mela; but without any note of time either about the beginning, length, or end of their reigns. Neither can we affirm, that they ſucceeded one another in the order we have ſet them down, or even whether they all reigned over the ſame nations, or ſome of them over one or more tribes, and others over other tribes. However, we ſhall to the liſt of their names ſubjoin ſuch particular facts as we have recorded of any of them, and with which we ſhall be forced to cloſe this hiſtory.

Kings of Scythia:

1 Scythes.
2 Napis.
3 Phithra.
4 Sagillus or Protothyas.
5 Madyes.
6 Thomyris.
7 Jancyrus.
8 Indatyrſus,
9 Targitaus.
10 Calaxais.
11 Scholypethes or perhaps rather Scythopetes.
12 Panaxagoras.
13 Tanais.
14 Saulius.
15 Spargapiſes.
16 Aripethes.
17 Scyles.
18 Octamaſades.
19 Ariantes.
20 Atheas.
21 Lambinus.

Scythes. SCYTHES is that fabulous ſon of Hercules, begotten on a monſter, of whom we have ſpoken in a former note, and from whom the Scythian nation was affirmed by the fabulous Greeks to have taken their name, if not to be deſcended [a]. This hiſtory ſeems to have been invented by the Greeks, for no other end than to ſully the origin of the noble and warlike Scythians, to whom they were no doubt vaſtly inferior in power, courage, virtue, and other accompliſhments, as the reader will eaſily ſee by comparing the hiſtory of theſe, with what we ſhall relate, in a ſubſequent ſequent chapter, of the more obſcure and barbarous beginnings of the Grecian nation.

[a] Herodot. l. iv.

SAGILLUS is ſaid to have ſent his ſon Panaſagoras, who is perhaps the ſame with Protothyas, the father of Madyes, with an army of horſe, to the aſſiſtance of Orithya, queen of the Amazons, againſt Theſeus king of Athens. To perſuade him to it, ſhe let him know, that the Amazons were of Scythian race, that it was mere neceſſity that had obliged them to diſpatch their ſurviving huſbands, and to erect themſelves into a female monarchy, and to engage in this war. In a word, ſhe uſed all the arguments that could induce the Scythian king to her aſſiſtance: his ſon came accordingly with a large army of horſe, but preſently after his arrival, upon ſome diſguſt which that prince took at thoſe brave heroines, he left them to the mercy of their enemies, who ſoon after gained the victory over them [b]. Sagillus.

MADYES, of whom we have ſpoken in a former chapter *, and ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the Indathyrſus of Strabo, though different from that of Herodotus, was the ſon of Protothyas, and a warlike prince. Under his conduct it was, that the Scythians, having drove the Cymmerians, or northern Celtes, out of Europe, and purſued them into Aſia, invaded the country of the Medes, and held the greater part of upper Aſia in ſubjection twenty-eight years. The occaſion of their quarrel with the Cymmerians, and of this Aſiatic irruption, is indeed no where to be found; but may, however, be eaſily gueſſed at. Scythia, we obſerved, was more fruitful of men than of food and ſuſtenance; it was hemmed on the north by intolerable froſts and ſnows: where ſhould they then diſcharge their over-ſwelling multitudes, but towards the more inviting regions of the ſouth, where the inhabitants, being probably as much accuſtomed to an eaſy and delicate life, as thoſe were to a hardy and warlike one, were moſt likely to yield to them if not their country, yet at leaſt a free paſſage through it, and aſſiſt them with all neceſſaries of life, that they might be the ſooner rid of them? Hence it is, that they ſo ſwiftly paſſed into Aſia, and led their victorious army even into Egypt. But here we are told, they were prevailed upon by their king Pſammiticus, either by preſents or entreaties, to proceed no farther. They Madyes.

[b] Juſtin. ex Trog. l. ii. c. 4. * Vol. iv. ch. 10. ſect. iv. par. 17.

made likewise some incursions into the land of the Philistines; and it was in this expedition that they took the city of Bethsheam from the half tribe of Manasseh on this side of Jordan, and called it by their name the city of the Scythians or Scythopolis, as we have hinted in the history of the Medes *. In their return through Syria some of their stragglers plundered the temple of Venus at Ascalon, and for their sacrilege were punished with hemorrhoides, or, as others say, with that kind of it, which is only common to the other sex; which did also cleave to their posterity as a brand of infamy.

They might probably have held their dominion in Asia much longer than they did, had not their indolence and exactions on the one hand, and the treachery of Cyaxares king of the Medes on the other, put an end to it, in the manner we have related in that history. What became of the rest that survived the slaughter we can only guess at; many of them might submit themselves to the Medes, and continue there; but a much greater number went, as is supposed, and served Nebuchadnezzar, part of whose army is said to have consisted of all the families of the north; but the greatest part, according to Herodotus, marched towards Scythia [c], where they met with an unexpected reception from their servants and slaves. This story is somewhat differently reported, as well as that of their Asiatic expedition, and the time they spent in it: Justin, who calls this their third expedition, says, it lasted but eight years [d], during which their wives, having given them over for lost, on account of the great distance between them, had married their servants and slaves; to whom, as we have observed, their masters used upon all such excursions to commit the care of their families and cattle. As soon therefore as the Scythians were entered into the confines of their own territories, this upstart race of slaves sent to forbid their masters to approach nearer at their peril.

But Herodotus, who speaks of this expedition as their first into Asia, and affirms it to have lasted twenty-eight years, adds [e], that their wives, unused to be so long idle, had taken their servants and slaves to their beds, from whom this new generation was sprung, which obstructed their masters return into Scythia, after they had suffered themselves themſelves to be driven out of their Aſiatic conqueſts by the Medes. This laſt is the more probable of the two in many reſpects, and agrees better with thoſe other authors, who affirm, as was obſerved before, that the Scythians held the dominion of Aſia twenty-eight years. However that be, this ſlaviſh offspring, having timely notice of their maſters returning home, had ſo well fortified and intrenched themſelves againſt them, that they would in all probability have kept them out, had not ſome of the wiſer Scythians bethought themſelves of a ſtratagem, which quite diſcomfited that rebellious rout.

* Ib. [c] Herodot. lib. i. [d] lib. ii. c. 5. [e] lib. ii. iv.

THEY had already had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with equal ſucceſs on both ſides, when one of the Scythian lords told the reſt, that it was a ſhameful thing for them to fight with their ſlaves, as with their equals, that if they deſigned to force them into ſubmiſſion, they muſt fall upon them, not with warlike weapons, but with whips and ſcourges, ſuch as they were formerly wont to chaſtiſe them with. This advice was followed with ſurprizing ſucceſs, and the ſlaviſh rebels were taken with ſuch a pannic at this new and unexpected kind of war, that they laid down their arms and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. As many of them as could be caught were put to the moſt cruel deaths, whilſt their miſtreſſes, conſcious of their guilt, ſought to avoid their huſbands reſentment, by hanging, or ſome other ſpeedy death (K). After this ſignal victory over

(K) It is plain by theſe Scythians leaving their wives, ſervants, and baggage behind, that they deſigned to return again from Aſia; for it is ſcarce probable, that their deſign was to conquer ſome ſpacious country there, and then to come back to fetch them thither. And therefore we conclude, as we obſerved above, that they only went to aſſiſt thoſe new colonies, which they were obliged to diſcharge from time to time for want of room, to make a good ſettlement there, after which they deſigned to return to their own homes, as uſual.

However that be, this adventure ſeems plainly to contradict a ſtory which Herodotus tells of the Scythians, that they uſed to put out the eyes of their ſlaves: for it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that this ſlaviſh army that oppoſed their return, was wholly a new offspring, unleſs we can believe that their wives took their blind ſlaves into their beds almoſt as ſoon as their huſbands backs were turned from them.

As for the war itſelf between the maſters and ſlaves, it is ſo far from being a fiction, or ſo much as doubted of in thoſe parts, even at this day, that we are told, that the Novogradians, whoſe over their rebellious ſlaves, the Scythians, according to Juſtin, enjoyed a long and unmoleſted peace till the days of Jancyrus, of whom we ſhall ſpeak by-and-by. We muſt, however, except the invaſion which happened under the next reign we are going to mention.

Tomyris. THOMYRIS, Tomyris, or Tamyris, was that heroine whom, we are told, * Cyrus the great did, or at leaſt pretended to, court in marriage, and was ſending an embaſſy to treat about it. But ſhe, ſuppoſing that her kingdom, rather than her perſon, was the object of his wiſhes, ſent expreſs orders to the embaſſadors not to proceed further. Cyrus, provoked either at her refuſal, or at her ſuſpecting his artifice, advanced with his army againſt the Maſſagates, who were then under her dominion. What the iſſue of this expedition was, and what credit may be given to the ſtory of his tragical end, and the revenge which that exaſperated princeſs took of him, we have already ſeen in another chapter †, and ſhall not repeat it.

Jancyrus. JANCYRUS, a magnanimous and haughty prince, is famed for the noble anſwer which he ſent to Darius king of Perſia, when he ſent to demand of him the uſual preſents of earth and water in token of ſubjection, and for the total defeat which he gave to that aſſuming monarch's army; and as ſuch ſeems to be the ſame with Herodotus's Indathyrſus, [f] or to have been his immediate ſucceſſor. The occaſion of this war with the Perſians is variouſly related

* Herodot. lib. i. ad fin. † See before, p. 67. [f] l. iv

whoſe city ſtands in the Sarmatian Scythia, did cauſe a coin, which they call a Dingoe Novogradſkoi, to be ſtampt in memory of it, which had a man on horſeback, ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand, and which has been current ever ſince throughout all Ruſſia †

It is probable likewiſe that it was from this breach of conjugal faith in the Scythian wives, that the cuſtom has been ſince eſtabliſhed among the Muſcovite women of preſenting their future ſpouſe, even in the time of their courtſhip with, a Pudkey, or whip, wrought with their own hands, in token both of a greater ſubjection and fidelity than their Scythian anceſtries, or moſt probably to put them in mind of their fault, and of their own duty, whenever they chance to forget it.

† Vid. Fletch. Ruſſ. Commonwealth, c. iv. ap. Rawl. l. ii. c. 28. ſect. iv.

by Juſtin [g], and the laſt quoted author: the former tells us, that the Scythian monarch had exaſperated Darius by refuſing to give him his daughter in marriage; and the latter introduces ſome Scythian princes, accuſing him with being the firſt aggreſſor and having invaded the Perſian territories, whilſt Darius himſelf pretended only to revenge the ravages which the Scythians had committed in Aſia 120 years before, when they held it in ſubjection 28 years. There is therefore no other way of reconciling theſe accounts and the two different names of the Scythian monarch; but by ſuppoſing the Jancyrus of Juſtin to have been the father of Indathyrſus, and that, finding that the refuſal of his daughter had provoked the Perſian king to a war, he reſolved to be before-hand with him, and to ſend his ſon Indathyrſus to invade his territories; and that dying ſoon after he intailed that war upon his ſon, from which he afterwards reaped ſo much glory. Herodotus might not think fit to tranſmit a circumſtance ſo much to the honour of the barbarous Scythians, as that of the great Darius's ſeeking to contract an affinity with one of their monarchs. And it is perhaps for the ſame reaſon, that he makes the Perſian army to have been rather haraſſed and ſtarved out of Scythia, than repulſed by the known bravery of that prince and nation. As for Darius, if he really received ſuch an affront from the king of Scythia as the refuſal of his daughter, it was too diſhonourable a pretence to ground this invaſion upon; and a more glorious motive muſt be ſought out, though at ſo great a diſtance of time, to cover the true and real one.

HOWEVER that be, Indathyrſus, having received the proud challenge from the Perſian king implied in the demand of earth and water, which we have elſewhere ſhewn to ſignify not a ſupply of proviſions for his army, but an acknowledgment of ſubjection †, ſent him this haughty reply; that, as he acknowledged no lord but his progenitor Jupiter and Veſta queen of the Scythians, he would ſhortly ſend him a more ſuitable preſent, and ſuch a one as might perhaps make him repent him of his arrogance. This preſent accordingly was diſpatched to him ſoon after: it was a bird, a mouſe, a frog, and five arrows, without any farther explication; theſe arrows might perhaps allude to the number of Scythian tribes which were joined with his own, of which we ſhall ſpeak by-and-by. Theſe and the the living creatures Darius immediately interpreted in his own favour, and to have been ſent in token of ſubmiſſion. But Gobrias, who knew the Scythians perhaps better than his maſter, and compared the meſſage and the preſent together, gave quite another ſenſe to the latter, namely, that the Perſians muſt not hope to avoid the effects of the Scythian valour, unleſs they could either fly like birds, plunge like frogs, or bury themſelves in the earth like mice: Whether or no this was the real meaning of the preſent, the preparations which he made againſt him ſufficiently ſhew, that it was deſigned to ſignify an open defiance to the Perſian army (L).

[g] l. ii. c. 5. † See before, p. 105.

ACCORDINGLY, the king of Scythia ſummoned all the princes of the other tribes to come to his aſſiſtance, againſt the common enemy and invader of their country. Theſe were the kings of the Gelonians, Budians, and Sarmatians; the Agathyrſians, Neurians, Androphages, Melanchlæni-ans, and Taurians. Theſe, being aſſembled in council and having debated the occaſion of the war, were divided in their opinions; and the three firſt were the only ones who eſteemed it a common cauſe, and reſolved to join Indathyrſus in defence of it. As for the other five, they ſent him word, that as he had been the firſt and only aggreſſor, by invading the Perſian territories without their participation, ſo they did not think themſelves at all concerned in the retaliation which Darius was preparing againſt him. That they would therefore ſit quiet at home, till ſome hoſtilities had convinced them, that the Perſians deſigns were equally levelled at them, in which caſe they would would ſoon convince them, that it was not their deſign to ſtand idle and ſuffer their own territories to be invaded.

(L) We have given this ſtory ſomewhat in a different order than we find it in Herodotus, who tells us, that theſe reciprocal meſſages were not ſent till the Scythians had drawn the Perſian army into the furtheſt parts of their country, and, as it were, intrapped them in the wild countries of the Melanchlænians, Androphages, and Neurians. Had this been the caſe, there had been no great bravery in their ſending ſuch a haughty anſwer to an enemy ſo haraſſed and entangled as Darius then was; neither will thoſe circumſtances he then found himſelf in, permit us to ſuppoſe that a proper time for his arrogant challenge to the Scythians, We think it therefore more probable, as it is indeed more conſonant to the known cuſtoms of other kingdoms, that theſe meſſages were interchanged at the beginning of the war, or before he invaded the Scythian territories.

INDATHYRSUS was ſo exaſperated at this unexpected meſſage, that he reſolved at the ſame time that he made the beſt defence he could with his royal and free Scythians and his three allied princes, to be revenged on the other five treacherous nations, by drawing, if poſſible, the enemy into their country. To this end he reſolved to fight no battle in the open field, but gradually to withdraw his army from the frontiers, and to fill up all the wells and ſprings, and to deſtroy all the graſs and proviſion as they went. He divided his army into two columns, the one, under the command of Taxacis, was to act in conjunction with the Gelonians and Budians; the other, which was by far the greater, was commanded by the king himſelf; whilſt the Sarmatians were ordered to advance to the territories of king Scopaſis, that, in caſe the Perſians ſhould come by that way, they might retire by the lake Meotis to the river Tanais; and upon their retiring haraſs them as much as they could. Taxacis was ordered to keep ſtill a day's march before the Perſians, and to tire them with frequent ſkirmiſhes, in order to draw them into the territories of ſome of theſe five nations that had refuſed to join with them: and if that did not ſucceed, they were left at liberty either to return into their own country, or to attempt any other means their diſcretion ſhould ſuggeſt to them.

THESE orders being thus fixed, they ſent away their wives and children towards the northern parts, together with all the baggage and cattle they could ſpare; after which Indathyrſus commanded the beſt of his horſe to march towards the enemy, whilſt the reſt followed them by private ways. This detatchment, finding the Perſian army advanced about three days march from the Iſter, deſtroyed all the product of the ground and fled away. This cauſed the Perſians to purſue after them as faſt as the others retired ſtill further back, till they had drawn them through Sarmatia into the territories of the Budians, where they burnt and laid waſte all that came in their way. They continued their purſuit till they came to a great deſart of about ſeven days march; and here Darius, not thinking it proper to proceed further, ſet himſelf about building ſome ſpacious cities at equal diſtances from each other. Theſe, however, he left unfiniſhed to go in purſuit of the flying Scythians, who by degrees drew him through the territories

territories of the Melanchlœnians, Androphages, and Neurians, who had cowardly left them to the mercy of the Perſians, and who failed not to lay all waſte as they went through, that the Perſian army might find nothing there to ſubſiſt on. The remainder of this expedition we have already given in a former ſection*: the reſult of which was, that the Perſian monarch was forced to retire with the loſs of the greateſt part of his numerous army (M), glad to eſcape with his own life, at the expence of his glory. How mueh dearer ſtill this invaſion would have coſt the Perſians, had the Ionians, whom Darius had left to guard the bridge which he had laid over the Iſter, kept their promiſe to the Scythians, and left them to deſtroy it, may be eaſily gueſſed; but they only deceived them with a promiſe that they would demoliſh it, and made a ſhew as if they were going about it in good earneſt, by taking off ſo much of it on the Scythian ſide as an arrow might reach, to prevent the Scythians paſſing and demoliſhing it, which, however, they ſoon rejoined again, when the flying Perſians appeared; by which means Darius once more eſcaped the fury of the purſuing Scythians, who failed not ever after to load the Ionians with the worſt of epithets for their treachery and cowardice. As ſoon as they found, that Darius was gone beyond their reach, they reſolved to be revenged of him ſome other way, and to make themſelves amends for the ravage they had been forced to make in their own country. Thrace, ſo lately conquered by the Perſian king, became

* See before, p. 105. & ſeq.

(M) If Herodotus's account of this tranſaction may be credited, Darius was not ſo much repulſed by the arms of the Scythians, as affronted at an unaccountable inſtance of contempt which they occaſionally ſhewed to him, juſt as the two armies were going to engage: he tells us, they were both drawn in order of battle. When a hare accidentally ſtarting in the interval between them, the Sythians immediately quited their ranks with loud outcries, and in the utmoſt confuſion purſued after it. One would expect, that the Perſians would have took the opportunity of falling upon them whilſt they were in this hurly-burly; but, it ſeems, Darius judged quite otherwiſe of an enemy that ſhewed ſo little regard for his gallant army, as to turn their backs to it to run after a hare; ſo that he thought it high time to take Gobrias's advice, and to ſecure his retreat as ſoon as he could, which he accordingly did that very night.

became the unhappy victim of their fury: they laid it all waste as far as the Hellespont, and repassing the Ister returned into Scythia, loaden with the immense spoils of that province.

Saulius. SAULIUS, This was he of whom we took notice before, for killing Anacharsis, a prince of the blood, for having ventured to introduce the nocturnal rites of the mother of the gods into Scythia, which he had seen used among the Grecians. For though Anacharsis had chosen a private place, covered with a great wood, to perform this new worship in, yet he was discovered in the midst of it by a Scythian, who went immediately to acquaint the king with it. Saulius hasted to the place, and found him playing on a tymbal before the images he had hung upon the trees, and shot him dead upon the spot. Our author gives us here the names of three of Saulius's predecessors, in a lineal descent, viz. Spargapythes, Cyrus, and Gnarus, and of one of his successors, viz. Indathyrsus [i].

Aripithes. ARIPITHES had a numerous issue, but particularly one son named Scythes, not by a Scythian, but by an Istrian woman, who therefore brought him up in all the Grecian customs and learning. Aripithes being afterwards killed by the treachery of the king of the Agathyrsians, his son found means to possess himself of his father's kingdom.

Scythes. SCYTHES, though now king of Scythia, and married to one of his father's wives who was also a Scythian, yet preferred the Grecian customs, in which he had been brought up by his mother, to those of his own country. To indulge himself in them, and avoid giving offence to his subjects, he bethought himself of the following stratagem; he led his Scythians to the metropolis of the Borysthenians, which is reported to be a colony of the Milesians, and leaving his army before the place, he entered alone into it, and, causing the gates to be shut, and centinels to be placed at each of them, put off his Scythian dress, cloathed himself after the Grecian manner, and walked about the city without guards or attendance. Thus he continued a whole month, conforming to the Grecian worship, customs, and dress, after which he resumed his Scythian habit, and departed, Not content with often repeating the same practice, he built a palace in that city, and married a native of it. He was going to be initiated in the rites of Bacchus, and had prepared all things things for the ceremony, when the outward court of his ſumptuous palace, which he had adorned with marble ſtatues repreſenting Sphynxes and griffins, was demoliſhed by thunder. This did not, however, deter him from accompliſhing his initiation; but whilſt he was in the midſt of it, a Boryſthenian went and acquainted the Scythians with it in words to this effect: you upbraid us with celebrating our Bacchanals, becauſe when poſſeſſed with the god we loſe, you ſay, the uſe of our reaſon; come now and behold your king celebrating thoſe rites with a divine fury, and be yourſelves eye-witneſſes, how that god has taken poſſeſſion of him. Some of the principal Scythians were immediately introduced into the city, and with grief and indignation beheld their prince, from one of the towers, performing the Bacchanalian rites with a numerous choir.

[i] Id. ibid. [k] Id ibid.

Octamaſades. At their return they acquainted the army with what they had ſeen, which did ſo enrage the Scythians, that as ſoon as he was got home they revolted from him, and choſe his brother Octamaſades in his room. Scythes being informed of the occaſion of this revolt fled into Thrace, and as ſoon as his brother had notice of it, he purſued him with a numerous army as far as the banks of the Iſter, where he found Sitalces, king of Thrace, advancing to meet him. But as both armies were preparing to fight, Octomaſades received a meſſage from the Thracian king to this effect; why ſhould we try the fortune of war, thou art my ſiſter's ſon and haſt my brother with thee, deliver him up to me and I will ſend Scythes to thee, ſo ſhall we avoid the hazard of a defeat. Octomaſades agreed to the propoſal, and ſurrendered his uncle to Sitalces, who immediately decamped with his army, and the new king of Scythia having received his brother from him, cauſed his head to be immediately taken of [l].

Ariantes. Ariantes was that prince of whom we have lately ſpoken upon another occaſion; and who being deſirous to know the number of his fighting-men, ordered them all to appear at a ſet time, and to throw every one the tip of an arrow into a common heap, which amounted to ſuch a bulk, that he cauſed it to be caſt into a large capacious bowl, as a monument of the thing, and dedicated it to Exampæus [m].

The

[l] Id. ibid. [m] Id. ibid.

THE laſt king we ſhall mention in this hiſtory (N), and under whom the Scythians are ſaid to have received a conſiderable overthrow [n], was Atheas, or, as he is called by others, Matheas and Machæas. This prince, being [n] Juſtin, l. ix. c. 2.

(N) We have omitted ſeveral of their kings, concerning whom we either meet with nothing except their names, or ſomething too fabulous and ridiculous to deſerve a place in this work, or at beſt ſo vague and uncertain, eſpecially in point of time, that it is impoſſible to fix it to any epocha.

Of this nature is that ſtory we are going to give out of Herodotus, not ſo much for its incredible ſingularity, as becauſe, fabulous as it is, it muſt have been founded upon ſome facts, which give no ſmall countenance to ſome conjectures we have ventured to advance in this hiſtory, it being not of Greek, but Scythian, extraction. It is as follows:

He tells us of a part of Scythia, whoſe inhabitants he nevertheleſs doth indiſcriminately call Scythians, who, though they owned themſelves to be of ſuch recenter date than the reſt, yet pretended to have been 1000 years before Darius's expedition. The account they give of themſelves is, that their country was at firſt peopled by Targitaus, the ſon of Jupiter, by a daughter of the river Boryſthenes; that this prince had three ſons, viz. Lipoxais, Apoxais, and Colaxais, in whoſe reign, a plow, with a yoke, an ax, and a bowl, all of gold, fell from heaven into their country; that the two elder brothers drew near the place, and one after another tried to take them up, and found them burning-hot, but the youngeſt coming, preſently after, found them cool enough to take and carry them off, whereupon the other two yielded their ſhare of the kingdom to him. They add, that the Auchatian Scythians were deſcended from the eldeſt, the Catiarians from Apoxais, and the race of their kings, whom they called Paralates, from the youngeſt brother. All theſe gave themſelves the general name of Scholotes, which, our author tells us, was alſo the ſirname of their kings, but were called Scythians by all the Greeks. The miraculous golden utenſils, we are told, were preſerved with utmoſt care, and that their kings did aſſiſt at the annual ſacrifices which were offered to them with great magnificence.

Colaxais, who had likewiſe three ſons, perceiving the vaſt extent of his territories, divided them between them, allowing, however, the biggeſt ſhare to that portion into which the miraculous golden veſſels were fallen. According to this tradition

there

being engaged in a war with the Iſtrians, a people of Myſia on the ſouth banks of the mouth of the river Iſter, ſent to Philip king of Macedon to deſire his aſſiſtance, and upon his complying promiſed to make him his heir to the crown of Scythia. But the Iſtrians having, at the news of this powerful ſuccour, delivered him of his fears by their ſudden departure, he ſent another meſſage to Philip, in which he told him flatly, that he had neither ſent for his aſſiſtance, nor promiſed him his crown; that the Scythians neither wanted the help of the Macedonians, nor their king an heir, whilſt he had a ſon alive. Philip, who was then beſieging Byzantium, ſent to deſire him at leaſt there muſt have ſtarted at leaſt three new kingdoms or principalities, and by what our author adds immediately after, of the vaſt quantities of feathers or ſnow, with which the adjoyning regions towards the north are covered; we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, theſe three tribes to have ſprung from a colony of the ancient Scythians, and to have been forced to ſeek for a new habitation in thoſe more inclement regions, eſpecially conſidering, that they pretend to be of much recenter original than any others, meaning doubtleſs than any other Scythians, though older by 1000 years than the time of Darius. As for the pretended divine extraction of their founder and the miraculous fall of the golden utenſils, they only imitated their own and other nations in it, there being nothing more common in thoſe early days, than theſe pretences of ſomething ſupernatural accompanying the foundations of moſt kingdoms, and the divine original of their firſt founders. Hence we would further obſerve, that it is moſt likely, that the kings of Scythia, which we have given in the above liſt, did not all belong to the royal Scythians, but that ſome of them reigned over other tribes or branches which time and neceſſity had divided for them, eſpecially as they were ever warring and elbowing one another out of the moſt pleaſant parts of the country.

With reſpect to this pretended daughter of the Boryſthenes, it will not be amiſs here to obſerve once for all, that it was a common cuſtom in thoſe early and ignorant times for the firſt planters of kingdoms or colonies to give their names, not only to their new territories and capital cities, but alſo to the conſiderable rivers. Hence therefore it is more than probable, that their poſterity, who every where affected to boaſt of ſomething miraculous in their origin, choſe rather to derive it from the river itſelf, than from their real parent who gave name to it. We ſhall meet in the hiſtory of the fabulous and heroic times with inſtances more than enough of theſe ſons and daughters of rivers to juſtify the truth and ſhow the neceſſity of this previous obſervation, leaſt to remit him ſome money to defray part of the expences of the ſiege, eſpecially conſidering, that he had paid nothing either towards the ſubſiſtance of, or by way of reward to, the auxiliaries which he had ſent to him.

ATHEAS had no way to elude ſo reaſonable a demand, but by excuſing himſelf upon the inclemency of their climate, and barrenneſs of their ſoil, which he ſaid was ſo far from contributing to their inrichment, that it ſcarcely afforded them ſufficient ſuſtenance. Philip, vexed at heart to ſee himſelf thus baffled, reſolved to retaliate trick for trick, and whilſt he was raiſing the ſiege in order to enter into a war with them, he ſent the Scythians word, that he had vowed to erect a ſtatue to Hercules at the mouth of the Iſter, which he deſired liberty to come and ſet up there, as he was a known friend to the Scythians. Atheas, who ſmelt his deſign, ſent him word, that if he had a mind to perform his vow, he need but ſend the ſtatue, and he would take upon himſelf the care both of the erecting of it, and of its remaining ſafe there; but that he would by no means ſuffer him to bring his army into his territories: he added, that if he perſiſted in ſpight of him, to come and ſet up ſuch a ſtatue, they would ſoon melt and caſt it into arrows againſt him. Philip not minding his threatening refuſal, and both monarchs being highly exaſperated againſt each other, a bloody battle enſued, in which our author tells us, the Scythians, though ſuperior in ſtrength and courage, were overcome by the craftineſs of the Macedonian king; twenty-thouſand women and children were carried off priſoners, beſides a vaſt quantity of cattle, and twenty-thouſand of their fineſt mares, which they ſent into Macedonia for breeding. As for gold and ſilver they found none among them, and this, our author obſerves, was the firſt proof which the Scythians gave of their poverty in that reſpect.

HOWEVER, this overthrow is not ſo univerſally agreed among antient authors as the war is, neither doth it conſiſt well with what our author has in another place: where he introduces Mithridates haranguing his army, part of which conſiſted of Scythians, and complimenting their known valour with the relation of the two kings, Darius and Philip, who, having but dared to invade their territories, had been put to a ſhameful flight [o]. But be that as it will,

[o] l. xxxvii. c. 7.

'tis plain their overthrow was not so considerable as to hinder them from signalizing themselves upon many occasions, both against the Macedonians and Romans, and against several other nations; and during a considerable time, as the sequel of this work will sufficiently shew.

LAMBINUS is supposed, upon what account doth not clearly appear, to have been the last king of Scythia [p].

[p] Vid. Hyl. lib. iii. p. 172.

CHAP. XIII.

The History of the antient Phrygians, Trojans, Lycians, Lydians, &c.

SECT. I.

A brief account of Asia Proper.

AS the several small kingdoms, which we are to treat of in this place, were antiently comprehended under the name of Asia Minor, we shall premise a general description of that country, for the better understanding of the particular accounts which we shall have occasion to join, as we come to treat of the several regions contained therein.

Asia Proper. THE different and various acceptations of the word Asia, even in its strictest sense, has created a great deal of confusion among writers, and often led the unwary readers into considerable mistakes. To obviate these inconveniences, the incomparable bishop Usher [a] advises those who are to give any

[a] In his geographical and historical disposition touching Asia properly so called.

Carambis
op. e prom
Cytor
op. e Amastris
Zag
Hu
Ischopolis
Cerasus
Harmonasa
Trapezus
Asibu
PAPHLAGONIA
PONTUS
CAPPADOCIA
Parthenius Flu.
Tolist
Cocalia
Satala
idiopolis olim tynium
44
43

EUROPAE PARS

ASIA MINOR

PONTUS EUXINUS

AEGAEUM MARE

MEDITERRANEI MARIS PARS

MARE SYRUM

SYRIÆ PARS

Carambis op. et prom.
Cimolis
Armene
Cytorum op. et M.
Abonutichos
Sinope
Cyaneæ Petræ s. Ins. et Os.
Thymias
Promnas
Tios s. Tium
Heraclea
Amastris
Zagira
Plegra
Helua
Heneti
Amisus
Eupatoria
Polemonium
Chrysopolis
Chalcedon
Astacus
Olyzo
Libissa
Calpas Fl.
Nicomedia
Cius s. Prusa
Adriam
Apamea Myrlea
Cyzicus
Appollonia
Parium
Lampsacus
Perinthus
Abydus
Arisbe
Dardanum
Ilium
Simois F.
Scamander Flu.
Alexandria Troas
Antandrus
Assos
Sigrium prom.
Ajax
Scepsis
Adramyttium
Perperena
Caicus Flu.
Pitana
Elæa
Cane
Grynium
Myrina
Hermus Flu.
Magnesia ad Sipylum
Tmolus M. et op.
Tripolis
Hierocæsarea
Thyatira
Mostenus
Hypæpa
Sardes
Philadelphia
Metropolis
Caystrius Flu.
Tralles
Nysa
Meander Flu.
Antiochia ad Mæandrum
Trapezopolis
Ephesus
Magnesia
Pryene
Myus
Orthosia
Bubon
Aphrodisias
Œnoanda
Cibyra
Cadmus M.
Termessus
Balbura
Bangasa
Alabanda
Amizon
Stratonice
Miletus
Heraclea
Didyma
Ladè I.
Lasos
Bargylia
Caryanda
Mylasa
Pedasa
Tendeba
Alinda
Hydissus
Halicarnassus
Myndus
Telmissus
Calbis Flu.
Thera
Pinara
Pysicus
Caminus
Cnidus
Triopii prom.
Syrnus
Telos
Loryma
Talysis
Rhodus
Camirus
Lindus
Chalcea
Astypalæa
Casus
Carpathus
Megiste
Dolichiste
Chelidoniæ Insulæ
Dædalæ Promontorium
Dædalæ Opp.
Calydna
Cauno
Myra
Andri
Phaselis
Olympus
Limyra
Xanthus Flu.
Lycus Flu.
Patara
Xanthus
Telmessus
Pinara
Calydna
Cragus M.
Olympus M.
Blucium
Ancyra Galatiæ
Germa
Vindia
Tectosages
Tavium
Pessinus
Dindymus M.
Gordium
Synnada
Docimeum
Aspona
Parnasus
Archelais
Magaba Mons
Tiocmi
Halys Flu.
Sangarius Flu.
Sangarius sive Gallus Flu.
Cotyæum
Dadastana
Gordiucombe et Iuliopolis
Azani
Olympeni
Dorylæum
Midæum
Synaus
Nacolia
Ancyra Phrygiæ
Cotyæum
Eucarpia
Acmonia
Eumenia
Tiberiopolis
Celæna
Laodicea comb usta
Apamea Cibotos
Colossæ
Laodicea
Neapolis
Amblada
Pappa
Isaura
Derbe
Lystra
Cadyna
Tyana
Castabala
Iconium
Nora castellum
Nazianzum
Dacora
Sasima
Nissa
Garsauria
Diocæsarea
Cæsarea olim Mazaca
Argeus Mons
Antitaurus Mons
Artaxata
Arabissus
Melas Flu.
Melitene
Cocusos
Cybistra
Pylæ
Taurus M.
Taurus Mons
Mopsucrene
Mopsuestia
Selucia
Sagalassus
Antiochia
Apamea
Olbasa
Flaviopolis
Termessus
Pisidia
Oroanda
Petnelissus
Sandalium
Milyas
Cremna
Perga
Magydates M.
Rhodia
Pamphylia
Aspendus
Attalia
Side
Coracesium
Sygra
Selinus Flu.
Melas Flu.
Hamaria
Ancyra
Celenderis
Alexi Campi
Isauria
Lycaonia
Cilicia Aspera
Trachia sive Seleucia
Cydnus Flu.
Sarus Flu.
Pyramus Flu.
Adana
Flavias
Anazarbus
Cæsarea
Epiphania
Erana
Nicopolis
Alexandria
Pylæ Syriæ
Eleutheropolis
Cilices.
Pindenissus
Amanus Mons
Portæ Amanicæ
Issus
Mare Pamphylium
Cyprus
Arsinoe
Lapethus
Aphrodisium
Soli
Carpasia
Citium
Salamis
Paphos nova Paphos vetus
Curium
Amathus
Malium
Curias prom.
Acamas Promont.
Crommyon promont.
Antiochia
Seleucia
Pieria
Pontus Polemoniacus
Pontus Galaticus
Cappadocia
Paphlagonia
Bithynia
Mariandyni
Heraclea
Flaviopolis
Pantherius Flu.
Tolistobogii
Neoclaudianopolis
Pompeiopolis
Olgassis Mons
Halys Flu.
Iris Fl.
Themiscyra
Cotyorum
Pharnacia
Ischiopolis
Cerasus
Harmena
Trapezus
Asiba
Phanaræa
Cocalia
Satala
Thermodon Flu.
Neocæsarea
Lycus Flu.
Amasia
Eupatoria Magnopolis
Comona pontica
Sebastopolis
Zela
Nicopolis
Cabira, Diopolis Sebaste
Iris Flu.
Ariarathira
Sebastia
Sargarausena Præfectura
Herpa
Archelais
Garsauria
Cappadocia
Argeus Mons
Antitaurus Mons
Arabissus
Melas Flu.
Melitene
Euphrates Flu.
Lemnus
Imbros
Thasus
Samothrace
Chersonesus Hellespontus
Myrlea Minor
Granicus Flu.
Ida M.
Tenedos
Sigrium prom.
Lectum prom.
Chryse
Scyros
Malea prom.
Minnas
Arginusæ
Phocæa
Smyrna
Clazomenæ
Myonnesus
Lebedos
Colophon
Notium
Icaria
Samus
Nycale prom.
Pathmus
Minyæ
Scopia
Hieros
Amorgus
Calymne
Astypalæa
Carpathus
Icarus
Pharus
Cauno
Myra
Andri
Phaselis
Olympus
Limyra
Xanthus Flu.
Lycus Flu.
Patara
Xanthus
Telmessus
Pinara
Calydna
Cragus M.
Olympus M.
Blucium
Ancyra Galatiæ
Germa
Vindia
Tectosages
Tavium
Pessinus
Dindymus M.
Gordium
Synnada
Docimeum
Aspona
Parnasus
Archelais
Magaba Mons
Tiocmi
Halys Flu.
Sangarius Flu.
Sangarius sive Gallus Flu.
Cotyæum
Dadastana
Gordiucombe et Iuliopolis
Azani
Olympeni
Dorylæum
Midæum
Synaus
Nacolia
Ancyra Phrygiæ
Cotyæum
Eucarpia
Acmonia
Eumenia
Tiberiopolis
Celæna
Laodicea comb usta
Apamea Cibotos
Colossæ
Laodicea
Neapolis
Amblada
Pappa
Isaura
Derbe
Lystra
Cadyna
Tyana
Castabala
Iconium
Nora castellum
Nazianzum
Dacora
Sasima
Nissa
Garsauria
Diocæsarea
Cæsarea olim Mazaca
Argeus Mons
Antitaurus Mons
Artaxata
Arabissus
Melas Flu.
Melitene
Cocusos
Cybistra
Pylæ
Taurus M.
Taurus Mons
Mopsucrene
Mopsuestia
Selucia
Sagalassus
Antiochia
Apamea
Olbasa
Flaviopolis
Termessus
Pisidia
Oroanda
Petnelissus
Sandalium
Milyas
Cremna
Perga
Magydates M.
Rhodia
Pamphylia
Aspendus
Attalia
Side
Coracesium
Sygra
Selinus Flu.
Melas Flu.
Hamaria
Ancyra
Celenderis
Alexi Campi
Isauria
Lycaonia
Cilicia Aspera
Trachia sive Seleucia
Cydnus Flu.
Sarus Flu.
Pyramus Flu.
Adana
Flavias
Anazarbus
Cæsarea
Epiphania
Erana
Nicopolis
Alexandria
Pylæ Syriæ
Eleutheropolis
Cilices.
Pindenissus
Amanus Mons
Portæ Amanicæ
Issus
Mare Pamphylium
Cyprus
Arsinoe
Lapethus
Aphrodisium
Soli
Carpasia
Citium
Salamis
Paphos nova Paphos vetus
Curium
Amathus
Malium
Curias prom.
Acamas Promont.
Crommyon promont.
Antiochia
Seleucia
Pieria
Pontus Polemoniacus
Pontus Galaticus
Cappadocia
Paphlagonia
Bithynia
Mariandyni
Heraclea
Flaviopolis
Pantherius Flu.
Tolistobogii
Neoclaudianopolis
Pompeiopolis
Olgassis Mons
Halys Flu.
Iris Fl.
Themiscyra
Cotyorum
Pharnacia
Ischiopolis
Cerasus
Harmena
Trapezus
Asiba
Phanaræa
Cocalia
Satala
Thermodon Flu.
Neocæsarea
Lycus Flu.
Amasia
Eupatoria Magnopolis
Comona pontica
Sebastopolis
Zela
Nicopolis
Cabira, Diopolis Sebaste
Iris Flu.
Ariarathira
Sebastia
Sargarausena Præfectura
Herpa
Archelais
Garsauria
Cappadocia
Argeus Mons
Antitaurus Mons
Arabissus
Melas Flu.
Melitene
Euphrates Flu.
Lemnus
Imbros
Thasus
Samothrace
Chersonesus Hellespontus
Myrlea Minor
Granicus Flu.
Ida M.
Tenedos
Sigrium prom.
Lectum prom.
Chryse
Scyros
Malea prom.
Minnas
Arginusæ
Phocæa
Smyrna
Clazomenæ
Myonnesus
Lebedos
Colophon
Notium
Icaria
Samus
Nycale prom.
Pathmus
Minyæ
Scopia
Hieros
Amorgus
Calymne
Astypalæa
Carpathus
Icarus
Pharus

S. W. Sculpt.

any account of Aſia to begin with explaining the various acceptations of the word, without which it is impoſſible to underſtand the ancient hiſtorians or geographers, He looks upon this as one of the moſt difficult points in hiſtory, there being a ſeeming contradiction between the ſacred and profane writers, as to the provinces comprehended under the name of Aſia, which cannot be reconciled without a very careful diſtinction of times and places. In reading the ancient hiſtorians or geographers we frequently meet with the following terms, viz. The Greater and Leſſer Aſia, Aſia Proper or Aſia properly ſo called, the Lydian Aſia, the Proconſular Aſia, the Aſiatic Dioceſs. That vaſt continent, which was known to the Greeks and Romans under the name of Aſia, was divided by the antient geographers firſt into the Greater and Leſſer Aſia. The leſſer, commonly termed Aſia Minor, comprehended a great many provinces, but that which included Phrygia, Myſia, Caria, and Lydia, was named Aſia Proper or Aſia properly ſo called, as is plain from Tully [b]. Where it is to be obſerved, that Tully, in enumerating the regions contained in Aſia Proper, makes no mention of Æolis or Ionia, though undoubtedly parts of Aſia Proper, becauſe they were comprehended partly in Lydia, and partly in Myſia. Beſide, the inland country commonly known by that name, contained alſo the adjoining countries both of Ionia, lying on the ſea-ſide between the rivers Hermus and Mæander, and of Æolis, extending from Hermus to the river Caicus according to Ptolemy [c], or according to Strabo [d] to the promontory Lectum, the antient boundary between Troas and the ſea-coaſt of the Greater Myſia (A). The remaining parts of Æolis and Ionia are by Pliny [e], Strabo [f], Hellanicus [g], and Scylax [h], placed in Mysia; nay Mysia itself, after the Æolians possessed themselves of it, was commonly called Æolis [i]; which Stephanus not being aware of makes Assos of Æolis a different city from Assos of Mysia near Antandrus. From what we have said it is plain, that Asia Proper comprehended Phrygia, Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Æolis, and Ionia. This tract was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by Bithynia and Pontus, extending from Galatia to Propontis, on the east by Galatia, Pamphilia, and Lycia, on the south by part of Lycia and the Rhodian sea, on the west by the Hellespont, by the Ægean, Icarian, and Myrtoan seas. It lies between the thirty-fifth and forty-first degree of north latitude, and extends in longitude from fifty-five to sixty-two degrees.

[b] Cic. in Orat. pro Flacco. [c] lib. v. cap. 2, [d] lib. xii.

(A) That Myſia reached to the mouth of the river Caicus is acknowledged, not only by Ptolemy (1), but alſo by Strabo (2); and yet, becauſe it was poſſeſſed in his time by the Æolians, he tells us, that Æolis, properly ſo called, extended from Hermus to Lectum (3). In like manner Pliny (4) makes the promontory Lectum the boundary betwixt Æolis and Troas; though elſewhere, following other authors, he places Aſſos in Troas (5). But Hellanicus (6), Strabo, and Stephanus (7) make it a city of Æolis near the Helleſpont.

(1) lib. v. c. 2. (2) lib. xii. (3) lib. xiii. (4) lib. v. c. 30. (5) Id. lib. ii. c. 96. & l. xxxvi. c. 17. (6) Strab. l. xiii. (7) Id. l. xv.

As Asia Proper is but a part of Asia Minor, so the Lydian Asia is only a part of Asia Proper (B). Asia in this acceptation comprehends Lydia, Æolis, and Ionia, according to the description we have already given of it, and is that Asia whereof mention is made in the Acts and St.

[e] lib. v. cap. 30. [f] lib. xv. [g] Id. lib. xiii. [h] Scylax. in Periplo. [i] Pomp. Mela, lib. i. cap. 18. Plin. lib. v. c. 30.

(B) That in antient times Lydia was called Meonia and the Lydians Meonians, is manifest from Herodotus (8), Diodorus Siculus (9), Dionysius Afer (10) Strabo (11), Pliny (12), Stephanus, and others; and that Meonia was called Asia is no less plain from Callinus, who flourished before Archilocus (13), from Demetrius Scepsius, cotemporary with Crates and Aristarchus the Grammarian (14), from Euripides (15), Suidas (16), the great etymologist, &c. Nay, that Lydia was formerly called Asia, is expressly affirmed by the antient scholiast of Apollonius Rhodius (17). From whence Lydia borrowed the name of Asia is altogether uncertain; some deriving it from a city of Lydia, seated on mount Tmolus, others from one Asius king of Lydia, who according to the Lydians communicated his name to the whole continent (18). But be that as it will, it is certain, that Lydia has a better claim to the name of Asia, than any other part of that continent.

(8) Herodot. l. vii. (9) Diodor. Sicul l. iv. (10) Dionys. in Periegesi. (11) Strab. l. xiii. (12) Plin. l. v. c. 29. (13) Strab. l. xiv. (14) Id. l. xii. (15) In Bacch. (15) In Ασίᾳ (17) Scholiast. Apollon. Argonaut. l. ii. (18) Herod. l. iv.

St. John's revelation. In the former we read the following account of St. Paul's journey [k]. When they had gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia, and were forbidden of the holy Ghoſt to preach the word in Aſia; after they were come to Myſia they aſſayed to go into Bithynia; but the ſpirit ſuffered them not. And they paſſing by Myſia came down by Troas. Where it is to be obſerved, that the Greater Phrygia, through which they paſſed into Galatia, Myſia Olympena bordering upon Bithynia, and Helleſpont where Troas was ſituate, though provinces of Aſia properly ſo called, are yet in expreſs terms diſtinguiſhed from the Proper Aſia of the Romans; as is likewiſe Caria, by what we read elſewhere in the ſame book [l]. As theſe cities and countries did not belong to the Lydian Aſia, ſo what remains of Aſia Proper, together with the ſeven churches mentioned in the Revelations, were properly Lydia, or the Lydian Aſia. In the firſt place Pergamus is placed by Xenophon [m] in Lydia, and alſo by Ariſtotle [n]. The ſame Ariſtotle [o] tells us, that Smyrna was at firſt poſſeſſed by the Lydians, and Scylax Corvandenſis reckons it among the cities of Lydia, as alſo Epheſus, wherein he agrees with Herodotus [p]. Sardis, Philadelphia, and Thyatira, are reckoned by Ptolemy among the cities of Lydia, as is Laodicea by Stephanus [q] (C).

The Proconſular Aſia.

THE Proconſular Aſia (ſo called becauſe it was governed by a proconſul) according to the diſtribution of the provinces of the empire made by Auguſtus, comprehended the following countries, viz. Lydia, Ionia, Caria, Myſia, Phrygia, and the proconſular Helleſpont. And this is Ptolemy's Aſia Proper [r]. By the ſame emperor Pontus and Bithynia were made a Prætorian province [s]; and Aſia

[k] Acts xvi. [l] Acts xx. 16, 17. [m] Xenoph. de exped. Cyr. lib. 7. [n] lib. de Poetica, p. 97. [o] Ariſtot. lib. de Poetica apud. Plutarch. in lib. de vita & poeſi Homeri. [p] Herodot. lib. 1. [q] Steph. de urb. [r] Ptolem. l. v. c. 2. [s] Strab. l. xvii.

(C) Laodicea is placed by Ptolemy in Caria, by others in Phrygia, and by ſome in Lydia, the confines of thoſe countries having been ſo often altered, that it was not poſſible, as Strabo witneſſes (19), to aſcertain their exact boundaries; and hence it is, that the ſame city is oftentimes placed by one of the antient geographers in Phrygia, by another in Lydia, and by a third in Caria.

(19) Strab. l. xiii.

conſular, containing all that part of Aſia which lay on this ſide of the river Halys and mount Taurus. In the time of Conſtantine the Great the Proconſular Aſia was much abridged, and a diſtinction brought in between the Proconſular Aſia and the Aſiatic dioceſs; the one being governed by the proconſul of Aſia, and the other by the Vicarius or Lieutenant of Aſia (D). The Proconſular Aſia, according to the deſcription which Eunapius gives us of it [t], ſeems to have been much the ſame with the Lydian Aſia abovementioned. In the reign of Theodoſius the Elder, who ſucceeded Valens, the conſular Helleſpont was taken from the Vicarius of Aſia, and added to the Proconſular Aſia; but under Arcadius the Proconſular Aſia was abridged of all the inland part of Lydia. And this is the reaſon, why Palladius [u] makes a diſtinction between the biſhops of Lydia and thoſe of Aſia. However, the ſouthern part of Lydia, lying between the Mæander and Cayſter, and the maritime provinces from Epheſus to Aſſos and the promontory Lectum were left to the Proconſular Aſia [w].

The Aſiatic dioceſs.

THE Aſiatic dioceſs (E) is ſometimes taken in a more ſtrict ſenſe, as diſtinct from the Proconſular Aſia and the provinces under the juriſdiction of the proconſul, and ſometimes in a more extenſive ſenſe, as comprehending alſo the Proconſular Aſia. According to this acceptation all Aſia in the reign of Theodoſius the Younger conſiſted of eleven provinces;

[t] Eunap. in vita Maximi. [u] Pallad. in vita Chryſoſt. [w] Hierocl. notitia imp. in Append. Geograph. ſacra. p. 27. Photius de ordine Metropolitar, p. 43. & in tomo i. juris Græco Romani, p. 90. Subſcript. Concil. Chalced. Act. vi. Concil. Conſtantinop. vi. Act. xviii. &c.

(D) We find in the Imperial Conſtitutions two reſcripts of the emperor Valens, the one dated the 27th of January 365, (that is, towards the latter end of the firſt year of his reign), and directed to Clearchus, Vicarius Aſiæ; the other dated the 6th of the October following, and directed to Auxonius, Vicarius Dioeceſeos Aſianæ (20). This diſtinction was brought in by Conſtantine, and continued under the chriſtian emperors that ſucceeded him.

(E) The word dioceſs, in the dialect of the times we are here ſpeaking of, imports a tract of country comprehending ſeveral provinces under the juriſdiction of one chief ruler.

(20) Cod. Theodoſ. lib. v. tit. 11. Ne colon. inſcio dom.

provinces, three whereof were under the juriſdiction of the proconſul of Aſia, viz. the Proconſular Proper, which he governed by himſelf, the conſular Helleſpont, and that of Rhodes, with the other iſlands called Cyclades, which were firſt made a province by Veſpaſian, and placed under a preſident [x]; eight were under the vicarius or lieutenant of Aſia, viz. Lydia, Caria, Phrygia Salutaris, Phrygia Pacatiana, Pamphilia, Lycia, Lycaonia, and Piſidia; theſe eight made up what was properly called the Aſiatic dioceſs [y] (F). Theſe are the terms we moſt commonly meet with in reading the antient hiſtorians and geographers, for the explanation of which we are chiefly indebted to the learned biſhop Uſher, who thought it well worth his while to examine the various acceptations of Aſia Proper in a particular treatiſe [z].

The name of Aſia.

As to the common name of Aſia there is a great variety of opinions among the learned, ſome deriving it from Aſia the daughter of Oceanus and Thetis, wife of Iapetus, and by him mother to Prometheus; others from Aſius ſon of Atys king of Lydia, from whom that kingdom firſt, and in length of time the whole continent, was named Aſia. Bochart [a] is of opinion, that it took its name from the Phœnician word Aſia ſignifying the middle, becauſe Aſia Minor, which, ſays he, communicated its name to Aſia the Greater, lies, as it were, in the middle between Europe and Afric. This opinion he endeavours to ſupport with the authority of Pliny and Pomponius Mela [b], But as all that can be ſaid on this head is grounded on bare conjectures, it is ſcarce worth our while to dwell on enquiries of this nature.

THIS

[x] Sextus Rufus, in Breviario. [y] Alciat. Parerg. l. v. c. 13. [z] Uſher in his geographical and hiſtorical diſquiſition of Aſia, properly ſo called, &c. [a] Phaleg. l. iv. c. 36. [b] Plin. in Preſat. lib. iii. & Pomp. Mela, de Aſia, l. i. c. 2.

(F) In the Notitia Imperii, which was compiled in the reign of Theodoſius the younger, the Aſiatic dioceſs is ſaid to conſiſt of ten provinces only, the firſt and chief province of all, viz. Aſia itſelf, being, we know not how, omitted (21). On the other hand, Iſidorus Merçator reckons twelve provinces belonging to this dioceſs, and among them Galatia, which was without all doubt a province of the dioceſs of Pontus (22).

(21) Notit. utriuſque Imperii. (22) Vid. Salmaſii Euchariſtic. de Eccleſ. ſub urbicar. p. 347.

Climate and fertility.

THIS country is juſtly counted among the fineſt and moſt fruitful of the earth, and mightily extolled by antient writers, chiefly by the Romans who were well acquainted with it, for the fertility of the ſoil, temper of the climate, nature of the ſeaſons, excellence and variety of its productions and fruits; in all which reſpects it was preferred by Tully [c] to all the countries of the then known world. The common epithet, whereby, the Latin poets diſtinguiſh this from other regions, is that of rich, alluding not only to the richneſs of the ſoil, but alſo to the wealth and opulence of the inhabitants, which we may eaſily judge of from the immenſe ſums that ſome of the Roman governors are ſaid to have extorted from them, namely Marc Antony, who, as we are told by Plutarch [d], ſqueezed from the inhabitants of Aſia Minor in the ſpace of one year the ſum of twenty thouſand talents.

Its preſent diviſion.

THIS country is at preſent divided into four parts, viz. Natolia, properly ſo called, the weſtern part: Caramania the ſouthern part; Aladulia the eaſtern; and Amaſia the northmoſt part. By the Turks the whole country, called by them Nadalu, is divided into five parts under the government of five Beglerbegs, who reſide at Cotyæum, Tocat, Trabezond, Maroſch, and Iconium. Theſe are ſubdivided into leſſer governments, denominated from the city or town where the governor reſides. But it is now time to proceed to the particular hiſtories of the various kingdoms, antiently comprehended under the common name of Aſia Minor.

[c] Cic. pro Q. Ligario. [d] Plutarch. in Lucull. &. Antonio.

The Hiſtory of the Phrygians.

SECT. II.

The Deſcription of Phrygia.

AS we can ſcarce offer any thing touching Phrygia, but what we have either at ſecond hand, or from mutilated pieces of antiquity, we ſhall not dwell long on ſo dark and perplexed a ſubject, nor pretend to ſupply the defect of better authorities with ſuch precarious conjectures as as every writer may, and the moſt ordinary uſually do, vent on ſuch occaſions (G).

WHENCE the ſmall country before us borrowed the name of Phrygia is not determined. Some derive it from the river Phryx (now Sarabat), which divides Phrygia from Caria and empties itſelf into the Hermus [e], others from Phrygia the daughter of Aſopus and Europa. The Greek writers tell us [f], that the country took its name from the inhabitants, and theſe from the town of Brygium in Macedonia, from whence they firſt paſſed into Aſia and gave the name of Phrygia or Brigia to the country which they ſettled in; but we ſhall have occaſion to examine this opinion hereafter. Bochart is of opinion [g], that this tract was called Phrygia from a Greek verb, ſignifying to burn or dry, which according to him is a tranſlation of its Hebrew name, derived from a verb of the ſame ſignification (H).

No

[e] Plin. lib. v. c. 29. [f] Meſſal. Corvin. de progen. Aug.
[g] Phaleg. lib. iii. c. 8. [g] Strab. l. xii. & l. xiv.

(G) The names of the authors that have wrote the Phrygian hiſtory are Democritus, Hermeſianactes, Timolaus, Aretazes, and Cornelius Alexander (23); but as their works have not reached us, we are left quite in the dark, as to ſome of the moſt material points of that hiſtory.

(H) The Greek word φρυγία ſeems to be derived from the verb φρύγειν, to burn or parch; and hence that place on mount OE ta where Hercules was burnt took the name of φρυγία, ἀπὸ τῶ ἐκεῖ πεφρυχθαι τὸν Ἡρακλέα. Now as that part of Phrygia which was waſhed by the rivers Cayſter and Mæander was diſtinguiſhed by the epithet of Καταικαυμένη, as Strabo and Diodorus witneſs (24), it is not improbable, but that the name of Phrygia, which was at firſt peculiar to one part, might in length of time become common to the whole country. How this part came to be called Καταικαυμένη, burnt, is variouſly reported. Diodorus (25) ſpeaks of a fiery monſter called Ægis, which appearing there conſumed all that tract; but was afterwards killed by Pallas. Others recur to the fable of Typhon (26), who, ſay they, was in that place thunder-ſtruck by Jupiter. But without having recourſe to fables, it will be no hard matter to account for this denomination, if we but conſider, that this part of Phrygia we are ſpeaking of is deſcribed both by Diodorus and Strabo (27)

(23) Plutarch. de fluviis & Laert. in Democrito. (24) Strab. l. xiii. & Diod. Sicul. l. iii. (25) Diodor. Sicul. l. iii. p. 142. (26) Strab. l. xiii.

Its diviſions. No leſs various are the opinions of authors as to the exact boundaries of this country, which gave riſe to the proverb related by Strabo [g], viz. that the Phrygians and Myſians had diſtinct boundaries, but that it was ſcarce poſſible to aſcertain them. The ſame writer adds [h], that the Trojans, Myſians, and Lydians, are by the poets all blended under the common name of Phrygians, which Claudian [i] extends to the Piſidians, Bithynians, and Ionians. Again, Pliny places Aſcania in Phrygia, which together with Dardania is reckoned by Strabo [l] among the provinces of Myſia. Phrygia Proper, according to Ptolemy whom we chuſe to follow, was bounded on the north by Pontus and Bithynia, on the weſt by Myſia, Troas, the Ægean ſea, Lydia, Meonia, and Caria; on the ſouth by Lycia; on the eaſt by Pamphylia and Galatia. It lies between the 37th and 41ſt degree of north latitude, extending in longitude from 56 to 62 degrees. The inhabitants of this country mentioned by Ptolemy are the Lycaones and Anthemiſenii towards Lycia, the Moceadelis or Moceadine, the Cyddeſes or Cydiſſes towards Bithynia, and between theſe the Peltini or Speltini, the Moxiani, Phylacenſes, and Hierapolitæ. To theſe we may add the Berecyntes and Cerbeſis mentioned by Strabo [m].

PHRYGIA is commonly divided into the Greater, and Leſſer Phrygia called alſo Troas. But this diviſion did not take place till Troas was ſubdued by the Phrygians; and hence it is no more conſidered by ſome Roman writers as a part of Phrygia, than Bithynia, Cappadocia, or any

[g] Strab. l. xii & l. xiv. [h] Stra. ubi ſupra. [i] Claud. l. ii. in Eutrop. [k] Plin. lib. v. [l] Strab. ubi ſupra. [m] Strab. l. xii.

(27) as a dry ſoil, impregnated with ſulphur, bitumen, and other combuſtible ſubſtances, which in all likelihood gave riſe to this appellation. We are not ignorant, that the tract we are ſpeaking of is by ſome of the antients reckoned a province of Myſia, by others of Mæonia; but Heſychius (28), Diodorus (29), and moſt of the other hiſtorians and geographers place it in Phrygia. Bochart is of opinion (30), that by Gomer in ſcripture is meant Phrygia, and that the Greek word Phrygia is a tranſlation of the Hebrew גמרן Gomer, which he derives from the verb. גמר Gamar, importing, among other ſignifications, to burn or conſume, in which ſignification he ſhews it to have been frequently uſed both by the Chaldeans and Syrians.

(27) ubi ſupra. (28) Heſych. l. 12. (29) Diodor. ubi ſupra. (30) Phaleg. l. iii. c. 8.

any other of the adjacent provinces. In after-ages, that is, in the reign of Constantine the Great, the Greater Phrygia was divided into two districts or governments, the one called Phrygia Pacatiana from Pacatianus, who under Constantine bore the great office of the Præfectus Prætorio of the east; the other Phrygia Salutaris, from some miraculous cures supposed to have been performed there by the archangel Michael.

Its soil and climate.

This country, and indeed all Asia Minor, as lying in the fifth and sixth northern climates, was in ancient times greatly celebrated for its fertility. It abounded in all sorts of grains, being for the most part a plain country, covered with a deep rich soil, and plentifully watered by small rivers. It was in some parts productive of bitumen and other combustible substances. It was well stocked with cattle, having large plains and pasture-grounds. The air was anciently deemed most pure and wholesome, though it is now in some parts thought extremely gross, great part of the country lying uncultivated, a thing too common in such regions as groan under the Mohammedan yoke. In short, whatever desirable things, nature has frugally bestowed here and there on other countries, were found in this, while well manured, as in their original seminary.

The cities of note in Phrygia Major were, 1. Apamea or Apamia, a famous mart and the metropolis of all Phrygia, till the above-mentioned division of Constantine took place. It was seated at the confluence of the Marsya and Mæander. Pliny [n] places it at the foot of the hill Signia, surrounded by the rivers Marsya, Obrima, and Orga, which empty themselves into the Mæander; wherein he seems to confound the situation of the antient Celæne with that of the new city called Apamea. Celæne indeed stood at the foot of the hill on which the Marsya has its spring; but Antiochus Soter, son to Antiochus Seleucus, who built Apamea of Syria, carried the inhabitants to the new city which he built about ten miles from thence, where the Marsya and Meander begin to flow in one channel; this city he named Apamea from his mother Apame wife to Seleucus Nicanor [o]. As there are many other cities bearing the same name, this for distinction sake is commonly called Apamea Cibotos; but as to the original of this this appellation there is a great diſcrepancy among authors (I).

[n] Plin. l. v. c. 29. [o] Strab. l. xii. Liv. ib. xxxviii. Marcianus, lib. vi.

LAODICEA, now Eſkihiſſar, ſeated on the banks of the river Lycus, not far from Apamea. It was firſt called Dioſpolis, afterwards Rheas, and at laſt Diocæſarea and Laodicea. We are told by Stephanus, that Jupiter appearing to Antiochus the ſon of Stratonice in his ſleep commanded him to build a city, which he did accordingly, calling it Dioſpolis from Jupiter, and Laodicea from his wife Laodice. It was afterwards greatly increaſed by Hiero, by Zeno the Rhetorician, and his ſon Polemon [p], who, being honoured by Cæſar Auguſtus with the title of king, might perhaps out of complaiſance to that prince add his name to that of Jupiter, calling the city Diocæſarea, the city of Jupiter and Cæſar. However, the name of Laodicea, which Strabo derives from the river Lycus [q], prevailed. This city was famous for its wool, which was univerſally preferred on account of its ſoftneſs, as the ſame author witneſſes [r], even to that of Miletus ſo much cried up by the antients, and beſides was of a very extraordinary blackneſs. With this the inhabitants carried on a very conſiderable trade, and were accounted the moſt wealthy people of all Aſia

[p] Strab. lib. xii. [q] Id. ibid. [r] Ibid.

(I) As the word Κιβωτὸς ſignifies Ark or Coffer, ſome have ſuppoſed, that it was ſo called, becauſe the ark reſted on the hill from which the river Marſya ſprings. But theſe writers confound the ſituation of Celæne with that of Apamea; the former, which never bore the name of Cibotos, was ſituate at the foot of the hill Signia, but Apamea Cibotos at ten miles diſtance. As thoſe who traded from Italy and Greece to Aſia Minor uſed to convey their wares to this city, as a place of general reſort (30). Salmaſius thinks, it was called Cibotos from its being, as it were, the common treaſury of thoſe countries (31). It is worth obſerving, that there are no fewer than ſeven cities bearing the ſame name, viz. Apamea of Bithynia, Apamea of Media, Apamea on the Tigris, Apamea on the Euphrates, one in Perſia, one in Syria, and one in Phrygia; and all ſituate between two rivers, which made Bochart (32) conclude, that they were ſo called from the Hebrew verb ſignifying to ſurround, whereof the import is plainly expreſſed in Jonas (33) אפפונו מים aphaphuni majim.

(30) lib. xvii. (31) Salmaſ. Plinianæ Exercitation. c. xl. p. 380. (32) Phaleg. l. ii. c. 11. (33) c. ii. v. 6.

Aſia Minor. Ptolemy makes Laodicea and Diocæſarea two different cities, wherein he is certainly miſtaken. At Laodicea was one of the ſeven churches mentioned in the apocalypſe, but at preſent not ſo much as the ruins of it are any where to be ſeen, that prophetical treat being fully accompliſhed; I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot——becauſe thou art luke-warm——I will ſpue thee out of my mouth[s] (K).

HIERAPOLIS famous for its mineral waters, which, according to Strabo's account [t], when expoſed to the air petrified in the ſpace of a year, and yet were endued with ſuch a virtue as to render the fields they watered exceeding fruitful, and prove a preſent remedy againſt innumerable diſtempers to ſuch as uſed them [u]. Near this city was to be ſeen an opening on the edge of a hill of an extraordinary depth, always overſpread with a thick fog, and exhaling ſuch a peſtilent ſtream, that no living creature could come within the reach of it without being immediately ſtifled. Strabo and Pliny [w] except theGalli or eunuchs of Cybele; Ammianus and Dio Nicæus all eunuchs [x] (L).

GGR-

[s] Revel. c. iv. ver. 15, 16. [t] lib. xiii. [u] Strab. ubi ſupra. Vitruvius, l. viii. c. 3. Ulpianus lege prima, ſect. xiii. [w] lib. iv. [x] Ammian. lib. xxxvii. c. 6. Dio. Nicæ. in vita Trajan. p. 252, ed. H. Steph. 1592.

(K) Terrari in his dictionary tells us, that Laodicea is ſtill called Laudichia, and by the Turks Nove Lefche, that it is one of the archbiſhopricks of Aſia Minor, &c. But he is either miſtaken, or the town was not quite demoliſhed in his time; at preſent it lies in ruins, and is only the habitation of wild beaſts. Several travellers, miſled by the ſimilitude of names, have taken the village Laotik near Angoura for Laodicea. At Eſkihiſſar, as it is now called, there are ſtill to be ſeen four theatres of white marble, as intire as if they had been but lately built; near one of them is an inſcription in honour of the emperor Titus, which the reader will find in Spons's account of the ſeven churches (34).

(L) Strabo, an eye witneſs (35), ſays, that in his time this Plutonium or opening was incloſed with baliſters taking up about half an acre of ground in compaſs, that the peſtilent ſteam kept within that incloſure, ſo that one might approach the baliſter without the leaſt danger; but whoever advanced one ſtep further was immediately ſtifled. What Strabo affirms is vouched by Ammianus,

(34) Spon. lib. iii. (35) lib. xiii.

GORDIUM, the seat of Gordius king of Phrygia, and famous for the Gordian knot which we shall have occasion to mention hereafter. This town was situated on the borders of Phrygia towards Cappadocia, and not between the two Phrygias, where Justin places it[y]. Not long after the death of Gordius it was reduced to a poor beggarly village, as Strabo calls it, and continued in this despicable condition till the triumvirate of Augustus, when it was again made a city and called Juliopolis by one Cleo, a famous robber native of that place (M).

COLOSSE, now Chonos, on the south side of Mæander, to the people whereof St. Paul wrote that epistle which is part of our canon.

SIPYLUS, the residence of Tantalus, and therefore called also Tantalis. Some place this city in Meonia, supposing Tantalus to have reigned there. 'Tis observable, that four cities, viz. Sipylus, Archæopolis, Colpe, and Lebade, were successively built on the same spot and destroyed by earthquakes.

SYNNADA, Synada, or Synnade, noted for its marble quarries. This city was by Constantine the Great declared the metropolis of Phrygia Salutaris, after his division of Phrygia into Pacatiana and Salutaris took place (N). Besides as, Dio Nicæus, both eye-witnesses, Apuleius, and many others (36). The city of Hierapolis is now called Bamboakkale, and some foot-steps of what it once was are to be seen in the many heaps of ruins and fine pillars in the fields where it stood; insomuch, that Dr. Smith after viewing them could not help thinking this city to have been inferior to none.

[y] lib. xi. c. 7.

(M) This Cleo having with a band of robbers possessed himself of a strong hold on mount Olympus called Collydium, by frequent excursions from thence prevented the officers of Labienus prefect of Asia from gathering the annual tributes, on which consideration he was by Marc Antony rewarded with large territories. But in the Actiac war revolting from Antony he sided with Augustus, who added great part of Morena to what Antony had bestowed on him, created him priest of Jupiter Abrettenus worshipped by the Mysians, and high priest of Bellona adored in Commana of Pontus, a dignity no ways inferior to that of kings (37).

(N) In the fifth general council held at Constantinople, Severus subscribes as bishop of Synnada the metropolis of Phrygia ſides theſe and ſeveral other cities of leſs note mentioned by the antients, there were in latter times ſome of no ſmall account, ſuch as Saqua, the habitation of Etrogul father of Ottoman the firſt king of the Turks, Charachiſar, by the Greeks called Melampyrgus, or the Black-tower, Cillexuga, Einegiol, &c. taken by the ſaid Ottoman from the chriſtian princes at the firſt riſe of the Ottoman empire.

(36) ubi supra & Apuleius de Mundo. (37) Strab. lib. xii.

THE rivers of this country which we ſhall take notice of, are the Mæander, now Madre and Mindre, a river ſo celebrated by the antients for its windings and turnings, that all obliquities are from thence called Meanders. It riſes on the hill Celæne, the ſame as Aulocrene mentioned by Pliny [z], at the foot of which ſtood antiently a famous city of the ſame name. Pliny [a] and Strabo [b] derive it from a lake on the top of the ſaid hill. It paſſes through Phrygia, divides Caria from Lydia, and after 600 windings [c], by which it ſeems to flow back to its fountain-head, empties itſelf into the Archipelago between Priene and Miletus (O).

[z] l. xxxviii. [a] ubi ſupra. [b] Strab. l. xii. [c] Dio Pruſæus, lib. i.

gia Salutaris (38); and yet Socrates, in his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory (39), and Nicephorus, blindly following him, place this city in Phrygia Pacatiana (40). And here we may obſerve by the way, that in the fourth general council held at chalcedon, Aberius ſubſcribes as biſhop of Hierapolis in Phrygia Salutaris (41), which ſome have looked upon as a miſtake crept into the acts of that council, not reflecting, that beſides the more known city of Hierapolis in Phrygia Pacatiana, there was another of leſs note in Phrygia Salutaris. They are both mentioned by Pliny (42), and the one ſaid to be under the juriſdiction of Laodicea, the other under that of Pergamus.

(O) The Cayſter, now Minderſcare, bears ſuch a reſemblance to the Mæander, that many of our modern travellers, and among them the incomparable Pietro della valle, du Loir, and Manconis, have miſtaken the one for the other (42). The Turks call the (38) Concil. v. Collat. viii. (39) lib. vii. cap 3. (40) Nicephor. Calliſt. hiſtor. lib. xiv. c. 11. (41) Concil. Chalced. Act. xvi. (42) lib. v.. 29, & 30.

THE river Marſya, ſo named from Marſyas, a celebrated muſician, who challenging Apollo, was by him overcome, and flead his for preſumption. Moſt of the antients tell us, that this river hath its ſpring near that of the Mæander; but Maximus Tyrius [d], who was upon the ſpot, derives them both from the ſame ſource, and ſo does Strabo [e]. It ruſhes down from a conſiderable height between rugged rocks and precipices with great noiſe, on which account it was called by Herodotus [f] Cataracta. It has not only the ſame ſpring with the Mæander, but flows in the ſame channel through the town of Celæne, ſtanding at the foot of the river on which it riſes. In leaving the town the main ſtream divides itſelf into two branches, and forms theſe two rivers, the one the moſt winding river in the world, the other without ſo much as one turning during its whole courſe, and therefore flowing with an incredible rapidity. Near Apamea, that is after a courſe of ten miles only, the Marſyas is again received within the banks of the Mæander which it left at Celæne; ſo that in reality theſe two rivers are but two branches of the ſame original ſtream. Q. Curtius gives us a noble deſcription of it [g], and adds, that while it flows within the walls of Celæne it is named Marſyas, which name, on its leaving that city, it changes for that of Lycus; but, with this author's leave, Maſyas and Lycus are quite different rivers; the Lycus ſprings from mount Olympus and diſcharges itſelf into the Mæander not far from Laodicea, which was therefore called Laodicea on the Lycus; this is a quite different courſe from that of the Marſyas, which we have already deſcribed [h] (P).

SANGA-

[d] Serm. xxxviii. [e] lib. xii. [f] lib. vii. [g] lib. iii.
[h] Vid. Salmas. Plinian Exercitat. cap. xxxviii. p. 582.

the Cayſter Coutchouk mindre and Minderſcare, that is, the little Mæander, or the black Mæander; and the Mæander itſelf Boujouc-Mindre, the great Mæander. Some have obſerved, that it forms in its courſe the following Greek characters, ξ, ζ, ς, ω, &c. ſome pretend, that Dædalus formed his labyrinth on this plan, Seneca (43) calls it poetarum omnium exercitatio & ludus; but Ovid's deſcription of it (44) is, in our opinion, an inimitable piece, and far preferable to any other.

(P) The poets feign, that Marſyas having challenged Apollo, who flead him for his pride and arrogance, his death was ſo

(43) Epiſt. 105. (44) Metamorph. l. viii.

SANGARIUS, Sangaris, or Sangurus, is numbered by Pliny among the rivers of note [i]; it ſprings from the hill Dindymus, waſhes Phrygia and Bithynia, and empties itſelf into the Black-ſea. Phryx, which divides Phrygia from Caria, and diſembogues itſelf into the Hermus, now Sarabat. Hermus, much celebrated by the poets for its gold ſands, takes its rits riſe near Dorylaum, and falls into the Archipelago near Smyrna. Myſias, Orgos, Obrima, &c.

[i] Plin. lib. 1.

ſo bemoaned by the nymphs and ſatyrs, that from their tears ſprung a river called after him Marſyas. This Marſyas is ſaid to have been the ſon of Olympus, and one of the moſt ingenious men of his age. He was the inventor of the pipe called Syrinx, and the firſt that brought in the playing on two pipes at a time. He was born, put to death, and buried near the ſpring of the river that bears his name. Pliny (45) gravely writes, that in his time was ſtill to be ſeen the plane-tree on which this unhappy muſician ended his days. Others ſay with the ſame appearance of truth, that it was a pine-tree. Maximus Tyrius (46) informs us, that the rivers Mæander and Marſyas were both worſhipped by the inhabitants of Celæne; and adds, that the victims and offerings, though thrown into the common ſtream, never failed being carried by the waters, at their parting, into the channel of that river, for which the pious votaries had deſigned them. The river Lycus, which Q. Curtius, and with him Mr. Spon, miſtakes for the Marſyas (47), runs a few miles under-ground, but appears again before it loſes itſelf in the Mæander, which Ovid ſeems to have been ignorant of when he ſaid (48),

Sic, ubi terreno Lycus eſt epotus hiatu,
Exiſtit procul hinc, alioque renaſcitur orbe.

(45) lib. L. (46) Sermon, 38. (47) Voyage d' Italie, &c. tom. i, lib. iii. (48) Metamorph. lib. xiv.

SECT. III.

Of the antiquity, government, religion, cuſtoms, arts, learning, &c. of the antient Phrygians,

Their antiquity.

THE Phrygians deemed themſelves the moſt antient people of the world, which opinion ſeems to have prevailed even among the Egyptians, at leaſt in the time of Pſammiticus, who in point of antiquity looked upon all other nations with an eye of contempt. For we are told [k], that after the experiment, which we have mentioned elſewhere [l], thoſe great boaſters of antiquity acknowledged the Phrygians to be more antient, challenging only the ſecond rank to themſelves. And hence it is, that Apuleius [m] diſtinguiſhes them with the epithet of firſt-born.

Origin.

As to their origin, ſome ſuppoſe them deſcended from Togarmah, one of the ſons of Gomer; and of this opinion are Joſephus and S. Hierome [n], who adds, that they were known to the Hebrews under the name of Tigrammanes. Herodotus [o], Strabo [p], Pliny [q], and Euſtathius [r], led by the ſimilitude of names, a deceitful guide, derive them from the Brigians a people of Macedonia, who paſſing into Aſia Minor, were, with a ſmall alteration, called Phrygians, and the country which they ſettled in named Phrygia. We are not unwilling to allow, that as the Phrygians and Brigians bore anciently the ſame name, ſo they were originally one and the ſame people; but how it can be deduced from thence, that the Brigians paſſed out of Europe into Aſia rather than the Phrygians out of Aſia into Europe, is what we do not comprehend. All that can be concluded from this ſimilitude, or, if you pleaſe, identity, of names is, that they were both derived from the ſame origin; but in order to prove, that the Phrygians were a colony of the Brigians, rather than the Brigians a colony from from Phrygia, recourſe muſt be had to ſome other argument. All we can ſay is, that if they Phrygians had been deſcended from the Macedonians, it is not likely, they would have piqued themſelves ſo much on their antiquity; at leaſt other nations, namely the Egyptians, would not ſo readily have yielded to them the priority. Bochart [s] is of opinion, that the Phrygians were the offspring of Gomer, the eldeſt ſon of Japhet, the word Phrygia being, as we have obſerved elſewhere, the Greek tranſlation of his name. Joſephus makes Gomer the father of the Galatians, but he by the Galatians muſt neceſſarily mean the Phrygians, inhabiting that part of Phrygia which the Galatians had made themſelves maſters of; the deſcendants of Gomer being placed by Ezekiel [t] northward of Judea near Togarmah, (which Bochart takes to be Cappadocia) long before the Gauls paſſed over into Aſia. Moſt of the modern writers will have the Cimmerii to be the offspring of Gomer, underſtanding their country by the country of Gomer mentioned in the ſcripture. But as the Cimmerians lay beyond the Euxine ſea, at a vaſt diſtance from Judea, we can hardly think, that the Jews had any knowledge of a nation ſo remote from them. The Chaldee paraphraſts place Gomer in Afric, wherein they muſt certainly be miſtaken, ſince it is plain from Ezekiel [u], that his country lay northward of Judea. We are therefore willing to let Gomer enjoy the fine country which Bochart is pleaſed to give him, and allow him the honour of being the progenitor of the Phrygians, ſince we have no-body elſe to beſtow it on.

[k] Diodor. Sicul. l. i. p. 9. [l] Phaleg. lib. iii. [m] de Aſino aur. l. xi. [n] Joſeph. Ant. l. i. c. 7. Hieron. in quæſt. Hebraicis. [o] lib. vii. [p] lib. vii. x. xii. [q] lib. v. c. 37. [r] Euſtath. in Homer. & Dionys.

THE antient Phrygians are deſcribed as a ſuperſtitious, voluptuous, and effeminate race, without any prudence or forecaſt, and of ſuch a ſervile temper, that nothing but ſtripes and ill-uſage could make them comply with their duty, which gave riſe to ſeveral trite and well-known proverbs (Q). They are ſaid to have been the firſt inventors

[s] Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 8. [t] Ezek. xlviii. 6. [u] ubi. ſupra.

(Q) Phryges ſero ſapiunt, Phryx verberatus melior, Phryx non minus quam ſyhntharus, &c. which proverbs intimate their ſervile temper, and ſhew, that they were more fit to bewail misfortunes in an unmanly manner, than to prevent them by proper meaſures. Their muſic too was ſuited to their effeminate temper. The Doric mood was a kind of grave and ſolid muſic; the Lydian a doleful and lamentable harmony; but the Phrygian chiefly calculated to effeminate and enervate the mind. But this is contradicted by others.

tors of divination by the ſinging, flying, and feeding of birds. Their muſic, commonly called the Phrygian mood, is alledged by ſome as an argument of their effeminacy.

Their Government.

CONCERNING their government thus much may be ſaid, that it was monarchical, and that all Phrygia was, during the reigns of ſome kings, ſubject to one prince, Ninnacus, Midas, Manis, Gordius, and his deſcendants, were certainly lords of all Phrygia. But ſome time before the Trojan war we find this country divided into ſeveral petty kingdoms, and read of divers princes reigning at the ſame time. Apollodorus [w] mentions a king of Phrygia contemporary with Ilus king of Troy. Cedrenus [x] and others ſpeak of one Teuthrans king of a ſmall country in Phrygia, whoſe territories were ravaged by Ajax, himſelf ſlain in a ſingle combat, his royal ſeat laid in aſhes, and his daughter, by name Tecmeſſa, carried away captive by the conqueror. Homer [y] makes mention of Phorcys and Aſcanius, both princes and leaders of the Phrygian auxiliaries that came to the relief of Troy. Tantalus was king of Sipylus only and its diſtrict, a prince no leſs famous for his great wealth, than infamous for his covetouſneſs and other deteſtable vices. Whether Phrygia was ever ſubdued by Ninus, as Diodorus Siculus informs us, or by the Amazons, as we read in Suidas [z], is much queſtioned by the learned. Moſt authors, that ſpeak of Gordius, tell us, that the Phrygians, having ſent to conſult an oracle, in order to know how they might put an end to the inteſtine broils, which rent their country into many factions and parties, received for anſwer, that the moſt effectual means to deliver themſelves and their country from the calamities they groaned under, was to commit the government to a king, which they did accordingly, placing Gordius on the throne. Whence we may conclude, that, ſome time before his acceſſion to the crown, an ariſtocratical or democratical form of government had been introduced

Their trade, laws, learning.

As to their trade, all we can ſay is, that Apamea was the chief emporium of all Aſia Minor. Thith rereſorted merchants and traders from all parts of Greece, Italy, and the neighbouring iſlands. Beſides, we know from Syncellus, that the Phrygians were for ſome time maſters of the ſea (he ſays 25 years); and none but trading nations ever ever prevailed on that element. The country was ſtocked with many choice and uſeful commodities, and well able to afford conſiderable exports. They had a ſafe coaſt, convenient harbours, and whatever may incline us to think that they carried on a conſiderable trade. But as moſt of the Phrygian records are loſt, we will not dwell on conjectures ſo hard to be aſcertained.

[w] lib. iii. [x] Cedrenus, p. 104. Sophocl. in Ajace. Calaber. lib. iii. [y] Homer. Iliad. B [z] Suid. vit. ορφευς.

We have no ſet form of their laws; and as to their learning, ſince we are told that for ſome time they enjoyed the ſovereignty of the ſea, we may, at leaſt, allow them a competent ſkill in geography, geometry, and aſtronomy, and add to theſe, from what we have ſaid above, a more than ordinary knowledge of muſic.

Their language.

Some have been of opinion, that the Phrygian language bore a great reſemblance to the Greek; but the contrary is manifeſt from the few Phrygian words which have been tranſmitted to us, and carefully collected by Bochart [a] and Rudbechius [b]. To theſe we may add the authority of Strabo [c], who, after attempting to derive the name of a Phrygian city from the Greek, concludes, that it is a difficult matter to diſcover any ſimilitude between the barbarous words of the Phrygian language and the Greek. The Phrygian tongue after the experiment made by Pſammiticus king of Egypt, as we have mentioned elſewhere [d], was looked upon by the Egyptians as the moſt antient language of the world. But other nations, namely the Scythians, refuſed to ſubmit to their opinion, as founded on an argument of no real weight. As the two children, ſay they, had never heard the voice of any human creature, the word Bec or Bekkos, the firſt they uttered, was only an imitation of the goats that had ſuckled them, and happened to be a Phrygian word ſignifying bread (R). A late writer [f], after obſerving that Homer in ſeveral paſſages diſtinguiſhes the language of the gods from that of men, endeavours to ſhew, that the poet by the language of the gods meant the Greek, and by that of men the Phrygian (S).

[a] Bochart. Quæſt. num Æneas unquam fuerit in Italia. [b] Rudbec. in Atlant tom. i. cap. 36. [c] Strab. lib. xii. [d] Univerſal Hiſtory, Vol. I. p. 537. [e] Lakemacherus. obſer. Philol.

(R) Goropius Becanus makes uſe of the ſame argument to prove, that the High-Duch is the original or mother-tongue of the world, becauſe the word Becker in that language ſignifies a baker.

Their Religion

As to the religion of the antient Phrygians, we have already obſerved, that they were greatly addicted to ſuperſtition. They had many idols, but the goddeſs Cybele ſeems to have been their principal deity. She was called Cybele, Berecynthia, Dindymene, from Cybelus, Berecynthus, Dindymenus, all hills of Phrygia, and Idæa from mount Ida in Troas, becauſe on theſe hills ſhe was worſhipped in a particular manner (T). She was alſo named Cubebe,

(S) Gothofredus Lakemacherus in order to prove this chuſes the two following verſes (49);

Αυτα δ' αρ' Ηφαιστοιο μεγας ποταμος βαθυδινης,
Ὁν Ξανθον καλεσσι θεοι, ἀνδρες δε Σκάμανδρον, where Homer tells us, that the river here mentioned is by the gods named Xanthos and by men Scamander. He ſhews, that as Xanthos is a Greek word ſignifying yellow, the above mentioned river had very probably its name, from the Greeks, who gave the ſame name, as Strabo (50) witneſſes, to another river in Lycia on account of its yellow ſands. From hence he infers, that Homer, by the language of the gods, can mean no other than the Greek. As to the word Scamander, he thinks that this name was communicated to the river from one Scamandrius ſon of Hector and king of the Phrygians, whoſe territories were watered by this river, it being a common cuſtom among the antients to call the rivers after the names of the princes through whoſe countries they had their courſe. Now as Scamandrius, ſays he, was a Phrygian, his name was undoubtedly taken from that language; from whence he concludes, that the name of the river Scamander is originally Phrygian, and that Homer by the language of men means the Phrygian. This author concludes the ſame of all other paſſages in Homer, where ſuch a diſtinction is made; the more becauſe two other words attributed by Homer to men, viz. Bateia and Kumindis, are without doubt Phrygian; the one being the name of a hill in Phrygia, and the other of a bird moſtly frequenting mount Ida in Troas.

(T) Phiioſtephanus is of opinion, that the hill Dindymene was ſo called, becauſe it had διδυμας μασας two tops; but Strabo ſays in expreſs terms that it has but one. Bochart (51) thinks, that

(49) Iliad. 20. ver. 73. (50) lib. xiv. p. 665. (51) Bochart. de Quæſt. Utrum. Æneas fuerit unquam in Italia; a cym-

Cubebe, becauſe her prieſts, when ſeized with their frantic fits, uſed to throw themſelves on their heads, that name being derived from a Phœnician verb of that import. Arnobius [g] gives us the following account of Cybele from the mythology of the Gentiles. There was a vaſt rock on the borders of Phrygia, called in the language of that country Agdus, from whence Deucalion and Pyrrha, by the direction of Themis, took the ſtones, which they made uſe of to repair mankind after the duluge. From one of theſe ſprung Cybele the great mother of the gods. The ſame rock conceived by Jupiter and brought forth Acdeſtis, who is ſaid to have been an hermaphrodite, of invincible ſtrength, of a moſt cruel and intractable temper, and, above all, a moſt outragious enemy of the gods, who were in no ſmall fear of him, till Bacchus by a cunning contrivance found means to deprive him of his manhood, and thereby rendered him ſomewhat more tractable. From the blood he ſhed on this occaſion ſprung up a pomegranate-tree loaded with fruit in full perfection and maturity, which Nana daughter to king Sangarius being wonderfully taken with, gathered one, and, as it was of a moſt beautiful appearance, put it in her boſom. This coſt her dear, for ſoon after proving with child, notwithſtanding all her proteſtations of innocence, ſhe was by her father ſhut up and condemned to ſtarve. But being maintained alive with fruit conveyed to her by Cybele, ſhe was in due time delivered of a ſon, who being expoſed by his grandfather's order, was privately taken up by one Phorbus, and nurſed with goats milk; whence he was called Attis, the word Attagos in the Phrygian dialect ſignifying a goat. As he grew up he proved a moſt beautiful youth, and was on that ſcore greatly favoured both by Cybele and Acdeſtis; nay Midas king of Phrygia, then reſiding at Peſſinus, was ſo taken with a cymbal was in the Phrygian language called Dindum, as it is in the Syrian Zinzum; and from thence he derives the name of the hill Dindymus; the more, becauſe the invention of cymbals is generally aſcribed to the Phrygians, and in particular to this goddeſs (52), whoſe feſtival was on that account ſolemnized on mount Dindyme with great noiſe of cymbals, drums, trumpets, and other inſtruments.

[g] Arnobius contra Gentes, lib. viii.

(52) Diodor. Sicul. lib. iii.

with him, that he designed to bestow on him his only daughter, by name Ia. The day appointed for the nuptials being come, Midas, to prevent any disturbance that other suiters might create, caused the gates of the city to be shut and well guarded. But no gates or guards could keep out the great mother of the gods, who, being stung with jealousy, presented herself at the gate of the royal palace, with the walls of the city and all their turrets on her head; whence she was ever afterwards pictured with a crown of towers on her head. At the same time, came Acdestis, who, inspiring with an enthusiastic frenzy all who assisted at the fatal nuptials, changed the genial banquet into a scene of horror and confusion. The unhappy bridegroom in the height of his fury emasculating himself under a pine-tree, soon after died of the wound; the bride laying violent hands on herself accompanied her spouse to the shades. Acdestis and Cybele drenched in tears long bewailed the untimely and cruel death of their beloved Attis, and Jupiter having, at their joint entreaties, exempted his body from corruption, a magnificent temple was erected to his memory in Pessinus, ceremonies instituted, priests appointed, &c. Thus far Arnobius.

Eusebius [h] gives us a very different account of Cybele and Attis or Atys, copied, as he informs us, from the antient Phrygian mythologists. According to these, the first king of Phrygia, by name Meon, was father to Cybele, who being smitten with the charms of Attis, proved with child by him; whereupon Meon caused Attis to be put to death, at which Cybele being unspeakably grieved wandered long up and down Phrygia, seeking in the mountains and woods some allay to her grief. Her sorrow being in length of time somewhat asswaged, she admitted Apollo into an intimacy with her, and with him wandered to the Hyperboreans. By his order the body of Attis was interred, and Cybele after her death ranked among the gods. From these two accounts of Cybele, which come both from very good hands, we may conclude, that the Phrygians had different genealogies for, and traditions of, this their chief deity (U).

This

[h] Eusеb. de præpar. evangelic. l. ii iv.

(U) The Roman writers differs widely from those we have quoted, and frequently among themselves. Cybele according to

THIS goddeſs was pictured ſitting in a charriot drawn by four lions, crowned with towers, holding a key in her hand, and attired with a garment ſeeded with flowers of different colours. The mythologiſts by Cybele mean the earth, taking her crown of towers to be an emblem of the towns and cities built thereon; the key ſhe holds in her hand intimates, that the earth, which, during the winter, is in a certain manner locked up, begins to open in the ſpring, and the ſeeds to ſhoot up; her garment variegated with flowers of divers colours is a ſymbol of earth beautifully enamelled with all kinds of flowers; the lions that draw her chariot denote her empire over all ſorts of animals; which ſhe both produces and nouriſhes; finally Saturn, that is time, is feigned to be her huſband, to ſignify, that the earth produces nothing but in time. Euſebius and others [i] are of opinion: that Cybele was a woman famous for remedies againſt ſuch diſtempers as young children are ſubject to, and that on this ſkill or knowledge are grounded all the ſtories that are related of her.

CYBELE had her peculiar prieſts, ceremonies, and ſacrifices. Her prieſts were called in the Phrygian language Cubeboi, for the reaſon we have alledged above. The Greeks and Latins named them Curetes, Corybantes, which to them was the daughter of heaven and earth, wife of Saturn, and the ſame with Ops, Rhea, Veſta, and the Bona dea. She was expoſed immediately after her birth on mount Cybelus, nurſed there firſt by wild beaſts, and after by the wife of a ſhepherd who found her by chance, &c. The Romans having learnt from the books of the Sybils, that they would never be able to drive the Carthaginians out of Italy, till the Idean mother was brought to Rome, ſent therefore embaſſadors to king Attalus, who delivered them a ſtone, which the inhabitants of Peſſinus called the great mother of the gods. This happened in the year of Rome 550 (53). 'Tis to be obſerved, that the Romans made Cybele to be the ſame with Veſta, but acknowledged two goddeſſes bearing the ſame appellation, which their poets frequently confound; Cybele was that Veſta they called the earth and wife to Saturn, ſhe was called Veſta becauſe Stat vi terra ſua, as Ovid ſays, vi ſtando Veſta vocatur. The other was daughter to Saturn, and the goddeſs of fire, or rather fire itſelf, according to that verſe of the ſame poet, Nec tu aliud Veſtâ quam vivam intellige flammam.

[i] Diodor. Sicul. l. iii. Euſeb. de præpar. evang.

(53) Liv. Decad. iii. l. 9.

which is the Greek tranſlation of the word Cubeboi, and Galli, from the river Gallus, flowing through Peſſinus, where this goddeſs had a magnificent temple. They were alſo ſtiled Idæi Dactyli ; but it is no eaſy matter to account for this appellation. Sophocles quoted by Strabo [k] informs us, that they were called Idæi becauſe they inhabited mount Ida, and Dactyli from the Greek word Dactylus, ſignifying a finger, they being at firſt ten, which is the number of a man's fingers. Strabo indeed numbers five brothers [l], viz. Hercules, Pæon, Epimides, Jaſias, and Idas, adding, that they had as many ſiſters. But in other writers we find three only mentioned, and quite different from thoſe Strabo ſpeaks of, viz. Kelmis, Damnameneus, and Acmon. Apollonius [m] acknowledges but two, Fitia and Cyllenus. Some derive the name of Corybantes from the word Cherub, ſignifying in the Phœnician language valiant, and add, that they were the guards of the firſt kings of Phrygia [n] (W).

[k] Strab. lib. x. p. 473. [l] ubi ſupra. [m] Apollon. Argonaut. [n] Fr. Not. in Scholiaſt. Luciani. tom. ii. Pitiſcus. Lexicon Antiquitat. Natalis Comes. l. ix. Myth. c. vii.

(W) Diodorus tells us (54), that Cybele was daughter to Meon king of Phrygia, that ſhe married Jaſius a Samothracian the brother of Dardanus, and had by him a ſon called Corybas; that after the death of her huſband ſhe went with Dardanus and Corybas into Phrygia, and introduced into that country the myſteries of the mother of the gods, calling the goddeſs after her own name Cybele, and her prieſts Corybantes from her ſon Corybas. Thus Diodorus ; but Dionyſius (55) informs us, that Dardanus inſtituted the Samothracian myſteries, that his wife Chryſes learnt them in Arcadia, and that Idæus the ſon of Dardanus inſtituted afterwards the myſteries of the mother of the gods in Phrygia. Herodotus brings the Curetes out of Phœnicia with Cadmus ; and Sir Iſaac Newton (56) thinks, that having followed Cadmus out of Phœnicia, ſome of them ſettled in Phrygia where they were called Corybantes, ſome in Crete where they were named Idæi Dactyli, others in Rhodes where they were ſtiled Telchines ; others in Samothrace where they were known under the name of Cabiri ; ſome in Eubœa, where, as they were well ſkilled in arts and ſciences, they wrought in copper (iron not being yet invented) in a city thence called Chalcis ; ſome in Lemnos, where they aſſiſted Vulcan ; ſome in Imbrus ; and

(54) Diodor. p. 223. (55) Dionyſ. l. i. p. 38, 42.
(56) The chronology of antient kingdoms, &c. c. ii. p. 146.

THE ceremonies performed by theſe prieſts in honour of this goddeſs were, 1ſt, At ſtated times they uſed to carry her ſtatue about the ſtreets dancing and ſkipping round it, and after having with violent geſticulations worked themſelves up to the height of frenſy, they began to cut and ſlaſh their bodies with knives and lancets, appearing ſeized with a divine fury. This ceremony was performed in commemoration and a very conſiderable number of them in Ætolia, which was thence called the country of the Curetes, till Ætolus the ſon of Endymion, poſſeſſing himſelf of it, called it Ætolia. Theſe Curetes making themſelves armour uſed to dance in it at the ſacrifices, with great noiſe of pipes, and drums, and ſwords, which they ſtruck upon one another's armour, keeping time and forming ſome kind of harmony. And this is reckoned the origin of muſic in Greece both by Solinus and Iſidorus (57). Clemens Alexandrinus (58) aſcribes to the Curetes the invention of muſical rhymes. and of the letters called Epheſian. And Sir Iſaac Newton is of opinion (59), that when the Phœnician letters were by Cadmus brought into Greece, they were at the ſame time introduced into Phrygia and Crete by the Curetes, who called them Epheſian from the city of Epheſus where they were firſt taught. Theſe Curetes were no leſs eſteemed for their ſkill and knowledge in religious matters and myſtical practiſes, than for their arts and ſciences (60). In Phrygia they attended the myſteries of Cybele; in Crete and the Terra Curetum thoſe of Jupiter, who had been brought up under their care and tuition in a cave of mount Ida, where they danced about him in their armour, with great noiſe to drown the cries of the infant, and conceal him from his father Saturn who ſought his deſtruction. Bochart (61) brings them from Paleſtine, and thinks, they had the name of Curetes from a people among the Philiſtines called Crethim or Cerethites. We muſt not forget, that Cybele or the Great Mother was ſometimes repreſented with a key, and ſometimes with a drum in her hand; which has made ſome think that ſhe was the ſame with the Syrian goddeſs Aſtarte, whoſe chariot was alſo drawn by lions. Lucian tells us (62), that ſhe was the Cretan Rhea, that is, according to ſome, Europa the ſiſter of Cadmus; and thus the Phœnicians firſt introduced, as Sir Iſaac Newton obſerves, among the Greeks and Phrygians the practice of deifying their dead; for we meet with no inſtance of any ſuch practice before the departure of Cadmus and Europa from Sidon.

(57) Solin. Polyhiſt. c. xi. Iſidor. orig. l. xi. c. 6. (58) Clem. Strom. l. i. (59) ubi ſupra. (60) Strab. l. x. p. 472, 473. Diodor. l. v. c. 4. (61) Boch. in Canaan, l. i. c. 15. (62) Lucian. de Saltatione.

commemoration of the grief wherewith Cybele was transported at the death of her beloved Attis: 2dly, A pine-tree was yearly wrapt up in wool, and with great solemnity carried by the priests into the temple of the goddess, in commemoration of her wrapping up after the same manner the dead body of Attis and carrying it to her cave; on these occasions the priests were crowned with violets, which were supposed to have sprung from the blood of Attis, when he had laid violent hands on himself. The victims immolated in honour of the Phrygian goddess were a bull or a she-goat, whence the sacrifice was called Taurobolium or Criobolium. At Rome a sow was yearly sacrificed to her, and the ceremony performed by a priest and priestess sent for out of Phrygia on that occasion. Her priests, (those at least who were known under the name of Galli) were all eunuchs; this the great goddess required of them in memory of Attis; the waters of the river Gallus, when plentifully drunk, were believed to inspire them with such a frantic enthusiasm, as to perform the operation on themselves without the least reluctancy. They were not allowed to drink wine, because Attis, overcome with that liquor, discloſed his amours with Acdestis, which he had ever before concealed with the utmost care. They abstained from bread, in commemoration of the long fast which Cybele kept after the death of the same Attis. They held oaths to be unlawful on all occasions, which tenet, some tell us, was common to all the Phrygians. The priests were placed after their death on a stone ten cubits high [o]. Though the Romans professed a great veneration for Cybele, yet we find, that they looked upon her priests as the very refuse of mankind; of which we have a signal instance in Valerius Maximus [p], who tells us, that one Genutius, a Gallus or eunuch of Cybele, having by a decree of the prætor been admitted to the possession of an estate that had been bequeathed him, Mamercus Æmilius Lepidus, at that time consul, being appealed to, reversed the decree of the prætor, adding thereunto, that an eunuch, as being neither man nor woman, could not enjoy any privileges of that nature. This judgment Valerius Maximus extolls as a decree worthy of Mamercus, worthy of one that was at the head of the ſenate, ſince it put a ſtop to the appearing of eunuchs in the courts of judicature, and defiling the tribunals with their unhallowed preſence, under pretence of ſuing for juſtice.

a

[o] Arnol. lib. v. Hierony. Epist. ad Lætam. [p] Val. Max. l. vii. c. 7. Natalis Comes. l. ix. Myth. Pitiscus. Lexicon. Antiquit. &.

BESIDES Cybele, who was the peculiar deity of Phrygia, the Phrygians had divers other idols; namely Bacchus whom they ſtiled Sabazios, and his prieſts and temples Saboi, whence Bochart derives the Hebrew word Sabbath, as that of Levite from Lyſius and Evius [q]. Apollodorus acquaints us, [r] that while Bacchus was travelling through Phrygia, he was purified by Cybele, inſtructed in her myſteries, and preſented by her with a ſtole, which was the firſt he ever uſed (X). Adagyus, whom Bochart [s] takes to be Hermaphroditus, the ſon of Venus and Mercury, there being, at leaſt to his ear, a great ſimilitude of ſound between Adagyus and Androgynus. Some rank alſo the Cabiri or Cabires among the Phrygian deities, and add, that they were ſo called from Cabirus a hill in Phrygia, or, as Steſimbrotus terms it, in Berecynthia [t]. But others, with more appearance of truth, derive their name from the Hebrew word Cabir, ſignifying great or powerful [u]. Some confine the number of the Cabiri to two, viz. Jupiter and Bacchus; but Manaſeas enumerates four, Ceres, Proſerpine, Pluto, and Mercury, whom he diſguiſes under the uncouth appellations of Axioros, Axiokerſa, Axiokerſos, and Kaſmilos; to theſe Dionyſidorus adds a fifth whom he ſtiles Caſmilus, called by others Camillus, and the ſame with Mercury; but he is univerſally looked upon as one of an inferior rank, and no ways on the level with the Cabiri, termed the moſt high, the moſt powerful [w]. But theſe we ſhall have occaſion caſion to mention when we come to ſpeak of the Samothracian deities.

[q] Vide Boch. ubi. ſupra. [r] Apollodor. lib. iii. [s] Boch. ubi ſupra. [t] Bochar. ubi. ſupra. [u] Bochar. ubi ſupra. [w] Bochar. ubi ſupra.

(X) Stephanus (65) writes, that when Bacchus was born, Jupiter committed the care of him to one of Cybele's female attendants, by name Ma, who being aſked by Juno, whoſe child ſhe nurſed, anſwered, that it was the child of Mars, whence Bacchus in the Carian dialect was called Maſaris or Maſares, that is, the Mars of Ma.

(65) Voce Μᾶ.

We likewiſe read of ſome dances and ſongs uſed by the Phrygians in ſolemnizing the feſtivals of their gods, and ſometimes on other occaſions, which they called Lityerſes, from Lityerſes ſon of Midas king of Phrygia. Heſychius mentions certain Phrygian dances called by him Briciſmata, without doubt from the word Briges the antient name of the Phrygians [x]. Some ſpeak of a dance called Sicinnis, invented, ſay they, by a Phrygian nymph, and uſed by the Phrygians in honour of Sabatius, whom they add to the number of the other Phrygian gods [y]. But it is now time to proceed to the hiſtory of the Phrygian kings.

[x] Bochar. ubi ſupra. [y] Bochar. ubi ſupra.

SECT. IV.

The reigns of the kings of Phrygia.

THE ſucceſſions and reigns of the kings of Phrygia are overcaſt with ſuch an impenetrable miſt, and interrupted with ſo many chaſms, that it is no eaſy matter to give any tolerable account of them. However, we ſhall here produce what occurs in hiſtory relating thereto, and appears moſt worthy of credit.

The firſt king of Phrygia we find mentioned in hiſtory is Nannacus, Annacus, or Cannacas, for he bore all theſe appellations. Suidas [a] ſays, that he reigned before the flood of Deucalion, and that from thence things exceeding antient were proverbially ſaid, to be from the time of Nannacus. He lived to a very great age, for it is recorded of him, that when he was above three hundred years old he ſent to enquire of all ſuch oracles as were in any repute how long he ſhould live. The oracles unanimouſly anſwered, that at his death all things were to periſh; whereupon repairing with his ſubjects to the temples of the gods, he

[a] Verbo Αννακος.

he ſtrove there with many ſighs and tears to appeaſe their wrath, and avert the impending calamaties; and thence to weep like Nannacus, became a trite expreſſion to ſignify an extraordinary grief or ſorrow [x]. Not long after Nannacus died, and the flood of Deucalion enſued, which was attended with the deſtruction of mankind.

MIDAS appears next, of whom all we can ſay is, that he reſided at Peſſinus, and deſigned to diſpoſe of his daughter, by name Ia, in marriage to Attis or Atys, as we have already mentioned. This perhaps is the Midas who built, as Diodorus Siculus informs us [y], a magnificent temple at Peſſinus, and appointed yearly ſacrifices to be performed there in honour of the great mother of the gods. Hyginus ſeems to make him the ſon of Cybele [z].

THE next king we read of is Manis, a prince, as Plutarch [a] informs us, of ſuch proweſs and virtue, that the word Manic, derived from his name, became ſynonimous with Great, whence Manic atchievements were among the Phrygians the ſame as great, glorious, heroic atchivements [b].

AFTER theſe reigned Gordius, who was raiſed from the plough to the throne. His riſe is related thus [c]: While he was one day ploughing, an eagle ſettled on the yoke, and continued there all day. Gordius, terrified at this prodigy, went to conſult the ſoothſayers of Telmiſſus, a city in Lydia, about this ſo extraordinary an event; for the art of divining was, in a manner, hereditary to all the Telmiſſians. At his entering the city he met with a moſt beautiful young woman, who, upon his enquiring after the ſoothſayers, and acquainting her with the motives of his journey, informed him, as ſhe was herſelf ſkilled in the art, that nothing leſs than a kingdom was preſaged by that omen; and therewithal offered herſelf ready to ſhare with him in wedlock, the hopes with which ſhe had inſpired him. This offer ſeemed to him the greateſt happineſs that could attend a crown, he therefore readily complied with her requeſt, gratifying at the ſame time his own inclination.

[x] Suid. ubi ſupra. Eraſm. Chiliad. [y] Diodor. Sicul. l. iii. c. 5. [z] Hygin. fab. 191. & 274. [a] Plutarch. de Iſid. & Oſirid. [b] Eraſm. Adag. Chiliad. i. Cent. iii. lxxvii. [c] Strab. l. xii. Juſtin. l. xi. Curt. l. iii. Arrian. l. ii. Ælian. vit. H. l. i. c. 1.

inclination. Not long after a sedition breaking out among the Phrygians, the oracles, which they consulted on that occasion, were all unanimous in advising them to commit the government to a king, if they desired to put a stop to the growing evils. Upon this the Phrygians having sent again to consult about the person whom they should raise to that dignity, their embassadors were enjoined to acquaint them, that the first man, who after their return should visit in a cart the temple of Jupiter, was by the gods designed for their king. The embassadors had scarce delivered the answer of the oracle, when Gordius appeared riding in his cart, and was immediately with loud shouts of joy proclaimed king of Phrygia. Gordius, acknowledging the crown from Jupiter, in memory of so signal a favour, consecrated in his temple the cart to regal majesty, which not by the Phrygians only, but other nations, was adored as a goddess. To the beam of the cart he fastened a knot, woven with such art, and so perplexed, that the monarchy of the world was promised by the oracles to him who should untie it, which Alexander the Great having attempted in vain, cut it at last with his sword, and thereby either fulfilled or eluded the oracle. We know nothing more of Gordius, but that he built the city of Gordium, which was his residence, and that of all the princes of the Gordian family. Plutarch writes [d], that his son Midas was born of the goddess worshipped by the Romans under the name of Bona Dea; but whether she was wife to Gordius is much questioned by the mythologists (Y).

GORDIUS

[d] Plutarch. in vita Cæsaris.

(Y) Midas the son of Gordius, according to Ælian and Arrian (64), was the first king of the Gordian family that reigned in Phrygia. They tell us, that the Phrygians, having enquired of the oracle by what means they could put an end to their intestine broils, received for answer, that a cart would bring them a king who should restore their country to its former tranquillity; and that while they were musing on this answer, Midas came riding in his cart into the throng, who was immediately acknowledged king. But most writers begin, as we have done, the reign of the Gordian family with Gordius himself. Justin (65) makes Midas king of the Brigians in Macedonia; and adds, that being driven from his own territories he retired to Asia Minor, (64) Ælian. vit. H. l. i. c. 1. Arrian. l. iii. (65) Justin. l. xi. c. 7.

GORDIUS was ſucceeded by his ſon Midas, of whom it is recorded, that when he was a child, a ſwarm of ants was obſerved very busy one day, while he was aſleep, in conveying their ſtores of wheat into his mouth; whereupon the oracles being conſulted, returned anſwer, that immenſe riches were preſaged by that omen. The prediction was completely fulfilled, for he is accounted by all the antients as one of the richeſt princes that ever reigned [e]. Strabo [f] ſays, that he drew vaſt treaſures from mines of metal, diſcovered perhaps in his reign, on mount Bermius. He is greatly commended by ſome writers for the comelineſs of his perſon, by others for the religious bent of his mind. He is ſaid to have been inſtructed by Orpheus in the myſteries of religion, and to have filled Phrygia with new deities, temples, prieſts, ceremonies, and ſacrifices [g]. He introduced the cuſtom of mourning over the dead with doleful ſongs or dirges, and by annually renewing his lamentations over his deceaſed mother brought the Phrygians by degrees to worſhip her as a goddeſs [h]. He built the town of Ancyra [i], where an anchor of his contrivance was to be ſeen in the temple of Jupiter, when Pauſanias travelled through Greece [k]. He is ſaid to have reigned not over Phrygia only, but alſo Dardania [l]. Cleobulus Lyndius, one of the ſeven ſages of Greeee, honoured his monument with an epitaph [m], which is falſely aſcribed by ſome to Homer [n]. His wife, by name Hermodica, is celebrated by Heraclides [o] in regard of her beauty and wiſdom, and ſaid to have been the firſt that taught the inhabitants

[e] Cic. l. i. de Divin. Val. Max. l. i. c. 6. Ælian. vit. H. l. xii. c. 15. [f] Strab. l. xiv. p. 680. [g] Arrian. l. ii. Juſtin. l. xi. [h] Suidas Ἔλεγος. [i] Nonnus, in orat. 30 Greg. Naz. Pauſan. in Atticis. Suidas Μιδάς. [k] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. L Servius in Æneid. II. [m] Plato in Phædro. Laer. in Cleob. [n] Plutarch. in vita, & anthologium Planudis. [o] Heraclides in Politiis.

nor, where the Brigians with a ſmall alteration were termed Phrygians. According to this writer then the Phrygians, under the conduct of Midas, migrated out of Europe into Aſia, and of courſe there were no Phrygians in Aſia before Midas; how then could his father Gordius reign in Phrygia and be raiſed to the throne from ſo mean a condition, as Juſtin himſelf relates? As to the Gordian knot, ſome authors ſay, that it was of a bark of a cornel-tree, and that it faſtened the yoke of the cart to the beam.

bitants of Cyme to coin money. By her Midas had three ſons, Gordius, Ancharus, and Otreus; his fourth ſon Lityerſes was a baſtard (Z).

AFTER

(Z) Nothing has rendered the name of Midas more famous than the Greek proverb Μίδας ὄνος ὦτα, that is Midas has aſſes ears; but what gave riſe to that ſaying is variouſly reported. The poets tell us, that in a trial of ſkill between Pan and Apollo, both famous muſicians and rivals in that art, Midas gave ſentence in favour of the former, whereupon Apollo clapt a pair of aſſes ears on his head; this badge of ignorance he artfully concealed a long time under his diadem; but at laſt it was unfortunately diſcovered by his barber and made public. Others ſay, that Midas having offered an affront to Bacchus, was by the incenſed deity metamorphoſed into an aſs. Conon in his firſt narration (66) tells us, that Midas, having found a treaſure, became very rich; that being inſtructed by Orpheus on mount Pierius, he got himſelf by various artifices proclaimed king of the Brigians; that in his reign Silenus appeared on mount Brime, that whatever Midas touched was immediately turned into gold; and that making uſe of this prodigy, he perſuaded his ſubjects to remove out of Europe into that country which lies on the Helleſpont; that he ſettled in Myſia, and there changed the name of his ſubjects, calling them no more Brigians, but Phrygians. He adds, that Midas had a great many ſpies diſperſed up and down the country, by whoſe informations he knew what-ever his ſubjects did or ſaid, whence he reigned in peace and tranquillity to a great age, none of his ſubjects daring to enter into any plot or conſpiracy againſt him. His knowing by this means whatever his ſubjects ſpoke of him occaſioned the ſaying, that Midas had long ears; and as aſſes are ſaid to be endowed with the ſenſe of hearing to a degree of perfection above all other animals, he was alſo ſaid to have aſſes ears; but in proceſs of time, what was taken in a metaphorical ſenſe began to run current in the world for truth. Tully (67) relates, that Silenus, being taken priſoner by Midas, inſtead of paying gold for his ranſom, taught the king, that the greateſt happineſs was not to be born, and next to that to die ſoon. To other fables the poets add, that for entertaining Bacchus he was rewarded by the gods with the virtue of changing into gold whatever he touched, which is interpreted by ſome, as if he had been extremely covetous, ſtudying by all means and methods to fill his coffers (68).

(66) Conon apud Phot. Bilblioth. (67) Tuſcul. Quæſt. l. i. (68) Maximus Tyrius Serm. 3. Joan Tzetzes hiſt. 2. Iſaicus Tzetzes in Caſſandram Lycophrontis. p. 377. Fulgentius. l. ii. Natalis Comes Mythol. l. ix. c. 15. Greg. Sabinus in lib. xi. Metamorph.

AFTER Midas reigned his eldeſt ſon Gordius, but all we can ſay of him is, that he ſurrounded the town of Gordium with a wall [p]. His brother Ancharus is celebrated for the love he bore his country, having even ſacrificed his life for the public welfare. The fact is related thus [q]; during the reign of his father Midas the earth opened to a prodigious depth, and ſwallowed up great part of the city Celæne; whereupon Midas, having recourſe to his oracles, underſtood, that the opening would not cloſe till the moſt valuable thing in human life were thrown into it. This anſwer was no ſooner imparted to the inhabitants, but all the gold, ſilver, jewels, and whatever elſe of any value came to their hands, was gladly ſacrificed to the common ſafety. But all to no effect, for the gap continuing open threatened both the city and citizens with preſent deſtruction, when Ancharus, conſidering with himſelf that nothing in the world was of ſuch value as a human ſoul, embraced his father, took leave of his wife Timothea, and mounting on horſeback rid full ſpeed into the opening, which immediately cloſed. His example was long after followed in a parallel caſe by Curtius the Roman.

OTREUS is ſtiled by Homer [q] king of all Phrygia, and ſaid to have been contemporary with Anchiſes, whence we may conclude, that he ſucceeded his brother Gordius.

LITYERSES reigned at Celæne, and is deſcribed as a ruſtic, unſociable, and inhuman tyrant. Soſitheus the tragedian paints him as one of an inſatiable and canine appetite, having in one day, as this poet writes, emptied three large baſkets of read, band drank out twelve gallons of wine. He took great pleaſure in agriculture, and uſed often to labour in the fields like a common huſband-man. But as acts of cruelty were what he chiefly delighted in, he uſed to oblige ſuch as happened to paſs by while he was reaping to join with him in the work; and then cutting off their heads for their pains bind up their bodies in the ſheaves. For theſe and ſuch like cruelties he was put to death by Hercules, and his body thrown into the Mæander [r]. However, his memory was cheriſhed by the reapers of Phrygia (for reaping was his favourite employment); and an hymn,

[p] Stephanus, p. 99.
[q] Homer. in hymnis. Plutarch. in Parall. Stobæus. Serm. 7. Pollux. l. iv.
[r] Athenæus, l. x. c. 1, Suidas Διτυέρσης from him called Lityerſis, ſung in harveſt-time in honour of their fellow-labourer [s].

Midas II. MIDAS II. was king of all Phrygia, but whoſe ſon he was, or whom he ſucceeded, is what we find no-where recorded. He was an uſurper, and ſeized on the crown in the following manner: One night, under pretence of offering a ſolemn ſacrifice to the gods, he marched out of the town of Gordium, attended with a numerous band of Phrygians, playing on all ſorts of muſical inſtruments; but at the ſame time, as they were privy to their maſter's deſign, with ſwords and daggers concealed under their garments. The citizens, led by their curioſity and not ſuſpecting any treachery, followed them out of town, when the conſpirators, all on a ſudden throwing away their muſical inſtruments, fell upon the multitude ſword in hand, ſeized the city, and, in that terror and confuſion no-body daring to oppoſe them, proclaimed Midas king of Phrygia [t].

Gordius III. MIDAS II. was ſucceeded by Gordius III. perhaps his ſon. He is mentioned by Herodotus [u] as father to Midas, and that is all we can ſay of him. Herodotus does not ſtile him king, but as his ſon reigned, it is not unlikely that he held the crown before him.

Midas III. MIDAS III. ſon of Gordius, was the firſt among foreign princes that ſent donations to the oracle at Delphi; he preſented that deity with the royal ſeat or tribunal, from whence he uſed to adminiſter juſtice. Herodotus, in whoſe time it was ſtill to be ſeen, commends it as a piece of moſt exquiſite workmanſhip [w]: at that time it ſtood by the golden cups, with which Gyges king of Lydia had preſented the ſame oracle; for after Midas Gyges was the firſt of the Barbarians, as Herodotus informs us, who ſent preſents to Delphi [x]. Perhaps this Midas was ſucceeded by another Gordius, for we find that the kings of Phrygia took alternatively the names of Gordius and Midas.

Midas IV. MIDAS IV. lived in moſt calamitous times, when the Cimmerions, being driven out of Europe by the Scythians, invaded Aſia Minor, poſſeſſed themſelves of Sardis, and made a moſt dreadful havock of the Lydians, Paphlagonians, and Phrygians. Gordius, not finding himſelf in a condition to oppoſe ſo powerful an enemy, and foreſeeing the many evils that were inevitably to fall upon him, thought thought beſt to prevent them by putting an end to his unhappy days, which he did accordingly, drinking off a large cup of bull's blood [y]. And this is the firſt time that we find this ſort of death mentioned in hiſtory; his example was followed long after by Pſammenitus king of Egypt, and Themiſtocles the Athenian. Plutarch [z] ſays, that Midas thus ended his life, being driven to deſpair by frightful dreams and apparitions; but theſe in all likelihood were occaſioned from the terror and conſternation he was in, at the approach of ſo dreadful and mercileſs an enemy. Midas had two ſons, Adraſtus, and another whoſe name is not mentioned in hiſtory. Adraſtus, having unfortunately killed his brother in his father's life-time, and being thereupon baniſhed Phrygia, repaired to the court of Crœſus king of Lydia, who not only purified him, according to the cuſtom of thoſe days, from the blood he had innocently ſhed, but earneſtly preſſed him to remain at his court, aſſuring him, he ſhould want for nothing that Crœſus could give him. Adraſtus complied with his requeſt, and being entruſted with the education of the king's favourite ſon by name Atys, he unfortunately killed him too at a chace; which ſo grieved him, that he laid violent hands on himſelf, though Crœſus had generouſly forgiven him [a]. In him ended the royal family of Phrygia, which became a province of the Lydian monarchy, and continued in that ſtate till Crœſus was conquered and all Lydia reduced by Cyrus, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of Lydia.

[s] Theocritus Eidill. x. Eraſm. Adag. Chilad. iii. Cent. iv. Ad. lxxv. [t] Polyænus, lib. vii. [u] Herodot. lib. i. [w] Herodot. l. i. [x] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

Year of the flood 2447. Before Chriſt 655.

[y] Strab. l. i. Euſtathius in odyſſ. λ. [z] Plutarch. in Q. Flaminio. [a] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

SECT. V.

The Hiſtory of Phrygia Minor.

THE tract we commonly call Phrygia Minor was antiently ſtyled Troas, Teucria, and Darnania, from kings that reigned in that country. It was alſo named Idæa from mount Ida, and Phrygia from the Phrygians, who were maſters of great part of it, ſome ſay before, others after, the deſtruction of Troy; the epithet of Minor was added to diſtinguiſh it from the other Phrygia where Midas reigned, as Euſtathius expreſſes himſelf [a]. In the reign of king Priam the name of Troas generally prevailed.

THIS country was divided into two parts, the maritime called Helleſpontiaca and the mediterranean termed Epictetus. The former borrowed its name from the Helleſpont, and extended along the coaſt from the town of Percote to the promontory Lectum or Lecton, oppoſite to the north ſide of the iſland of Leſbos. This part was properly called Troas or Troja, though the Trojan kingdom extended from the river Æſopus to the banks of the Caycus [b], including not only Troas but alſo the Greater and Leſſer Myſia. Epictetus, or the inland part of Phrygia Minor, extended to the neighbourhood of mount Olympus in the Greater Myſia. This part at firſt belonged to Pruſias king of Bithynia, who yielded it, by agreement, to Eumenes king of Pergamus, whence it was called Epictetus, that is, acquired. However, theſe appellations are frequently confounded, and both attributed to all Phrygia Minor (A).

PHRYGIA Minor, as preciſely as we can gather, lay between the forty and forty-ſecond degrees of north latitude, and was but of a very ſmall extent in longitude, which we ſhall not pretend to determine, there being a great diſagreement among authors as to the boundaries of the inland provinces. In general we may ſay, that Phrygia Minor, as comprehending both the Helleſpontiaca and Epictetus, was bounded by the Propontis on the north, by the Ægean ſea on the ſouth, by Myſia Minor on the eaſt, and the Helleſpont on the weſt.

Cities of Phrygia Minor.

ON the coaſt were the cities of Percote, Abydus, Ariſba, Dardanum, Rhœteum, Sigeum, Troy, or Illium, Lariſſa,

[a] Euſtath. in Dionyſ. ver. 810. [b] Strab. l. xiii. p. 582.

(A) Strabo ſometimes diſtinguiſhes Troas Helleſpontiaca from Epictetus, and ſometimes confounds them; nay, he often makes Epictetus part of Phrygia Major (69), wherein he agrees with Ptolemy. Euſtathius diſtinguiſhes three Phrygias, viz. the Greater, where Midas reigned, extending as far as Piſidia; the Leſſer lying on the Helleſpont, and from thence reaching to mount Olympus; the third he calls Epictetus, and places it near Dorylæum.

(69) Strab. l. xii. p. 374. 388. 393.

Lariſſa, Colonæ, Alexandria, Troas, &c. Percote is often mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Arrian, and Homer, who mentions one Merops and his two ſons as being of this city [c]. Abydos was built by the Mileſians on the Helleſpont, and became famous for the poetical ſtory of Hero and Leander. Here it was that Xerxes began his bridge ſo much talked of, over which in ſeven days and ſeven nights he marched, according to Herodotus, ſeventeen-hundred-thouſand foot and fourſcore-thouſand horſe, exclusive of the camels and carriages. Here all Alexander's cavalry and moſt of his infantry landed, under the command of Parmenio, on their paſſing out of Europe into Aſia. The geographers are generally of opinion that the caſtles of the Dardanelles were built on the ruins of Seſtos and Abydos; but they are manifeſtly miſtaken, for the caſtles are directly oppoſite to each other, whereas Seſtos was a great way nearer the Propontis than Abydos; and Strabo [d] reckons 3750 paces from the port of Abydos to that of Seſtos. Beſides, there are no remains of antiquity to be ſeen near the caſtles, but very remarkable ones three miles further, where the channel is conſiderably narrower [e] (B). Ariſba, [c] Homer. Iliad. A. ver. 229. [d] Strab. l. xiii.

[e] Tournefort voyage au Levant. Spon. voyage d'Italie, Dalmatie, &c.

(B) The Helleſpont, every one knows, ſignifies the ſea of Helle; for the ancients tell us, that a daughter of Athamas king of Thebes, whoſe name was Helle, was drowned in that channel as ſhe was carrying the golden fleece to Colchis with her brother Phryxus (70). The name of Dardanelles is probably derived from Dardanum, an ancient city not far from the caſtles bearing that name. This ſtrait was antiently called the Helleſpont and the ſtrait of Abydos; but now it goes under the following names, the ſtrait of Gallipoli, the channel of the Dardanelles, the arm of St. George, from a famous church of St. George in a village called Periſtaſis not far from Gallipoli: it is known to the Turks by the name Boghas, or ſtrait of the white ſea. The mouth of the channel is defended by two new caſtles, which Mahomet IV. built in 1659, to ſecure his fleet againſt the inſults of the Venetians, who uſed to attack it in ſight of the old caſtles. The waters, that paſs through this ſtrait from out of the Propontis, flow with great rapidity; when the north-wind blows no ſhip can enter, but when 'tis ſouth, the current is ſcarce perceptible. Tournefort (71) tells us, that the mouth ba, the place appointed for the general rendezvous of Alexander's army after he had paſſed the Helleſpont. Dardanum, built by king Dardanus, near a promontory, bearing the ſame name. This city was the reſidence of Dardanus and his ſucceſſor Erichtonius. It communicated its name to the neighbouring country, and in length of time to all Troas. Some think, that the Dardanelles borrowed their name from this city. Here Mithridates and Sylla mouth of the Helleſpont is four miles and a half over, but Le Brun (72) ſays, that it is only a mile and a quarter. Spon (73) informs us, that where the old caſtles ſtand the Helleſpont is near two miles broad, and that the very name of Abydo or Avido is unknown to the inhabitants of the place. But Le Brun aſſures us (74), that the ſtrait at the old caſtles is only half a mile over, and that one of them is ſtill called Seſtos, and the other Abydo or Avido; he adds, that this ſea, where broadeſt, is but a mile and a quarter over, and half a mile where narroweſt: Among the antients, Strabo (75) allows it about a mile in the narroweſt place; Pliny (76) and Herodotus (77), ſeven furlongs or ſtadia, and Polybius only two (78). Of Abydos was Leander, who uſed to ſwim from thence to Seſtos to viſit his miſtreſs. One night that the ſea was very rough, and he near being drowned, Martial makes him addreſs the waves thus; Parcite dum propero, mergite dum redeo. He is repreſented on the medals of Caracalla and Alexander Severus, as conducted by a cupid flying before him with a torch. The inhabitants of this city made a vigorous reſiſtance againſt Philip of Macedon, and when they were not able to hold out any longer, choſe rather to deſtroy themſelves than ſubmit to the conqueror. Abydos was taken by the Turks through the treachery of the governor's daughter in the year 1330. It will not be amiſs to obſerve here, that what Herodotus (79) relates of Xerxes, viz. that he ordered three hundred laſhes to be given to the ſea, and a pair of fetters to be thrown into it for having broke down the firſt bridge he built here, is looked upon by ſome as quite fabulous. Gilles (80) thinks, that this piece of folly was firſt laid to his charge by the Greek poets, and that Herodotus took the thing too ſeriouſly; the 300 laſhes, ſays this writer, intimate 300 anchors, that were thrown into the ſea to fix the ſhips that formed the bridge; and by the pair of fetters is meant the two iron chains that faſtened them together at both ends and on each ſide.

(70) Euſtath. in Dionyſ. p. 810. (71) Tournefort, ubi ſupra.

(72) Le Brun voyage au Levant. (73) Spon, ubi ſupra. (74) Le Brun, ubi ſupra. (75) Strab. l. xiii. (76) Plin. l. viii. c. 32. (77) Herodot. l. vii. c. 34. (78) Polybius, l. c. (79) Herodot. l. vii. (80) De Boſph. Thrac. l. ii. c. 12.

Sylla concluded a peace. Some ſay, with what foundation we know not, that Dardanum was the patrimony of Æneas. Rhetæum, memorable for the tomb of Ajax, who was ſaid to have been interred there [f]. Sigeum, ſeated on a promontory of the ſame name, whence that ſea is called the Sigean ſea [g]. On this promontory was the tomb of Achilles, which Alexander honoured with a viſit, and in antient times a ſtatue of the ſame Achilles [h] with ear-rings like the ſtatue of a woman, which Tertullian [i] interprets as an argument of his effeminacy in point of dreſs (C).

TROY or Ilium, a city of great fame, and made immortal by the inimitable poems of Homer and Virgil, was built by Tros king of that country, who called it Troy from his own name, and Ilium from that of his ſon Ilus. It was ſeated on a riſing ground near mount Ida, and about five miles from the ſhore. There was ſcarce any remains of it to be ſeen in Strabo's time, and moſt of the antient as well as the modern writers, confound the old and new Ilium. All [k] Strabo ſays of its ſituation is, that the new Ilium or Troy was 30 furlongs nearer the ſhore than the old city. This new city was reduced to a village in the time of Alexander the Great, remarkable for nothing but a temple of Minerva, which that prince viſited after defeating Darius on the banks of the Granicus, and enriched with offerings, beſtowing ample privileges on the place, and honouring it with the title of city. He likewiſe ordered the buildings to be repaired, and the whole city to be embelliſhed, which was performed by Lyſimachus, one

[f] Strab. l. xiii. p. 409.
[g] Virg. Æneid. ii. ver. 312.
[h] Salmaſius Plinianæ exercitat. p. 610.
[i] Tertul. de pallio.
[k] Strab. l. xiii.

(C) Pliny (81) places not far from hence the tomb of Proteſilaus with trees ſet round it of a very extraordinary nature; for when they are grown up to ſuch a height as to be diſcovered from Troy, they begin to wither, and ſoon after die; then they ſhoot up again, and thrive till they are grown up to their former height, when they begin anew to decay and wither; and this viciſſitude of ſhooting up and dying away has continued, ſays our author, ever ſince they were firſt planted; that is, ſince the death of Proteſilaus, who in the Trojan expedition was the firſt among the Greeks that ſet foo in Aſia, and the firſt that was ſlain.

(81) Plin. l. xvi. c. 44.

one of his generals, who ſurrounded it with a wall of 40 furlongs in circumference. This new city was almoſt reduced to the condition of the former, and was more like a village than a city, when the Romans firſt entered Aſia. As they pretended to be the genuine offspring of the antient Trojans, no coſt nor pains was ſpared to reſtore it to its antient luſtre, eſpecially in the time of the Cæſars. Cæſar Auguſtus ſent thither a colony, embelliſhed the city with many ſtately buildings, and enriched it with moſt ample privileges and exemptions. And of this Ilium are, without all doubt, the ruins which are to be ſeen at preſent. Bellonius [l] tells us, that in his time the walls were yet ſtanding with the ruinous monuments of their turrets, and that he ſpent four hours in compaſſing them, partly on horſe-back, and partly on foot. He obſerved round the walls a great many marble tombs of moſt exquiſite workmanſhip, with their covers entire. Two of theſe were ſtill remaining when Mr. Spon [m] viſited thoſe places, who informs us, that they were in the ſtile of the antient Romans, and not unlike thoſe that are to be ſeen at Arles; whence he concludes them to be the remains of that Troy which was rebuilt by the Romans. Bellonius likewiſe obſerved the ruins of three great towers, one on the top of a hill not far from the ſhore, another about the middle, and the third at the bottom, with a great many large ciſterns to receive the rain-water. As to the ſo much celebrated rivers Xanthus and Simois, he calls them ſmall brooks, and adds, that in ſummer-time they are quite dry. But Sandys [n] thinks, they are not ſo contemptible as Bellonius makes them, who perhaps miſtook others for them, Spon [o] obſerved on the ſouth of the haven three columns lying among the briars, of which two were entire, and each of one ſingle piece, being thirty foot long; the third, which was broken in three places, was thirty-five feet in length, and four feet nine inches in diameter; they were all three of granate. Le Brun [p] ſpeaks of great remains of a moſt noble ſtructure which he viſited at the diſtance of about five miles from the coaſt. The four gates of this great edifice, at that time intire, were about forty-five feet in height, and near them ſtood a wall of an extraordinary nary thickneſs with fourteen gates of a competent ſize; the veſtiges of this magnificent ſtructure took up a hundred and thirty feet in length, and a hundred in breadth. Our author thinks, that theſe ruins may vie with any monuments of antiquity he ever ſaw. The harbour of Troy, ſo much ſpoke of by the antients, is now quite choaked up with ſand; however, there are ſtill to be ſeen fragments of columns, to which they faſtened their ſhips and gallies, and as theſe were placed round it, Spon thinks, that the port was about a mile and a half in circumference. As to antient Ilium, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of it more at length in the reign of king Priam, when it was taken and laid in aſhes by the Greeks after a ten years ſiege.

[l] Bellonius, l. ii. c. 6. [m] Spon, ubi ſupra. [n] Sandys, l. i. [o] Spon, voyage d'Italie, Dalmatie, &c. [p] Le Brun, voyag. au Levant.

TROAS Alexandria was ſituated between the promontories of Lectum and Sigeum, and is named by Stephanus in the ſecond place among the eighteen cities, which were ſo called from Alexander. It is ſometimes named Alexandria without the appellation of Troas, and ſometimes Troas without that of Alexandria or Alexandrea, which has made ſome think, that Alexandria and Troas were two different cities. Its firſt name was Antigonia from its founder Antigonus, which was afterwards changed by Lyſimachus into that of Alexandria in honour of Alexander [q]. This is ſuppoſed to be the place meant by the apoſtle Acts xx. 6. it being at that time the metropolis of the province; it lies now in ruins, and is called by the Turks Eſki-Stamboul. Theſe are the chief cities on the coaſt, the others are but of ſmall account, and therefore we ſhall dwell no longer on this ſubject.

OF the rivers that watered Troas or Phrygia Minor, we ſhall only mention the Scamander and Simois, rivers, as Mela writes [r], greater by fame than by nature. The Scamander riſes from mount Ida, and, having received within its banks, not far from Troy, the Simois, diſcharges itſelf into the Ægean ſea, over-againſt the iſland of Tenedos. It is ſaid by Herodotus to have been drunk up by the army of Xerxes. Pliny [s] calls it a navigable river, and diſtinguiſhes it from the Xanthus, though it is certain that theſe are but too different appellations of one and the ſame river. Its original name was Scamander; but it was afterwards called alſo Xanthus, becauſe it was believed to communicate communicate a yellowiſh tincture to the ſheep that drank its waters [t]. Homer tells us [u], that it was named Scamander by the gods and Xanthus by men, where according to his cuſtom he aſcribes the moſt antient appellation to the gods, and the more modern to men. This river was honoured by Heſiod with the title of divine Scamander. It was a cuſtom among the Phrygian brides to bathe themſelves before marriage in this river, uſing on that occaſion the following words, Receive, O Scamander, my virginity. Which opportunity one Cimon an Athenian taking hold of, under the diſguiſe of a river-god deflowered Callirhoe, a noble virgin, at that time betroathed, and thereby occaſioned the abrogating of that ſuperſtitious ceremony.

[q] Plinius, l. v. c. 30. Strab. lib. xiii. p. 408. [r] Pompon. Mela, l. i. c. 18. [s] Plinius, l. v. c. 30.

THE Simois ſprings likewiſe out of mount Ida, falls into the Scamander near Ilium, and diſcharges itſelf into the Ægean ſea, as we ſaid already. Whatever theſe rivers were in antient times, they are at preſent but ſmall brooks, if the accounts of our modern travellers are to be depended on.

IDA is the only mountain of this country that deſerves notice. It is rather a ridge of hills than a ſingle one; for it extends from the city of Zeleia, near the borders of Myſia Minor, to the promontory Lectum. We are told by the poets, that Paris, on this hill being choſen judge by the three contending goddeſſes, decided the controverſy in favour of Venus, which ſay they, occaſioned the deſtruction of Troy.

Soil and climate.

THE ſoil of this country was antiently reckoned among the moſt fertile that were then known. It was productive of whatever was requiſite for the pleaſures of life, and yielded to no ſpot that lay under the ſame happy parallel; nor at this day are there wanting ſigns and ſufficient indications thereof, though it is now in part uncultivated and neglected. Our modern travellers deſcribe the Aſiatic coaſt of the Helleſpont as a moſt beautiful and fertile tract of land, the hills being covered with vineyards and olive-plantations, and the vales productive of all ſorts of grain [w].

Tenedos.

OVER-AGAINST Troy lay Tenedos about two leagues from the ſhore, and formed the Trojan harbour. As all the [t] Ælian. de animal. l. viii. c. 21. ubius ſequeſter de fluminibus Maximus Tyrius Serm. 12. [u] Iliad. verſ. 74. [w] Tournefort, ubi ſupra.

the ſplendor and magnificence of this iſland ſtood and fell with Troy, it will not be improper to inſert here a ſuccinct account of it. All antient writers agree, that this Iſland was firſt called Leucophrys, and afterwards Tenedos from one Tenes or Tennes, who brought a colony thither from the continent. Tennes was ſon to Cycnus king of Colone in Troas, and is deſcribed by Diodorus Siculus [x] as a man of great probity and juſtice, having been greatly beloved by his ſubjects during his life, and adored by them after his death. The antient inhabitants of Tenedos gave the following account of him, which Diodorus Siculus looks upon as fabulous, but Suidas and Pauſanias ſeem to credit. Tennes, ſay they, was ſon of Cycnus and Proclea, ſiſter to Caletor, who was killed by Ajax in attempting to burn the ſhips of Proteſilaus. Cycnus, after the death of his wife Proclea, married Philonome, who falling in love with her ſtep-ſon Tennes, and finding that ſhe could by no means make him comply with her inceſtuous deſires, complained of him to her huſband, as if he had offered violence to her. Stephanus adds, that the evidence ſhe produced in proof of her charge was a player on the flute. Cycnus giving more credit to his wife than his ſon, cauſed him to be ſhut up in a cheſt and thrown into the ſea, which carried the cheſt ſafe to the iſland we are ſpeaking of, where Tennes was received as ſent by the gods, and with loud acclamations proclaimed king. Some writers tell us, that his ſiſter by name Hemithea, not caring to outlive her brother, was at her own requeſt with him locked up in the cheſt. Some time after Cycnus, being convinced of his ſon's innocence, ſailed to Tenedos to crave his pardon, and expreſs the concern he was in for ſo haſty and inhuman a reſolution. But Tennes inſtead of receiving him went to the harbour, where with a hatchet he cut the cable which faſtened his father's ſhip to the ſhore. This hatchet was carried by Periclytus, a citizen of Tenedos, to Delphos, and there lodged in the temple of Apollo. The Tenedians cauſed two others to be made reſembling this in ſhape and ſize, which they conſecrated in the temple of [x] Diodor Sicul. l. v.

of their city, These adventures gave birth to two famous proverbs among the antients (D).

SECT.

(D) The one is Τενεδιος αυλητης, that is, the Tenedian player on the flute, a saying used by the antients to reproach a false evidence. The other Τενεδιος πελεκυς, that is, the Tenedian Ax, an expression used to signify a quick and an unalterable resolution (82). Aristotle, cited by Stephanus, explains this in a different manner. He says, that a king of Tenedos having enacted a law forbidding adultery on pain of death, the first that transgressed this law was his own son, who was therefore beheaded with an ax. Stephanus adds, that the heads of the two lovers back to back were represented on the medals of the island, and on the reverse the ax with which they were beheaded. 'Tis certain several medals of this kind have been found in that island. Some take these two heads to be those of Tennes and his sister Hemithea, others of Jupiter and some Amazon, who might have founded a city in Tenedos. The ax on the reverse was the instrument used by the inhabitants in the execution of their criminals. Suidas tells us, that Tennes after he was settled on the throne of Tenedos ordered an officer to stand behind the judge in all public trials with an ax in his hand, ready to strike off the head of such as should give false evidence; and hence Τενεδιος ανθρωπος, Τενεδιος συνηγορος, that is, A man of Tenedos, an advocate of Tenedos, were expressions used to signify a man or a judge of great severity (83). Nothing has rendered this island more famous than the siege of Troy. It was within sight of that powerful city, as Virgil observes (84): he supposes, that the Greeks concealed themselves behind this island when they feigned to raise the siege. After the fall of Troy, the inhabitants were brought so low, that they gave themselves up to their neighbours, as Pausanias obferves. Tenedos was one of the first conquests of the Persians after the overthrow of the Ionians at the isle of Lada (85). It was reduced by the Athenians, or at least sided with them against the Lacedæmonians, since Nicolochus admiral of Lacedæmon ravaged this island, and raised contributions in it in spite of the vigilance of the Athenian generals. The Romans enjoyed Tenedos in their turn, and the temple of that town was plundred by Verres, who as Tully informs us, carried away, to the great grief of all the inhabitants, the statue of Tennes founder of the city (86). This island is about eighteen miles in circumference. It had one city, two havens,

(82) Erasmi Adag. Chiliad. iv. Cent. 1. (83) Suidas. Erasmus ubi supra. Cic. lib. ii. Epist. ad Q. Fratrem. Tournefort, voyag. au Lev. (84) Virg. Æneid. l. ii. (85). Herodot. l. vi. (86) Cic. pro Manil. pro Muræna. pro Arch. poæta.

vens, and a temple dedicated to Apollo Smynthius, of which idol we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak preſently. There are no ruins to be ſeen at Tenedos except thoſe of the granaries, which Juſtinian cauſed to be built as a repoſitory for the corn that was brought from Alexandria to Conſtantinople, leaſt it ſhould mould on ſhip-board, the veſſels being frequently wind-bound for a conſiderable time at the entrance of the Dardanelles. Theſe magazines, as Procopius informs us, were two hundred and eighty feet long, and ninety broad (87). The muſcate wine of this iſland is the moſt delicious of all the Levant, and though it is not celebrated by the antients as that of Scio and Leſbos, yet it may be proved from ſeveral medals, that Tenedos has in all times produced great plenty of good wine, ſince on the reverſe of ſome medals of that iſland is to be ſeen the branch of a vine charged with grapes, a plain indication, that it was in antient times famed for this production.

(87) Procop. de ædific. Juſtin. l. v. c. 1.

SECT. VI.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, cuſtoms, arts, learning, and trade of the Trojans.

THE inhabitants of Leſſer Phrygia or Trojans, ſo called from Troy the metropolis of that country, were without all doubt a very antient people; but as to their original there is a great diſagreement among authors. Some make them Samothracians by deſcent; others Greeks, and tells us, that Teucer, according to them the firſt king of Troy, was by birth an Athenian, and lord of a village named Axonus. Some derive them from the iſland of Crete from whence they ſuppoſe Phrygia Minor to have been peopled; but theſe are again divided among themſelves as to the leader of this colony, ſome beſtowing that honour on Teucer, others on Dardanus. Some will have them deſcended from the Arcadians, and there are not wanting writers who make them even come originally from Italy, which opinion, though deſtitute of all probability, Antiquity.

bility, was embraced by Virgil, as moſt redounding to the glory of that country, and perhaps current among the Romans in his days. Bochart [y] thinks, that Leſſer Phrygia was planted by Aſkkenaz Gomer's eldeſt ſon, there being the footſteps of his name in the Aſcanian lake, and a river called Aſcanius with a bay of the ſame name in Bithynia, and likewiſe in a city named Aſcania in Leſſer Phrygia, with iſles on the coaſt named the Aſcanian iſlands: he alſo obſerves, that, beſides Aſcanius the ſon of Æneas, Homer mentions a king of that name, who was at the ſiege of Troy. Hence he concludes, that a colony was led by Aſkkenaz out of Greater Phrygia, where his Father had ſettled, into Troas or Leſſer Phrygia, and that by this colony and their deſcendants that tract of country was peopled, which from the Ægean ſea extends along the coaſt of Helleſpont and the Propontis, to the Pontus Euxinus or Axenus, as it was firſt called by the Greeks, which he ſuppoſes to be a corruption for the ſea of Aſkenaz. He obſerves, that the ſcripture, among the nations which were to be called by the Medes under Cyrus to deſtroy Babylon, mentions Ararat, Minni, and Aſkenaz. And to prove, that the Aſkenæz mentioned in ſcripture were the people of theſe parts, he ſhews out of Xenophon [z], that Hyſtaſpes having conquered Phrygia that lies on the Helleſpont, brought from thence many of the horſe and other ſoldiers, which Cyrus carried with him to the ſiege of Babylon. But whoever was the progenitor of the firſt inhabitants of this country, it is certain, that in proceſs of time their blood was mixed with that of foreigners, namely of Myſians, Samothracians, Greeks, and Cretans, who ſettled among them, and were reckoned of the ſame deſcent with the antient proprietors.

Government. As to their government, it was, no doubt, monarchical and hereditary; for from Dardanus to Priam we find the father conſtantly ſucceeded by the ſon, or the elder brother by the younger. Their country was at firſt, like moſt others, parcelled out into ſeveral petty Kingdoms; for we read of Cycnus, Pandarus, Eurypylus, and other princes of ſmall teritories within the limits of Leſſer Phrygia [a]. But all theſe were in length of time either driven out by, or made tributary to, the Trojan kings; inſomuch, much, that Strabo [b] enumerates no fewer than nine ſmall kingdoms or principalities ſubject to Troy, beſides the iſland of Lesbos. And this is what drew out the Trojan war to ſuch a length, for all theſe countries were to be ſubdued before Troy could be inveſted. Diodorus Siculus informs us [c], that the Trojans were ſubdued by Ninus; but Philoſtratus tells us in expreſs terms, that they were allies, and no ways vaſſals or tributaries, to the Aſſyrians. The Trojan kings ſeem to have been abſolute and no ways controulable by the ſubject. But we ſhall have occaſion to reſume this ſubject when we come to their hiſtory.

[y] Phaleg. l. iii. c. 9.

[z] Cpropæd. l. vii.

[a] Diodor Sicul. l. v. Strab. l. xiii.

Religion. We have no particular ſyſtem of their laws, and ſhall therefore paſs to their religion.

As to the religion of the Trojans, it was in ſubſtance hardly different from that of the inhabitants of Greater Phrygia. which we have already deſcribed. Their principal deities ſeem to have been Cybele, or as they ſtiled her the great mother of the gods, who, according to the common opinion, was brought into Troas from Crete by Teucer, lord of that iſland and the progenitor of the Trojans [d]. She was chiefly worſhipped on the hills of Ida, Dindymus, Berecynthus, and Cybele, whence ſhe borrowed her name. Apollo, who had a temple in the citadel of Troy called Pergamus. In this temple, and by this god, Homer feigns, that Æneas was concealed, till the wounds he had received in an encounter with Diomedes were cured by Latona and Diana, Apollo's mother and ſiſter. Minerva or Pallas, from whoſe temple Virgil pathetically deſcribes Caſſandra dragged by the victorious Greeks, while the city was in flames [e]. The famous Palladium was a wooden ſtatue of this goddeſs, holding in one hand a buckler, and a ſpear in the other, ſo contrived as to move them, and at the ſame time roll her eyes in a threatning manner. We are told, that, while the Trojans were erecting a temple to Pallas in their citadel, this ſtatue fell from heaven into the temple before it was covered; whereupon an oracle being conſulted returned anſwer, that the city of Troy could not be taken ſo long as it enjoyed this heavenly gift; which coming to the knowledge of the Greeks, Diomedes and Ulyſſes got privately into the caſtle, killed the guards, and by bereaving the Trojans of their main defence enabled the Greeks to take the city. All the Roman writers aſſure us, us, that this Palladium was brought into Italy by Æneas, and lodged first at Lavinium, afterwards at Alba, and at last removed to Rome, and deposited there in the temple of Vesta under the care of the vestals and the Nautian family. The Romans were so strongly possest with the false notion, that the city, which was blest with this valuable treasure, could never fall into the enemies hands, that Metellus, seeing the temple of Vesta all in flames, ventured his life without the least hesitation to rescue this sacred depositum, and was on that score thanked by the senate and people of Rome, as if he had saved the republic. The Romans universally belived themselves masters of the true Palladium, but could never shew how they came by it. For to say, that it was in Troy when the city was taken, is the same as to deny its boasted virtue of rendering that city impregnable in which it was lodged. On the other hand, if it was stolen by the Greeks before they entered Troy, how could Æneas bring it into Italy (E)?

[b] lib. xiii. [c] ubi ſupra. [d] Virgil. l. iii. [e] Æneid ii.

(E) There is great variety of opinions among the antients as to the Trojan Palladium. Some tell us (88), that the king of Phrygia Major presented Ilus with a pied ox, warning him at the same time to build a city where the ox should lie down; that Ilus followed him, and in the place where he lay down built a city, calling it from his own name Ilium. They add, that Ilus, having desired Jupiter to signify his approbation by some visible token, found the Palladium next morning before his tent. Others say (89), that Chrysas daughter of Pallas, marrying Dardanus, brought him the Palladium as part of her fortune; that Dardanus first erected a temple in Samothrace to this and other deities, and afterwards took them with him into Phrygia on the Hellespont, Lycophron seems to insinuate, that the Palladium was a Phænician goddess, for he calls Ulysses Δελφινό σημον κλῶπα Φοινίκης Θεᾶς (90). Johannes Antiochenus, Eustathius, and others say, that it was made by a certain mathematician, and covered over with a human skin (91). Julius Firmicus (92), Clemens (93), and Arnobius (94), tells us, that the Gentiles believed it to have been made of the bones of Pelops. According to the common opinion it was stolen out of the citadel of Troy by Diomedes and Ulysses; but some tell us, that the true Palladium never fell into the hands of the Greeks, it being carefully concealed, and another of the same shape

(88) Apollod. l. iii. (89) Vide Rosinum Roman. Antiquitat. p. 147. (90) Seldenus de diis Syris Syntag. 2. (91) Selden. ubi supra. Syntag. 1. (92) De errore profanar. religion. c. xvi. (93) In protrept. (94) Ad. versus gentes. l. iv.

VENUS alſo is counted among the Trojan deities, but as to Veſta, whom Æneas is ſaid by the poets to have carried into Italy, with his houſhold gods, we find not any footſteps of worſhip paid her at Troy. She was indeed worſhipped all over Greece, where there was not one city, but could ſhew a temple dedicated to this goddeſs with a lamp always burning in honour of her, which has made ſome think, that the rites and ceremonies of Veſta were introduced into Italy by the Greeks, and not by the Trojans [f].

AMONG the other Trojan deities we find mention made of Apollo Sminthius, ſo ſtiled from the Phrygian word Sminthos ſignifying a field-mouſe. We are told [g], that this ſort of vermin made ſuch a devaſtation in the fields of Troas, that the inhabitants, finding all other means of ridding the country of them unſucceſsful, had recourſe to the oracle of Delphos, which anſwered, that they ſhould be delivered from that plague if they ſacrificed to Sminthian Apollo, which they did accordingly, and moreover erected a temple in Amaxito a city of Troas to their pretended deliverer, addreſſing him under the title of Sminthian Apollo. [h] Others relate the matter in a different manner, and tell us, that the inhabitants of Troas worſhipped mice for having on a certain occaſion gnawed the bow-ſtrings of their enemies, and thereby ſecured a complete victory to the Phrygians. The worſhip of Apollo Sminthius was introduced into Myſia, the iſle of Tenedos, and other countries; for Strabo [i] tells us, that a ſhape and ſize expoſed to public adoration; this, ſay they, was carried off by Diomedes and Ulyſſes; but the true Palladium remained in Troy till Æneas removed it from thence to Lavinium. But as this is derogating from the virtue of the true Palladium, and putting it, as it were, upon the ſame level with a falſe one, ſince it was not able to ſave the city in which it was kept, others, to mend the matter, ſuppoſe, that the Greeks returned the Palladium to the Trojans, or rather to Æneas, being warned ſo to do by the oracles. But we ſhall have occaſion to examine in the courſe of this hiſtory the truth of Æneas's voyage to Italy, and add ſomething relating to this famous idol. In the mean time, we may obſerve, that there was another Palladium of great fame worſhipped at Athens, which Nicias had placed in the caſtle of that city.

[f] Prudentius contra Symmach. l. ii. ſect. viii. [g] Strab. l. xiii. Ælian, vit. H. l. iv, [h] Ptolemo apud Clem. Protrept. [i] ubi ſupra.

mouſe was engraved at the foot of Apollo's ſtatue in a temple of Chyrſa a city of Myſia, to unfold the reaſon of his being ſurnamed Sminthian; he adds, that the ſtatue was done by Scopas a celebrated ſtatuary of Paros. The ſame author, in ſpeaking of the iſle of Tenedos, ſays, that it had one town, two havens, and a temple dedicated to Sminthian Apollo (F.) As to the religious cuſtoms and ceremonies of the Trojans we are almoſt quite in the dark; but we may ſuppoſe them to have been much the ſame with thoſe of the inhabitants of Phrygia Major.

Character. THE character we have of the Trojans is, that they were a brave and warlike people; and in this we ſhall be more confirmed, when we come to view their behaviour in the reign of king Priam, when they withſtood for nine years with uncommon bravery the combined forces of all Greece. They ſeem to have entertained a fond veneration for their deities, and a great reſpect for their princes; for we do not find in their hiſtory any kind of inteſtine broils, or plots, or conſpiracies againſt the prince on the throne, whoever he was.

Cuſtoms, Language &c. WE can ſay nothing particular touching the cuſtoms of the Trojans, their civil concerns, or their arts and learning; they are celebrated by the antients as one of the moſt polite and civilized nations of thoſe days, and in the reigns of their latter kings they aroſe to a very conſiderable pitch of ſplendor and magnificence, thoſe great encouragers of arts and induſtry. Their language was in all likelihood the ſame with that ſpoken by the inhabitants of Greater Phrygia, and perhaps in all that tract which was afterwards known by the name of Aſia Proper, the ſeveral nations ſpoke one and the ſame tongue with ſome variation of dialect.

Trade. THEIR trade we can only gueſs at from their ſituation, which very likely drew merchants from all the neighbouring parts to traffic in their country, as well for their own growth as for foreign productions. Their country was ſtocked with many uſeful commodities, and muſt have abounded

(F) Tournefort (95) mentions two medals of Tenedos, the one with Apollo's head, and under it a mouſe, having on the reverſe a two-edged ax; the other bears two heads back to back, and on the reverſe the ſame ax with two mice.

(95) Tournefort voyage au Levant.

abounded in all things neceſſary for life, ſince it could ſupport for many years together two very conſiderable armies, as we ſhall ſee in the following ſection. Their ſettlements in Thrace, in Peloponneſus, in Sicily [k], in Italy [l], in Egypt [m], and in Afric [n], are a convincing proof, that they applied themſelves pretty early to trade and navigation, which in all likelihood, were the ſources of the riches, ſplendor, and power, wherein they far excelled all the ſtates round them.

[k] Pauſanias, l. ii. & 5. [l] Strab. l. vi. [m] Diodor. Sicul. l. i. c. 1. [n] Herodot. l. iv.

SECT. VII.

The reigns of the Trojan kings.

TROAS or Phrygia Minor was in all likelihood governed by kings before the reigns of Teucer and Dardanus; for Servius names out of Nero's Troica one Cynthius king of Troas long before Teucer. But as the Trojan hiſtory of that epoch is either fabulous, or altogether uncertain, it were loſt labour to make a narrow ſearch into it. It is no leſs uncertain which of the two aboveſaid princes reigned firſt, ſome writers giving the precedency to Teucer, others to Dardanus; and truly this is ſo dark and obſcure a ſubject, that every one may ſay what he liſts. We ſhall follow the moſt common opinion, and begin with Teucer, without pretending to add any thing of our own, or entering into the merits of ſo perplexed a cauſe. Teucer.

TEUCER, the ſon of Scamander and Ida, that is, born in Phrygia near the river Scamander and mount Ida, ruled over all Troas or Phrygia Minor. He is ſaid to have been very fortunate and ſucceſsful in all his undertakings, but what they were we find no where ſpecified. Having no iſſue-male he married his only daughter, by ſome called Batia, by others Aſia, by others Ariſba, to Dardanus, ſettling therewithal the crown of Phrygia on him and his deſcendants. Thoſe who make Teucer a Phrygian by birth ſuppoſe him to have come to the crown by a lineal deſcent, and place Cynthius, whom we have mentioned above, among his anceſtors; ſo that, according to theſe writers, Teucer was not the founder of the Trojan kingdom, but the laſt of a long ſeries of kings prior to thoſe of the Dardanian family ſprung from Dardanus and Batia. From Teucer the country was called Teucria and the inhabitants Teucri (G).

TEUCER

(G) This is the opinion of Diodorus Siculus, and, as we have hinted, the moſt common. However, Virgil, who had as good means to come at the truth, as any other could have, and very likely did not depart from it in ſuch things as no ways concerned Auguſtus, makes Teucer a Cretan, and delivers his opinion as follows:

Creta Jovis magni medio jacet inſula ponto;
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula noſtræ.
Centum urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna.
Maximus inde pater, ſi rite audita recordor,
Teucrus Rhæteas primum eſt advectus in oras,
Optavitque locum regno; nondum Ilium, & arces
Pergameæ ſteterant, habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiaque æra,
Idæumque nemus; hinc ſida ſilentia ſacris,
Et junctì currum dominæ ſubiere leones (96).

Teucer then, according to thoſe who follow Virgil's opinion, which is aſcribed to Beroſus, was the ſon of one Scamander a native of Crete, from which iſland Teucer, retiring in the time of a great famine, put to ſea with the third part of the inhabitants in queſt of new ſeats, and arrived at that part of Phrygia which lies on the Helleſpont. Here he landed not far from the Rhætean promontory, and being the firſt night greatly annoyed by vaſt numbers of mice, he reſolved to ſettle there in compliance with the oracle, which had directed him, before he put to ſea, to fix where he ſhould be attacked in the night-time by an enemy ſprung from the earth. His firſt care was to raiſe a temple to Apollo Sminthius, who was pictured treading under foot a mouſe, calling in the Cretan or Phrygian language Sminthos. He gave new names to the hill and river near which he landed, calling the one Ida from a hill of the ſame name in his native country, and the other Scamander, which was the name of his father. This river to that time had been called Xanthus; whence Homer ſays, that it was called Xanthus by the gods and

Scamander

(96) Æneid, l. iii. ver. 104.

TEUCER was ſucceeded by Dardanus the ſon of Corytus or Corythus, by Electra the daughter of Atlas. Corytus was king of Samothrace, and had by Electra two ſons, Jaſius and Dardanus, and one daughther by name Harmonia. Dardanus ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Samothrace, where he erected a ſtately temple, and inſtituted religious rites and ceremonies in honour of Pallas and the other gods, whoſe ſtatues his firſt wife Chryſe had brought with her as part of her fortune. This, together with the many excellent laws he is ſaid to have enacted on his acceſſion to the crown, gained him the reputation of a wiſe, juſt, and religious prince. Inſomuch, that Teucer, who was ſtrucken in years and had no iſſue-male, invited him over into Phrygia, gave him in marriage his only daughter Batia, and appointed him his heir and ſucceſſor to the kingdom of Phrygia, which, after the death of Teucer, he ruled with the ſame moderation, equity, and religion, as he had done that of Samothrace. He waged war with the neighbouring princes, namely with the Paphlagonians, and, as he was always attended with ſucceſs, extended the boundaries of his new kingdom by conſiderable acquiſitions. He built two cities, the one he honoured with his own name, ſtiling it Dardana or Dardania, and this he choſe for his royal ſeat; the other he called Thymbra from Thymbræus one of his intimates. Haveing ſettled the civil concerns of the kingdom, and made many uſeful laws for the due adminiſtration of juſtice, which he looked upon as the baſis of regal authority, he applied himſelf entirely to religious matters. The Palladium, or, as others will have it, the Palladiums (H), were Dardanus. Year of the flood, 1524. Before Chriſt 1479.

Scamander by men, meaning thereby that the former was the more antient. He likewiſe introduced the worſhip of Cybele according to the rites that were practiſed in Crete, where that goddeſs was ſuppoſed to have brought forth and nurſed Jupiter. Some think the authority of Virgil, with regard to Teucer, to be of very great weight, ſince it no ways concerned Auguſtus whether Teucer was of Crete, or not.

(H) Some writers tell us, that Dardanus had with Chryſe two Palladiums or ſtatues of Pallas, and that they were both of equal virtue, the oracle having promiſed, that the city in which either of them was kept ſhould never be liable to any diſaſters. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus gives us the words which the oracle was ſaid to have uttered, and are the following; were by his orders brought over into Phrygia; as for the other gods, which he had with his firſt wife, they were left in Samothrace till the death of his brother Jaſius, who governed that iſland in the abſence of Dardanus (I). Dardanus

Fate

Fata dabunt urbem, poteris qua condere ſacra,
Cœlicolaſque illic feſtis colere atque choreis.
Munera namque deæ ſervabis arce repoſta
Palladis; hæc quoniam cepit tua regia conjux,
Servatura tuam duris procul omnibus urbem.

One of theſe, ſay they, was ſtolen out of the citadel of Troy by Diomedes and Ulyſſes; but the other was brought by Æneas into Italy (97). But Varro (98) tells us, that the Palladium was brought to Rome by one Nautes, and adds, that the prieſthood of Minerva was hereditary in his family. Others ſay, that Diomedes, after the deſtruction of Troy, being driven by a ſtorm on the coaſts of Italy, and there ordered by an oracle to return the Palladium to the Trojans, ſent it to Æneas by Nautes, one one of Æneas's friends and companions.

(I) In what has been ſaid of Dardanus we have followed Homer, Manetho, Diodorus, Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, Euſebius, Cyrillus, Cedrenus, Johannes Tzetzes, &c. but Virgil and the poets to flatter Auguſtus make Dardanus ſon of Electra not by Coritus, but by Jupiter. And as to Coritus, they will have him to have been king of Hetruria, and not of Samothrace. Virgil tells us, that Dardanus paſſed out of Hetruria into Samothrace, and from thence into Phrygia. He expreſſes himſelf thus: (99)

Eſt locus, Heſperiam Graii cognomine dicunt;
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere glebæ.
Oenotrii coluere viri; nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixiſſe, ducis de nomine, gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ ſedes; hinc Dardanus ortus,
Iaſiuſque pater, genus a quo principe noſtrum.

And elſewhere (100).

Atque equidem memini (fama eſt obſcurior annis)
Auruncos ita ferre ſenes; his ortus ut agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes, Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum, Coriti Tyrrhena ab ſede profectum,
Aurea nunc ſolio ſtellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Virgil

(96) Procog. de Bell. Goth. l. i. Iſaac Tzetzes in Caſſandram Lycophron. p. 146. (98) Varro de familiis Rom. apud Servium. (99) Æneid, iii. verſ. 163. (100) Æneid. l. iv. verſ. 205.

danus had two wives, the firſt named Chryſe an Arcadian, by whom he had two ſons, Idæus and Dimas, the other Batia, who likewiſe bore him two ſons, Zacynthus and Erichthonius. Idæus and Dimas, according to Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus [o], inherited, in right of their mother, the territories of their grandfather in Arcadia, whence they led colonies into Aſia, being forced to quit their own country by frequent inundations. Zacynthus planted a colony of Phrygians in an iſland of the Ionian ſea, which from himſelf he called Zacynthus [p]. Erichthonius ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Phrygia, as we ſhall ſee anon. As to his ſiſter Harmonia, ſhe married Cadmus founder of the Theban kingdom, whom her brother Jaſius had initiated in the myſteries of religion. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of her and her huſband Cadmus, when we come to treat of the Theban kingdom. Dardanus reigned in Phrygia 64 or 65 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon.

ERICHTHONIUS, who treading in the footſteps of his father was revered by his ſubjects, and greatly reſpected by all Erichthonius. Year of the flood, 1589. Before Chriſt 1414.

[o] Dionys. Halicar. l. i. [p] Dionys. Halicar. ubi ſupra.

Virgil does not tell us on what occaſion Dardanus quitted Tuſcany: But Annus informs us, that after the death of Coritus, the two brothers Dardanus and Jaſius falling out about the ſucceſſion to the crown, the former killed the latter, whereupon he was obliged to ſave himſelf by flight from the Tuſcans, and from Siculus king of Spain and brother to Electra, who was come to compoſe their differences. The ſame Annus gives the name of Comblobaſcus to the father of Dardanus and Jaſius, and adds, that the word Corytus was a title of dignity. Apollodorus, in his fabulous hiſtory of the Greeks, tells us, that Jaſion, as he ſtiles him, and Dardanus were ſons of Electra, the daughter of Atlas and Jupiter, that the former, being paſſionately in love with Ceres, and attempting to raviſh her, was thunderſtruck, and that Dardanus was ſo concerned for the death of his brother, that, abandoning Samothrace his native country, he retired to the oppoſite continent, where he was kindly received by Teucer king of Phrygia. Iſaacus Tzetzes (9) thinks, that Dardanus was forced by an inundation to leave Samothrace. As to Atlas, the father of Electra, ſome ſay, that he was king of Mauritania others of Samothrace, and that he gave his daughter in marriage to Corytus, who had by her Chryſe firſt wife to Dardanus. Boccace (10) is of opinion, that Atlas was neither an African, nor a Samothracian, but an Italian. The want of good authorities in this point of antient hiſtory has given every one leave to ſay what he pleaſed.

(9) In Apollonium. (10) De gen. deor. l. iv. c. 8.

all the neighbouring princes, with whom, as he was more inclined to the arts of peace than of war, he carefully maintained a good underſtanding. The long quiet he enjoyed gave him an opportunity of heaping up immenſe riches, which Homer takes notice of, without burdening the ſubject with taxes and impoſitions. By his wife Aſtyoche he had but one ſon named Tros. He reigned, according to ſome, forty-ſix, according to others ſeventy-five years, and dying left the kingdom of Phrygia in a moſt flouriſhing condition (K).

Tros. Year of the flood 1635. Before Chriſt 1368.

On the death of Erichthonius, Tros aſcended the throne, and in the very beginning of his reign laid the foundations of a city, which became ſoon the moſt famous of all Aſia. This grand work being at laſt finiſhed, he invited all the neighbouring princes, except Tantalus king of Sipylus, to aſſiſt at the ſolemn dedication of the new city. Why Tantalus was omitted we know not; but he highly reſented ſuch a contemptuous behaviour, as he called it, and ſoon after had a fair oppootunity of ſhewing his reſentment. For Ganymedes, a youth of extraordinary beauty, and the darling of his father Tros, being ſent by him with a ſplendid retinue to carry preſents of great value to Jupiter Europæus, in paſſing through the territories of Tantalus was not only detained, but abuſed by that vitious and impious king (L). This indignity the generous youth

(K) Apollodorus tells us, that Erichthonius had an elder brother, by name Ilus, who died before his father, and a ſiſter called Idæa, who married Phineus II. king of the Thracian Thyni, whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention in the hiſtory of Thrace. As the name of Erichthenius is entirely Greek, ſome have concluded from thence, that the Greek tongue began very early to prevail in Phrygia; which argument would be of no ſmall weight, could they but prove, that Erichthonius was that prince's original or Phrygian name, and not a Greek tranſlation thereof; for the Greeks, as Plato obſerves (11), uſed to tranſlate foreign names into their own language, as the Egyptians did all Greek names into theirs. Some finding a king of Athens bearing the ſame name, infer from thence, that the Trojans were originally Athenians. An opinion built on ſo ſlight a foundation is ſcarce worth refuting.

(L) The fable of Ganymede's being taken up into heaven by Jupiter is variouſly interpreted; but Natalis Comes (12) is of opinion, youth took ſo much to heart, that he died ſoon after of pure grief. Neither did his father Tros long outlive him; for the war, which he made upon Tantalus to revenge the affront offered to his ſon, proving unſucceſsful, the affliction, which aroſe from thence, joined to the concern he was in for the loſs of his favourite ſon, put an end to his days in the 60th, or, according to others, in the 49th year of his reign. He had by his wife Acalide, or, as Apollodorus calls her, Callirrhoe, three ſons, Ilus, Ganymedes, and Aſſaracus, and one daughter by name Cleomeſtra, or as Apollodorus will have it, Cleopatra. Hyginus, by miſtake, makes Ganymedes ſon to Erichthonius. From this king Phrygia Minor borrowed the name Troas, as its metropolis did that of Troy.

(11) In Atlantic. (12) l. ix. c. 13.

As the chief commanders of the Trojan troops, whoſe names are of great renown in antient hiſtory, and from whom moſt of our European nations have once pretended to derive their pedigree, were deſcended from Tros, before

opinion, that this ſtory was invented by the Greeks to give a kind of ſanction to the unatural luſt that greatly prevailed in that nation. And truly Jupiter, as Arnobius obſerves (13), ſeems to have been ſet up for no other purpoſe, but that men might father their crimes upon him, and thereby extenuate in great meaſure their own guilt. Thus Theocritus the poet, in celebrating the inceſtuous marriage of Ptolemæus Philadelphus with his ſiſter Arſinoe, produces the example of Jupiter and Juno; and Seneca the tragedian had recourſe to the ſame topic to find ſomething commendable in the marriage of Octavia and Nero: Sortita fratris more Junonis toros, ſays he, ſpeaking of Octavia (14). Others tell us, that Ganymedes was killed in a battle between Tantalus and Ilus; for Ilus purſued the war with Tantalus which his father had begun. They add, that the body of Ganymedes not being found among the dead, nor ever after appearing, the poets took occaſion from thence to feign, that he had been taken up into heaven by Jupiter. Suidas charges Minos with the rape of Ganymede, and ſays, that Minos being kindly received and entertained by Tros, on that occaſion fell in love with Ganymedes, and requited the favours he had received of the father by abuſing, and forcibly conveying away the ſon, who was the only delight of his old age. Cicero (15) ſeems to make Ganymede the ſon of Laomedon, which is a miſtake. Oroſius (16) and Euſebius (17) inform us, that the war which Tros made upon Tantalus was deſcribed by one Patrocles a poet of no mean character; but his works have not reached us.

(13) lib. v. contra gentes. (14) Pag. 334. (15) Cicero 1. Tuſcul. (16) lib. 1. c. 12. (17) De præpar. evangel. l. ii, fore we proceed in the hiſtory of the Trojan kings, we ſhall give a ſuccinct account of his numerous progeny. Tros, as we have already obſerved, had by his wife Acalide, or, as others call her, Callirrhoe, three ſons, Ilus, Ganymedes, and Aſſaracus, and one daughter by name Cleomeſtra. Of Ilus, who ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Phrygia, and his poſterity, we ſhall ſpeak in the ſeries of the kings. Ganymedes died without iſſue. Aſſaracus had by his wife Hieromname, or, according to others, Clytodora, one ſon named Capys, of whom we know nothing elſe but that the city of Caphya in Arcadia, according to Stephanus, borrowed its name of him, and that he married one Themis, by whom he had Anchiſes, who was famous for the comelineſs of his perſon, which gave riſe to the fable of his amours with Venus. He had the misfortune to ſee the city of Troy twice taken and plundered during the firſt ſiege, which happened in the reign of Laomedon, he is aid to have behaved with great gallantry; but in the time of the ſecond, he was no more fit to bear arms, being wore out with old age and infirmities, occaſioned by the lewdneſs and diſſoluteneſs of his youth, to which his blindneſs is alſo aſcribed. He is ſuppoſed to have been ſaved out of the flames of the burning city on the ſhoulders of his ſon Æneas, and to have accompanied him to Sicily, where he died. He had two ſons, Æneas, whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention hereafter, and Elymus, and one daughter named Hippodamia. Elymus, according to Suidas, imparted his name to the Elymæis a people of Sicily. Apollodorus calls him Lycus. Hippodamia married Alcathous, who fell in a battle by the hand of Idomeneus [q].

Cleomestra had but one ſon, by name Lyerſus, father to Antenor. As to Lyerſus antient hiſtory is quite ſilent; but Antenor is greatly commended for his prudence and wiſdom. He was ſent by king Priam embaſſador into Greece to demand his ſiſter Heſione, whom Hercules after taking Troy had carried captive into Greece, and beſtowed on Telamon, as a reward for being the firſt that mounted the wall of that city. The Greeks treated him more like a ſpy than an embaſſador; whereupon, returning to Aſia, he inflamed Priam and his ſons againſt that nation However, ſome time after he not only

[q] Homer. Iliad. v.

ly entertained in his houſe the Greek embaſſadors that were ſent to demand Helena, but protected them againſt the treacherous attempts of Priam's ſons, and found means to convey them ſafe out of Troy. This having gained him the good will of the Greeks, he was ſent into Greece on a ſecond embaſſy, on which occaſion he is commonly believed to have betrayed the truſt repoſed in him, and ſome years after the city itſelf, ſeeing that Priam would hearken to no conditions of peace, to which Antenor ſhewed himſelf mightily inclined after his laſt embaſſy. It is agreed on all hands, that the Greeks entering Troy ſword in hand, ſhewed in the height of their revenge a tender and friendly regard for Antenor, having even cauſed the ſkin of a panther to be hung up before his door, leſt, through miſtake, any violence ſhould be offered to his houſe or perſon by the greedy and incenſed ſoldiery. Some add, that having known Ulyſſes, who had entered the city in diſguiſe to obſerve the ſtrength of the Trojans, he neither apprehended nor diſcovered him. Many, however, clear him from all treachery, and put a more favourable conſtruction on the kindneſs ſhewn him by the Greeks, ſaying that they ſpared him merely in compliance with the laws of hoſpitality, which in thoſe days were deemed ſacred even by the moſt ſavage nations. Of this opinion is Livy [r]; and Virgil alſo ſeems to free him from all ſuſpicion of treachery, ſaying, that he eſcaped falling into the hands of the Greeks [s]. But be that as it will, the Trojans, that remained in the country after the deſtruction of Troy, were ſo predudiced againſt him, that they obliged him to withdraw from Troas. At the ſame time the Heneti, being driven out of Paphlagonia and forced to ſeek for new ſettlements, choſe him for their leader in room of their king Pylæmenes, who had been killed in the ſiege of Troy. With theſe and a few Trojans he put to ſea, and, ſteering his courſe up the Adriatic gulph, landed in the country of the Euganei lying between the ſea and the Alps. Here he reſolved to ſettle, and having driven out the antient proprietors, and blended the mixed multitude of Heneti and Trojans under the common name of Veneti, he gave riſe to a new nation. He built a ſmall town in the place where he landed and called it Troy. He is ſuppoſed to have built the city of Padua. Antenor nor had by his wife Theano, ſiſter to Hecuba and daughter to Ciſſeus king of Thrace, Iphidamus, Coon, Helicaon, Laodocus, Acamas, Archilochus, Polybus, Agenor, Laodamas, Demoleon, Glaucus, and Crino. Iphidamus was brought up in Thrace under the care of his grand-father, and came to ſuccour Priam and his country with twelve ſhips, which he left at Percope, marching by land to Troy, where he was ſlain by Agamemnon, whom he had engaged, and would very likely have conquered, had he not been leſs fortunate than brave [t]. Coon, attempting to revenge the death of his brother, ſingled out and dangerouſly wounded the ſame Agamemnon, but at laſt fell likewiſe by his hand. Helicaon married Laodice daughter to king Priam. Archilochus and Acamas commanded, in conjunction with Æneas, the troops of Dardania. Agenor was a warrior of great proweſs, attended Hector in his boldeſt undertakeings, and was not afraid to encounter Achilles himſelf [u]. The others are named by Homer, Pauſanias, Calaber &c. but performed nothing worth relating. Pindar [w] tells us, that the ſons of Antenor, after the deſtruction of Troy, joined Menelaus and Helena, and with them ſettled in Libya. But Euſebius ſays, that they reigned in Phrygia till the return of Hector's ſons, by whom they were driven from the throne and the country. Perhaps ſome of them remained in Phrygia, and ſome accompanied Menelaus and Helena; among the latter were, according to Symmachus [x], Glaucus, Acamas, and Hippolochus or Archilochus. As to Theano Antenor's wife, Suidas and Cedrenus informs us, that ſhe was the chief prieſteſs of Pallas, and that ſhe betrayed the Palladium to Diomedes and Ulyſſes, who were ſent into Troy under the pretence of an embaſſy to king Priam. Let us now return to the ſucceſſion of the Trojan kings.

[r] Decad. i. l. i. [s] Æneid, l. i. verſe 246.

Ilus. Year of the flood 1684. before Chriſt 319.

TROS was ſucceeded by his ſon Ilus, who, purſuing with great vigor the war which his father had begun, after many ſignal victories drove Tantalus out of Aſia and poſſeſſed himſelf of his kingdom, which he annexed to the crown of Phrygia. Pelops the ſon of Tantalus, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, was at laſt entirely routed, and forced to quit Aſia and follow his father into Greece.

Byſnus

[t] Homer. Iliad. λ. Pautanias in Phoc.
[u] Homer. Iliad. λ.
[w] Pindar. Pyth. Od. 5.
[x] Apud Iſaac. Tzetzum, p. 276.

Byſnus king of the Bebryces, who had eſpouſed the quarrel of Tantalus and his ſon Pelops, was likewiſe defeated, and, ſome ſay, killed in the engagement; Ilus having thus revenged the affront offered to his brother, applied himſelf entirely to civil affairs, and is ſaid to have made a great many uſeful laws for the regulation of public affairs. He enlarged and adorned with many ſtately buildings the city of Ilium or Troy. Plutarch informs us, that in his time the temple of Pallas being ſet on fire by lightning, he ſaved the Palladium out of the flames; but on that occaſion loſt his ſight, which, however, he afterwards recovered. Herodianus informs us[y], that he called the place, where he defeated Tantalus, Peſſinus, which name was afterwards given to a city built on that ſpot. He died in the 40th year of his reign. He had by his wife Lucippe two ſons, Tithonus and Laomedon. Tithonus, whom ſome believe to have been the ſon, and not the brother, of Laomedon, was from his early years greatly addicted to hunting; by which manly exerciſe having acquired a ſtrong and robuſt conſtitution, and inured himſelf to hardſhips, he betook himſelf to a military life, and went to ſerve among the Aſſyrians, who in thoſe days were a very warlike people, and thought to excel all other nations in the military art. His courage and conduct ſoon raiſed him to the firſt poſts in the army, in which he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that he was ranked among the Titanes or chief lords of the Aſſyrian monarchy, and made governor of Perſia. Hearing that Phrygia was invaded by the Greeks, he obtained leave of Teutamus king of Aſſyria, who had a great value for him, to ſend his ſon Memnon at the head of a conſiderable body of choſen troops to aſſiſt his countrymen. But this expedition proved fatal both to the father and the ſon; for Memnon being ſlain by the Theſſalians, Tithonus, already worn out with old age, was ſo grieved for his death, that he did not long outlive him. The comelineſs of his perſon, his riſing early in the morning as he was a great ſportſman, the old age he lived to, and his pining away at laſt with grief, may have given riſe to the many fables which the poets relate of him; but for theſe and their explanation we muſt refer the reader to Athenæus [y] lib. i.

Athenæus [a], Tzetzes [b], Natalis Comes [c], and other mythologists.

TITHONUS had by his wife Ciſſia, or, as Diodorus calls her, Ida, two ſons, Memnon and Emathion, and one daughter named Hemera. Memnon, being brought up under the diſcipline of his father, proved a brave, wiſe, and experienced commander. He ſerved with great ſucceſs in Egypt againſt the Ethiopians, who were become very troubleſome neighbours to the Egyptians; for he routed and diſperſed their armies, laid waſte their country, and obliged them to pay an annual tribute to the Egyptians, who out of gratitude transferred it to Memnon, appointing him king over the country which he had ſubdued. In Ethiopia he built a city bearing his own name, and ſome make him likewiſe the founder of Abydus. Having thus diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Egypt and Ethiopia, he returned to his father in Aſſyria, where he was ſet over part of Perſia in quality of ſatrapa or chief governor, and is ſaid to have built in his ſatrapy the city of Suſa, and another to which he imparted his own name. To gratify his father he marched, at the head of 20000 Ethiopians and the like number of Perſians, to the aſſiſtance of king Priam. On this occaſion he behaved with his uſual bravery, and often put the Greeks to flight; but at laſt falling into an ambuſcade was killed by Achilles at the head of the Theſſalians. His body was reſcued out of the enemies hands, his obſequies performed with great ſolemnity, and his aſhes ſent back to his father. Joſephus places his tomb near Ptolemais in Phœnice, but Pliny and Ælian ſay, that he was buried at Suſa (M). Every body has heard of the vocal ſtatue of Memnon near Thebes in Egypt. This, according to Pauſanias [d], Euſtathius,

[a] Athen. lib. xii. c. 26. [b] Iſaac Tzetzes in Caſſandr. Lyc. [c] Natalis Comes, l. vi. c. 4. [d] In Atticis.

(M) Pauſanias (18) tells us, that a cenotapium or empty tomb was raiſed to him in the country of Troas, not far from the river Æſopus, which tomb, as the inhabitants informed him, was yearly viſited by ſtrange birds, known to them under the name of Memnonian birds. Theſe on ſtated days flocking to the tomb, cleared the ground, on which it ſtood, of all rubbiſh, and afterwards dipping their wings in the Æſopus ſprinkled it with the water of that river.

(18) In Phocis.

thius [e], Lucian [f], was broke in pieces by order of Cambyſes, but ever after that part, which remained on the pedeſtal, at the riſing of the ſun, yielded a ſound like that of the ſtring of a lyre or lute, when it breaks on the inſtrument by being drawn too tight. Euſebius ſeems to have credited this ſtory; for he ſays, that this miraculous effect ceaſed at the birth of Chriſt. Pauſanias [g] informs us, that Memnon's ſword was kept at Nicomedia, and produces it as an argument to prove, that the arms uſed by the antients were of braſs. Anticles, quoted by Pliny, ſays, that Memnon invented letters fifteen years before the reign of Phoroneus firſt king of Argos. Heliodorus [h] makes him the progenitor of the kings of Ethiopia.

EMATHION, the other ſon of Tithonus, remained at home with his uncle Laomedon, and was killed in the war that broke out between him and Hercules. Probus the grammarian is of opinion, that Macedonia was from him named Emathia, and Juſtin mentions an antient king of Macedonia bearing his name [i]. Romus, deſcended from one of the ſons of Tithonus, was reckoned by ſome, as Plutarch informs us, among the founders of Rome [k]. As to Hemera, we know nothing of her but what is related by the ſpurious Dictys now extant, whoſe hiſtory deſerves no manner of credit.

Laomedon. Year of the flood, 1724. Before Chriſt 1279.

ON the death of Ilus Laomedon was placed on the throne, his elder brother Tithonus being at that time employed in foreign wars. He built the citadel of Troy, being aſſiſted therein by Apollo and Neptune, that is, he carried on the work with the treaſures that were conſecrated to them and lodged in their temples. Several inundations are ſaid to have happened in his reign, and a plague to have broke out, which carried off great numbers of the inhabitants. Theſe were looked upon as puniſhments inflicted by the gods whoſe temples he had plundered. He treated Jaſon and the other Argonauts, who had landed on the coaſts of Troas, in a very inhoſpitable manner, refuſing to ſupply them with neceſſaries, and even threatening to treat them as enemies, if they did not forthwith return on board their ſhips and quit the country. To revenge this affront, Hercules, who was one of the Argonauts, returned ſome time after with twelve gallies to Troy, which he beſieged, took, and plundered. In this war Laomedon killed Oileus, a commander of great renown, but was himſelf not long after killed by Hercules, whom he had engaged with more courage than caution (N). Laomedon had five ſons. Tithonus, Lampon, Clytus, Icetaon, and Priam; his daughters were Heſione, Cilla, Aſtyoche, Antigone, Proclia, and Euthria. All his ſons, except Priam, were killed in the war with Hercules. As to the daughters, Heſione, as we have ſaid, baing taken by Hercules, was beſtowed in marriage on Telamon, who treated her more like his concubine than wife; which Priam, who had ſucceeded his father, no ſooner underſtood, but he ſent Antenor into Greece to expoſtulate with Telamon, and to demand his ſiſter Heſione. In the council of the princes of Greece this embaſſy was heard with contempt, and the embaſſadors uſed in a manner no ways ſuitable to their character, which gave occaſion, according to ſeveral writers, to the Trojan war. Cilla and Aſtyoche are only named by Apollodorus [i]. Antigone is deſcribed as a woman of a proud, haughty, and inſolent behaviour, which gave riſe to the fable of her contending for beauty with Juno, and being transformed into a ſtork by that incenſed goddeſs [k]. Proclia married Cycnus, by whom ſhe had Tenus and Hemithea [l]. Euthria, being taken by the Greeks and preferring death itſelf to ſlavery, adviſed the Trojan women, who were captives with her on board the Greek fleet, to ſet the enemies ſhips on fire, and thereby revenge the evils which they had brought upon their common country, and prevent thoſe that were reſerved for themſelves

[e] In Dionyſ. [f] In Toxeri. [g] In Atticis. [h] In Æthiop. l. x. c. 5. [i] Juſtin, l. vii. [k] Plutarch in Romulo.

[i] Apollod. l. iii. [k] Servius in l. i. Æneid. [l] Iſaac Tzetzes in Caſſandr. Lycoph. p. 118.

(N) Others tell us, (19) that Apollo and Neptune were hired by Laomedon to build the walls of Troy; and that, upon his refuſing to pay them their wages, Apollo ſent a plague, and Neptune drowned part of the country with inundations. They add, that the oracle adviſed him to expoſe his daughter Heſione to a ſea-monſter, and attone for his crime by ſacrificing his favourite child. She was delivered by Hercules, ſay they, but Laomedon refuſed him the reward which he had promiſed; whereupon Hercules beſieged and took Troy, killed the king, and gave Heſione in marriage to Telamon.

(19) Euſeb. in Chron.

themſelves. Her advice was followed, and the Greeks being gone aſhore near Pallene to take in freſh proviſions, they burned both the fleet and themſelves, which obliged the Greeks to ſettle there [m], having no other ſhips to purſue their voyage. Apollodorus mentions one Bucolion, a natural ſon of Laomedon's by Calybe, who was ſlain with his father and brothers by Hercules. Laomedon reigned, according to ſome, thirty-ſix, according to others, forty-four, years.

LAOMEDON being ſlain by Hercules, as we have ſaid above, Podarces, the only ſurviving ſon, who had been carried away captive with his ſiſter Heſione, was with a great ſum of money ranſomed and placed on the throne of his anceſtors, and hence came the ſirname of Priam, which is derived from a Greek verb ſignifying to redeem or ranſom. His firſt care, after his acceſſion to the throne, was to encompaſs the city of Troy with a ſtrong wall, to prevent ſuch calamities as had happened in his father's reign. There being diſcovered in the beginning of his reign a mine of gold near Abydus, he was thereby enabled to undertake and carry on many public works; for he is ſaid to have embelliſhed the city with ſtately edifices, towers, caſtles, aqueducts, &c. He maintained in conſtant pay a conſiderable army, reduced moſt of the neighbouring ſtates, and was rather conſidered as ſovereign of all Aſia Minor, than king of Troas. He married to his firſt wife Ariſba, or, as others call her, Alyxothoe, by whom he had but one ſon named Æſacus; but by his ſecond wife Hecuba, daughter to Ciſſeus king of Thrace, he had Hector, Alexander or Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponous, Polydorus, and Troilus; and daughters, Creuſa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Caſſandra. Beſides theſe he had many children by concubines, in all to the number of fifty. Some writers ſay, that being abroad when Troy was taken in the reign of his father, he was called home and placed on the throne by Hercules, notwithſtanding ſome of his elder brothers were then alive.

Priam. Year of the flood 1768. Before Chriſt, 1235.

THE name of this king will be ever memorable in hiſtory for the war that happened in his reign between the Greeks and Trojans, a war famous to this day for the many princes of great proweſs and renown that were concerned in it, the battles that were fought, the length of the ſiege, the deſtruction of that great city, and the endleſs

The cauſe of the Trojan war.

[m] Polyænus l. vii.

endleſs colonies that were planted in divers parts of the world by the conquered as well as the conquerors. As to the cauſe of this fatal and deſtructive war, it is agreed on all hands, that the rape of Helen firſt kindled it; but what encouraged Paris to ſuch an attempt, and induced his father Priam to ſtand by him at the expence of ſo much blood, and treaſure is not determined by antient writers. Herodotus [n] gives a very unnatural and far-fetched account of this rape. He ſays, that the Phœnicians having raviſhed Io, the daughter of Inachus king of Argos, and carried her with other Greek women into Egypt, the Greeks, making uſe of repriſals, firſt carried off Europa, the king of Tyre's daughter, and afterwards Medea daughter to the king of Colchos, refuſing to reſtore either till ſuch time as they received due reparation for the rape of Io. Paris, adds Herodotus, in the next ſucceeding age hearing of theſe adventures, was encouraged to raviſh Helen, perſuading himſelf, that he ſhould not be conſtrained to make any reparation, ſeeing others had eſcaped with impunity. But this whole account is quite frivolous and foreign to the purpoſe. For how could the Greeks ever take it in their heads to quarrel with the king of Colchos, or revenge on him an injury done to their nation by the Phœnicians, whom the king of Colchos, in all likelihood, had never ſo much as heard of? Beſides, it is plain from Thucydides, that the diſtinction of Greeks and Barbarians was not introduced even in Homer's time, and conſequently highly improbable, that the Greeks ſo long before, when they had not even one common name to diſtinguiſh themſelves from other nations, ſhould nevertheleſs look upon them all as their enemies by reaſon of an injury done by one. Others ſay, that king Priam, hearing that his ſiſter Heſione was ill-uſed by Telamon, to whom Hercules had given her in marriage, ſent firſt Antenor, and afterwards Paris, to complain thereof, and inſiſt on her being delivered to them. This, they think, has ſome appearance of truth; for Telamon in hiſtory bears the character of a ſurly, cruel, and ill-natured prince, inſomuch, that his own ſon Teucer choſe rather to roam on the ſeas in queſt of a new habitation after the war, than return home, not daring to appear before his father, for no other reaſon, but becauſe his brother Ajax had laid violent hands on himſelf, which it was not in Teucer's power to prevent. Paris, [n] lib. i.

ris, add theſe authors, coming into Greece upon this embaſſy was hoſpitably entertained by Menelaus king of Sparta, who being obliged by his private concerns to paſs over into Crete, his baſe and ungrateful gueſt laid hold on that opportunity to entice away his wife. But neither is this account by any means ſatisfactory; for were it true, that Heſione was ill-uſed by Telamon, yet no body can imagine, that Priam would on that ſcore ſend a ſolemn embaſſy into Greece, or think of taking his ſiſter from her huſband, with whom ſhe had lived above thirty years. Whereupon it is moſt natural to think, that Paris, in raviſhing Helen, never thought of Europa, Medea, or Heſione; but, falling in love with her, as ſhe was the moſt beautiful womam in Greece, was prompted by his own perverſe inclinations to do what in thoſedays was commonly practiſed both by Greeks and Barbarians. Thus Helen herſelf had been ſtolen before by Theſeus, and ſuch practices of ſtealing women were ſo common, as Thucydides [o] informs us, that none durſt venture to live near the ſea-coaſt. The ſame Thycydides [p] tells us, that as Helen was a women of extraordinary beauty, her father Tindareus, after recovering her from Theſeus, to prevent a ſecond rape, obliged all her ſuitors, who were moſt of the princes of Greece, to bind themſelves by a ſolemn oath to reſcue her, in caſe ſhe ſhould be taken from her huſband. This done, he gave his daughter free choice of a huſband, who preferred Menelaus to all the reſt. According to this account, the oath, which ſo many princes had taken to Tyndareus, was what drew them together, and armed them againſt the raviſher and his abettors. To which we may add the great power of Agamemnon, brother to the injured Menelaus, who, as he was by far the moſt potent prince of all Greece, ſo he had, without all doubt, a great influence over the reſt of his countrymen. But be that as it will, war againſt Troy was determined in a general aſſembly of all the princes of Greece, and this was the firſt enterprize the Greeks ever undertook with common conſent. Before the aſſembly broke up, Agamemnon was appointed commander in chief of the whole army; Ægium a city in Peloponneſus was fixed upon for the place of the general rendezvous; and each prince, as Greece was at that time divided into endleſs dynaſties, enjoined to ſend his quota of troops and ſhips.

[o] Thucyd. l i. [p] Idem ibid. p. 6.

THE beſt and moſt rational account we have of this great war is that which we gather from Homer, whoſe inimitable performance ought not to be regarded as a mere fiction, or the reſult of a poetical imagination, but as a rich fund of the moſt antient hiſtory of Greece. The known rules of epic poetry ſuppoſe the truth of the hiſtory, though they admit of its being embelliſhed with poetical fictions. So that if we had no other monuments of antiquity to convince us of the Trojan war, and the taking of that city by the Greeks, yet we could not queſtion the truth of the fact. But moſt of the hiſtorical events related by Homer are atteſted and confirmed by the moſt creditable hiſtorians, and by all the monuments of antiquity, namely, by the Arundelian marbles. We muſt therefore carefully diſtinguiſh in Homer's works what is hiſtorical from what is merely fictitious. He deſcribes the ſtate of Greece at that time, and informs us, that it was cantled out into a great many dynaſties; that Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ, Sicyon, and Corinth, was the moſt powerful prince of all Greece, that he was appointed to command in chief; he enumerates and names the ſeveral nations and princes that ſided with the Trojans; he gives us an inſight into the art of war practiſed in that age; diſcloſes the laws and religion of the Greeks; gives us the character of their leaders; deſcribes the ſituation of their country and cities, &c. all which are purely hiſtorical; ſo that Homer's poems may deſervedly be conſidered as the moſt antient hiſtory of the Greeks, whoſe earlier ages are buried in oblivion for want of ſuch a writer to tranſmit their actions to poſterity (O).

THE number of ſhips employed by the Greeks in this expedition, according to Euripides, Lycophron, and Virgil, amounted to 1000; Homer enumerates 1186; but Thucy-

(O) Dion Chryſoſtome (19), in an oration addreſſed to the Trojans, attempts to prove the ſiege and reduction of Troy by the Greeks to be an errant fable without any foundation of truth. But his performance is generally looked upon only as a witty eſſay, ſince the author elſewhere (20) diſproves what he endeavours to prove here. And truly the ſiege and taking of Troy are tranſactions ſo well atteſted, and have left ſuch a remarkable epocha in hiſtory, that no man of ſenſe can call them in queſtion.

(19) Orat. xi. (20) Περὶ ἀσκήσεως p. 255.

Thucydides [q] raiſes the number to 1200. The Bœotian ſhips, that were the largeſt, carried 120 men each; thoſe of the Philoctetæ were the ſmalleſt, and each manned with 50; every man, the commanders excepted, was both a mariner and a ſoldier; ſo that ſuppoſing the fleet to have been of 1200 ſail, as Thucydides affirms, and the ſhips to have carried one with another 85 men, we ſhall find the Greek army to have been 102,000 men ſtrong, no great force, conſidering, that all the powers of Greece, except the Acarnanes alone [r], were engaged in this war. The Greeks, as Thucydides obſerves, could have raiſed a far more powerful army, but were afraid of being diſtreſſed for proviſions in a foreign country [s]. Againſt this army the city of Troy held out ten years; but the Trojans, as Homer makes Agamemnon ſay, were not the tenth part of the enemies which the Greeks had to contend with; for all Phrygia, Lycia, Myſia, and the greateſt part of Aſia Minor ſided with the Trojans. Rheſus king of Thrace marched at the head of a conſiderable body to their aſſiſtance, and Memnon, as we have ſaid, joined them with 20,000 Perſians and the like number of Æthiopians. Wherefore the Greeks, foreſeeing the reſiſtance they were likely to meet with, and how dear it would coſt them to carry their point by dint of arms, before they began any hoſtilities, ſent Menelaus and Ulyſſes embaſſadors to Troy, to demand Helen and the treaſures which Paris had carried off with her, hoping, that the fame of the vaſt preparations which they had made might frighten the Trojans into a compliance with ſo equitable a demand. What anſwer was returned to the embaſſadors we know not; but 'tis certain, that they returned without Helena, and highly diſſatisfied with their reception at Troy.

Herodotus [t], upon a tradition that prevailed among the prieſts of Egypt, ſeems inclinable to believe, that Helen was taken from Paris before he could reach Troy. The tradition, as Herodotus, who learnt it of the prieſts themſelves, informs us, amounts to this: Paris on his return with Helen was by ſtreſs of weather driven on the coaſt of Egypt, and forced to put in at Tarichia on the Canopean mouth of the Nile. Here ſome ſlaves of Paris's retinue, taking ſanctuary in a temple of Hercules which ſtood on the ſhore, informed againſt their maſter, aggravateing before the governor of the province, by name Thonis, [q] lib. i. p. 8. [r] Juſtin. l. xviii. [s] ubi ſupra. [t] lib. ii.

nis, the injury which he had done to Menelaus. Thonis laid the whole matter before Proteus, at that time king of Egypt, who, finding, upon examination, the depoſition of the ſlaves to be true, detained Helen and the treaſures that had been taken with her, in order to reſtore them to Menelaus; but commanded Paris, after having ſeverely reprimanded him for his crime, to depart the kingdom within the term of three days, on pain of being treated as an enemy. The Egyptian prieſts add, that when the Greeks ſent embaſſadors to demand Helen and her riches, the Trojans proteſted, that they were not in their power, but in the hands of Proteus king of Egypt, which the Greeks looking upon as a mere ſhift to put them off, began the war; but at laſt after taking the town, as Helena no where appeared, and the Trojans perſiſted in their former proteſtations, the Greeks began to believe them, and ſent Menelaus into Egypt, where he was kindly entertained by Proteus, and had his wife reſtored to him without any injury done to her perſon or goods. Theſe things the Egyptian prieſts aſſured Herodotus that they knew for certain, as they had happened in Egypt, and had been handed down to them from thoſe who had converſed with Menelaus himſelf. Herodotus produces one argument of no ſmall weight to prove the truth of this tradition, viz. that if it had been in king Priam's power to reſtore Helen, he would certainly have done it, rather than ſuffer the unſpeakable calamities that befel his family, his kingdom, and himſelf, during the courſe of the war. How great ſoever his tenderneſs to Paris might have been, yet it could not be proof againſt ſo many misfortunes. Homer ſeems not to have been ignorant of the tradition of the Egyptian prieſts, for he mentions Paris and Helen's arrival in Egypt, and ſays, that Menelaus went thither before he returned home to Sparta, which voyage it is not likely he undertook at that time for pleaſure. Nevertheleſs Homer, and with him all the Greek poets (after whom the Latins have copied), except Euripides, ſuppreſs the circumſtance of Helen's not being in Troy, as too favourable to the Trojan cauſe. But whether the Trojans would not, or could not, reſtore her, the embaſſadors on their return highly complained of the treatment they had met with, and with their complaints ſo incenſed their countrymen, that they reſolved without further delay to put to ſea, and carry carry fire and ſword into the enemies country (P). They ſteered to the coaſt of Troas, where on their landing they met with ſo warm a reception, that they began to be ſenſible of the difficulty of the enterprize. In the firſt encounter they loſt Proteſilaus, who was ſlain by Hector, and many others of leſs note. However, they gained ground enough to encamp on. But what moſt of all retarded their progreſs was want of proviſions, which daily increaſed, and was owing partly to their numbers, partly to the ſmallneſs of their veſſels, which, as the building of ſhips with decks was not then introduced, could not carry ſuch ſtores of proviſions as were neceſſary to ſupply the army. Wherefore they were obliged to divide their forces, ſending part of them to cultivate the ground in the Thracian Cherſoneſus, and part to rove about the ſeas for the relief of the camp. All writers, whether poets or hiſtorians, agree, that the Greeks employed the firſt eight or nine years in ſcowering the ſeas, pillaging the coaſts, and reducing ſuch cities and iſlands as ſided with the Trojans. Hence in the poets we read of many towns taken, iſlands plundered, ſtrong-holds razed, and numbers of people carried into captivity by Achilles, whom the army could not well have ſpared, had there been any ſervice of importance to be performed before Troy (Q).

At

(P) Calchas, a famous ſoothſayer, without whoſe advice and approbation nothing was undertaken by the Greeks during the war, declared, that the goddeſs Diana oppoſed their paſſage with contrary winds, and that ſhe was to be appeaſed with a victim of no ſmaller note than Iphigenia daughter to Agememnon. The goddeſs, ſay the poets, was incenſed againſt him for having killed by chance one of her ſtags; but after all, pitying the innocent young virgin, ſhe prevented ſo horrid a ſacrifice by putting a hind in her room. Some writers are of opinion, as we have obſerved elſewhere (21), that the fable of the ſacrifice of Iphigenia had its birth from Jephtha ſacrificing his daughter.

(Q) Ovid ſays, that from the firſt year to the tenth there was no fighting at all; and Herodotus tells us, that the Greeks did not ſit down before Troy till the tenth year, contenting themſelves with laying waſte the enemies country, and blocking up the city. Homer (21) introduces king Priam ſitting on a high tower, and there learning of Helen the names of the Greek commanders

(21) p. 751. O. (21) Iliad. 3.

At laſt the ſeveral ſmall parties, that had been diſperſed up and down the neighbouring countries and iſlands, being joined in one body, and great ſtore of proviſions brought into the camp, they approached the city with a deſign to exert their utmoſt efforts, and put an end to ſo tedious a war. But by this time the Trojans had been reinforced with conſiderable both of mercenaries and allies. Inſomuch, that when the Greeks firſt inveſted the town, Hector attacked them at the head of an army ſcarce inferior to theirs in number. The Greeks had not been long before the city, when a plague broke out in their camp, which Homer ſays was ſent by Apollo, becauſe Agamemnon refuſed to releaſe the daughter of one of his prieſts; but Heraclides on this paſſage informs us, that it was occaſioned by the violent heats, and peſtilentious vapours raiſed by the ſun, the Greeks being encamped among fens and marſhes. The plague was followed by a quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles; for Agamemnon being obliged by the ſoothſayer Calchas to return his fair captive to her father a prieſt of Apollo, to appeaſe that revengeful deity, took Briſeis in her room, who in the diviſion of the booty had fallen to Achilles. This affront Achilles revenged by withdrawing his forces, and retiring with them on board his veſſels. In his abſence ſeveral battles were fought with great ſlaughter on both ſides, the victory generally inclining to the Trojans. In one of theſe Patroclus was ſlain by Hector; but his death was not long unrevenged, for Achilles returning to the camp put the Trojans to flight, and revenged the death of his friend by killing Hector himſelf. Achilles did not long outlive him, being ſlain by Paris. Thus fell many of the chief leaders on both ſides, but the Greeks at laſt carried the city; whether by force, ſtratagem, or treachery is uncertain. All writers agree, that it was taken by night: Some ſay, that Æneas and Antenor, who commanded manders who appeared in the field on the tenth year, for which fiction, allowing it to be ſuch, there would have been no room, had the Greeks been encamped under the walls of Troy for ten years together. The only thing wherein authors differ as to this particular is, that ſome, with Thucydides (22), ſay, that the whole army was employed in ſubduing the Trojan allies; while others, with Herodotus, tells us, that a conſiderable body of troops was encamped the whole time before Troy.

(22) lib. i. p. 9.

manded the Dardanians, ſeeing, that Priam would hearken to no terms even after the death of Hector and Paris, concluded a ſeparate peace with the Greeks, betraying the city into their hands. The poets tell us, that it was taken by the contrivance of a wooden horſe, which fable ſome think to have had its birth from the Greeks entering the city by the Scæan gate, over which was the picture or ſtatue of a horſe. Perhaps they entered the town through a breach made in the wall by ſome wooden engine, called a horſe, and in the nature of that which the Romans in after-ages made uſe of to batter the walls, and from its ſhape called a Ram. Be that as it will, the Greeks, having at laſt maſtered the city, practiſed all the cruelties and abominations which a cruel, hungry, and enraged enemy can be guilty of. The city was laid in aſhes, and ſuch of the inhabitants as had not time to ſave themſelves by flight, were either put to the ſword without diſtinction of ſex or age, or carried by the conqueror into captivity. And thus ended the kingdom of Troy, after having ſtood, from Teucer to Priam, 296 years, according to the moſt exact computations. The city was taken the 24th day of the month Thargelion, or April, 1184 years before Chriſt. Troy taken. Year of the flood, 1810. Before Chriſt, 1184.

THE Greeks, having at laſt put an end to the war, divided the booty, and put to ſea in order to return to their reſpective homes, but met with many adventures, many of them being driven on far diſtant coaſts. Meneſtheus king of Athens died at Melos. Teucer the ſon of Telamon ſettled in Cyprus, where he built a city calling it Salamis, from the chief city of his own country, which bore that name. Agapenor, who commanded the Arcadians, built in the ſame iſland the city of Paphos. Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles ſettled in Epirus, and there built Ephyra. Ajax the ſon of Oileus was loſt. Some of the Locrians were driven on the coaſts of Afric, others to Italy, whereof all the eaſt part was called Magna Græcia, by reaſon of the many towns built there by the Greeks. Many, who got ſafe home, were obliged to put to ſea again, as Thucydides informs us [u], in queſt of new ſeats, others having ſeized their territories, and uſurped the ſovereignty, during their abſence. Agamemnon and his brother Menelaus fell out when they were upon the point of weighing anchor to return home, and their quarrel divided the whole fleet, ſome ſailing with Menelaus to the iſland of Tenedos, and others remaining with Agamemnon on the coaſt of Troas.

[u] lib. i.

Troas. Thoſe, who followed Menelaus, not agreeing among themſelves, parted, each holding his own courſe homewards. Agamemnon arrived ſafe at Mycenæ, where he was ſoon after his arrival murdered by his wife Clytemneſtra; but his ſon Oreſtes revenged his death by the murder of Clytemneſtra, of Ægiſthus her gallant, and of Helen their daughter; for which murders he was tried and acquitted by the Areopagus. The adventures of Ulyſſes are related by Homer in a fabulous manner; but what may have ſome foundation in hiſtory is, that ſome years paſſed before he got home. The adventures of the other Greeks are leſs known; but upon the whole it appears, that this war proved no leſs fatal to the conquerors than to the conquered.

As for the Trojans, thoſe who eſcaped the general ſlaughter, ſeeing their country utterly ruined, took their meaſures accordingly, and ſettled in diſtant regions. Antenor, as we have ſaid already, eſtabliſhed himſelf in Italy, and founded the nation of the Heneti. Helenus, one of Priam's ſons ſettled in Macedonia, where he built the city of Ilium. Some ſay, that during the ſiege he went over to the Greeks, and ſhewed them in what manner they might eaſily maſter the city.

As to Æneas, all the Roman writers aſſure us, that he ſettled in Italy and there founded the kingdom of Alba. From him the Cæſars affected to derive their pedigree, as the other Romans did theirs from the Trojans who accompanied him. Livy alone ſeems to betray ſome ſort of doubt as to this particular, inſinuating, with a great deal of reſerve, that, he has not ſufficient grounds either to admit or reject the common opinion. But, notwithſtanding the unanimous conſent of the Latins, there are not wanting arguments of great weight, which the learned Bochart [w] has carefully collected, to evince the arrival of Æneas in Italy to be a mere fable (R).

The

[w] Bochart. epiſt. num Æneas unquam fuit in Italia.

(R) In the firſt place this opinion is directly oppoſite to that of Homer (23), who ſuppoſes Æneas to have remained in Phrygia; for he introduces Neptune, whom he repreſents favourable to Æneas on all occaſions, and averſe from Priam and his whole race,

(23) Iliad, 20.

THE city of Troy being utterly ruined, and moſt of the inhabitants of Troas put to the ſword, ſome writers tell us, that the neighbouring Phrygians and Lydians, poſſeſſing themſelves of that country, ſettled there, and that Troas from that time began to be called Phrygia; others race, aſſuring him, that he and his poſterity ſhould reign over the Trojans, which the poet would never have done, had he not known that Æneas and his poſterity had reigned, or were actually reigning in his time. It is the cuſtom of poets to introduce their deities or prophets telling before-hand, that ſuch thing will happen as the poets knows to have already happened; but no poet ever-made them utter ſuch things as he knew neither did nor could happen, which would be Homer's caſe if Æneas had not reigned in Phrygia. To this argument ſome anſwer, that Æneas, after ſettling a colony in Italy, returned to Phrygia and reigned over the few Phrygians that outlived the deſtruction of their country. As this anſwer has no manner of foundation in hiſtory, it is ſcarce worth refuting. Dionyſius Halicarneſſenſis (24) is of opinion, that Neptune, or rather Homer, meant only, that Æneas was to reign over ſuch Phrygians as accompanied him, or over a Phrygian colony. But this is no more than what happened to Antenor, Aceſtes, Capys, Helenus, and others; whereas the poet's intent is to make Neptune diſtinguiſh Æneas from the other Phrygians by ſome particular marks of his favour. Beſides, the words of Venus in the hymn which is generally aſcribed to Homer ἐν Τρώεσθιν ἀνάξει are capable of no other ſenſe, but that Æneas ſhall reign in the country of the Trojans; and in this ſenſe they are underſtood by Strabo (25), who tells us in expreſs terms, that Æneas remained in the country of the Trojans, that the family of Priam being extinct, the crown fell to him, and was by him tranſmitted to his poſterity. Euſtathias thinks (26), that when Homer introduces Neptune promiſing to Æneas, that he and his poſterity ſhould reign over the Trojans, the poet by the Trojans meant the Romans, and becauſe it might be objected, that Homer could have no knowledge of the Romans, being dead long before the foundation of Rome, he adds, that Homer had either ſeen the oracles of the Sibyls, which derive the Roman princes from Æneas, or had himſelf foreſeen, as moſt poets are endowed with the gift of prophecy, that the Romans were to deſcend from Æneas and be maſters of the world. But as to the books of the Sibyls, Homer certainly never did, nor could, ſee them; for they were forged, as ſeveral writers have demonſtrated, above a thouſand years after Homer's time; and as to the ſpirit of prophecy, which Euſtathius is pleaſed to beſtow upon poets, every one ſees that it has not the leaſt appearance of truth. To the authority of Homer we may others are of opinion, that Æneas, having gathered together the scattered remains of the Trojans, rebuilt the city, and that his descendants and the descendants of Hector reigned there, till the country was subdued by the Lydians, who became so powerful as to over-run all Asia Minor. If the Trojans had any kings of their own after their city was destroyed by the Greeks, they must needs have made but a very indifferent figure, since they are not so much as named in history.

(24) lib. i. (25) lib. xiii. (26) In Iliad.

CHAP.

may add that of Agathocles Cyzicensis, quoted by Festus (27), who cites many authors affirming Æneas to have been buried in the city of Berecynthia by the river Nolos (or, as others read, Gallus) not far from Troy. Stephanus informs us, that the city of Ascania in Phrygia was built by Ascanius the son of Æneas, wherein he agrees with Nicolaus Damascenus. Mela tells us, that the city of Antandrus was so called, because Ascanius who reigned there, being taken by the Pelasgi, yielded this city to them for his ransom. Hellanicus in his Troica makes Æneas fly into Thrace, and from thence to Pallene; but as to Ascanius, he says, that he remained in Troas and reigned there. Strabo assures us, that the city of Scepsis, in former times situate near Troy, was removed from thence sixty furlongs by Scamander the son of Hector and Ascanius the son of Æneas; and adds, that these two families reigned for many years in that city; and that the monarchical form of government being first changed into an oligarchy, and afterwards into a democracy, nevertheless such as were descended from these two families were still honoured with the title of kings. To these authorities Bochart (28) adds two arguments of no small weight, namely, that the chief deities of the antient Trojans, viz. Venus, Apollo, Cybele, &c. were for a long time quite unknown to the Romans, and that there is not the least similitude imaginable between the antient Phrygian and Roman language, which he proves by producing the few Phrygian words that have been transmitted to us. This, however, is no exception to Virgil's divine and inimitable Æneid; for he advances nothing but what was vouched by all the historians, orators, antiquaries, critics, and poets, who had flourished before him. Neither is it the duty of a poet to contradict an opinion which a whole nation holds for indubitable.

(27) Festus vote Roma. (28) ubi spura.

CHAP. XIV.

The Hiſtory of the Myſians.

SECT. II.

The deſcription of the country, the manners, cuſtoms, religion, &c. of the inhabitants.

THE ſmall country before us is thought to have borrowed its name from the Lydian word Myſos ſignifying a beech-tree, becauſe that tree remarkably abounded here. It was divided into the Greater and Leſſer Myſia. Myſia Minor or the Leſſer Myſia lay on the Propontis, and from thence extended to mount Olympus, being bounded by Bithynia and the Propontis on the north and weſt, by Phrygia Minor on the ſouth, and by Phrygia Major on the eaſt. Myſia Major or the Greater Myſia was bounded on the north by Phrygia Minor, on the ſouth by Æolia, on the eaſt by Phrygia Major, and on the weſt by the Ægean ſea. What Strabo, whom we have followed, calls Myſia Minor, Ptolemy calls Myſia Major; the former is alſo named Olympena from mount Olympus, and Helleſpontiaca becauſe ſome towns antiently belonging to it were ſeated on the Helleſpont. That part of Myſia which lay between Ancyra of Phrygia and the river Rhindacus is called by Strabo Abrettana, and the remaining part Morena. The former denomination is often given to all Myſia.

In that part of Myſia Minor which lay on the Propontis were the following cities: Cyzicus or Cyzicum ſeated in an iſland of the Propontis bearing the ſame name, but joined to the continent with two bridges by Alexander the Great. It borrowed its name from Cyzicus king of that iſland and the adjacent continent, who is ſaid to have been killed through miſtake by Jaſon the Argonaut. This city, when first known to the Romans, was one of the greatest and richest of all Asia, and hence was stiled by Florus the Rome of Asia, and celebrated by him and all the other Latin writers for its walls, bulwarks, haven, marble towers, &c [x]. Among its many magnificent buildings the chief temple is mightily cried up by the antients; the whole structure was of polished marble, and the joinings all covered with lines of gold; the pillars were four cubits thick and fifty high, each of one piece. The statue of Jupiter, which stood in the temple, was of ivory, and most exquisite workmanship [y]. In after-ages this city made a glorious stand against Mithridates, who lost under its walls no fewer than 300,0000 men, and after all could not conquer it. However, the antient inhabitants of this city and island were generally deemed a cowardly and effeminate race; insomuch, that when any one behaved himself in an unmanly manner, or through fear did what was unbecoming, he was contemptuously called a Cyzican [z]. Tully [a] represents those of his time as a quiet and inoffensive sort of people, enemies to plots or tumults, averse from war, and of a turn to enjoy the sweets of peace, whatever they cost. The current coin of this island, called Stater and weighing eighteen drams, was engraved with such nicety, exactness, and skill, that they were looked upon in those days as a miracle of art (S). The inhabitants pretended to a very great antiquity, and believed, that their city had been given by Jupiter to Proserpine for her dowry, and on that account worshipped her as their chief deity. As for the beauty, greatness, riches, and laws of this city, we refer our reader to Appian [b]. It was ruined by an earthquake, and the fallen marbles and pillars were conveyed [x] Florus, lib. iii. c. v. [y] Xiphilinus in Dione. Plin. l. xxxvi. c. 15. [z] Hesychius. Erasm. Chiliad. [a] Act. iii. in Ver.

(S) This gave birth to the Greek proverb Κυζικηνοὶ σατῆρες an expression used in commending any eminent performance in the art of engraving; as if the Cyzician stateres were the utmost effort of that art. This coin represented on one side Cybele the great mother of the gods, and a lion on the other, which has made some imagine the above mentioned proverb to be a taunt on those who talk big and affect to appear like lions, though they be in effect as timid and fearful as women (29).

(29) Erasm. Chiliad.

veyed to Conſtantinople to embelliſh that city. Under the Romans it was the metropolis of the Conſular Helleſpont, but is at preſent little better than a village, and known under the names of Chizico, Spiga, and Palormi.

PARIUM, ſo called, as ſome writers inform us, from Parus the ſon of Jaſon. Some think, that Archilochus, the famous writer of Iambics, was a native of this place. In this city was a naked Cupid much celebrated by the antients, and deemed no ways inferior to the famous Venus of Cnidos. In the neighbourhood of this city lived the Ophiogenes mentioned by Pliny [c], who are ſaid to have had the gift of curing the bitings of ſerpents with their touch. Not far from hence ſtood a ſtately temple of Apollo Actæus and Diana, which being demoliſhed, the ruins were employed to build an altar at Parium, which was looked upon as one of the miracles of Aſia. The antient Parians were a colony of Mileſians, and the more modern of the Romans, who in all this province had but two colonies, namely Parium and Troas. Homer makes Parium and Adraſta one and the ſame city; but Strabo diſtinguiſhes them. Parium is now reduced to a village, but retains its antient name.

LAMPSACUS or Lampſacum was ſeated at the entrance of the Propontis over-againſt Callipolis in the Thracian Cherſoneſe. It was built, according to ſome, by the Phocenſes, according to others by Priapus, who was a native of this city and the moſt infamous of all the heathen deities. This city, as we are told, borrowed its name from a young woman named Lampſaces. It had a capacious and ſafe harbour and a noble temple conſecrated to Cybele. It was in antient times famous for its wine, and on that conſideration given by Artaxerxes to Themiſtocles in his exile. Alexander the Great conceived ſuch an averſion to this city for the lewdneſs and vices of the inhabitants, that he reſolved to lay it in aſhes; which the inhabitants having timely notice of, diſpatched deputies to intercede for mercy, and avert if poſſible their impending doom. They no ſooner appeared before Alexander, but the incenſed monarch, to redeem himſelf from their importunity, ſolemnly vowed that he would deny their requeſt. Whereupon Anaximenes, who was at the head of that embaſſy, addreſſed the king thus: Moſt juſt and powerful monarch, the inhabitants of Lampſacus, having been ſo unhappy as to incur your royal diſpleaſure, and deſiring to atone for the enormous crimes that could provoke the wrath of ſo merciful a prince, have ſent us to beg, that you would utterly deſtroy their unfortunate city, a puniſhment richly deſerved by thoſe who could provoke your diſpleaſure. This unexpected requeſt, and the vow which Alexander, being bent on its deſtruction, had made to reject the deputies petition, was its preſervation. Priapus was worſhipped here in a particular manner, and his temple was a perfect ſink of lewdneſs, a very ſchool of the moſt unnatural luſts. Tully [c] repreſents the inhabitants of Lampſacus as a quiet and indolent ſort of people, and more fit to reliſh the eaſe of peace, than ſuffer the toils of war. This city is ſtill in a tolerable good condition, ſituated in a pleaſant plain, and ſurrounded with vineyards, which are fenced in with pomegranate-trees, and produce excellent wine. The Greeks call it Lampſaco, and the Turks Lepſeck. Theſe were the chief cities of Myſia Minor ſeated on the coaſt.

[b] Appian. in Mithridatico. [c] lib. vii. c. 2.

We will not take on us to mark out the bounds of the midland Myſia, which, according to Strabo, lay between the river Rhyndacus and mount Ida. Here Stephanus places the city of Apollonia on the banks of the Rhyndacus, which riſes from a lake bearing the name of the city. This lake, called now the lake of Abouillona, is five-and-twenty miles in compaſs, and eight miles wide, being interſperſed with ſeveral iſlands and peninſulas, whereof the largeſt, which is three miles in circuit, is called Abouillona. As the village ſituate in this iſland bears the ſame name, ſome modern travellers [d] take it be the antient city of Apollonia (U), which was once a city of great note, and maintained its its antient luſtre to the reign of the emperor Alexis Comnenus, when it was taken and pillaged by the Turks, as his daughter Anna Commena informs us. Apollo was undoubtedly the chief deity of this city, for beſides that it bore his name, he is repreſented on the reverſe of ſeveral medals of this city [c].

[c] Act. c. iii. in Verr. [d] Tournefort voyag. au Levant, &c.

(U) Vaillant, who viſited thoſe places, deſcribes Apollonia as ſeated on the top of a hill, at the foot of which runs the Rhyndacus; but this learned traveller miſtook the city of Lopadi, or as the Turks call it, Ulubat, for the antient Apollonia, not being aware, that the inhabitants of Apollonia for the conveniency of their commerce removed from Apollonia to Lopadi, giving the name of the city they had forſaken to this their new habitation; it being manifeſt from Anna Comnena, that in her time Lopadi bore alſo the name of Apollonia.

THE chief rivers of Myſia Minor are the Rhyndacus and the Granicus. The Rhyndacus, called by Pliny Lycus, and by the moderns Lartacho, has it ſource in the lake of Apollonia, or Artynia, as Pliny names it, and falls into the Propontis near Cyzicus. This river is memorable in the Roman hiſtory for the overthrow of Mithridates, who, deſigning to ſurprize Lucullus, was himſelf ſurprized by that great commander, and his army cut to pieces on the banks of this river. The Granicus riſes on mount Ida, and diſcharges itſelf into the Propontis between Parium and Cyzicus. This river Alexander croſſed at the head of 30000 Macedonians in face of the Perſian army 600000 ſtrong. Travellers obſerve, that its banks are very high and ſteep on the weſt ſide; ſo that the forces of Darius had a conſiderable advantage, had they known how to uſe it. This river at preſent is called the Souſoughirli, which is the name of a village it waters (W).

IN this part of Myſia ſtands mount Olympus, called by the antients Olympus Myſiorum to diſtinguiſh it from ſeveral other mountains of the ſame name. It is one of the higheſt mountains in Aſia, and great part of the year covered with ſnow.

THE city of greateſt note in Myſia Major was Pergamus, ſeated in a ſpacious plain on the banks of the Caicus. It was the royal ſeat of the Attalic kings and of Eumenes, and enriched with a library containing 200,000 choice volumes, for the tranſcribing of which parchment was here firſt invented, and thence called by the Latins Charta Pergamena. Ptolemy king of Egypt gave occaſion to this uſeful contrivance by prohibiting the exportation of the Egyptian papyrus, in order to defeat the deſign of [c] Tournefort ubi ſupra.

(W) Spon miſtakes the Fourtiſſar, as it is now called, for the Granicus. The Fourtiſſar is a ſmall brook riſing on mount Timinus, which ſome, thro' miſtake, think to be the Caicus of the antients.

Eumenes king of Pergamus, which was to cauſe all the valuable books then extant to be carefully tranſcribed, and by that means make a collection that might vie with Ptolemy's famous library at Alexandria. In Pergamus were likewiſe invented thoſe coſtly hangings which we call Tapeſtry, and the Romans named Aulæa from Aula ſignifying a hall, becauſe the hall of Attalus, who invented them, was the firſt room adorned with this furniture. Galen the famous phyſician was born in this city. Here Æſculapius is ſaid to have practiſed phyſic. We muſt not forget that Pergamus was one of the ſeven churches mentioned in the Revelations. It is now an inconſiderable place, and thinly inhabited. There are ſtill to be ſeen in the neighbouring fields the ruins of the palace of the Attalic kings, of an aqueduct, and a theatre.

On the coaſts of the Greater Myſia were ſeated the following cities, Antandrus, Scepſis, Aſſus, Aramyttium, Pitane, &c.

Soil and Climate.

The ſoil of this country is one of the fineſt and richeſt of Aſia, and as ſuch celebrated by the antients [f]. It chiefly abounded in corn and wine, was well ſtocked with cattle, and had a great many large plains proper for paſturing them. It was plentifully watered with ſmall rivers running down from mount Ida and mount Olympus. In ſhort, the Myſians, as Philoſtratus informs us, with reſpect to their country, were the happieſt of all the Aſiatics.

Origin.

As to the origin of the Myſians, Herodotus [g] informs us, that they were Lydians by deſcent. According to his account, Manes, the firſt king of Lydia, was father to Cotys, and Cotys to Atys, who had three ſons, Lydus, Myſus, and Cares. From Lydus the Lydians, formerly called Mæones from Mæon the father of Cybele, borrowed their name. Myſus and Cares planted Lydian colonies in the neighbouring countries, which from them were named Myſia and Caria. Others derive them from the Phrygians, and tell us that Myſus, was not a Lydian but a Phrygian. Strabo derives the Aſiatic Myſians from thoſe of Europe, inhabiting that tract which lies between mount Hermus and the Danube, and is now known under the names of Boſnia, Servia, and Bulgaria. There are divers other opinions touching the origin of this people ple, which it would be of no uſe to relate, as they are moſtly founded on diſtorted and far-fetched etymologies.

[f] Virg. Georg. l. i. verſ. 103. [g] lib. i. & vii.

Character. As to the character of the antient Myſians, it muſt be conſidered at different times; for they ſeem to have been once a warlike people. Herodotus [h] and Pliny [i] ſpeak of a very powerful army of Myſians and Trojans, which before the Trojan war, paſſing over the Boſphorus into Europe, ſubdued all Thrace, and advancing to the Ionian ſea penetrated as far as the river Peneus. But in after-ages they degenerated from the valour of their anceſtors, ſo as to be looked upon as the moſt contemptible and inſignificant nation on the earth; inſomuch, that the Greeks [k] had no expreſſion to ſignify more emphatically a perſon of no worth or merit, than to call him the laſt of the Myſians. They were prone to tears, and on that account employed by the Greeks [l] to attend their funerals, and lament over the deceaſed. Their language was in all likelihood the ſame as the Phrygian and Trojan, with ſome variation of dialect. As to their manners, cuſtoms, arts, and ſciences we are quite in the dark. Their trade we can only gueſs at from their ſituation and wealth; for Philoſtratus informs us, that in antient times they were the moſt wealthy nation of all Aſia.

Religion. THEIR religion was much the ſame with that of the neighbouring Phrygians, whom they did not fall ſhort of in ſuperſtition. They worſhipped the ſame deities, and uſed the ſame religious ceremonies, which has made ſome believe them to be originally Phrygians. Cybele had a ſtately and rich temple at Cyzicus, and Apollo Actæus near Parium. Nemeſis alſo is numbered among their deities, and was worſhipped in a magnificent temple built by king Adraſtus not far from the city of Parium, whence both the country and the goddeſs were named Adraſtia. Priapus was worſhipped by the more modern Myſians, but unknown to them even in Heſiod's time. The Myſian prieſts abſtained from fleſh, and were not allowed to marry. It was a ceremony practiſed among them to ſacrifice a horſe, and eat his entrails, before they were admitted to the prieſthood.

Their Hiſtory. CONCERNING their government, thus much appears, that it was monarchical. We find no mention made of their kings till the Argonautic expedition; but authors are of of opinion, that they had kings long before that time. Diodorus [m] tells us, that they lived in subjection to Ninus, by whom they had been conquered, and to the Assyrian kings that succeeded him. After the destruction of Troy and dispersion of the Trojans, the Mysians possessed themselves of great part of that country, which they held till they were conquered by Crœsus king of Lydia.

[h] lib. vii. [i] lib. vii. c. 6. [k] Strab. l. xii. Cic. pro. Flacco. [l] Æſchyl. in Perſis. Eraſm. Chiliad.

Olympus. THE first king of Mysia, we find mentioned is called Olympus: He is said to have married Nipæa the daughter of Jasius or Jasion, brother to Dardanus king of Troy [u].

Teuthras. TEUTHRAS appears next; it is uncertain whom he succeeded; he is said to have reigned over the Mysians, Cilicians, and Ceteans [o]. He married Auge daughter to Aleus the king of Arcadia's son [p]. As he had no issue-male, he gave his daughter Agriope, whom he had by his first wife, in marriage to Telephus his second wife's son by Hercules [q] (X). He built a city calling it Teuthrania, which name became common to the country where the new city stood, and in process of time to all Mysia [r]. He had another daughter by name Tecmessa, who, in the division of the booty, which the Greeks had got in plundering Mysia, fell to Ajax the son of Telamon.

Telephus. TEUTHRAS was succeeded by Telephus a natural son of Hercules by Auge. Telephus, being exposed by his grand-father's order on mount Parthenius, was nursed there by a hind till he was found by the shepherds of one Corythus, who brought him up as his own child. Being desirous, when he was grown up, to find out his mother, he

[m] lib. ii. cap. 1. [u] Scholiast. Apoll. p. 155. [o] Strab. l. xiii. [p] Diodor. l. iv. c. 3. [q] Strab. l. xiii. [r] Pindar. in Olymp.

(X) Euripides, quoted by Strabo (30), informs us, that Telephus was a natural son of Hercules by Auge; and adds, that her father Aleus caused both her and her child to be locked up in a chest and thrown into the sea; that the chest was by the provident care of Pallas guided to the mouth of the river Caicus, and that Teuthras, who at that time reigned there, falling in love with Auge, married her, and, as he had no children of his own, adopted her son Telephus, declaring him his heir and successor to the crown.

(30) Strab. l. xiii.

he was directed by an oracle to steer his course towards Mysia, where he was received with incredible joy, not by his mother only, but also by king Teuthras her husband, who, being taken with this extraordinary youth, bestowed his daughter on him and appointed him his heir. In the Trojan war he first sided with king Priam, and was dangerously wounded by Achilles; but was afterwards prevailed upon by the Greeks to stand neuter [s]. Pausanias and Aristides tell us, that he planted a colony of Arcadians in the neighbourhood of Pergamus. Jornandes [t] makes him king of the Goths, wherein he confounds the European with the Asiatic Mysians; for those of Europe, whom Pliny calls Mæsians, are thought to be descended from the Mysians of Asia. Telephus had two sons, Eurypylus and Latinus: Eurypylus, according to some [u], was killed in the Trojan war, according to others succeeded his father, or reigned over the Cilicians [w]. Latinus is said to have led a colony of Ceteans into Italy [x].

EURYPYLUS left one son by name Arius, who succeeded his father or grand-father, and was slain in a single combat by Amphialus the son of Neoptolemus, who possessed himself of the kingdom of Mysia [y]. We read of no other kings of Mysia till many ages after, when the Attalic family reigned at Pergamus, which we shall speak of in its proper place. Arius.

[s] Diodor. lib. iv. Strab. l. xiii. Apollodor. Stephan. &c. [t] De rebus Geticis. [u] Calaber. l. vi, vii, viii Hyginus fab. 113. [w] Strab. l. xiii. [x] Cedrenus. p. 115. [y] Pausanias in Atticis.

CHAP.

CHAP. XV.

The Hiſtory of the Lydians.

SECT. I.

The deſcription of Lydia.

Name. WHENCE this country borrowed the name of Lydia is not determined. Some, led by the affinity of words, derive it from Lud, Shem's fourth ſon, whom they pretend to have ſettled here. But this opinion we ſhall examine, when we come to enquire into the origin of the Lydians. All the antient writers tell us, that Lydia was firſt called Mæonia or Meonia from Meon king of Phrygia and Lydia, and that it was known under no other name till the reign of Atys, when it began to be called Lydia from his ſon Lydus. Bochart [z], finding in his learned collection of Phœnician words the verb Lud ſignifying to wind, and obſerving that the country we are ſpeaking of is watered by the Mæander ſo famous for its windings, concludes, that it was thence named Lydia or Ludia. As to Meon and Lydus, he rids himſelf of them at once, by denying that there were ever any ſuch perſons. To ſupport this opinion, he endeavours to prove, that the Phœnicians, and after them Moſes, who, in the deſcription of countries made uſe of their terms, gave the name of Lud not only to Lydia on the banks of the Mæander, but likewiſe to Ethiopia, where the Nile, as Herodotus obſerves [a], has as many turnings and windings as the Mæander itſelf. Now as theſe two countries, lying on the two moſt winding rivers that were then known, were named Lud, which word ſignifies to bend or wind, who can doubt, ſays he, but they had their common denomination from the rivers which watered them? As to the antient name of Mæonia, he takes it to be a Greek tranſlation of the Phœnician word Lud, wherein he agrees, in ſome meaſure, with Stephanus, [z] Phaleg. l. ii. c. 12. [a] lib. ii. c. 29.

phanus, who derives the name of Mæonia from Mæon the antient name of the Mæander. Some take the word Mæonia to be a tranſlation of a Hebrew word ſignifying metal, becauſe that country, ſay they, was in former times enriched above any other with mines.

THOUGH Lydia and Mæonia are by moſt authors indifferently uſed for one and the ſame country, yet they are ſometimes diſtinguiſhed, that part, where mount Tmolus ſtood and which was watered by the Pactolus, being properly called Mæonia, and the other, lying on the coaſt, Lydia. This diſtinction is uſed, as Spanhemius obſerves [b], by Homer, Callimachus, Dionyſius, and other antient writers. In after ages, when the Ionians, who planted a colony on the coaſt of the Ægean ſea, began to make ſome figure, that part was called Ionia, and the name of Lydia given to the antient Mæonia.

LYDIA, according to Pliny [c], Ptolemy, and other antient geographers, was bounded by Myſia Major on the north, by Caria on the ſouth, by Phrygia Major on the eaſt, and Ionia on the weſt, lying between the 37th and 39th degrees of north latitude. What the antients ſtile the kingdom of Lydia was not confined within theſe narrow boundaries, chiefly under the later kings, but extended from the river Halys to the Ægean ſea. Pliny's deſcription includes Æolia, lying between the Hermus and the Caicus, but that tract we ſhall conſider apart.

THE chief cities of Lydia were Sardis, the metropolis of that kingdom and the ſeat of king Crœſus. This city ſtood on the banks of the Pactolus at the foot of mount Tmolus. The Perſians thought Sardis of ſuch conſequence after it fell into their hands, that Xerxes, hearing it was taken by the Greeks, commanded one of his attendants to cry aloud every day while he was at dinner; The Greeks have taken Sardis; which was continued till he recovered the city. It was utterly ruined by an earthquake and rebuilt by Tiberius. There are ſtill to be ſeen the ruins of a large palace and two magnificent churches with a great many pillars and cornices of marble. Not far from Sardis ſtands a village of the ſame name, which ſome take to be that Sardis which is mentioned in the Revelations, and was one of the ſeven churches. Near this city was to be ſeen in Herodotus's time [d] the ſepulcre of Alyattes father to Crœſus, ſtructure whereof the foundation was of ſtone but the whole ſuperſtructure of earth, being ſix furlongs and 200 foot in circumference, and a thouſand three hundred foot in breadth.

[b] Ad Callimachi hymnum in Delum, verſ. 250. [c] lib. v. c. 29. [d] Herodot. l. i.

PHILADELPHIA, formerly the ſecond city of Lydia, and ſo called from Attalus Philadelphus brother to Eumenes, ſtood in a ſpacious and fruitful plain on the north ſide of mount Tmolus. In this city were antiently celebrated the common feaſts of all Aſia, as appears from an inſcription quoted by Spon [e]. It was one of the ſeven churches, and continued to make a good figure under the Greek emperors. It was the laſt in Aſia Minor that ſubmitted to the Turks, and that upon very honourable terms after ſix years ſiege. Among the Greeks it retains its antient name, but is known to the Turks by the name of Allachſheyer. Part of the antient walls is ſtill remaining, with the ruins of an amphitheatre, and ſome ſepulchres, whence the bodies, according to an antient tradition among the inhabitants, were tranſported by the Chriſtians into Europe.

THYATIRA, a colony of the Macedonians, as Strabo informs us, was ſituate in a pleaſant plain not far from the river Hermus. This city was another of the ſeven churches, and its preſent ruins teſtify its former grandeur. The Greeks call it Thyra, and the Turks Akhiſar. It is a place of ſome trade for corn and cotton, and inhabited by about 5000 Turks.

MAGNESIA, by the Turks called Guzethiſar, ſeated on the Mæander, was formerly a city of great note, as the ruins of many ſtately buildings demonſtrate. Here Themiſtocles died, this being one of the three towns that Xerxes allotted to him for his ſubſiſtence during his exile. It is ſtill a large, handſome, and well-built city. Another city of the ſame name ſtood at the foot of mount Sypilus on a riſing ground, whence it commanded a very large and beautiful plain, famous in hiſtory for many battles fought there, but eſpecially for that between Antiochus and the Romans under the command of Scipio, which decided the fate of Aſia. This city was for ſome time the ſeat of the Ottoman empire, and is ſtill the capital of Caraſia.

MOUNT Sypilus is the only one in Lydia of any note. The goddeſs Sypilene took her name from this mountain; or rather Cybele was called Sypilene, becauſe ſhe was worſhipped in a particular manner on mount Sylipus. And [e] Voyage d'Italy, &c.

And hence on the reverse of almost all the antient medals of Magnesia this goddess is represented, sometimes on the frontispiece of a temple with four pillars, and sometimes in a chariot. Plutarch informs us, that mount Sypilus was likewise named the Thunder Mountain, because it thundered more frequently there than on any other mountain of Asia; and hence we find on the reverse of several medals stamped at Magnesia Jupiter armed with thunder-bolts. Mount Tmolus, and in more antient t me Timolus, was once very famous for its wine and saffron.

THE rivers of this country, that we shall take notice of are the Pactolus, which rushing from mount Tmolus waters the city of Sardis, and then discharges itself into the Hermus or Sarabat. It was called by the antients Chrysorhoas, from the colour of its sands which shine like gold. The Cayster, celebrated by the poets for the swans that frequented its banks, has its source in Phrygia Major, baths Lydia, and empties itself into the Ægean sea near Ephesus. It has almost as many windings, if Spon is to be believed, as the Mæander itself, but neither have near so many, according to Tournefort, as the Seine, beneath Paris.

Origin and Antiquity.

As to the origin of the Lydians, Josephus and after him all the ecclesiastic writers derive them from Lud, Shem's fourth son. As this opinion has no other foundation but the similitude of names, there is a strong objection against it, viz. that the Lydians were first called Mæones, as all the antients agree, and Lydians from Lydus the son of Atys, except we suppose the Greeks were deceived, and that, the name of Mæones ceasing, they resumed their old name of Lydians, which often has happened. But even in that case, we ought perhaps to consider Lydia as possessed by the Ludim, or posterity of Lud, on a second or third remove, for we see no more reason than Sir Water Releigh [f], why Lud should straggle so far from his friends as Lidya, according to what we have said elsewhere [g]. Some of the antients will have the Lydians to be a mixt colony of Phrygians, Mysians, and Carians. Others, finding some conformity in religion and religious ceremonies between the Egyptians and Tuscans who were a Lydian colony, conclude them, without any further evidence, to be originally Egyptians. The very similitude of names, which on like occasions is generally ready ready at hand to help out at a dead lift, fails here; which has obliged ſome writers to take up arrant fables not worth relating. All we know for certain is, that the Lydians were a very antient nation, as is manifeſt from their very fables, for Attis, Tantalus, Pelops, Niobe, and Arachne, are all ſaid to have been the children of Lydus. And Xanthus in his Lydiaca, quoted by Stephanus, informs us, that the antient city of Aſcalon, one of the five ſatrapies of the Philiſtines mentioned in the books of Joſhua and the Judges, was built by one Aſcalus a Lydian, whom Alciamus king of Lydia had appointed to command a body of troops which he ſent, we know not on what occaſion, into Syria. The Heraclidæ, or kings of Lydia deſcended from Hercules, began to reign before the Trojan war, and had been preceded by a long ſeries of kings ſprung from Atys, and hence ſtiled Atyadæ, which is a ſtrong proof of the antiquity of that kingdom.

[f] Book I. cap. viii. sect. 15. [g] Vol. i. p. 464.

The Lydians began very early to be ruled by kings, whoſe government, ſo far as we can gather from their conduct, ſeems to have been truly deſpotic, and the crown hereditary. We read of three diſtinct races of kings reigning over Lydia, viz. the Atyadæ, the Heraclidæ, and the Mermnadæ. The Atyadæ were ſo called from Atys, the ſon of Cotys and grandſon of Manes. Manes, the ſon of Jupiter and Tellus and firſt king of Mæonia, had by Callirhoa, the daughter of Oceanus, one ſon by name Cotys; Cotys, by Halia the daughter of Tullus, had two, Aſius and Atys; from Aſius Lydia borrowed the name of Aſia, which in proceſs of time became common to the whole continent. Atys married Callithea the daughter of Choræus, and had by her Lydus and Tyrrhenus. Lydus ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Mæonia, which in his reign began to be called Lydia. Tyrrhenus led a colony into Italy, and ſettled in Hetruria now Tuſcany. This is the account Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis gives us of the kings ſprung of Atys, or the firſt race of the Lydian kings.

The Atyadæ were ſucceeded by the Heraclidæ or the deſcendants of Hercules. For Hercules, being by the directions of the oracle ſold as a ſlave to Omphale queen of Lydia, to expiate thereby the murder of Iphitus, had during his captivity by one of her ſlaves a ſon named Cleolaus, whoſe grandſon by name Argon was the firſt of the Heraclidæ that aſcended the throne of Lydia. This race reigned reigned from Argon the firſt to Candaules the laſt 505 years, the father ſucceeded the ſon for 22 generations. They began to reign about, or not long before, the time of the Trojan war.

THE third race called Mermnadæ, perhaps from one of the family named Mermnas (for the antients are ſilent as to the origin of this appellation) began to reign not long before the Medes ſhook off the Aſſyrian yoke. The Mermnadæ were alſo, properly ſpeaking, Heraclidæ, being deſcended from one Lemnos, or, as Apollodorus calls him, Agelaus, the ſon of Hercules by Omphale. The firſt king of this race was Gyges, and Crœſus the laſt.

As to their character, it muſt be conſidered at different times: under Crœſus and ſome of his predeceſſors, they were without all doubt a very warlike people; for they reduced all the neighbouring countries, and ſpread far and wide the terrour of their arms. But being aftewards ſubdued by the Perſians, and enjoyned by Cyrus, according to the advice given him by Crœſus (Y), to wear long veſts and apply themſelves to ſuch arts and callings only, as had a natural tendency to debauch their manners and enervate their

(Y) The Lydians, not long after they were conquered by Cyrus, rebelled at the inſtigation of one Pactyas a Lydian, whom Cyrus had truſted with the gold which he had found in the treaſury of Crœſus at Sardis. With this gold Pactyas putting to ſea engaged the maritime powers to join him, and having raiſed a conſiderable army of mercenaries, marched to Sardis, where he beſieged Tabalus, whom Cyrus had appointed governor of that city. News of this revolt being brought to Cyrus, as he was leading his army againſt the Babylonians, Bactrians, and Egyptians, he reſolved to march back into Lydia, ſell all the Lydians for ſlaves, and at once put an end to that unhappy nation. This reſolution he imparted to king Crœſus at that time his priſoner, who, fearing the utter ruin of his country, earneſtly intreated him to forgive the Lydians, and wreak his juſt anger on Pactyas alone by whom they had been ſeduced, adviſing him at the ſame time, in order to prevent any future rebellion, to forbid the Lydians the uſe of arms, to encourage luxury and debauchery among them, to which they were naturally inclined, and to cauſe their children to be brought up to ſuch callings only, as were moſt capable of debauching their minds and inclining them to idleneſs. This advice was followed by Cyrus, and in a ſhort time the Lydians became the moſt lewd aud debauched nation under the ſun (31).

(31) Herodot. lib. i.

their courage, they became by degrees a moſt voluptuous and effeminate race, unfit for action, and entirely given up to idleneſs, pleaſures, and diverſions.

The ſoil. THE ſoil of this country, by reaſon of the many rivers that watered it, was exceeding fruitful; it abounded in all ſorts of grain, and is celebrated for its exquiſite wines. It was enriched with ſeveral mines, whence Cræſus is ſaid

Religion. to have drawn his immenſe wealth.

As to the religion of the Lydians, it ſeems to have been much the ſame with that of the Phrygians, which we have already ſpoken of; they worſhipped Diana, Jupiter, and Cybele at Magneſia under the name of Sypilene; for in the alliance concluded between thoſe of Smyrna and Magneſia on the Mæander, in favour of king Seleucus Callinicus both parties ſwore, as appears from the Arundelian marbles, by the goddeſs Sypilene. She borrowed this name from mount Sypilus, or perhaps from a town of the ſame name, which, as Strabo informs us [h], was ruined by an quake in the reign of Tantalus. In the ſame city of Magneſia ſtood a temple of Diana Leucophryna, no ways inferior to the ſo much celebrated temple of Diana Epheſiana.

The manners, cuſtoms, &c. of the Lydians. THE cuſtoms of the Lydians were, as Herodotus informs us [i], much the ſame with thoſe of the Greeks, except that they uſed to proſtitute their daughters; for the young women among them had no other fortune but what they earned by proſtitution; after they had by this means acquired a competent dowry, they were allowed to marry whoever they pleaſed. They puniſhed idleneſs as a crime, and inured their children from their very infancy to hardſhips. Their arms were not bows and arrows, as ſome have pretended to argue from Jeremiah [k], but long ſpears, ſuch as were antiently uſed by the horſe; and in horſemanſhip, if Herodotus is to be credited [l], the Lydians far excelled all other nations. They were the firſt that introduced the art of coining gold and ſilver to facilitate trade; the firſt that ſold by retail, that kept eating-houſes and taverns, that invented public ſports and ſhews, which were therefore called Ludi by the Romans, who borrowed them of the Tuſcans, deſcended, as we ſhall ſee anon, from the Lydians. Herodotus informs us [m], on what occaſion caſion they invented thoſe public and ſeveral other private diverſions. During the reign of Atys the ſon of Manes, a great ſcarcity of proviſions prevailed all over the kingdom of Lydia, which the inhabitants endured for ſeveral years with an aſtoniſhing patience. But as the evil continued, in order to divert their minds from the conſideration of their unhappy condition, they applied themſelves to all manner of diverſion, and, ſome inventing one game, others another, they gradually introduced dice, balls, and ſuch other diverſions as were in antient times uſed among the Greeks, cheſs only excepted, whereof the Lydians, as we are told by Herodotus, do not challenge the invention. Having thus contrived various kinds of diverſions, they uſed to play one whole day without intermiſſion, eating and drinking the next day without amuſing themſelves with any kind of games. After they had continued thus alternately faſting and feaſting, as the ſcarcity of their proviſions could well allow, finding that their calamities increaſed rather than abated, the king divided the whole nation into two bodies, commanding them to determine by lot, which of the two ſhould remain at home, and which go abroad in queſt of new ſeats, ſince their native country could not afford wherewithal to maintain them at home. The king appointed his ſon Tyrrhenus to command thoſe who ſhould be obliged to remove, he himſelf remaining to reign over thoſe who ſhould have the fortune to ſtay. Thoſe who by lot were conſtrained to abandon their country marched to Smyrna, where they equipped a ſmall fleet, and putting to ſea, after many adventures, arrived in that part of Italy which was then called Umbria, and now Tuſcany. Here they changed their name, and were no longer called Lydians, but Tyrrhenians from their leader Tyrrhenus.

[h] Strab. l. i. p. 38. [i] Herodot. l. i. [k] Jerem. xlxvi. 9. [l] Herodot ubi ſupra. [m] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

THE trade of the antient Lydians is no-where mentioned; but we may ſuppoſe it to have been very conſiderable, eſpecially under the latter kings, when Lydia was in the meridian of its glory; whoſoever conſiders the ſplendor of this monarchy, and commodious ſituation of the country, cannot doubt, but commerce muſt here have flouriſhed to a very eminent degree. To this we may add the immenſe riches not only of the Lydian princes, but of ſeveral private perſons. Herodotus [n] mentions one, by name Commerce.

[n] Herodot. lib. vii.

name Pythius, who not only entertained Xerxes and all his army, while he was marching with innumerable forces to invade Greece; but made him a proffer of two thouſand talents of ſilver, and three millions, nine hundred, ninety three thouſand pieces of gold bearing the ſtamp of Darius, wherewithal to defray the charges of that war. The ſame Pythius had preſented Darius, father to Xerxes, with a plane-tree and vine of maſſive gold, and was reckoned, after the king of Perſia, the richeſt man in the then known world.

SECT. II.

The reigns of the kings of Lydia.

Maſnes. THE firſt king of Lydia we find mentioned in hiſtory is Maſnes, or Manes, as Herodotus calls him. He is ſaid to have been the ſon of the earth, which in the language of the antients denotes him to have been of a mean extraction. Heraclides mentions an anonymous king of Lydia, who, from the abject condition of a journeyman or ſlave to a cartwright living at Cyma, was raiſed to the throne of Lydia. The ſame author adds, that as the Lydians were diſburſing the money for his ranſom, a citizen of Cyma, for whom the ſlave was at that time making a cart, inſiſted on his finiſhing what he had in hand before he was ſet at liberty, proteſting, that he valued more the glory of having a cart made by the king of Lydia, than all the gold they could offer him. This fortunate ſlave may have been Maſnes, ſince he in regard of his mean deſcent is called by the antients ſon of the earth. Heraclides does not tell us what induced the Lydians to place a ſlave on the throne; but we may ſuppoſe this to have been brought about by the advice of ſome oracle, as it happened in the caſe of Gordius king of Phrygia; for Heraclides informs us, that the Lydians choſe a ſlave for their king, in hopes of being reſcued by his means from the oppreſſions they groaned under.

Cotys. Atys. MASNES was ſucceeded by his ſon Cotys, and Cotys by his ſon Atys, in whoſe reigns, as the country was overſtocked with inhabitants, the great famine, which we have mentioned above, reigned for the ſpace of 18 years, and obliged obliged the king to divide his subjects, keeping one half of them at home, and sending the other abroad in quest of new settlements, under the conduct of his younger son Tyrrhenus.

ATYS was succeeded by his son Lydus, from whom the country had the name of Lydia, having been called to that time Mæonia. Lydus.

ALCYMUS appears next: It is uncertain whom he succeeded: He is represented as an excellent prince, and is said to have had nothing so much at heart, as the welfare of his subjects; whence in the seventh year of his reign the whole nation met, as Suidas informs us, to offer up prayers and sacrifices for his health and prosperity. Stephanus calls him Alciamus, and adds, that in his time the city of Ascalon was built by Ascalus, son of Hymenæus and brother to Tantalus, who conducted an army of Lydians into Syria. Alcymus.

ADRYMETES or Adramytis is mentioned by Athenæus, and said to have been the first that employed women in such ministeries as other kings had done eunuchs. Adrymetes.

CAMBLETES, Camblitas or Cambles, a debauched prince, who murdered his wife, and afterwards revenged her death by laying violent hands on himself. Athenæus says, that he was so ravenous as to devour his wife in his sleep, and that finding her hand in his mouth next morning, he was so grieved and ashamed of what he had done, that he put himself to death. Cambletes.

TMOLUS put an end to his life by throwing himself headlong from a precipice, being driven thereto, as Plutarch acquaints us [n], by Diana for ravishing one of her followers by name Arrhipe. Tmolus.

THEOCLYMENUS succeeded his father Tmolus, of whom we find nothing in history, but that he buried his father on mount Tmolus, which from him had its name. Theoclymenus.

AFTER Theoclymenus Marsyas reigned, who, on what occasion we know not, coming into Italy, built there, as we are told by Solinus [o], the city of Archippena. Marsyas.

JARDANES succeeded Marsyas, and in his reign all manner of lewdness prevailed in the kingdom of Lydia to such a degree, that Omphale, the king's only daughter, could not find shelter even within the walls of the royal Jardanes.

[n] Plutarch. de fluviis.

[o] Solinus, lib. vii.

palace againſt the inſults of the licentious multitude, the moſt infamous luſts receiving a kind of ſanction from the example of the prince.

Omphale. ON the death of Jardanes his daughter Omphale was by the unanimous votes of the nobles placed on the throne. She puniſhed with great ſeverity thoſe by whom ſhe had been abuſed in her father's life-time, and by cauſing the ſlaves all over the kingdom to be ſhut up with their miſtreſſes, extended her revenge to the whole nation. But in the mean time falling in love with Hercules ſhe gave herſelf entirely up to him, and had by him a ſon named Alcæus.

Alcæus. OMPHALE was ſucceeded by her ſon Alcæus, according to ſome authors, who will have him to have been the firſt king of Lydia of the race of Hercules.

Ninus. AFTER Alcæus reigned Belus, and after Belus his ſon Ninus of whom we know nothing but their bare names.

Argon. ARGON ſucceeded his father Ninus, and is ſaid to have transferred the royal ſeat to Sardis. Herodotus will have Argon to have been the firſt of the deſcendants of Hercules that reigned in Lydia.

Leon, &c. ARGON was ſucceeded by his ſon Leon, Leon by Adryſus, who reigned thirty-ſix years; Adryſus by Alyactes who reigned fourteen; and Alyactes by Meles, who reigned twelve.

Candaules. CANDAULES the ſon of Myrſus was the laſt king of this ſecond race, and loſt by his imprudence both his life and kingdom. The fact is thus related by Herodotus[p]: He had a wife whom he paſſionately loved, and believed the moſt beautiful of her ſex. He extolled her charms above meaſure to Gyges his favourite, whom he uſed to entruſt with his moſt important affairs; and, the more to convince him of her beauty, reſolved to ſhew her to him quite naked; and accordingly placed him in the porch of her chamber, where the queen uſed to undreſs when ſhe went to bed, ordering him to retire after ſeeing her, and take all poſſible care not to be obſerved. But notwithſtanding all the caution he could uſe, ſhe plainly diſcovered him going out, and though ſhe did not doubt but it was her huſband's contrivance, yet ſhe paſſed that night in a ſeeming tranquillity, ſuppreſſing her reſentment to the next morning, when ſhe ſent for Gyges, and reſolutely told him, that he muſt either with his death atone for the criminal action he was

Year of the flood, 2268. Before Chriſt 735.

[p] Herodot. x. 1. i.

was guilty of, or put to death Candaules the contriver of it, and receive both her and the kingdom of Lydia for his reward. Gyges at first earnestly begged of her, that she would not drive him to the necessity of such a choice. But finding that he could not prevail with her, and that he must either kill his master, or die himself, he chose the former, and being led by the queen to the same place where her husband had placed him the night before, he stabbed the king while he was asleep, and at the same time married the queen, and took possession of the kingdom, in which he was confirmed by the answer of the Delphic oracle. For the Lydians having taken up arms to revenge the death of their prince, an agreement was made between them and the followers of Gyges, that if the oracle should declare him to be lawful king of Lydia, he should be permitted to reign; if not, he should resign the crown to the Heraclidæ. The answer of the oracle proved favourable to Gyges, whereupon he was universally acknowledged for lawful king of Lydia. Candaules is said [r] to have purchased a picture, done by one Bularchas, and representing a battle of the Magnetes, for its weight in gold, which shews how early the art of painting began to be in request, for Candaules was contemporary with Romulus.

Gyges. Year of the flood, 2285. Before Christ 718.

GYGES, having thus possessed himself of the kingdom of Lydia, sent many rich and valuable presents to the oracle of Delphos, among the others six cups of gold weighing thirty talents, and greatly esteemed for the workmanship. He made war on those of Miletus and Smyrna, took the city of Colophon, and subdued the whole country of Troas. In his reign, and by his permission, the city of Abydus was built by the Milesians. Plutarch and other writers relate his accession to the crown of Lydia in a quite different manner, and tell us, without making any mention of the queen, that Gyges rebelled against Candaules and slew him in an engagement. As to his fabulous ring mentioned by Plato [s] and Tully [t], we refer the reader to Tzetzes, Suidas, Philostratus, &c. Gyges reigned thirty-eight years, and was succeeded by his son Ardyes.

Ardyes.

ARDYES or Ardys carried on the war against the Milesians which his father had begun, and possessed himself of Priene, in those days a strong city. In the reign of this prince the Cimmerians invaded and over-ran all Asia Minor

[r] Plin. lib. xxxv. c. viii
[t] Cic. lib. iii. de off.
[s] Plato de rep. l. xi. & x.

nor; but what battles were fought between the Lydians and theſe invaders, and with what ſucceſs, we find no-where mentioned. Herodotus only informs us [u], that in the time of Ardyes they poſſeſſed themſelves of Sardis the metropolis of Lydia but could never win the caſtle. Ardyes reigned forty-nine years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon.

Sadyattes. SADYATTES, who reigned twelve years, and warred moſt part of his reign with the Mileſians.

Alyattes. Year of the flood, 2383. Before Chriſt 620. AFTER him came his ſon Alyattes, who for the ſpace of ſix years waged a bloody war with Cyaxares king of the Medes. The occaſion of this war is thus related by Herodotus. Certain Scythians being driven out of their country on occaſion of a ſedition that happened among them, they retired into Media, where Cyaxares received them with great humanity, and, as he entertained a good opinion of them, committed to their care divers youths to be inſtructed in the uſe of the bow, and in the Scythian tongue. The ſtrangers were great ſportſmen, and uſed daily to ſupply the king's table with game, which they dreſſed after their own manner. But returning one day empty, Cyaxares, as he was of a violent temper, treated them with moſt opprobrious language, which the Scythians reſenting, agreed among themſelves to kill one of the youths committed to their care, and ſerve his fleſh up to the king's table dreſſed like veniſon. This they effected, and then made their eſcape into Lydia, where they were kindly entertained by Alyattes, which, according to Herodotus, gave occaſion to a war that laſted ſix years, Cyaxares demanding the Scythians, and Alyattes refuſing to deliver them up. This war was carried on with various ſucceſs, the Medes ſometimes defeating the Lydians, and the Lydians ſometimes the Medes. In the ſixth year, while both armies were engaged, the day was all on a ſudden turned into night (Z), which ſo frightened both the Lydians and Medes, that they gave over fighting, and ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to make up their differences in an amicable manner, which was done accordingly by the mediation of Syenneſis king of Cilicia and Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon. The peace was ratified by a marriage between Aryenis the daughter of Alyattes and Aſtyages

[u] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

(Z) This total eclipſe fell upon the 28th of May, and had been foretold by Thales the Mileſian ſome years before.

ages the ſon of Cyaxares (A). A peace being thus concluded between the Lydians and Medes, Alyattes employed all his forces againſt the Scythians, and, after a war, which laſted ſeveral years, had the good luck to rid his kingdom of ſo troubleſome gueſts. He was attended with the like ſucceſs in the war he undertook againſt the Smyrneans, whom he worſted in ſeveral battles, and at laſt made himſelf maſter of their capital and whole country. He continued for the ſpace of five years the war, which his father had begun againſt the Mileſians, ravaging their country, and about harveſt time carrying away yearly all their corn, in order to oblige them for want of proviſions to ſurrender their city, which he knew he could not reduce any other way, the Mileſians being at that time maſters of the ſea. In the 12th year of this war the Lydians having ſet fire to the corn in the fields, the flames were carried by a violent wind, which happened to blow at the time, to the temple of Minerva at Aſſeſus, which was burnt down to the ground. Not long after Alyattes falling ſick ſent to conſult the oracle at Delphos, which refuſed to return any anſwer, till ſuch time as the king ſhould rebuild the temple of Minerva at Aſſeſus. Hereupon Alyattes diſpatched embaſſadors to Miletus, enjoining them to conclude a truce with the Mileſians till the temple ſhould be rebuilt. On the arrival of the embaſſadors Thraſybulus, then king of Miletus, commanded all the corn that was at that time in the city to be brought into the market-place, and the citizens to banquet in public and revel, as if the city were plentifully ſtored with all manner of proviſions. This Thraſybulus did, to the end that the embaſſadors, ſeeing ſuch quantities of corn, and the people every where diverting themſelves, might acquaint their ma-

(A) The account which Herodotus gives us of the cauſe of this war ſeems to ſome writers highly improbable. And truly it is not very likely, that the Scythians falling out among themſelves ſhould have had recourſe to either of theſe kings, whoſe countries the Scythians had over-run, and oftentimes plundered. They had chiefly reaſon to diſtruſt Cyaxares, for the treachery he had ſhewn in maſſacring ſuch of their countrymen as had ſettled in his dominions. Others are of opinion, that Alyattes, being jealous of the too great power of Cyaxares (who had ſeized, after the conqueſt of Nineveh, the regions belonging to the Aſſyrians as far as to the river Halys), entered into an alliance with the Scythians againſt the Medes, and that the war was carried on with the joint forces of the Lydians and Scythians ſter therewithal, and divert him from purſuing the war. As Thraſybulus had deſigned, ſo it happened; for Alyattes, who believed the Mileſians greatly diſtreſſed for proviſions, receiving a quite different account from his embaſſadors, changed the truce into a laſting peace, and ever afterwards lived in amity and friendſhip with Thraſybulus and the Mileſians. Alyattes had two ſons, Croeſus by a Carian, and Pantaleon by an Ionian. Croeſus ſucceeded his father after he had reigned fifty-ſeven years.

Croeſus. Year of the flood, 2441. Before Chriſt, 562.

CROESUS, ſucceeding his father at the age of thirty-five years, enlarged his dominions ſo as to be no ways inferior to any prince of that age, though there were in his time three very powerful monarchies, viz. of Media, of Babylon, and of Egypt. Croeſus was the firſt that made war on the Epheſians, whoſe city he beſieged and took, notwithſtanding their conſecrating it to Diana, and faſtening the walls by a rope to her temple, which was ſeven ſtades diſtant from the city. After the reduction of Epheſus, he attacked under various pretences the Ionians and Æolians, obliging them, and all the other Greek ſtates of Aſia, to pay him a yearly tribute. He alſo formed a deſign of equipping a fleet to attack the inhabitants of the iſlands, but was diverted from this thought by Bias of Priene, or, as others ſay, by Pittacus of Mitylene (B). Not long after he ſubdued the Phrygians, Myſians, Maryandini, Chalybes, Paphlagonians, Thracians, Thynians, Bithynians, Carians, Dorians, Æolians, Pamphylians, and all the nations that lay between Lydia and the river Halys. Athenæus out of Beroſus mentions a ſignal victory of his over the Sacæans a Scythian nation, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies yearly celebrated a feaſt which they called Sacæa. Croeſus having by theſe victories ries acquired great fame and renown; many wise men of that age went to Sardis on purpose to see him, and among others Solon, who, after publishing his laws at Athens, had absented himself from his country, under pretence of travelling for the space of ten years; that he might not be obliged to repeal any of the constitutions which he had established; for the Athenians could make no alteration of themselves, the citizens having taken a solemn oath to observe his laws for the space of ten years. Being arrived at Sardis he was with great humanity entertained by Crœsus in his own palace, and a few days after his arrival carried to see the wealth and magnificence of his treasury, which when he had seen, Crœsus asked him, who was the happiest man he had ever known, believing, that he would give, without any hesitation, the preference to himself. But Solon, as he was an enemy to all manner of flattery, and resolved on all occasions to speak the plain truth, answered, that Tellus the Athenian was the happiest man he had ever seen (C). Crœsus again asked him who was the happiest man after Tellus, not doubting but he would name him at least in the second place, but was again disappointed, the philosopher adjudging the second place to Cleobis and Biton two Argives (D). Crœsus shewing himself

(B) Bias arriving at Sardis from Greece, told Croeſus, enquiring what news he brought from thence, that the iſlanders had bought ten-thouſand horſes with a deſign to attack him by land, which Croeſus believing thanked the gods for inſpiring them with ſuch a reſolution, as knowing that the main ſtrength of his army conſiſted in cavalry. Then Bias acquainted him, that the iſlanders had no ſuch deſign, but were no leſs pleaſed in hearing that he deſigned to attack them by ſea, than he was at the news of their preparing to attack him by land. Whereupon Croeſus, being fully appriſed of the raſhneſs of his deſign, laid it aſide, and concluded an alliance with all the Greeks that inhabited the iſlands.

(C) Tellus was an Athenian, had many virtuous children who all survived him, and, after having enjoyed all the happiness which the condition of mortals is capable of, ended his life in a most glorious manner. For coming to the assistance of his countrymen in a battle fought at Eleusis against the neighbouring people, he put the enemy to flight, and died in the field of victory. He was buried by the Athenians at the expence of the public in the place where he fell, and yearly honours were paid to his memory.

(D) These two Greeks proved victorious in the Olympic games and all other public sports. Their mother was a priestess of Juno, who being one day obliged to go to the temple, whither she ought to have been carried in a chariot drawn by a yoke of oxen, her sons, seeing that the oxen were not brought from the field at the time appointed, yoked themselves, and drew the chariot the space of forty-five furlongs. This action was greatly extolled by all the people that were assembled at the temple, and their mother transported with joy in seeing her sons so much honoured by the whole nation, begged of the goddess, that she would reward her children with what she thought would prove most advantageous to them. Having put up this petition, and, after offering the usual sacrifices banquetted with her sons, they himſelf highly diſſatisfied with Solon, for preferring the condition of private men to that of ſo rich and powerful a prince as he, the philoſopher informed him, that it was impoſſible to judge of the happineſs of any man before death, and that all things ought to be meaſured by their end. Whereupon he was diſmiſſed by Crœſus as a man of no experience. Not long after the departure of Solon, Crœſus loſt his favourite ſon Atys, who was unfortunately killed at the chace of a wild boar by Adraſtus, ſon of Gordius and grandſon of Midas kings of Phrygia, who had fled to Sardis for refuge. This loſs was no ſmall allay to his happineſs, for he continued diſconſolate the ſpace of two whole years and in a ſtate of inaction, till the conqueſts of Cyrus and growing power of the Perſians rouſed up his martial ſpirits, and diverted his mind to other thoughts. He apprehended, that the good ſucceſs, which attended Cyrus in all his undertakings, might at laſt prove dangerous to himſelf, and therefore reſolved to put a ſtop if poſſible, to his conqueſts. To this end he conſulted all the oracles of any fame either in Greece or Afric (E), he ſtrengthened himſelf they both fell aſleep and died in the temple. Upon which the Argians, in commemoration of their piety, cauſed their ſtatues to be made and dedicated at Delphos (31).

(E) We are told by Herodotus, that Crœſus ſent embaſſadors to the oracles of Delphos, of Abe, of Phocis, of Amphiaraus, of Trophonius, of Branchis, and of Jupiter Ammon, enjoining them to propoſe, each to the oracle he was to conſult, and all the ſame day, the following queſtion; What is Crœſus the ſon of Alyattes king of Lydia now doing? What anſwer the other oracles returned we find no-where mentioned; but that of Delphos, as Herodotus informs us, anſwered thus: I know the number of the ſands of Libya, the meaſure of the ocean, the ſecrets of the ſilent and dumb lie open to me. I ſmell the odour of a lamb and tortoiſe boiling together in a brazen cauldron; braſs is under, and braſs above the fleſh. Crœſus hearing this anſwer adored the god of Delphos, and owned, that the oracle had ſpoken truth; for on the ſame day that his embaſſadors conſulted the oracle, he was employed in boiling together a lamb and a tortoiſe in a cauldron of braſs, which had a cover of the ſame metal, thinking it impoſſible, that any, but a god, could know what he was doing. Wherefore he immediately offered to the Delphic Apollo a ſacrifice conſiſting of three thouſand oxen; and to render him more favourable and propitious, he brought

(31) Herodot lib. i.

himſelf with alliances, and, having raiſed what forces he could, marched into Cappadocia, then belonging to the Perſians, before his allies could join him. Here he encamped near the city of Sinope on the Euxine ſea, took the city of Pteria, and laid waſte all the adjacent country. Cyrus, hearing of the enemy's motions, put himſelf at the head of a powerful army, and marching into Cappadocia, encamped in ſight of the Lydian army. Here after ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, the two armies came at laſt to a general engagement, wherein many fell on both ſides. The night coming on both armies parted on equal terms. But Crœſus fearing to venture a ſecond battle, as his forces were not near ſo numerous as thoſe of Cyrus, retired in the night-time, and marched with all poſſible expedition to Sardis, where he diſbanded his troops, enjoining them to re-aſſemble at the end of five months; for brought out beds of gold and ſilver, veſſels of gold, robes of purple, and other rich apparel, and burnt them all together, commanding the Lydians to follow his example. On this occaſion ſo much gold was melted down, that one hundred and ſeventeen tiles were made out of it, whereof the longeſt were ſix ſpans in length, the ſhorteſt three, but all one ſpan in thickneſs. Theſe, with a golden lion weighing ten talents and many other rich preſents, Crœſus ſent to the Delphic oracle, enjoining his embaſſadors to enquire whether he ſhould undertake a war againſt the Perſians. The oracle returned this anſwer; If Crœſus paſſes the Halys he will put an end to a vaſt empire; which was capable of being interpreted either of Perſia or Lydia. Crœſus, hearing this anſwer, and not doubting in the leaſt, but that he ſhould overturn the Perſian monarchy, ſent more preſents to the oracle, and two ſtaters of gold to each of the inhabitants of Delphos. In conſideration of which the Delphians granted Crœſus and the Lydians a right to conſult the oracle before any other nation, together with the firſt place in the temple, and the freedom of the city for ever. Crœſus, having made theſe preſents, ſent a third time to conſult the oracle, whether he ſhould long enjoy the kingdom. The oracle anſwered, That he ſhould reign till a mule ruled over the Medes, which Crœſus deeming impoſſible, concluded that he and his poſterity were to hold the kingdom of Lydia for ever. But the oracle, as it was afterwards interpreted, by a mule meant Cyrus, whoſe parents were of different nations, his mother being a Mede and his father a Perſian. And now Crœſus, relying on theſe fallacious anſwers, and believing himſelf invincible, marched, without waiting for the troops of his allies, into Cappadocia, where he was met by Cyrus at the head of a powerful army.

for he did not in the leaſt apprehend, that Cyrus, who had not been able to get the better of him in the field, would venture to advance to his capital. Cyrus, finding the next morning that the enemy had left the field, reſolved to purſue him to Sardis, and oblige him to venture a ſecond battle before his allies could join him. This reſolution was executed with ſuch expedition, that Cyrus at the head of his army appeared in the plains of Sardis, before Crœſus had any intelligence of his deſign. The Lydians were ſtrangely alarmed at ſo bold an attempt, which they had neither foreſeen nor expected. The king, however, drawing together what forces were ſtill remaining, marched out againſt the Perſians, by whom, after a ſharp engagement, he was put to flight, and forced to ſhut himſelf up in Sardis, which was ſoon after taken by aſſault and Crœſus himſelf made priſoner. In the taking of the town Crœſus himſelf had been killed, had not his ſecond ſon, who to that time had been ſpeechleſs, cried out to the Perſian who was ready to ſtrike, Spare Crœſus. Whereupon he was againſt his will ſaved and carried to Cyrus, who commanded him to be put in fetters, and placed on a great pile of wood, with a deſign to burn him and fourteen young Lydians in honour of the gods, as a ſacrifice and the firſt fruits of his victory. Then Crœſus recollecting the words of Solon, that no man can truly be called happy before his death, pronounced thrice that great philoſopher's name, which Cyrus hearing, and underſtanding what induced him to invoke Solon, commanded him to be taken down from the pile, and ranked among his friends and counſellors. Xenophon tells us, that Cyrus received his royal priſoner with great kindneſs and humanity, when he was firſt preſented to him, without mentioning the treatment which we read of in Herodotus. The firſt favour Crœſus begged of the conqueror was, that he would give him leave to ſend his fetters to the oracle at Delphos, as the trophies of the ſucceſs which Apollo had promiſed him. This favour Cyrus willingly granted; but the oracle, or rather the prieſts, convinced Crœſus, that he and not Apollo was to blame (F). Thus ended the antient kingdom of Lydia, continuing

Crœſus taken. Year of the flood, 2454 [illegible] before [illegible]iſt,

(F) The oracle anſwered, that the god himſelf could not reverſe the decrees of fate, and that Crœſus in the fifth generation ſuffered for a crime of one, who, at the inſtigation of a woman, had continuing subject to the Persians, till they also were conquered by the Macedonians, as we have seen in the foregoing part of this history.

had murdered his master, and possessed himself of a crown which did not belong to him; and that as to the answers of the oracle, he had no reason to complain; for Apollo only foretold, that by making war on the Persians he would overturn a great monarchy. Had he desired to be truly informed, continued the oracle, he ought to have sent again to enquire whether his own, or that of Cyrus, was meant by the oracle. But if he neither understood the true meaning of the oracle, nor would be at the pains of suing for a further explanation, his misfortune and downfall was entirely owing to himself. Crœsus, hearing this answer, acknowledged himself to be in the wrong; and cleared, as much as in him lay, the oracle from all suspicion of falshood.

CHAP. XVI.

The History of the Lycians.

THE country before us was at first called Milias or Tremile from the Milia, a people of Crete that settled there, as Herodotus [a] and Stephanus informs us, and afterwards Lycia, from Lycus the son of Pandion king of Athens. The proper Lycia, as precisely as we can gather, lies between the thirty-sixth and thirty-eighth degrees of north latitude. It was bounded by Caria on the west, by Pamphylia on the east, by Phrygia Major and part of Pamphylia on the north, and by the Mediterranean on the south. Name and divisions.

This country was divided into two parts the Maritime and the Mediterranean, or the coast and the country. The most remarkable cities on the coast were Telmessus or Telmissus, seated on a noted bay in the western limits, limits, whoſe inhabitants are ſaid to have been the firſt pretenders to the interpretation of dreams. Patara, ſituated on a hill, and formerly celebrated for a temple and oracle of Apollo no ways inferior to that of Delphos. At Patara Apollo was ſaid to reſide the ſix winter months, and the ſix ſummer months at Delos, whence the epithets of Pataræus Apollo [b] and Sortes Lyciæ [c]. This city was greatly improved and embelliſhed by Ptolemæus Philadelphus, and called Arſinoe from his wife who bore that name, but the former name prevailed. Myra, built on a high hill about twenty furlongs from the coaſt, mentioned in the Acts [d]. This city was the metropolis of Lycia when a Roman province, and of conſequence in the chriſtian times an archbiſhop's ſee. Olympus, a famous city with a mountain of the ſame name. Phaſelis, on the borders of Lycia and Pamphylia, and therefore by ſome placed in Pamphylia, by others more accurately in Lycia. This city in the time of the Romans was a famous neſt of pyrates, but was at laſt reduced by Servilius, while Pompey ſcoured the ſea with a numerous fleet. To the pyrates of this town former ages were indebted for thoſe ſwift veſſels, which the Romans from the place called Phaſeli, and we Brigantines. We will not take upon us to mark out the bounds of the midland Lycia. Strabo reckons in it the following towns, Pinara, Cragus, at the foot of a hill bearing the ſame name, Tlos, Simena, &c. Ptolemy adds to the Mediterranean part of Lycia two ſmall countries, viz. Milias on the weſt bordering on Caria, and Cabalia on the eaſt bordering on Lycia Proper. But Strabo places Milias on the borders of Piſidia and Pamphylia. The inland part of Lycia was divided by the river Xanthus, which, ariſing in two ſprings from the foot of mount Cadmus, and waſhing the walls of Xanthus, a city formerly of ſome note, diſcharges itſelf into the Mediterranean. From this river, the people inhabiting the inland parts of Lycia, were called Xanthians. The chief mountain of this country, and indeed of all Aſia, is mount Taurus, which has its beginning in this province, and extends eaſtward to the great oriental ocean. In Lycia was alſo the famous mountain Chimæra which vomited flames, the bottom whereof was infeſted with ſerpents, the middle parts

[a] Herodot. l. i. & vii.

[b] Horat. lib. iii. Carm. ode 4. [c] Virgil. Æneid. iv. 346.
[d] Act. xxvii. 5.

parts afforded paſture for goats, and the top much frequented by lions, which gave occaſion to the poets to paint it as a monſter with the head of a lion, the body of a goat, and the tail of a ſerpent. This mountain was firſt planted and rendered habitable by Bellerophon, who is therefore fabled by the poets to have killed this monſter.

Soil and climate.

THE ſoil of this country is very fruitful, and the air reckoned very wholeſome. It is plentifully watered with ſmall rivers running down from mount Taurus, which often ſwell to an immoderate degree, and overflow the country, being increaſed by the melting of the ſnows on that mountain, or by heavy rains.

Their origin.

As to the origin of the Lycians, Herodotus and others [e] inform us, that they were deſcended from the Cretans; for Sarpedon, being driven out of the iſland by his brother Minos, and landing in Aſia with thoſe Cretans who had ſided with him, ſettled in Milias, and there founded a new kingdom, after having conquered and driven out the antient proprietors, whom Herodotus calls Milyans and Solymi. During the reign of Sarpedon they continued to be called Cretans, but after his death took the name of Lycians, from Lycus the ſon of Pandion king of Athens, who, being forced by his brother Ægeus to quit his native country, had fled to Sarpedon. Hence the poets, and with them Strabo, ſeem to confound the Lycians with the Carians, who were undoubtedly deſcended from the Cretans. But Diodorus Sibulus [f], and Plato [g] before him, counts the Lycians among the Greek nations of Aſia, as being deſcended from the Argivi. But not to dwell on ſuch uncertainties, the Lycians were once a very powerful and warlike people, conſidering the ſmallneſs of their country. They had, according to Strabo [h], three and twenty, according to Pliny [i], ſix and thirty large and populous towns, were experienced mariners, and extended their power on the ſeas as far as Italy.

Their manners, governments, &c.

THE Lycians are highly commended by the antient writers for their ſobriety, and manner of adminiſtering juſtice. They had in latter ages twenty-three conſiderable cities, each of which ſent their deputies to a general aſſembly or diet, the great cities three, the leſſer two, and the leaſt

[e] Herodot. lib. i. & vii. Strab. lib. xii. & xiv. Pauſanias lib. vii. [f] Diodor. Sicul. l. v. c. 16. [g] Plato in Minoe.
[h] Strab. l. xiv. [i] Plin. l. v. c. 27.

least one only. In this assembly all matters of consequence were canvassed, and determined by the majority of votes. They chose in the first place the president of the council, and after him the civil and military officers of each city. Here they administered justice, settled all private differences, declared war, made peace, concluded alliances, &c. Whence we may conclude, that their government, at least in latter times, either was not monarchical, or their monarchs no way absolute. This form of government they maintained even under the Romans, as Strabo informs us [k], but with this difference, that the consent of the Roman governor, and, in matters of moment, of the senate, was requisite for the validity of such acts and decrees as had passed in their assembly. Their government was at first monarchical, and the country parcelled out into several petty kingdoms; for we read of the families of Bellerophon, Sarpedon, Lycus, Telephus, and Pandarus reigning in Lycia at one and the same time; if we will not rather suppose the government to have been aristocratical, and these families to have bore the greatest sway in the administration. But be that as it will, in process of time all Lycia became subject to one prince; for Herodotus, in enumerating the princes that contributed towards the equipping and arming of Xerxes's fleet, mentions but one king of Lycia, by name Cybernisicus. This nation, as most of the other nations of Asia, was first subdued by Crœsus or the Lydians, and after the downfal of the Lydian kingdom, by Cyrus. The courage, resolution, and intrepidity, with which the Lycians of Xanthus opposed Harpagus the Persian general deserves particular notice. For instead of tamely submitting, like their neighbours, to the Persian yoke, they attacked with a handful of men Harpagus's numerous army, and fought with incredible bravery, though under all the disadvantages imaginable. But being overpowered with numbers and forced to retire into their city, they first set fire to the castle, where they had shut up their wives, children, slaves, and all their riches; and then, engaging themselves by a solemn oath to die together, returned to the field of battle, renewed the fight, and were all killed to a man. The Lycians continued to be governed by their own kings even after they were subdued by the Persians, but paid an annual annual tribute to the king of Persia. They fell with the Persians under the power of the Macedonians, and after the death of Alexander were governed by the Seleucidæ. Of these Antiochus the Great being confined by the Romans beyond mount Taurus, Lycia was granted to the Rhodians; but these disobliging the Romans in the war with Perseus, Lycia was declared a free country, and continued to be so till the reign of Claudius, who provoked at their intestine dissensions, reduced their country into the form of a province.

[k] Strab. l. xiv.

THEIR customs were much the same with those of the Cretans and Carians, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. But they had one custom peculiar to themselves; for they took their names not from their fathers, but from their mothers, so that if any one was asked, who he was, or of what family, he had recourse to the female line. Besides, if a free-born woman married a slave, her children enjoyed all the privileges of citizens; but on the contrary, if a man of ever so great a family married a slave, their children were incapable of enjoying any honours or bearing any public employment [1]. As to their trade and navigation, we are quite in the dark. Their religion was the same with that of the inhabitants of Crete, which we shall have occasion to describe when we treat of the Greek islands.

THE succession of the kings of Lycia and the years of their respective reigns are overcast with such a mist, and interrupted with so many chasms, that it is not possible to give any tolerable account of them. We find mention of but three kings of all Lycia that we are sure of. Their kings.

AMISODARUS, who is fabled to have nourished the monster Chimæra.

JOBATES, who married his daughter Sthenobæa, or, as others call her, Antea, to Prætus king of the Argives. He is said to have undertaken an expedition against the Tyrinthians in favour of his son-in-law, and to have subdued them. His daughter Sthenobæa falling in love with Bellerophon, the son of Glaucus king of Ephyra, and having solicited him in vain to comply with her unchaste desires, complained to her husband as if she had been solicited by him. Whereupon Prætus, being unwilling to violate violate the laws of hoſpitality by putting a ſtranger to death in his own kingdom, ſent him into Lycia with fetters to Jobates his father-in-law, requeſting him to revenge the affront offered his daughter by the death of the bearer. Jobates, thinking it a baſe thing to imbrue his hands in the blood of a ſtranger, ſent him with a ſmall body of troops againſt the Solymi, a warlike and barbarous people, in hopes he ſhould there find his doom. But Bellerophon returned from this and many other dangerous expeditions, which he was put upon, not only ſafe, but victorious; whereupon Jobates being reconciled to him and diſcovering the calumny, gave him his other daughter in marriage, and with her part of his kingdom.

[1] Herodot. l. i.

MANY years after reigned Cyberniſcus, who was one of Xerxes's admirals in his expedition againſt Greece [m]. And this is all we find upon record concerning the antient kings of Lycia.

[m] Herodot. l. vii.

The Hiſtory of the antient Cilicians.

Name and diviſions.

CILICIA, according to the Greek writers, borrowed its name from Cilix, the ſon of Agenor and brother of Cadmus, who is ſaid by them to have ſettled in this country, as we have obſerved elſewhere [n]. Joſephus [o] tells us, that it was antiently called Tarſis from Tarſhiſh the ſon of Javan, who firſt peopled this part of Aſia [p]; and of the ſame opinion are Stephanus [q], Zonaras [r], and Hierom [s]; but the latter by Tarſis in ſcripture ſometimes underſtands Carthage [t], ſometimes a province in India [u], and ſometimes the ſea [w]. Bochart [x] derives the name of Cilicia from the Phœnician word Challekim or Challukim ſignifying a ſtone, that part of Cilicia, which the Greeks called Cilicia Trachæa, being very ſtony, and to this day called by the Turks Tas Wileieth, that is, the ſtony province.

CILICIA

[n] Vol. ii. p. 366. [o] Joseph. Antiq. l. i. c. 7. [p] See Vol. i. p. 472. [q] Steph. verbo Ταρσος. [r] Zonar. tom. i. [s] Hieronym in quæſt. Hebraic. [t] Idem, in cap. 23. Eſa [u] Idem, ad Marcell. [w] Idem. in cap. 10. Eſa. [x] Bochart. Phal. l. i. c. 5.

CILICIA, properly ſo called, lies between the 36th and 40th degree of north latitude, and is bounded by Syria on the eaſt, or rather by mount Amanus which ſeparates it from that kingdom, by Pamphylia on the weſt, by Iſauria, Cappadocia and Armenia Minor on the north, and by the Mediterranean on the ſouth. It is now called Caramania, having been the laſt province of the Caramanian kingdom that held out againſt the Ottoman race. This province is ſo ſurrounded by ſteep and craggy mountains, chiefly the Taurus and Amanus, that it may be defended by a handful of reſolute men againſt a whole army how numerous ſoever, there being but three narrow paſſes leading into it, commonly called Pylæ Ciliciæ or the gates of Cilicia, one on the ſide of Cappadocia called the paſs of mount Taurus, and the other two, called the paſs of mount Amanus, and the paſs of Syria, leading from Syria. The Perſian army marched through the ſtraits of mount Amanus, while that of Alexander was encamped at Iſſus not far from the ſtraits of Syria, which lie more to the ſouth, and were guarded by a body of Macedonians under the command of Parmenio; the ſtraits of mount Taurus Alexander had paſſed in entering Cilicia, the Perſians who guarded that important paſs having retired at the approach of the Macedonians.

THE whole country was divided by the antients into Cilicia Aſpera and Cilicia Campeſtris; the former, called by the Greeks Trachæa or ſtony, is bounded by Iſauria on the north, Pamphylia on the weſt, Cilicia Campeſtris on the eaſt, and the Mediterranean on the ſouth. The cities in this part of Cilicia, mentioned by the antients, are Sydra, or as Ptolemy calls it, Syedra, Nagidus a Samian colony, Anemurium, Arſione, Celendris or Celenderis, Aphrodiſias, ſo called from Venus who was worſhipped there in a ſtately temple, Holmus, or, as Pliny calls it, Holmia, Sarpedon, famous for a noble temple conſecrated to Apollo and Diana, Zephyrium, according to Ptolemy, the laſt city of Cilicia Aſpera, which Strabo extends to Solæ. Pliny, Mela, and Scylax make no diſtinction between the two Cilicias. Near Zephyrium was a grove much celebrated by the antients, and minutely deſcribed by Pomphonius Mela[y]. Sebaſte, which Archelaus the Cappadocian choſe for his reſidence, after he was Cities of Cilicia Aſpera.

[y] Pomp. Mela, apud. Apollodor. l. i. c. 6. ſect. iii.

by Auguſtus appointed king of Cilicia Aſpera; this city was ſituated on a ſmall iſland called Eleuſa, and not on the continent, where Pliny and Ptolemy have placed it. Theſe were the towns of moſt note on the coaſt of Cilicia Aſpera; the inland cities were, Seleucia, built by Seleucus Nicator on the banks of the Calycadnus, and peopled by the inhabitants of Holmus; it was a free city under the Romans, and maintained its liberty, as is plain from ſeveral medals, at leaſt to the time of the emperor Gordian. Domitianopolis, Philadelphia, Lamus, and in latter times Scandeloro, on the confines of Pamphylia, which, with the adjoining territory, was governed by its own prince, while all the neighbouring provinces were ſubject to the Caramanian kings.

Cities of Cilicia Proper.

THE chief cities of Cilicia properly ſo called, or Cilicia Campeſtris, were, according to Strabo, Soli or Solæ, built by the Rhodians and Achæus. This city was deſtroyed by Tigranes king of Armenia in his wars with the Romans, and rebuilt by Pompey; whence in after-ages it was known by the name of Pompeiopolis. Laertius [z] tells us, that this city was built by Solon on his return from the court of Crœſus, and peopled by a colony from Athens; and adds, that theſe Athenians, having in proceſs of time quite loſt the purity of their native language by converſing with the Barbarians, became remarkable for their rude pronunciation and uncouth expreſſions, whence any impropriety of ſpeech was called a Soleciſm. But this is contradicted by others [a], who derive the word Soleciſm not from the Solenſes in Cilicia, but from the Solii in Cyprus [b]. Tarſus, which produced the great Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and was, if we believe Strabo [c], in former times no ways inferior for the ſtudy of philoſophy and polite literature either to Athens or Alexandria. We are told, that it borrowed its name from Tarſhiſh the ſon of Javan, by whom or by his deſcendants it was built; but Strabo out of Ariſtobulus acquaints us, that it was built by Sardanapalus, and proves his aſſertion from an antient monument found in thoſe parts with this inſcription, Sardanapalus the ſon of Anacyndaraxes built the cities of Anchiale and Tarſus in one day. Tarſus was at firſt the metropolis of all Cilicia, and after Conſtantine's diviſion of Cilicia

[z] Laert. in vitis Philoſoph. [a] Strab. l. xiv. p. 456. [b] vid. Plut. invita Solon. [c] Strab. l. xiv. p. 463.

licia Prima. The inhabitants enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens, which St. Paul thought fit to make use of according to the Portian law [d]. The Tarsians, to ingratiate themselves with Julius Cæsar, exchanged the antient name of their city for that of Juliopolis; but the old name survived the new, that city being called to this day by the Greeks Tersia or Terassa; the Turks, as Bellonius and other more modern travellers inform us, call it Hamsa. Anchiale, built by Sardanapalus, as we hinted above, or, if we believe Athenodorus, by Anchiale the daughter of Japhet. Anazarobum, situated on the river Pyramus, and in the Roman times the metropolis of Cilicia Secunda. Suidas tells us, that it was first called Cyinda, and afterwards Anazabum from one Anazarbus, who was sent by the emperor Nerva to rebuild it after it had been quite ruined by an earthquake; but he is certanly mistaken, since Pliny, who died long before the reign of Nerva, calls the inhabitants of this city Anazarbeni; and Stephanus derives its name from mount Anazarbus at a small distance from the place where this city stood. Anazarbum was the birth place of Dioscorides, and continued in a very flourishing condition to the division of the empire. Epiphania, which gave birth to George the famous Arian bishop of Alexandria. Mopsuestia, the see of Theodorus Mopsuestenus, a great patron of the Nestorian heresy in the time of Chrysostom. Issus, situated on a gulph to which it gave name, and famous for the battle fought near it between Alexander and Darius; this town is now called Ajazzo, and the great gulph on which it stands the gulph of Ajazzo. Alexandria built by Alexander the Great between Issus and the straits which lead from Cilicia into Syria. Ptolemy places this city in Syria, but Strabo more rightly on the bay of Issus. As this city was situated in a place very convenient for trade, it soon became one of the most flourishing cities of the world. Alexander in building it employed Democrates, who had rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus burnt by Erostratus [e], and took care to people his new city with colonies from several other places, especially from Judæa [f], allowing the Jews the free exercise of their own religion, and the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions which he granted the Macedonians. As it was very convenient for such as traded traded on the Mediterranean, the Red-Sea and the Nile, it continued in a flouriſhing condition, till trade took another courſe on the diſcovery of a way to the Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, when it became by degrees a poor village. It is at preſent called by the Turks Scandaroon, by the Italians Alexandretta, remarkable for nothing elſe but ſome ruins, which ſhew what it was in better times. Several other cities are mentioned by the antients, but as they were no ways conſiderable, and are at preſent quite unknown, we ſhall not dwell any longer on this ſubject.

[d] Act. xvi. 37. and xxii. xxv. xxviii. Joseph. contra Apion. l. ii.

[e] Plin. l. v. c. 10.

Rivers. THE rivers of any note in Cilicia are, the Pyramus, which riſes on the north ſide of mount Taurus, and empties itſelf into the Mediterranean between Iſſus and Magarſus; the Cydnus, which ſprings from the Antitaurus, paſſes through Tarſus, and diſembogues itſelf into the Mediterranean near the city of Anchiale; it is famous for the rapidity of its ſtream, and coldneſs of its waters, which proved very dangerous to Alexander; the Calycadnus, the Lamus, the Sarus, the Pinarus, and ſeveral others of leſs note, water this province, and diſcharge themſelves into that part of the Mediterranean, which the antients called the ſea of Cilicia, and extended near two hundred and fifty miles from eaſt to weſt.

Soil and Climate. THAT part of Cilicia, which the antients called Cilicia Campeſtris, was, if we believe Ammianus Marcellinus, one of the moſt fruitful countries of all Aſia; but the weſtern part equally barren, though famous even to this day for an excellent breed of horſes, of which 600 are yearly ſent to Conſtantinople for the ſpecial uſe of the Grand Signior. The air in the inland cities is reckoned very wholeſome, but equally dangerous on the coaſt, eſpecially to ſuch as are not accuſtomed to it.

Their origin THIS country, according to Joſephus [g], was firſt peopled by Tarſhiſh the ſon of Javan and his deſcendants, whence the whole country was called Tarſis, and not the territory alone adjoining to the city of Tarſus, as ſome have wrote. The antient inhabitants were in proceſs of time driven out by a colony of Phœnicians, who under the conduct of Cilix firſt ſettled in the iſland of Cyprus, and from thence paſſed into the country which from their leader they called Cilicia. Strabo [h] tells us, that this Phœnician colony paſſed from Cyprus into Phrygia, where they lived lived in subjection to the kings of Troy, and after the Trojan war poſſeſſed themſelves of that country which was afterwards called Cilicia. In tract of time ſeveral colonies from other countries ſettled in this kingdom, namely from Syria and Greece, whence the Cilicians in ſome places uſed the Greek tongue, in others the Syriac, but the former greatly corrupted by the Perſian, the predominant language of the country being a dialect of that tongue.

[g] Joseph. Antiq. l. i. c. 7. [h] Strab. l. xiii. p. 342.

Their manners, government, &c.

THE Cilicians, if we believe the Greek and Latin writers, were a rough race of people, unfair in their dealings, cruel, great liars (G), and in the Roman times entirely addicted to piracy. They firſt began together with the Pamphylians in the time of the Mithridatic war to infeſt the neighbouring coaſts, and being emboldened with ſucceſs ſoon ventured as far as the coaſts of Greece and Italy itſelf, where they took innumerable ſlaves, whom they ſold to the Cypriots, and the kings of Egypt andSyria. Publius Servilius was firſt employed againſt them, who gave them a great overthrow in a ſea-engagement, took Phaſelis and ſeveral other ſtrong-holds, whither they uſed to retire, and ravaged their whole country. But ſcarce was he withdrawn, when they broke out more violently than ever, filling all the ports and creeks of the Ionian, Mediterranean and Archipelago, with their veſſels, ſo as to entirely obſtruct the navigation. Whereupon Pompey himſelf did not think it beneath his greatneſs to undertake a war againſt them, which he ended in the ſpace of one month, having at the ſame time attacked them both by ſea and land, with 500 ſhips, and 130,000 men.

IN antient times the Cilicians, before they ſettled in that country which we call Cilicia, were governed by their own kings, and divided into two petty kingdoms, viz. the Theban and the Lyrneſſian; in the former ruled the family of Eetion, in the latter that of Evenus. Theſe kingdoms did not extend beyond the territories of Thebes

(G) Which gave riſe to the proverbs, Cilix haud facile verum dicit; Cilicium exitium; and to the ſaying of Pherecrates, Dii ſemper nobis imponunt, more Cilicium; that is, A Cilician ſcarce ever ſpeaks the truth; Cilician cruelty; The gods, like the Cilicians, always deceive us. (32)

(32) vide Chiliad. Eraſmi. verbo Cilix.

and Lyrneſſus, two cities in the famous plain called the plain of Thebes, often mentioned both by the Greek and Latin writers, as having been the occaſion of frequent diſputes between the Lydians and Myſians, and in the Roman times between the neighbouring princes of Aſia Minor. After the ſettling of the Cilicians in that country which from them was called Cilicia, we find no mention made of their kings till the time of Cyrus, to whom they voluntarily ſubmitted, continuing ſubject to the Perſians till the overthrow of that empire, but governed to the time of Artaxerxes Mnemon by kings of their own nation. Herodotus indeed counts Cilicia among the Perſian Satrapies [i]; but from other writers it is manifeſt, that the Cilicians were governed by kings of their own in the time of Xerxes [k] and Artaxerxes Mnemon. After the downfal of the Perſian empire Cilicia became a Macedonian province, and on the death of Alexander fell to the ſhare of Seleucus, and continued under his deſcendants till it was by Pompey reduced to a Roman province. As a proconſular province, it was firſt governed by Appius Claudius Pulcher, and after him by Cicero, who reduced ſeveral ſtrong-holds on mount Amanus, in which ſome Cilicians had fortified themſelves and held out againſt his predeceſſor, for which he was ſaluted by the army with the title of Imperator or General. All Cilicia being thus brought under ſubjection, it was firſt divided into Cilicia Campeſtris and Trachæa; the former became a Roman province, but the latter was governed by kings appointed by the Romans till the reign of Veſpaſian, when the family of Tracodementus being extinct, this part too was made a province of the empire, and the whole divided into Cilicia Prima, Cilicia Secunda, and Iſauria; the firſt took in all Cilicia Campeſtris, the ſecond the coaſt of Cilicia Trachæa, and the laſt the inland parts of the ſame diviſion; and in this ſtate it continued till the diviſion of the empire.

As to the ſucceſſion of the Cilician kings we are almoſt quite in the dark. Thoſe we find mentioned by the antients, are Eetion, who reigned before their migration into Cilicia and aſſiſted Priam againſt the Greeks. He was king of Thebes only, in the defence of which city he was with his ſeven ſons killed, as we read in Homer [l], by Achilles. The famous Andromache, Hector's wife, was his his daughter. Evenus reigned in Lyrneſſus during the Trojan war, and is likewiſe mentioned by Homer [m]. He was ſucceeded in his petty kingdom by his ſons Mines and Epiſtropus, who ſiding with the Trojans were both killed by Achilles. Syenneſis I. who was contemporary with Alyattes king of Lydia, Cyaxares king of the Medes, and Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, as we have hinted in the hiſtories of Media and Lydia. Horomedon mentioned by Herodotus [n]. Syenneſis II. who aſſiſted Xerxes in his expedition againſt Greece [o], and is greatly commended by Æſchylus. Syenneſis III. who aſſiſted, tho' much againſt his will, Cyrus the younger againſt his brother Artaxerxes. After his death we find no mention of kings, but only of governors of Cilicia, appointed by the kings of Perſia; whence we conclude him to have been the laſt that reigned in Cilicia before the country was ſubdued by Alexander. Of the kings that reigned ſeveral ages after in Cilicia Trachæa we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter.

[i] Herodot. l. iii. [k] vid. Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. vii. Diodor. l. xvi. Curt l. ii. [l] Homer. Iliad. Z.

Year of the flood, 2592. Before Chriſt 401.

[m]. Idem. Iliad B. [n] Herodot. l. vii. [o] Herodot. ibid.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVII.

The fabulous and heroic times; Containing the history of the antient kingdoms of Sicyon, Argos, Attica, Bœotia, Arcadia, Thessaly, Corinth, of Sparta to Lycurgus, and some others of less note, to their severally becoming common-wealths.

SECT. I.

An account of the fabulous and heroic times in general.

IT being the design of this chapter to open the way to the history of Greece, by tracing the several nations of it, as far as can be done with probability, to their primitive, weak, rude, and obscure originals; and by pointing out the various steps by which they raised themselves, from the lowest beginnings, to that flourishing state in which they came at length to excel all the world in learning, in arts and sciences, in politeness, in the excellency of their laws and government, and in the strength and valour of their armies; we cannot reasonably expect, that our readers will rest satisfied with our bare endeavouring to give them the best account that can be had of this long and perplexed epocha, clear of all the monstrous fictions with which the extravagant fancies of the poets, and the vanity and ignorance of the Grecian writers, have stuffed it. We shall therefore strive to make the best and shortest way we can through this long period of 900 years, whose antient monuments, though disguised under the tales of the most unnatural actions of the gods, such as their adulteries, rapes, murders, and the like, and the incredible exploits

Original of the Greeks.

ADRIATICI

42

Par thini

Epidamnus seu
Dyrrachium

Almopi

Albani

Albanopolis

GRÆCIA ANTIQUA

prout Primitus in Regna dein in Respub; denique a Romanis in Provincias in hoc Vol: divisa legitur.

S. Wheatley Sculp.t

Vol. II. against page 343

42 exploits of their heroic offspring (A); yet, when divested, from the fable, afford at leaſt ſo much light to thoſe dark times, that all hiſtory of this country would be juſtly thought imperfect without ſome ſhort account of them.

THE

(A) It will not be amiſs to begin our notes on this fabulous epocha with offering ſome tolerable account for that heap of monſtrous fables under which the hiſtory of it is couched; and it will, upon examination, appear to flow from ſome, if not all, of the following reaſons:

1. From the genius of thoſe languages in which theſe antient monuments were written, which was altogether figurative, and whoſe elegance conſiſted in the boldeſt and moſt ſublime alluſions and metaphors.

2. From the writers themſelves, who, being all poets, and recording theſe tranſactions in ſhort ſonnets, to be learned by heart and ſung upon proper occaſions, did ſtill inhance upon their native idiom in poetic pieces, and made choice of the moſt ſtrained and ſurpriſing allegories, that they might make the deeper and more laſting impreſſion both on thoſe who ſang, and thoſe who heard them.

3. From an ambitious affectation of antiquity, equal or ſuperior to other contemporary nations, or perhaps rather from a ſhame of their mean and low extraction, and of their rude, not to ſay brutiſh, anceſtors, who like wild beaſts did live by preying upon one another, having no law or rule, but that of the ſtrongeſt arm. The conſciouſneſs of which made ſome of them fetch their original from certain great heroes begot by ſome lecherous god, either upon ſome kind goddeſs or ſtraggling nymph, whilſt others contented themſelves with pretending, that they ſprung like muſhrooms out of their own native ſoil.

4. This might be alſo another reaſon, why they transformed into fictitious monſters thoſe real ones amongſt them, whoſe cruel and infamous actions they could not either palliate or obliterate.

5. From the high eſteem they had for thoſe renowned heroes, who cleared the country of thoſe peſts of mankind. They could not, it ſeems, look upon the arduous, and yet ſucceſsful, labours of a Minos, Hercules, or a Theſeus in this ſo beneficial a province, without ſuppoſing them to have been more than mortal men, or at leaſt without an ambition to make them paſs in future ages for the offspring of ſome of the gods.

6. From an imitation of, or rather an emulation to outdo, the antient Hebrew heroes, both in their extraction and in their wonderful exploits; thus we find a great part of the character of Hercules to be a mere compound of thoſe of a Samſon, Gideon, Jephtha, and other Jewiſh worthies. The ſame may be ſaid of ſeveral others (1).

(1) vid. Grot. de Verit. Huet demonſt. Evang. & al. mult.

Geography of Greece.

THE limits of Greece, not as they were afterwards enlarged, either by continual sending out of colonies, or by conquests which still carried their name with them, which will be best seen in the next chapter, but only as they relate to our present epocha, extended from north to south, that is, from the long ridge of mountains, which divided it from Macedonia, and from the river Strymon, by which it was parted from Thrace, to the promontory of Tenarus, the utmost southern extent of Peloponnesus, about 6 deg. 20 min. or 380 miles. And from east to west, that is, from the Ægean to the Ionian sea, about 5 deg. 10 min. or 310 miles. It contained the following kingdoms: In Peloponnesus, Sicyon, Argos, Messenia, Corinth, Achaia Propria, Arcadia and Laconia. Out of it, or in Græcia Propria, those of Attica, Megara, Bœotia, Locris, Epichnemidia, Doris, Phocis, Locris, Ozolœa, and Ætolia. In Epirus, the Molossi, Amphilochi, Cassiopœi, Dræopes, Chaones, Thesprotii, Almenii, and Acarnania. In Thessaly, it contained the countries of Thessaliotis, Estiotis, Pelasgiotis, Magnesia, and Phthia [a]. All these have at one time or other been severally governed by kings of their own, whose names we only find occasionally mentioned in the history of the more considerable kingdoms of Argos, Attica, Thebes, and Sparta, of the Argonautic expedition, and of the Trojan war [b]. The fuller description and history of those chief kingdoms will be seen in the following sections; of the rest we must content ourselves with a bare mention, because we know very little except their names.

Their various names.

FOR this reason it cannot be expected, that we should enter into a critical enquiry into the names and original of those various inhabitants of antient Greece. The general names by which they were known, and mentioned by old historians and geographers, were those of Graioi and Graicoi [c] (B). These they quickly changed for those of Achæi and Hellenes [d], by which they are generally called in antient authors

[a] De his vid. Ptol. Herodot. D. Sicul. Mela, Cluver. & al. mult. [b] Pausan. Apoll. & al. [c] Callimach. Hym. in Jov. Sophoc. & al. [d] Thucydid. l. i. Aristot. in Meteor. l. i. c. 14. Steph. Byzant. &c.

(B) From Græcus the father, or, according to others, the son of Thessalus, who gave name to Thessaly (2). But by a modern critic

(2) Euseb. Chronic. Isidor. Orig. l. xiv. c. 4. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. iv. c. 7. Suid. & Steph. Byzant. in Voc. Γραικος & Θεσσαλια thors (C). Another name by which they were known in ſeveral parts of Greece was that of Pelaſgi, which the Arcadians, who are generally reckoned the antienteſt people of it, do challenge from their pretended founder Pelaſgus, who, we find, did get ſuch footing in Peloponneſus, that the whole peninſula was from him called Pelaſgia [e]. We find theſe Pelaſgians, for whom ſome critics and antiquaries have found a much older original (D), ſpread in many critic (3) derived from Ragau the ſame with Reu the ſon of Peleg (4), by the tranſpoſition of a letter to ſoften the ſound.

[e] Id ſub voc. Πελοποννησος.

(C) The firſt ſuppoſed from Achæus the ſon of Xuthus, the ſon of Hellen and father of Ion; or, according to the fable, the ſon of Jupiter (5); the other from Hellen abovementioned, the ſon of Deucalion and father of Dorus, from whom came the Dores, afterwards a famous nation in Greece.

Thucydides obſerves rightly, however, that the name of Hellenes did not univerſally obtain over Greece; ſince Homer, who wrote ſo long after the ſiege of Troy, doth only call them ſo who followed Achilles from Phthiotis (6).

(D) Theſe (7) ſuppoſe, that the deſcendants of Peleg, the fourth in deſcent from Shem the ſon of Noah, whom they ſuppoſe to have been the father of the Scythians, were the firſt who peopled Greece; and that they only ſoftned the name of Peleg, or, according to the ſeptuagint and vulgate, Phaleg their progenitor, aud called themſelves Pelaſgians. The laſt of thoſe authors confirms this opinion, drawn from the affinity between the Hebrew and antient Greek, from the various dialects and pronunciations of the latter, which in the Doric comes neareſt to the eaſtern tongues; and from the remainder of thoſe tongues, eſpecially in thoſe places where the Pelaſgians have been, which Bochart thought of Phœnician, but our author will rather have of Hebrew extraction.

All this is further confirmed by a paſſage in Epiphanius, who ſays (8), that from the age of Therah downward, Phaleg and Ragau removed towards the clime of Europe to part of Scythia, and were joined to thoſe nations from which the Thracians came.

This

(3) Salmaſ. de re Hellenicſt. p. 2. c. 1. ap. Hind. introd. in Hiſt. Græc. (4) 1 Chron. i. 25. Gen. xi. 18, 19. (5) vid. Byzant ſub voce Ιωνια. (6) Thucydid. l. i. (7) Grot. Salmaſ. & Stilling fleet. orig. Sacr. l. iii. c. 4. (8) Epiſt. ad Acac. & Paul.

ny other parts of Greece, as in Attica, Theſſaly and Epirus; in which laſt they have been ſuppoſed by ſome [f] to have laid the foundation of the Dodonean oracle. But the moſt antient name of all is univerſally allowed to be that of Iones, which the Greeks themſelves derive from Ion the ſon of Xuthus, or, as the fable hath it, of Apollo by Creuſa the daughter of Erechtheus, and grandſon to Deucalion [g]. But it is more probable, as Joſephus affirms[h], that their original is of much older date, and that Javan, the ſon of Japhet and grandſon of Noah, and his deſcendants were the firſt who peopled theſe countries, as the learned Bochart ſeems to have proved by very ſtrong arguments [i] (E).

It

[f] vid. Strab. Geogr. l. v. vid. & Pauſan. in Attic. & Byzant ſub voce Θεσσαλια. [g] vid. Herodot. l. viii. Apollod. l. i. c. 7. Pauſan. Achaic. [h] Ant. l. i. c. 7. [i] Phaleg. l. 3.

This laſt paſſage, where-ever Epiphanius got it, has been ſufficiently confuted by Bochart (9), who ſhews, that both Phaleg and Ragau, and their deſcendants, continued ſtill in the confines of Media and Armenia. And we have elſewhere ſhewn †, that the Scythians were the deſcendants of Magog, and not of Phaleg or Ragau. They were the ſons of Japhet and not of Shem, who divided the iſles of the gentiles (10). We ſhall therefore leave the Pelaſgians to their own founder, and find a much more likely one for the antient Greeks in the following note.

(E) 1. From the authority of Joſephus above quoted. 2. From the name itſelf of the patriarch, without the points, ſounding more properly Jon than Javan. 3. From the authority of Moſes, who ſays (11), that by theſe (the ſons of Japhet) were the iſles of the Gentiles divided; which, according to the genius of the Hebrew, means, not iſlands properly ſo called, but all maritime countries, at any diſtance from Paleſtine, eſpecially thoſe which are along the Mediterranean. 4. From that of the prophets (12), who call Græcia by the name of יון Jon, or, as pointed, Javan. According to which the Jews have all along to this day called the Greek tongue יונית Javanith.

All this is further confirmed by our author from the clear remains of Eliſha Javan's eldeſt ſon (13), which were ſtill to be found in that of Elis, one of the antient kingdoms of Peloponneſus.

(9) Phaleg l. ii. c. 14. † See before, Vol. v. p. 388.
(10) See Gen. x. ver. 2. ad 5. (11) Gen. x. 5.
(12) vid. int. al. Eſai. cap. ult. ver. 19. Dan. viii. 21. x. 20.
(13) Gen. x. 4.

It is true indeed, that among the Greeks themſelves; only the original Athenians and ſuch colonies as ſprang from them were called Iones, but then it is plain beyond exception, that other nations called all the inhabitants of Greece by that name; witneſs the teſtimony of Heſychius[k], and the ſcholiaſt on Ariſtophanes[l], and thoſe paſſages of holy writ mentioned in the laſt note. We omit the names of ſeveral other people among the antient Greeks, which were ſuppoſed to have been the oldeſt of all, but which do not appear by far to have been the firſt peoplers of that country; ſuch were the Aones, Hyanthes, Leleges, Dryopi, Caucones, Jemmices, and others mentioned by Strabo[m], but which may be better ſuppoſed to have been reliques of the old Carians, who, Thucydides tells us, made frequent incurſions into Greece[n]. Iones deſcended from Javan.

If we look upon this infant ſtate of Greece with reſpect to its inhabitants, it appears, even by the confeſſion of their own writers, to have been one continued, uncultivated deſart, inhabited by ſavage creatures ſcarcely removed one degree from brutes; men living indifferently on every fruit, herb, or root, that came in their way, and lying either in the open fields, or at beſt ſheltering themſelves from the inclemency of the weather, in dens, clefts and hollow trees[o]. The firſt improvement they made to their way of living was exchanging their old food for the more wholeſome acorns, building themſelves huts to ſleep in, and covering their bodies with the ſkins of beaſts. All this it ſeems they were beholden to Pelaſgus abovementioned[p], whoſe memory was highly reverenced among them upon that account. But this reformation in their way of living wrought none upon their manners. On the contrary, they, who had no occaſion to fight for any thing but a hole to ſleep in, began now to envy and rob one another of theſe new acquiſitions. This in time put them under a neceſſity of joining themſelves into companies under ſome head, that they might either more ſafely plunder their neighbours, or preſerve what they had got. Laws they had none, except that of the ſtrongeſt arm; ſo that they only lived ſafeſt and moſt quietly, who inhabited the moſt craggy and barren ſpots of ground, whilſt thoſe, who were more pleaſantly or fruitfully ſeated, were continually liable to be diſpoſſeſſed The manners of the antient Greeks.

[k] Sub voce Ἰαονία. [l] Ap. Hind. Introduct. in hiſt. Græc. [m] Geogr. l. vii. [n] lib. i. [o] vid. Horat. Satir. & Pauſan. in Arcadic. [p] Id. ibid.

dispossessed by new invaders. Hence it was, that Greece for a long time had no settled inhabitants, but was in a continual fluctuation, the weakest being always sure to be turned out by the strongest. Their gigantic size and strength if we may believe Plutarch [q], added so much to their insolence and cruelty, that they seemed to glory in committing the greatest acts of violence and barbarity on those that unhappily fell into their hands.

THE case did not alter much for the better after they came to form themselves into regular societies, and build themselves towns and cities for safety. Attica seems the only place that was free from those incursions, because it was destitute of every thing that could invite a plundering enemy; but those cities fared worst which were situate on the sea-coasts, because they were in continual danger of being plundered either by sea or land; for pirates did not less infest all those seas, than the robbers did the land. And this was one main cause why most of the antient cities of Greece were built at some distance from the shore, but even in these, as all their safety consisted in the resistance they could make against an invader, so their inhabitants were under a necessity of going constantly armed, and to be ever on their guard.

Pirates and robbers.

ANOTHER mischief arising from these continual piracies and robberies was, that the far greater part of their land did lie uncultivated, so that men only planted and sowed as much as was barely necessary for their present support; and where there was such an universal neglect of agriculture, there could be as little room for any discoveries in other useful arts and trades at land, as in commerce and navigation at sea. Hence it is also, that whilst other antient nations, as the Jews, the Egyptians, Midianites, and Phœnicians, had improved them to a very great degree, as we have seen in their several histories, the Greeks alone seem to have been the only strangers to them; insomuch, that one may reasonably question, by Homer's making oxen the standard of the value of things, whether they knew the use of money even in his days. One art however, one would have expected them to have been very expert in, that of war, and the only one indeed they seemed to have had a value for; but even here, the very reverse may be inferred from what the same poet tells us, of Neglect of agriculture.

Trades.

Art of war.

[q] In Theseo.

of ſome of his heroes putting whole ſquadrons of them to flight.

Arts and ſciences.

We ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in the ſequel, that they had no letters till Cadmus brought them thither out of Phænicia, whoſe alphabet, conſiſting only of ſixteen letters, was not perfected into that of twenty-four till many centuries after him. It was from him likewiſe that they learned arithmetic, navigation, and commerce; as for other ſciences, they continued much longer ſtrangers to them; and it was not till ſome of their great men began to travel into Egypt and other kingdoms, and the Celtes made their frequent incurſions into Greece †, that they began to have ſome knowledge and reliſh for them. We are indeed told, that Orpheus, Muſæus and ſome others, who went into the firſt of thoſe countries much earlier, did bring a great deal ofthe Egyptian divinity and religious rites from thence [r]. But as for aſtronomy, geometry, philoſophy, and magic, they were fetched long after, the firſt from Babylon, the next from Egypt, and the laſt from Perſia [s]; ſo ignorant we find them of the firſt of theſe ſciences, that they knew of no other way of dividing the day than by dark and light, or time of ſleeping and waking, nor the years, but by the time of ſowing and reaping.

Their government.

Their government was ſtill more rude and barbarous; every city, and almoſt every village or obſcure town, was a petty tyranny, governed by a head, to whom nevertheleſs they gave the name of king. Hence that vaſt number of ſmall inconſiderable kingdoms with which this country ſwarmed, and of the greateſt part of which we know little elſe than their names, and that of one or ſometimes two of their petty monarchs, which are occaſionally mentioned in the hiſtory of thoſe of more note, into which they were afterwards blended either by alliances or conqueſt.

Laws.

Laws, at leaſt a written body of them, we do not find they had till the times of the Athenian Archons; till then all depended on the will aud the definitive ſentence of their kings; only in dubious and important caſes, it was uſual for them to conſult ſome oracle, of which they had variety; the two moſt famous were that of Jupiter at Dodona

† See before, Vol. v. p. 408. [r] Herodot. l. i. D. Sicul. Bibl. Hiſt. l. i. [s] Vid. Tatian. Orat. cont. Græc.

dona and that of Apollo at Delphi, ſituated on the hill Parnaſſus. (F).

THEIR

(F) It will doubtleſs be expected, that we ſhould ſay at leaſt ſo much of theſe oracles as may enable our readers to frame an idea of them, ſince they were eſteemed of ſuch concern, that ſcarce any public affairs were tranſacted (or hardly any private ones, if the perſons were in circumſtances to pay for it) without conſulting ſome of them; but as a particular account of them all would carry us too far, we ſhall content ourſelves with a ſhort deſcription of that of Delphi, as it was the moſt celebrated and frequented of any, either in Greece or in any other part of the world, not only on account of its antiquity, contending even with that of Jupiter at Dodona, but becauſe Apollo was ſuppoſed more peculiarly to preſide over, and to inſpire men with the knowledge of futurity. Upon this account alſo it was eſteemed to outdo all others in the clearneſs and certainty of its anſwers; and by the great concourſe of people who reſorted to and enriched it with preſents, it did likewiſe outſhine all the reſt in ſplendor and wealth.

Its foundation, origin and magnificence, ſhall be ſeen in its proper place: here we ſhall content ourſelves with a ſhort account of the manner in which it was wont to be conſulted and delivered, and by way of ſpecimen to the reſt; as for thoſe of other countries, or other deities, the reader may, if he pleaſe, ſee them in our learned biſhop Potter's Grecian archæology.

1ſt, Thoſe who conſulted the oracle were to offer ſome conſiderable preſent to the god. 2dly, They offered alſo ſome ſacrifices to him, and according as theſe carried a good or bad omen, ſo the Pythoneſs conſented or refuſed to conſult the deity. 3dly, The queſtion to be aſked was be couched in as few words as poſſible. We omit ſome other circumſtances of leſs moment, and which varied according to time and place, the quality of the perſons conſulting, and the nature of the queſtion to be aſked.

2. The time for conſulting the oracle was only one month in the year, and that was in the ſpring; the ſeventh day of that month was called Apollo's birth-day, becauſe originally the Pythoneſs gave no anſwers but on that day, ſo that they came ſo thick to her, that they were forced to lengthen the time; in latter ages it came to be once a month (1).

3. The perſon who delivered the anſwer was to be a woman. They were originally to be virgins, but, one of them having been deflowered, they came at length to make choice of women above fifty years of age, that in caſe the ſame misfortune ſhould happen to them, their ſhame might be out of danger of being diſcovered by pregnancy. Yet even theſe they obliged to go apparelled

(1) Plutarch. Græc. Quæſt. 9.

THEIR religion was ſtill worſe than all the reſt, being little elſe than a corruption, if we may be allowed that word, of the Egyptian theology, brought thither at firſt Religion.

apparelled like virgins, but in a plain and homely dreſs, that they might give no temptation to their cuſtomers.

Pythia, the name that was given to the woman that delivered the oracle, is variouſly derived, by ſome, in memory of the ſerpent Pytho killed by Apollo, by others otherwiſe; but moſt probably from Pytho, which was but another name for Delphi, the place where this oracle was given, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

When all the previous ceremonies had been performed on the enquirer's part, this Pythia, having waſhed herſelf in the fountain Caſtalis at the foot of Parnaſſus, and ſhaken the laurel-tree that grew by it, ſhe crowned herſelf with a garland of thoſe leaves, and ſometimes alſo did eat ſome of them; and then aſcended the celebrated Tripod or Tripus, and ſitting down upon it waited for the impulſe of the god.

What kind of machine this wonderful Tripod was, is variouſly canvaſſed, and to as little purpoſe. Some take it to have been a braſs pot filled with duſt, through which a miraculous vapour was conveyed into the belly of the Pythoneſs, and thence came out at her mouth; others ſay, it was filled with pebbles, by the agitation of whom ſhe conceived the mind of the deity; others ſay, that it was large enough for her to plunge herſelf into; but the moſt probable opinion is, that it was a table or ſeat on which ſhe either leaned or ſat (3).

It was called Tripod becauſe it had three feet, alluding, according to ſome, to the three great celeſtial circles, viz. the two tropics, and the equinoctial line; but more probably, if they had any original meaning, from the three periods of time, paſt, preſent and future. They had more than one of theſe Tripods. The moſt antient of them was that which the people of that country cauſed to be ſet over the mouth of the miraculous cave, after they had found out its prophetic power. The next is ſaid to have been wrought by Vulcan, and preſented to Apollo by Pelops king of the Eleans; but the moſt famous one was that which the fiſhermen drew up with their nets, and, being adjudged by the oracle to the worthieſt of the ſeven wiſe men who flouriſhed then in Greece, and through modeſty refuſed by him, was dedicated to this Delphic Apollo. The two firſt appear to have been of braſs, and the laſt was of gold; ſome think alſo, there were likewiſe more than one Pythia at the ſame time, but without by Cecrops, an Egyptian exile and founder of the Attic monarchy, who, according to Pauſanias, did firſt introduce the worſhip of Jupiter into his new kingdom. Orpheus, Dædalus, and Melampus, went and fetched new ſupplies of Egyptic idolatry and ſuperſtition; and Greece was ſoon after without any good foundation (4); however, when ſhe, who officiated as ſuch, had received the divine afflatus into her belly, from whence ſhe was called εγγαστριμυθος and ςερνομαντις, ſhe began ſometimes to ſwell, foam at the mouth, tear her hair and fleſh, like one in the ſtrongeſt phrenſy, at other times her ſpirit moved her more gently. Sometimes the paroxyſm has been ſo terrible, that it hath ſcared away the prieſts as well as the conſulters, and one of them is ſaid to have died by the violence of it (5). Some add, that a dragon or ſerpent has been ſeen to return the anſwer from under the Tripod, and that the Pythia was once killed by him.

(2) Lyſiſtr. Scholiaſt. in Ariſtoph. ap. Potter Archæolog. l. ii. c. 9. (3) Cœl. Rhodig. lect. antiq. l. viii. c. 15. ap. eund.

The anſwer was returned viva voce, and in hexameter or heroic verſe. Pauſanias attributes this form of anſwering to the famed Phœmonoe the firſt Delphic Pythia. But the hymn of Beou, a Delphic lady, attributes it to Olen, who with his Hyperboreans inſtituted this oracle, and changed their ruſtic proſe into the ſmooth and heroic verſe.

But though this oracle was the moſt famed for the clearneſs and truth of its anſwers, inſomuch, that it was often applied to, to explain the more intricate ones of other places, yet was it not without its ambiguities, ſo as to be eaſily applicable to the event, let it fall which way it would. Herodotus gives us ſome inſtances of this kind of amphibolious anſwers given to Crœſus, of which that unfortunate king, a munificent votary to the Delphic god, juſtly complains, as having more than once or twice miſled him to his ruin (6).

The reader may ſee a number of other inſtances of the ſame nature in Pauſanias (7), beſides thoſe which we ſhall have occaſion to mention in the ſequel, and which, though fulfilled contrary to the meaning and expectation of the conſulters, yet ſeemed to be directed by ſome foreſeeing being, becauſe they ſtill anſwered the prediction, though in a different ſenſe. Of this nature was that which forewarned Epaminondas to beware of what the Greeks called the Pelagos; by which he underſtanding it to mean the ſea which they called πελαγος, forbore to go into any ſhip or galley, whereas it was the Mantinean wood of that name, of which the oracle bid him beware. Much after the after furniſhed with a number of deities, ſuited to the taſte of their brutal votaries, and with a ſanction and precedent for every unſocial and unnatural vice. To this deſperate and univerſal degeneracy of the Grecian nation it is, that we have ventured in a former note to aſcribe in ſome meaſure all the fabulous accounts, which the poets have given us concerning the birth, extraction, and extravagant exploits of thoſe famous heroes, who beſtowed ſo much pains and time to reform and aboliſh it. Of this number were Minos, Hercules, Theſeus and many more, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel, ſome of whom cleared the ſeas, others the land, of that peſtilent race, and others, laſtly, by wholeſome laws, by the introduction of commerce, arts, and ſciences, laid the happy foundations for that politeneſs and grandeur, for which they were ſo juſtly famed in after-ages.

(4) Vener. de divinat. (5) Vid. Plutarch. de defect. Orac. (6) lib. i. (7) In Arcad. Vid. & eund. in Phoc. & Potter ubi ſupra.

THIS fabulous epoch, as it includes all that the poets have ſung and hiſtorians recorded, concerning the foundation of all the antient Grecian monarchies, the exploits of the Grecian heroes, their wars and other tranſactions from the end of the Trojan war and upwards, to the foundation of the Sicyonian kingdom the moſt antient of all, amounts to 905 years, that is from A. M. 1915. when Ægialeus is ſaid to have laid the foundation of his kingdom, to the deſtruction of Troy, A. M. 2820. (G) [t]. But as under

The chronology of this epoch.
Year of the flood, 910.
Before Chriſt, 2089

[t] Vid. Uſſer. Ann. ſub utroque an. ex Caſtor. ap Euſeb. Chronic.

the ſame nature is the Carthaginian general ſaid to have been deceived, when he was told by another oracle that he ſhould be buried in Libya; from which he concluded, that after having beaten the Romans he ſhould return and die in his own country, whereas the oracle meant the town of Libyſſa in Bithynia, but according to our author called by the Nicomedians Libya, in which he died.

It was for this reaſon, that theſe predictions, attributed by the Heathens to ſome godhead, were by the primitive fathers aſcribed to the devil, who, though uncapable to dive into futurity, yet could give a greater gueſs into it than any mortal; but we leave the diſquiſition of ſuch queſtions to divines, as well as the times and cauſes of theſe oracles ceaſing in the heathen world, though this laſt we may perhaps touch upon, when we come to reſume the ſequel of the Jewiſh hiſtory.

(G) We need not tell our readers, that this chronology is far enough from being unqueſtionable; thoſe who have read Sir Iſaac der this period are contained the hiſtories of the ſeveral following manarchies; 1. That of Sicyon abovementioned: 2. Of Argos and Mycenæ: 3. Attica 4. Bœotia; 5. Arcadia: 6. Theſſaly: 7. Corinth: 8. Sparta, and ſome others, from their foundation to their either becoming incorporate with others, or to their ſeverally reſolving themſelves into commonwealths; this laſt circumſtance will oblige us both to extend it beyond what is properly called the fabulous and heroic epocha down to the times of their reſpective change of government, and to give a fuller chronology of each kingdom under each diſtinct head.

OTHER meterial tranſactions under this period are chiefly thoſe that follow, the Ogygian and Deucalion floods; the murder committed by the daughters of Danaus on their huſbands; the labours of Hercules; the unfortunate adventures of Œdipus; the Argonautic expedition; and the wars of Minos and Theſeus; the exploits and adventures of Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Atlas; thoſe of Perſeus and Bellerophon; the rapes of Io, Europa, and Helena; the war of the Epigoni or ſeven champions againſt Thebes; the Trojan war, ſpoken of in a former chapter; the fatal end of the greateſt part of the Grecian chiefs; the infamous exploits of the gods; and in a word, all the heroic deeds of their pretended offspring, in ſuppreſſing robbers and Iſaac Newton on this ſubject will eaſily agree with him, that the reigns of the ſeveral kings of Sicyon, Argos, &c. are ſpun out to an unnatural length, they amounting one with another to thirty-five and forty years apiece, which is almoſt double the time that thoſe of Judah and Iſrael reigned.

It is alſo not unlikely, that the foundation of the Sicyonian kingdom is vaſtly antedated, and that the eleven or twelve kings whom they pretend to have reigned between Apis and Epaphus or Epopeus, whom our author thinks to have been two names for the ſame perſon, were only feigned, and interlarded here to add the greater antiquity to that kingdom. We are told, that it began 232 years before the time of Inachus, or 1313 years before the firſt Olympiad (8); but what certainly can there be in a tradition of ſuch a length;

The ſame fault may be ſuppoſed to run through the whole chronology of the other kingdoms belonging to this epoch, ſince their foundation is likewiſe previous to the Olympiads, before which all computation of time is dark, precarious, and, in many inſtances, notoriouſly falſe.

(8) Caſtor ap. Euſeb. Chron. Vid. Newt. Chronol.

and pyrates, pulling down tyrants, protecting the oppreſſed, and for forming the Greek nation by degrees from anarchy, cruelty, and barbariſm, into a polite, warlike, and glorious people.

SECT. II.

The Hiſtory of the antient kingdom of Sicyon.

SICYON has the firſt place in this dark province of antiquity, both as being older than all the reſt, and becauſe it boaſts a ſucceſſion of twenty-ſix kings, whoſe ſeveral reigns makes up an epoch of nine-hundred and ſixty years and upwards. Its original name was Ægiala, given to it by Ægialeus, the ſuppoſed founder and firſt monarch of it. Whether the whole kingdom, or only its metropolis, were called by that name, is not certain; but it exchanged it afterwards for that of Apia, from Apis the 4th king from Ægialeus, and in proceſs of time it had that of Sicyon given to it, which was that of their 19th monarch, who reigned about 40 years after its ſuppoſed foundation, and from that time, not only the kingdom, but the whole peninſula of Peloponneſus, was called Sicyonia, until its diſſolution, and even beyond it [a]. Names.

THIS little kingdom was ſituate on the north part of Peloponneſus, ſince called the bay of Corinth. It had the province of Achaia on the weſt, and the Iſthmus which joins the peninſula to the continent of Greece on the eaſt. What its extent was cannot be known. The capital of it is ſuppoſed to have been ſituate upon the river Aſopus in about thirty-eight degrees and a half of north latitude, and twenty-three degrees and a half of eaſt longitude, having the bay of Corinth on the north, the reſt of the Peloponneſus on the other three points [b]. Situation.

ITS territory was rich, abounding with corn, vines, olive-trees, and other commodities, beſides ſome iron mines. It was in proceſs of time very much adorned, by Sicyon and his ſucceſſors, with temples, altars, monuments and Natural and artificial rarities.

[a] Stephan. de Urb. Strab. [b] Strab. Mela & al.

ſtatues, of all their gods and antient monarchs. It would be juſtly eſteemed the antienteſt mornarchy in the world, not excepting even thoſe of Egypt and Aſſyria, were it true, that its founder lived about 150 years after the flood, that is about 200 years before Noah's death, as ſome have computed it from Euſebius, who affirms this monarchy to have been founded 1313 years before the firſt olympiad [c].

Chronology. But that miſtake has been rectified by other chronologers, who make him contemporary with Terah Abraham's father, and to have began his reign about the year of the world 1915, or even later about A. M. 2236 [d], which brings it ſomewhat lower than the year of the flood 900; beſides it is not improbable, as Sir Iſaac Newton obſerves, that chronologers have ſplit Apis Epaphus (the 4th in deſcent from Ægialeus) into two kings, and between them have inſerted eleven or twelve feigned names of kings who did nothing, and thereby have made its founder Ægialeus 300 years older than his brother Phoroneus [e], the ſon of Inachus and founder of Phoronium, ſince called Argos. The truth is, we know nothing of theſe princes, but their names and the years they are affirmed to have reigned. The ſame indeed may be ſaid of the greateſt part of their ſucceſſors. We meet with no memorable action or conqueſt performed by any of them during the long ſpace of 960 years; though this epocha, dark and remote as it is, is ſo fruitful of the moſt ſurprizing exploits in moſt other contemporary kingdoms. However, we ſhall here ſubjoin a liſt of thoſe twenty-ſix monarchs with the length of their reigns, as we find it tranſmitted to us.

[c] Heyl. ex Euſeb. Chronic.
[d] Uſſer. Rawleigh & al.
[e] Newt. Chronol. introd. p. 6.

Kings

Kings of Sicyon.

		Reigned Years.			Reigned Years.
1	Ægialeus	52	14	Marathus	30
2	Europs	45	15	Æchyræus	55
3	Telchin or Selchin	20	16	Corax	30
4	Apis	25	17	Epopæus	35
5	Thelxion or Thelaſion	52	18	Laomedon	40
			19	Sicyon	45
6	Ægirus	34	20	Polybus	40
7	Eurymachus al. Thurimachus	45	21	Inachus or Ianiſchus	42
8	Leucippus	53	22	Phœſtus	8
9	Moſſapius	47	23	Adraſtus	4
10	Peratus	46	24	Polyphides	31
11	Plemneus	48	25	Pelaſgus	20
12	Orthopelis	63	26	Zeuxippus	32
13	Marathon	30
				In all years	962

THERE is little elſe to be found in hiſtory worth notice concerning theſe monarchs, beſides what we hinted above, Thoſe that are the moſt remarkable in the liſt are, 1. Ægialeus the founder; 2. Apis, from whom the country was called Apia; 3. Ægirus, the ſuppoſed founder of the antient city of Ægira, ſituate on a high and almoſt inacceſſible hill; once the capital of Achaia properly ſo called, and now ſuppoſed to be the ſmall village of Hylocaſtro; 4. Marathon, of whom the famous fields ofMarathon had probably their name; 5. Epopæus, who built a ſtately temple to Minerva and adorned it with his own trophies; 6. Sicyon from whom the whole country and peninſula took the name of Sicyonia. He is likewiſe ſuppoſed to have either built, or at laſt enlarged, the metropolis of the kingdom, and to have called it by his own name.

AFTER the death of Zeuxippus the laſt king in the liſt, that ſtate is ſaid to have been governed by the prieſts of Apollo Carneus, five of whom held the ſovereignty only during one year each; after which Amphictyon held it nine years ſucceſſively, and Charidemus the laſt of them

continued

continued in it eighteen years [f]. After this hierarchy had laſted thirty two years the Heraclidæ, who were by that time returned into Peloponneſus, became maſters of it, or, according to Pauſanias, the kingdom was incorporated with the Dores, and became ſubject to that of Argos [g], the next antient kingdom to that of Sicyon.

[f] Euſeb. Chron. [g] In Corinth.

SECT. III.

The Hiſtory of the antient kingdom of Argos.

WE have already hinted in the laſt ſection, that not the kingdom only of Sicyon, but the whole Peloponneſus, was called Ægiale and Apia from the firſt and fourth kings of it. There were likewiſe two kings of the ſame name in Argos; the one the younger ſon of Inachus the founder of the kingdom, and the other the ſon of Phornutus the elder brother of Ægialeus [a]. Hence theſe two have been confounded with thoſe of Sicyon, and their kingdom thought to have been of as antient, if not of older, date than the Sicyonian, and the country to have received their name not from the Sicyonian, but from the Argive monarch. In ſo dark a diſpute we can only ſay, that the Argive Ægialeus being only a younger brother, and it not appearing that he reigned at all there, ſeeing his brother Phornutus left the kingdom to his own ſon, it is not ſo likely, that the country ſhould receive its name from him as from that of Sicyon. However, the kingdom ſoon changed its name for that of Argolis from Argos, the ſon of Jupiter by Niobe, who was ſiſter to Apis, upon whom the kingdom devolved, becauſe Apis died without iſſue. It was alſo called Hippium and Hippoboton from the neighbouring paſtures, in which Neptune is ſaid to have fed his horſes [b], or rather from an excellent breed of horſes which that country was famed for.

THIS

[a] Apollodor. l. ii. c. 1. Vid. Hind. hiſt. Greec. [b] Pauſan. in Corinth.

THIS kingdom is ſituate on the north-eaſt ſide of Peloponneſus, ſurrounded on the eaſt by the two bays of Saron, now Golfo de Neapoli, and of Argos, and has the kingdom of Sicyon or Achaia Propria and Arcadia on the north and weſt, and that of Laconia on the ſouth. What its antients limits were is hard to ſay; but it is very much enlarged by ſome of its monarchs, ſo that it extended itſelf from eaſt to weſt from 23 deg. 40 min. to 24 deg. 50 min. eaſt longitude, or about ſeventy miles, and north and ſouth from 37 deg. and a half to 38 deg. 20 min. north latitude, or about fifty miles. Situation and extent.

ITS chief river is the Inachus, ſo called from the founder of this kingdom. It empties itſelf into the bay of Argos, now called Golfo de Engia, near the port Aſine. On this river was ſituate the metropolis, called alſo Inachus from its founder and fourth monarch, and famous among other things for the death of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who, having forced an entrance into it, was knocked on the head with a tile flung by an old woman from the top of a houſe. Here was alſo the brazen tower, in which Danae, being confined by her father, was deflowered by Jupiter. It was likewiſe much enriched by its trade, and particularly that of a fine breed of Horſes bred about its territory, from which the name of Hippium was given to it. 2. Next to Argos was Mycenæ, which became in proceſs of time the ſeat of the kingdom, and is celebrated by Horace for her riches, as her rival Argos was for her horſes. 3. Træzen. once the royal ſeat of Pitteus the grand father of Theſeus, 4. Nemea, famous for the Nemean games, ſuppoſed to have been inſtituted there in memory of Hercules's killing a lion which infeſted that neighbourhood or, as others will have it, in the memory of the ſon of Lycurgus king of the country about Nemea, who had been killed by a ſerpent, whilſt his nurſe Hyſipyle went to ſhew the Argives to a ſpring of water. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more fully of this adventure in the ſequel. 5. Epidaurus, in which ſtood the ſo famed temple of Æſculapius, reſorted to from moſt parts of Europe and Aſia for the cure of all diſtempers. 6. Nauplia, ſo called from its founder Nauplius king of Ebena, and for its excellent ſituation and harbour, whence it had the name of Nauplia Navale, now Neapolis, from which the gulf on which it is ſituate hath its modern name [d]. Natural and artificial rarities.

THE

[c] Steph. de Urb. [d] Mela, Heyl. Cluver.

Goverment. THE government of Argos, and afterwards of Mycenæ, continued altogether monarchical from its firſt foundation to its eſtabliſhing itſelf into a downright democracy. Pauſanias indeed obſerves, that the Argives were extremely jealous of their liberties, and were ever endeavouring to encroach upon the royal prerogative. However, they did not wholly clip it till after a long ſucceſſion of princes; the Heraclidæ, who were of the family of Perſeus, recovered the kingdom from that of Pelops, about eighty years after the taking of Troy, or about forty years before its becoming a commonwealth; for it was during that ſpace that they gained ſo much ground upon their kings, that they left them little elſe than the bare name; but by what laws they were antiently governed, or by whom they were enacted, and how far theſe monarchs were tied by them, is what we will not venture to ſay.

Year of the flood, 1143. Before Chriſt 1856. The chronology of Argos.

THIS kingdom, Euſebius tells us out of Caſtor [e], was founded 1080 years before the firſt olympiad, that is, according to Uſher, in the year of the world 2148, ſo that Inachus the founder of it was contemporary with Abraham, and with Thurimachus the 7th king of Sicyon. It continued under the name of the Argolic kingdom till the reign of Acriſius the 14th king of it, who transferred the ſeat of it to Mycenæ a city of his own founding, about the year of the world 2700 and about the year 550 of its foundation, from which time that part of it continued to be called the kingdom of Mycenæ, till the diſſolution which happened about the year 2920, when the Heraclidæ made themſelves maſters again both of this and of the whole peninſula, after it had ſtood upwards of 770 years, and under the government of twenty one monarchs. The Argolic kingdom, properly ſo called, retained likewiſe its own kings after this diviſion until the Heraclidæ, whoſe family had been ſet aſide by that of Euryſtheus, the implacable enemy of Hercules and all his race, above an age before. Theſe dividing the peninſula into three kingdoms, that of Argos had not continued above forty years, before Meltas there laſt king, having made a puſh to recover the royal prerogative, which was dwindled by that time to the loweſt pitch, loſt both his kingdom and life, after which the Argive government was changed into a democracy.

A Liſt

[e] Chronic.

A List of the kings of Argos before its Translation to Mycenæ.

1 Inachus
2 Phoroneus
3 Apis
4 Argus
5 Pirasus, al. Criasus
6 Phorbas
7 Triophas
8 Crotopus
9 Sthenelus
10 Danaus
11 Lynceus
12 Abas
13 Prœtus
14 Acrisius
15 Perseus

Founder of the kingdom of Mycenæ.

16 Talaon
17 Adrastus
18 Ægialeus
19 Diomedes

Kings of Mycenæ.

1 Perseus
2 Eurystheus
3 Atreus and Thyestes
4 Agamemnon
5 Ægisthus
6 Orestes
7 Tisamenus al. Penthilus

Kings of the Heraclidæ at Argos, after they had recovered Peloponnesus and divided it into three kingdoms.

1 Temenus
2 Cisus
3 Lacidaus
4 Meltas

1. Inachus, the supposed son of Oceanus and Tethys (A), is affirmed to have been the founder of this kingdom. He married his sister Melissa, by whom he had two sons, Phoroneus and Ægialeus; he is supposed to be the father of Io, and therefore the Greeks are sometimes called from him Inachi. Inachus.

2. Phoroneus

(A) Or rather because he came thither by sea. We have had occasion in a former chapter to take notice of this extravagant vanity in the descendents of those first founders of kingdoms of raising them such fabulous genealogies, in order to disguise the obscurity of their origin, by ascribing it to some god, to the sea, rivers, nymphs, and such like extraordinary progenitors. We shall refer the reader to the caution we gave them there concerning these miraculous offsprings †.

† Vid sup. Vol. v. p. 482. sub. fin. not.

Phoroneus. 2. PHORONEUS ſucceeded his father, enlarged his territories, and gathered the people who were before diſperſed about the country into one city, which was called from him Phoronium [f], he is ſaid to have a ſon, by the nymph Laodice, named Apis; and a daughter named Niobe, who became the firſt paramour of the luſtful god Jupiter, by whom ſhe had a ſon named Argos. From Phoroneus, his ſuppoſed ſiſter Io, is ſometimes called Phoronis by the poets. [g].

Apis. 3. APIS ſucceeded his father, but governing too tyrannically, a faction was formed againſt him, which was upheld by Thekim or Thelxion king of Sicyon (B), to whoſe treachery he was ſacrificed. Some affirm, that he fled into Egypt, where he taught that people the manuring of land, upon which account he was worſhipped under the title of Serapis and in the form of an ox. We have already obſerved in the hiſtory of that kingdom †, that Serapis was worſhipped under a human form, bearing a buſhel on its head. As for their Apis, though he was indeed worſhipped under the form of an ox, yet it doth not appear that he was of Argolic extraction. We meet with ſeveral of that name, one in Sicyon, one in Argos, and this in Egypt; all of them ſo confounded by Mythologiſts, that we can gather nothing certain concerning them.

Argos. 4. ARGOS, the ſon of Jupiter and Niobe, ſucceeded him; he is ſuppoſed to have been the founder of the capital city, and to have called it and the whole kingdom by his name [h]. He is ſaid to have been a promoter of agriculture, altogether neglected by the Grecians before his reign, who came from that time to be called Argivi from him.

Criaſus. 5. CRIASUS, by others called Piraſus, the ſon of Argos.

Phr.boas 6. PHORBAS, the ſon of Criaſus, ſuppoſed to have been contemporary with Atlas and Prometheus.

7. TRIOPAS

[f] Pauſan. in Corinth. [g] Horat. & al. † See before, Vol. I. p. 552. 554. [h] Apollod. l. ii. c. 1.

(B) This ſhews how little dependence there is on the writings of this epocha, ſince even this laſt reigned according to Euſebius's chronology, near 100 years before Inachus the founder of the Argolic kingdom, unleſs they have miſtook him for Peratus, who flouriſhed about the latter end of Apis's reign.

7. TRIOPAS the ſon of Phorbas, whoſe brother, named alſo Phorbas, ſettled himſelf in the iſland of Rhodes. Triopas.

8. CROTOPUS, in whoſe times the Argives felt the dire effects of Apollo's anger on the following occaſion: that God had had a private amour with Pſamathe the king's daughter; and ſhe to conceal the fruit of it from her father, went and hid it among the ruſhes, where it was devoured by the king's hounds. Apollo, to puniſh the Argives for this crime, ſent the monſter, or fury, Pene, who ſnatched their children from their mothers boſoms, and deſtroyed them. This monſter being killed at length by Cœrebus, Apollo ſent them a grievous peſtilence. Cœrebus, having conſulted the oracle how his anger might be appeaſed, was forbid to return to Argos, and directed to take a tripod in his hand, and to build a temple to that god whereever it chanced to drop from him, which he accordingly did. Crotopus.

9. STHENELUS, ſon of Crotopus, reigned ſixteen years, after which he, or as others think, his ſon Geleanor, was outed the kingdom by Danaus an Egyptian. Sthenelus.

10. DANAUS had been driven out of Egypt by his brother Ægyptus, for refuſing to marry his fifty daughters to the fifty ſons of his brother. His pretence for refuſing the marriage was, that he had been forewarned by the oracle, that he ſhould be killed by a ſon-in-law. Being therefore expelled Egypt, he came to Argos, where he laid claim to that kingdom, as being deſcended from Epaphus the ſon of Io, who, as he hinted above, was the daughter of Inachus. Both he and Sthenelus agreed to have their title decided by the people, and upon the ſecond meeting of the aſſembly, a wolf came and killed a bull, who was graſing among a herd of cows, under the very walls of the city. The people who beheld it, took it for a fatal omen againſt the preſent poſſeſſor. Sthenelus was ſuppoſed to be meant by the bull, and Danaus by the wolf, becauſe he was a ſtranger. Upon this he was immediately proclaimed king. [i] Danaus.

As ſoon as Ægyptus heard of this election, he reſolved to prevent his marrying his fifty daughters to neighbouring princes, and ſtrenghthening himſelf by ſo many alliances againſt him. He raiſed a powerful army, and ſent it with his fifty ſons at the head of it, againſt the new king of Argos; and theſe reduced him to ſuch extremity, that he was

[i] Pauſan. ubi ſupra.

was forced to grant them his daughters in marriage. But he had taken care to make them promise to stab their husbands on the very first night of their nuptials, which they all punctually performed, except one named Hypermnestra, who privately conveyed her bridegroom Lynceus to Lyrcæa, a town not far from the metropolis. Danaus was no sooner apprised of her disobedience, than he would have put her to death for it; but she was honourably acquitted by the more humane Argives, was again received into favour, and Lynceus declared his heir and successor. As for his other forty-nine daughters, they are feigned to have been condemned to an endless punishment in hell for their inhuman treachery, being forced to draw out water with buckets, bored with innumerable holes, and never to be filled (C).

Lynceus. II. LYNCEUS, the son of Ægyptus, expelled his father-in-law out of his kingdom, and reigned in his stead. In commemoration of his wife's having saved his life, and of the Argives having acquitted her, they dedicated a statue to Venus, and the Argives instituted a feast in memory of the signal Hypermnestra had given to her husband of his being out of danger, and called it the feast of Flambeaus.

Abas. 12. ABAS was the son of Lynceus and Hypermnestra, and father of Prœtus and Acrisius, by Ocalea the daughter of Mantineus. These two sons, who were twins, are said to have struggled together in their mother's womb, a sure presage of that more fatal struggle they had for the kingdom when they came to manhood. They are reported to have been the two first who made use of targets in the battles they fought against each other [k].

13. PROETUS

[k] Pausan. in Argolic. Apollod. l. 2. c. 2.

(C) This fable, some mythologists interpret of their being doomed to fill the cisterns of the citadel, which Danaus built at Argos, with water, and probably also those of the city, which, according to the description an antient geographer gives us of it (1), seems to have wanted a considerable supply of that element. For though it be built upon the river Inachus, yet by reason of its nearness to the gulf, it is more than probable, that the waters of it were too brackish to be drank.

(1) Strab. Geog. l. viii.

13. PROETUS found means to ſtep firſt upon the throne, and held it about ſeventeen years. It was in ſome part of this time, that Bellerophon king of Corinth, having committed manſlaughter, came to Argos to be expiated by Prœtus, whoſe queen Stenobæa, being charmed with the beauty of that prince, ſollicited him often in vain to an unlawful commerce; and at length, to be revenged of his continency, did privately accuſe him to her huſband of having attempted her chaſtity. Prœtus, not ſuſpecting the truth of the accuſation, ſent immediately the young Corinthian prince to his father-in-law Jobates, with letters, in which he deſired him to make away with the innocent ſtranger. Jobates ſent him upon ſeveral dangerous expeditions, from which, notwithſtanding, Bellerophon came off victorious, as we ſhall ſee when when we come to ſpeak of the kings of Corinth [l]. In the mean time Prœtus met with ſomething to turn his thoughts another way; his kingdom was invaded by his brother Acriſius, who, proving too ſtrong for him, forced him to fly to his father-in-law Jobates king of Lycia. Theſe two ſoon returned into Argos with an army, took the city of Tyrins, and obliged Acriſius to agree to a treaty, by which Prœtus had Tyrins, and other maritime, and Acriſius Argis and the inland towns [m]. Prœtus had forty-three daughters by his wife Stenobæa, or, as ſhe is called by Homer, Antæa; and they, with the reſt of the women of that country, were ſeized with a diſtemper which they called the fury of Bacchus; but were cured by an excellent phyſician and ſoothſayer, who had one of the daughters given him in marriage, with a third part of the kingdom, as a reward for his ſkill. Melampus, that was the phyſician's name, obtained another daughter, and another third of the kingdom for his brother Bias; but Prœtus had, ſoon after this partition, a ſon named Megapenthes, who ſucceeded him in the other third called Tyrins; but it is likely, that theſe three were again re-united, and made a new kingdom of Argos after the death of thoſe philoſophers, as we ſhall ſee after we have ended the hiſtory of the kings of Mycenæ, whoſe part from that time makes the moſt conſiderable figure. Prœtus.

14. ACRISIUS, on the other hand, had a daughter by his wife Eurydice called Danae, and had been forewarned by Acriſius king of Mycena.

[l] Idem, ibid. Ovid. Metam. &c. Apollod. ubi ſupra.

[m] Pauſan ubi ſupra.

by the oracle, that ſhe would have a ſon, by whom he ſhould be killed. To prevent therefore that young princeſs having any converſation with mankind, he cauſed her to be cloſe confined in a ſtrong braſen tower, and under ſuch ſtrict watch, that ſhe might in all likelihood have been out of danger of fulfilling the oracle, had not Jupiter melted himſelf, as the poets feign, into a golden ſhower, which ſliding through the tiles into her lap, eluded all her father's caution [n] (D).

THE fruit of theſe ſtolen embraces was Perſeus, who was no ſooner born, than Acriſius ordered him and his mother to be put into a cheſt, and thrown into the ſea; but Jupiter took care to convey them ſafe to Seriphus, where Dictys, the brother of Polydectes king of that iſland, brought Perſeus up as his own ſon. By that time he was grown up, the king was fallen in love with his mother, and would have offered violence to her, had not her ſon prevented it. The king, highly provoked at this oppoſition, and reſolved to be at once revenged and rid of him, ſent him into Africa to fetch the famous Gorgon, Meduſa's head, not doubting, but the attempt would coſt him his life. But to his ſurpriſe he ſaw the young prince return with the Gorgon (E), and crowned with a two-fold ſucceſs, having in that expedition ſaved Andromeda, the daughter of Cepheus king of Joppe a maritime town in Phœni-

[n] Apollod. ib. c. 4.

(D) This golden ſhower ſeems to have been only ſome conſiderable bribe to thoſe who guarded the tower. Some think, that it was her uncle Prœtus who found means to corrupt them, and to get admittance to her.

(E) It is not improbable, that, according to the account an antient writer gives us (2) of this expedition, Meduſa had ſucceeded her father Phorcas in his kingdom, which was ſituate along the lake Tritonis, and that ſhe was a Virago, who for want of other employment, was much uſed to hunting and to fight with her African ſubjects; and that Perſeus, coming upon her in the dead of the night with the choiceſt forces of Peloponneſus, ſurpriſed and beheaded her, and carried her head away into Greece, to be admired for its extraordinary beauty (3). The reader may ſee what has been ſaid of it by the judicious author laſt quoted.

(2) Vid. Pauſ. in Argol. Apollod. l. ii. paſſ. Diodor. Sical. Bibl. l. iv. & al. (3) Pauſan. ubi ſupra & Corinth. Ch. xxi.

Phœnicia, from being devoured by a whale (F); in recompence of which ſervice ſhe was given to him in marriage.

At his return into Seriphus, he thought on nothing but how to be revenged on the luſtful and inhoſpitable king. Here he found that his mother and Dictys had been forced to run into a ſanctuary, to ſkreen themſelves from his brutiſh violence, and, as the fable goes on, having turned him and all his accomplices into ſtones at the ſight of the Gorgon, ſet up Dictys upon the throne. From thence he went, with his mother Danae and his wife Andromeda, into Argos; but Acriſius, frightened at the news of his being alive and having performed ſuch noble exploits, had retired into Lariſſa, a city of Pelaſgia ſituate on the river Peneus, whoſe king Tantalus having ſoon after cauſed ſome funeral games to be celebrated in honour of his deceaſed father, Perſeus came thither among a great concourſe of Grecian princes, and by an unfortunate caſt of the diſk (G) which fell upon Acriſius's foot, who was there preſent, killed him, and unwittingly fulfilled the oracle upon him [o].

15. Perseus, though next heir to the kingdom of Ar- Perſeus.
gos in right of Danae his mother, yet choſe to exchange it with his couſin Megapenthes for that ſmall one of Tyrins which had been left to him by his father Prœtus, rather than to return to Argos after this unhappy death of his grand-father. Some affirm, that Perſeus reſtored his grand-father to his throne, after he had been driven out of it by his brother; but that is inconſiſtent with their dividing the kingdom by treaty. However after this exchange with Megapenthes, Perſeus went and built the city of Mycenæ, and made it the ſeat of the kingdom. That of Ar-

[o] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Apollod. ubi ſupra.

(F) This whale is ſuppoſed to have been nothing elſe than a ſhip ſo called, into which Phœnix had ſeduced her in order to carry her away (4).

(G) The diſk was a round piece of iron, lead, braſs, or ſtone, with a hole in the middle, with which the gameſters uſed to exerciſe their ſtrength and ſkill. He who could throw it fartheſt won the prize (5).

(4) Conon. Narrat. 40. Roſſ. Myſtag. Poetic. Hind. Hiſt. Greec. (5) Potter. Archæolog. Vol. I. Ch. 21. p. 443.

gos was therefore ſaid to have been tranſlated thither, beeauſe this new metropolis became in a ſhort time more populous and opulent than the other. After Acriſius's death, the kingdom being thus divided into ſeveral pieces and among different families, Perſeus, having reigned about eighteen years in that of Tyrins, left it to his ſon Alcæus, and he to Amphitryon, by whoſe wife Alcmena Jupiter is ſaid to have begot Hercules, and to have lengthened that amorous night as long as three to add the more ſtrength to the child [p]. In the mean time Amphitryon, having unawares killedElectryon,who was both his uncle and father-in-law, was forced to fly to Thebes. Here the child Hercules began to give ſuch early proofs of his courage, extraordinary ſtrength, and fierceneſs, that he was ſent to be brought up among ſome ſhepherds, where he killed a lion before he was eighteen years of age [q] (H).

Euryſtheus. 16. EURYSTHEUS the ſon of Sthenelus, who was come to the crown of Mycenæ, or, as others have it, ſucceeded his father, began to look upon that young hero with a jealous eye. His title to the crown, as being the reputed ſon of Amphitryon his couſin-german, made him fear, leſt he ſhould in time find means to diſpoſſeſs him of it. His fear and hatred of him ſoon grew to ſuch a height, that he left no

[p] Id. ibid. Diodor. Biblioth. hiſt. l. iv. [q] Apollod. ibid.

(H) We have already obſerved, that there were many fabulous heroes of this name. Diodorus and Euſebius mention three: Diodorus aſcribes all theſe fabulous actions to the youngeſt who was the ſon of Alcmena (6). Servius ſpeaks of four, and Varro of forty-four; but the moſt remarkable of theſe are the ſix mentioned by Tully; as follows (7):

The firſt begot by the moſt antient Jupiter and Lyſito, who contended with Apollo for the tripod.

The ſecond, the ſon of Nile and an Egyptian, was the inventor of the Phrygian characters.

The third was a native of Crete (and the ſon of the Celtic Jupiter): he was one of theIdæiDactyli,orCuretes of mount Ida.

The fourth was the ſon of the ſecond Jupiter and Aſteria ſiſter to Latona, and father of Carthago; he was worſhipped by the Tyrians.

The fifth was the Indian Belus. And

The ſixth was this Hercules, the ſuppoſed ſon of Amphitryon, but begot by the third Jupiter upon Alcmena.

(6) Hiſt. l. iv. (7) De Natur. Deor. lib. iii.

no way untried to be rid of him. Hercules, who was not inſenſible of it, becauſe he was ever engaging him upon ſome deſperate expedition, went to conſult the oracle, and being anſwered, that it was the pleaſure of the gods that he ſhould ſerve Euryſtheus twelve years, was caſt into ſo deep a melancholy, that it turned at length into a furious madneſs, during which, among other deſperate deeds, he put away his wife Megara, and murdered all the children he had by her, which are ſuppoſed to have been twelve, becauſe the king impoſed the ſame number of labours upon him, as an expiation for their murder, after he had recovered his ſenſes [r]. Theſe labours being for the moſt part fabulous, and ſome of them, as we have obſerved more than once, being probably ſtolen from the hiſtory of Sampſon and other Hebrew worthies, we ſhall give them in the margin, that they may not interrupt the thread of our hiſtory of this kingdom, with which but few of them have an immediate connexion (I).

17. ATREUS the ſon of Pelops, and grandſon of Tantalus king of Lydia, aſcended the throne of Mycenæ, af- Atreus, [r] Diodor. Apollodor. ubi ſupra.

(I) The firſt labour impoſed upon him was the killing of a lion in Nemea a wood of Achaia; whoſe hide was proof againſt any weapon, ſo that he was forced to ſeize him by the throat and ſtrangle him; in memory of which he afterwards wore his ſkin about his ſhoulders.

In the ſecond he killed the Hydra, a monſter with two heads, one of which was no ſooner cut off, than two ſprung up in its room.

In the third he brought the Erymanthian boar alive upon his ſhoulders at the ſight of which the king is ſaid to have been ſo frighted, that he ran and hid himſelf in a brazen hogſhead. It was likewiſe in this expedition that he overcame the famous Centaurs (8),

In his fourth he caught a hart with golden horns and of prodigious ſwiftneſs.

In his fifth labour he was commanded to cleanſe Augeas's ſtable in one day, which he did by turning the river Alpheus into it.

In the ſixth he chaſed away the miſchievous birds of the lake Stymphalis, who are feigned to have lived upon human

(8) Vid. Pauſan. in Arcadic. c. 22.

ter the death of Euryſtheus who left no iſſue. As for the line of Perſeus it only ſubſiſted in Hercules. Atreus is always joined with his brother Thyeſtes as partner of the kingdom. Theſe two are juſtly branded, the one for his inceſt fleſh, and to have been at length deſtroyed by Hercules's arrows, or, according to others, to have been only ſcared away from thence (9).

His ſeventh was to fetch a famous bull from the iſle of Crete, with which Paſiphae the wife of Minos is ſaid to have fallen in love. In this expedition, having helped Jupiter to overcome the Titanick giants, he reconciled Prometheus to him, and looſed him from mount Caucaſus.

The eighth was to fetch the mares of Diomedes out of Thrace, which were tied with iron chains to brazen mangers, and were fed with the fleſh of the ſtrangers that paſſed by that way. Hercules firſt threw their inhuman maſter to be devoured by them, and then brought the mares to Euryſtheus, who dedicated them to Juno. Their breed is ſaid to have continued till Alexander's time. Betwixt this and his next taſk he is ſuppoſed to have gone upon the Argonautic expedition, of which we ſhall ſpeak in due time.

In his ninth he fetched away the girdle of the queen of the Amazons; and

In the tenth the oxen of Geryon out of Iberia or Spain in the furtheſt parts of which he erected his two pillars as the utmoſt limits of the then known world. Theſe ten labours he atchieved, as the fable ſays, in a little above eight years. In this expedition he is likewiſe affirmed to have killed Antæus, a famous giant of a monſtrous ſize, who, when weary with wreſtling or labour, was immediately refreſhed by touching the earth. Pliny makes him the founder of Tangier. Hercules overcame him in wreſtling, and ſlew him; and after him the tyrant Buſiris in his way through Egypt. This bloody man uſed to ſacrifice all his gueſts and ſtrangers upon his altars, and deſigning to have done the ſame by Hercules, was ſlain by him together with all his attendants.

His two laſt taſks were fetching Cerberus out of hell, and the Heſperian golden apples kept by a dragon, which laſt is interpreted to have been ſome fine herd of cattle kept by ſome ſtout man, and brought out of Africa to the king. As to his other exploits they will be mentioned in their proper place.

(9) Apollod. l. ii. Diodor. Sicul. l. iv.

inceſt, and the other for his horrid murders. Thyeſtes for defiling his brother's wife; and Atreus for murdering his brother's ſons and feaſting him with their fleſh (K).

It was in his reign that the Heraclidæ, for ſo were called the ſons and deſcendants of Hercules, came under the conduct of their champion Hyllus the ſon of Hercules, and claimed the kingdom of Mycenæ, from which they had been driven by Euryſtheus. The controverſy was to be decided by ſingle combat and under theſe conditions, that if Hyllus killed Euchemus, who had undertook to be champion for Atreus, then this laſt ſhould relinquiſh his kingdom to the Heraclidæ; and if Hyllus was killed, they were to depart immediately, and not return into Peloponneſus till fifty years were expired. It happened, that Hyllus was killed by his antagoniſt, ſo that Atreus obliged them to leave the kingdom. Some of the Heraclidæ went to Tricorinthus, and others to Dorus, to whoſe father Hercules had left the region of Heſtiæotis in truſt for them, and demanded it of him, upon which they were incorporated with the Dores. Their grandmother Alcmena, diſappearing about this time, as ſhe was returning to Thebes, had divine honours inſtituted and paid to her [s]. Atreus was ſoon after their departure killed by Ægyptus, and ſucceeded by his own ſon.

18. Agamemnon, who was reckoned at that time the wealthieſt and moſt powerful potentate in all Greece. His dominion extended not only through a conſiderable part of Peloponneſus, but alſo to ſeveral neighbouring iſlands. So that having a larger fleet, and a greater number of ſea-ports, his commerce and revenue exceeded that of his contemporary kings. This was the main reaſon of his being choſen general of the Trojan expedition for the recovery of Helena his brother Menalaus's wife. Agamemnon.

[s] Pauſan. Apollod. ubi ſupra & al.

(K) The poets feign, that the ſun went back at the ſight of this horrid feaſt. As for Thyeſtes, he went to conſult Apollo how he might be revenged on his brother, and was anſwered, that if he would lie with his own daughter Pelopeia, he would beget a ſon that ſhould murder both Atreus and his ſon Agamemnon. He did ſo, and Ægiſthus, the fruit of this ſecond inceſt, fulfilled the prophecy.

THE ſucceſs of that expedition, the ſacrifice of Iphigenia, and other circumſtances relating to this prince, have been ſeen in a former chapter †. After taking of that city, beſides ſeveral other jars which happened between the allied monarchs, about the parting of the booty, the diſpoſition of their forces, and the like, a fatal quarrel aroſe between Agamemnon, and his brother. The latter was for ſailing homewards out of hand, and ther other for ſtaying, to ſacrifice to Minerva. The conſequence was, that they parted in great anger. Agamemnon having weathered ſeveral ſtorms, which the goddeſs Pallas, as the poets feign, had ſent both to him and his confederates during their return homewards, arrived at laſt at Mycenæ, where he was murdered by his couſin-german Ægiſthus and his wife Clytemneſtra, who during his abſence had contracted an unlawful amour together.

Ægiſthus. 19. ÆGISTHUS was the ſon of Thyeſtes, begot on his daughter Pelopeia by the advice of the oracle mentioned in the laſt note. His mother to conceal the foulneſs of her pregnancy, expoſed him in the woods, where a ſhepherd finding him, nurſed him with goats milk, from which he was called Ægiſthus. The unlawful commerce he had afterwards with Clytemneſtra, during Agamemnon's abſence, made them both fear leſt they ſhould fall a ſacrifice to the reſentment of that prince; and the oracle had pronounced him the murderer of both him and his father. The two guilty lovers were therefore ſoon determined to the fact, and having murdered Agamemnon ſeized upon the kingdom and held it about ten years, but both he and his paramour was at length murdered by Oreſtes Agamemnon's ſon.

Oreſtes. 20. ORESTES, who was but a child when his father was killed, had been privately conveyed to Strophius in Phocis by Electra his ſiſter; but as ſoon as he was come to riper years, he returned to Mycenæ, and having murdered the uſurper and his own mother, took poſſeſſion of the kingdom, and of that of Argos, whoſe throne was become in a manner vacant by the flight of Diomedes into Italy, after his return from the ſiege of Troy. The occaſion of this flight we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of the remaining kings of Argos, after its being parted parted from that of Mycenæ. Oreſtes ran raving mad ſoon after the guilt of his parricide, or, as the poets feigned, was tormented for it by furies. Being again reſtored to his ſenſes, and vexed to find that Hermione, his uncle Menelaus's daughter, whom her grandfather Tyndareus had promiſed to him in marriage, had been eſpouſed to Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles, he went and killed him in the temple of Apollo at Delphos, and married Hermione, by whom he got alſo the kingdom of Sparta*.

† See before, Vol. V. p. 550. & ſeq.

WITH Oreſtes we may mention here his faithful and conſtant friend Pylades the ſon of Strophius, with whom he had been brought up. Theſe two are famed for having been ſo like each other in face, ſhape, temper and affection, that they ſeemed to have had but one ſoul, and were not to be diſtinguiſhed from one another. Inſomuch, that when Thoas king of Taurica would have put Oreſtes to death, they both affirming to be the ſame perſon, and both ready to die each for his friend, the king could not poſſibly find out which was the right perſon, but admired their extraordinary friendſhip, which was indeed ſuch, that it paſſed into a proverb.

21. PENTHILUS, or according to others Tiſamenus, ſucceeded his father Oreſtes in both kingdoms; but in leſs than three years he was killed in a battle which he fought againſt the Achæi, whom he had driven from Argos and Mycenæ, and had reduced to the neceſſity of driving the Ionians out of Ægialea into Attica. After his death the Heraclidæ, who had already got the greateſt part of Peloponneſus, made themſelves maſters of theſe two kingdoms alſo, which they held until the conqueſt of that peninſula by the Macedonians †. Penthiſus.

AETER the parting of the kingdoms of Mycenæ and Argos, and of the latter into three parts, as we have ſeen above; we find Adraſtus the ſon of Talaon and Eurynome reigning in Argos, and deſcending from Perſeus. This valiant prince married his two daughters, the one to Polynices prince of Thebes, and the other to Tydeus, upon the following accident. Theſe two princes were come to Argos, the former to beg the kings aſſiſtance againſt his brother Eteocles, who had deprived him of his yearly Adraſtus in Argos.

* Apolod. † Pauſan. ubi ſupra.

yearly ſhare in the government, and the latter was fled thither from Calydonia for man-ſlaughter. Theſe two happened to have a ſquabble in ſome of the out-buildings of the palace, which alarmed Adraſtus, and forced him to come and enquire the occaſion of the diſturbance. He had formerly been adviſed by the oracle to give his two daughters, the one to a lion, and the other to a boar, and had been doubtleſs very much puzled to find out the meaning of it; but at his coming out he found, to his joy and ſurprize, an agreeable ſolution of it. Polynices bore a lion, and Tydeus a boar upon his ſhield, upon which he immediately gave his daughters to them, Argia to the former, and Deipyle to the latter, whoſe ſon ſucceeded him afterwards in the kingdom.

Soon after this, being reſolved to aſſiſt Polynices, he raiſed a good army, and procured the beſt commanders he could to accompany him. Among thoſe was one Amphiaraus, a good officer and great ſoothſayer, whom he had in vain attempted to gain, till Polynices bethought himſelf of the following ſtratagem. They offered to make his wife Eriphyle umpire whether he ſhould go or not, and having bribed her before-hand with a coſtly bracelet, ſhe decided in the affirmative; upon which Amphiaraus, who foreſaw that none of the chief officers would eſcape except the king, and thinking on nothing but how to be revenged on his faithleſs wife, left ſtrict charge with his two ſons before he departed, that, as ſoon as they were come of age, they ſhould kill her, and make war againſt the king of Thebes [u].

Adrastus, marching with his army through the wood of Nemea, met with a woman carrying a child in her arms. This was the unfortunate daughter of Thoas king of Lemnos, whom ſhe had ſaved, when the reſt of the Lemnian women had killed by one conſent all the males of that iſland, with an intent to turn Amazons. For this her filial piety, they had ſold her to pyrates, who brought her to Lycurgus king of the country about Nemea, whoſe ſon Archemorus, or as others call him Opheltes, ſhe was nurſing, and had then in her arms. The Argives deſired her to direct them to ſome water, and ſhe laying down the boy went to ſhew them a fountain. At her return, finding that the child had been killed by a ſerpent, ſhe went and hid hid herſelf for fear of her maſter's anger, and Amphiaraus ſent her ſons word ſoon after where their mother was. The Argives killed the ſerpent, and, in memory of the dead child, they are ſaid to have inſtituted the games called Nemean, in which Adraſtus won the race by the ſwiftneſs of his horſe Arion. Tydeus got the prize at whirlbats, Polynices at wreſtling, Amphiaraus at running and quoits, Parthenopæus at ſhooting, and Laodicus at darting [w].

[u] Diodor. Bibl. l. iv. Apollod. l. iii. c. 5.

FROM the Nemean woods they went and encamped at the foot of Cithæron, a famed hill among the poets, among other things for the infamous revels which the prieſteſſes of Bacchus, to whom the hill was conſecrated, uſed to keep there. Here they ſent Tydeus to Thebes, to demand of Eteocles the performance of the contract between Polynices and him. Upon his refuſal, Tydeus, deſirous partly to ſhew his own courage, and partly to try that of the Thebans, gave ſeveral challenges to their moſt noted champions, in which he ſtill came off conqueror. The Thebans, envious of his ſucceſs, ſent fifty of their choiceſt men to way-lay him in his return to Cithæron, who were all killed except one, whom he ſent back to Thebes to acquaint Eteocles with his courage and ſucceſs. The Argives on the other hand hearing what had paſſed, reſolved upon the ſiege of the city; the ill ſucceſs of which we ſhall ſee in its proper place. All that need be ſaid here is, that Adraſtus owed his eſcape to the ſwiftneſs of his horſe, and Amphiaraus is ſaid to have been ſwallowed up alive by the earth, together with his chariot and horſes, near the river Iſmene, or perhaps drowned together in that river. The other five generals did likewiſe loſe their lives, ſo that it proved even as Amphiaraus had foreſeen, that Adraſtus alone ſhould ſurvive that expedition; and even he was forced to take refuge at the altar of mercy of the Athenians, and to beg their aſſiſtance, that the Argives might at leaſt be enabled to recover the dead bodies of their ſoldiers and ſubjects, which the Thebans refuſed to deliver up. The Athenians readily granted his requeſt, and forced the Thebans into a compliance with it, after which we hear no more of him.

HE was ſucceeded by his ſon Ægialeus, who, about ten years after the defeat before Thebes, entered into a confederacy with Diomedes, the ſon of his brother-in-law Tydeus Ægialeus.

[w] Id. ibid.

Tydeus, and with the five ſons of the other generals, who had loſt their lives in that expedition, to revenge their deaths upon the Thebans, and if poſſible to level that city with the ground. Thence theſe ſeven captains were called Epigoni. The oracle being conſulted promiſed them ſucceſs, provided they choſe Alcmœon the ſon of Amphiaraus their general. They did ſo, and came off victorious accordingly, as we ſhall ſee in the next ſection.

Diomedes. AFTER this, Diomedes, the ſon of Tydeus the ſon-in-law of Adraſtus, who was alſo king of Ætolia, came to the crown of Argos in right of his wife, and was the laſt king of it. After his ſucceſsful enterprize againſt Thebes, he liſted himſelf in that againſt Troy, and was one of that ſmall number of princes which returned ſafe home. Upon his arrival at Argos, he found that his wife Ægiale, whom Venus had plagued with a furor uteri, in revenge of the wound which he had given her at the ſiege of Troy, had entertained a criminal familiarity with Cometes the ſon of Sthenelus, one of the heroes that went to the ſiege of Troy. When ſhe found that her huſband had diſcovered her intrigue, ſhe attempted to kill him, but he firſt retired to the temple of Juno, and thence into Apulia, then a ſmall kingdom in Italy. Here he found Daunus the king of it ſtraitly beſieged, who promiſed him part of his kingdom if he could beat his enemies. Diomedes did it with ſucceſs, and built a city there, which he called Argos Hippim, whence in proceſs of time it changed its name into Argyrippa. He was afterwards killed by Daunus, and according to the poetic fiction, his companions, who greatly lamented his death, were turned into ſwans, or birds very much like them.

IN the mean time the Heraclidæ, ſince their firſt expulſion out of Peloponneſus by Euryſtheus king of Argos, had made ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to regain it. The firſt, as we have ſeen, was in Atreus's time under Hyllus; another under his ſon Clæodeus; a third under his grandſon Ariſtomachus. This laſt prince left three ſons, Temenus; Creſphontes, and Ariſtodemus, who, when they came of age, conſulted the oracle concerning the ſucceſs of a new invaſion, and received this ambiguous anſwer, that it would ſucceed if they went by the way of Stenygrus; but they thinking the narrow paſſage of the Iſthmus to be meant by it, it, invaded it by that way, and Ariſtomachus loſt the battle and his life in the attempt [x].

THE Pythoneſs, being upbraided with it by his ſons, made anſwer, that their anceſtors had brought their misfortunes upon themſelves by miſtaking her words. Thus when Hyllus was bid to wait for the third fruit, the oracle meant the third generation, and not, as he miſtook it, the third crop; and that now by Stenygrus was not meant the neck of land, but the deep ſea on the right hand of the peninſula. Upon this anſwer they went to build a navy at Ætolia, ſince called upon that account Naupactus. During their ſtay here, Ariſtodemus the youngeſt of the three was killed by lightening, and left two twins, Euryſthenes and Procles. Soon after this a more ſevere misfortune befel them, for their fleet was deſtroyed, and their army laboured under a grievous famine. The oracle was applied to afreſh, and anſwered, that Apollo had ſent thoſe plagues upon them, becauſe they had murdered his prophet Carnus. There had indeed been ſuch a man among them whom Hippotes killed, becauſe he took him to be ſome magician who came to delude the army; to expiate which crime, he was ordered by the oracle to be baniſhed ten years.

THE Heraclidæ were alſo promiſed better ſucceſs, provided they put themſelves under the command of a general that had three eyes, but where to find ſuch a one was the difficulty; at length they met an Ætolian named Oxylus, who was returning from Peloponneſus into his own country, which he had been forced to fly a year before for the unfortunate murder of his brother. This man and the horſe, or mule, he rode upon, having but three eyes between them, was immediately ſuppoſed to be the perſon pointed at by the oracle, upon which they choſe him for their general, and promiſed him the country of Elis as a recompence [y]. They then gave out, that they were going to enter the peninſula at the Iſthmus, which drew all the Peloponneſian forces thither, and ſailing up the Stenygrus, as the oracle had directed them, landed their forces at Molycrium without any oppoſition.

THREE of the kingdoms of Peloponneſus they challenged as their undoubted right, namely Argos, Mycenæ, and and Lacedemon (L). The first of these they got with some difficulty, and Tisamenus the king of it was either killed [z], or escaped by flight [a]. Mycenæ they conquered with the sword, and expelled all the Nestorian family, who went and settled at Athens, where Alcmœon and Pœon became the heads of two considerable families in that city †. As for Lacedemon, Sparta being betrayed to them by one Philonomus [b], they entered it with the sound of the flute, which instrument became much in vogue, as it was thought both to inspire the soldiers with courage, and to keep them in their ranks [c]. They also kept their promise with their three-eyed general, who being descended from Ætolus had a right to the country of Elis, from which the latter had been banished by Salmoneus king of the Ephei, who were now in possession of it. These agreed with the Heraclidæ, that the pretensions of Oxylus should be decided by single combat, according to the Grecian custom, and the Ephean champion being killed, Elis was restored to its right owner. After these successes the three brothers, having raised three altars to Jupiter Patrius, resolved to divide their conquest by lot. Cresphontes is supposed by some juggle to have made the kingdom of Mycenæ, the richest and most fruitful of the three, to fall to his share. Temenus had Argos, and Lacedemon was divided between Eurysthenes and Procles the sons of Aristodemus [d], as shall be seen in its place.

[x] Apollod. l. iii. c. 5. & ſeq. Pauſan. in Bœotic. [y] Apollod. ubi ſupra. c. viii.

Temenus at Argos.

TEMENUS, now fixed in Argos, betrayed such an extraordinary fondness for his son-in-law Deiphontes, who was descended from Ctesiphus the son of Hercules by Dejanira, that his other sons, who had reason to fear he would appoint him his successor, hired the Titans to murder

[z] Pausan. Eliac. Strab. Geogr. lib. x. [a] Apollod. ubi supra. † Pausan. Argol. [b] Pausan. ubi supra. Strab. lib. x. [c] Id. l. viii. [d] Polyæn. Stratagem. Vid. Hind. hist. Græc. lib. ii.

(L) The first of these was their right, as being the descendants of Perseus; whereas the then king Tisamenus, who was of the race of Pelops, had no right to the crown. Mycenæ and Lacedemon they claimed in right of Hercules, who, having conquered them, had left the first to Nestor, and the last to Tyndareus, in trust for his own children (3).

der their father. Temenus being dead, our author tells us, the army, abhorring the parricides, ſet the crown upon Deiphontes and his wife [e] but Pauſanias tells us, that it fell to his eldeſt ſon Ciſus.

HOWEVER that be, from this time the royal prerogative began to loſe ground very faſt, as we obſerved before. To Ciſus ſucceeded Lacidamus, who had little elſe than the title of a king. His ſon Meltas, impatient of ſuch reſtraint, endeavoured when it was too late, to reſtore it to its antient dignity, but the people were by that time grown ſo powerful and headſtrong, that as ſoon as they found out his deſign, they put an effectual ſtop to it and a final end to the kingly power, reducing the government into a downright democracy, and condemning their unhappy prince to death [f].

THE kingdom of Mycenæ, or Meſſenia, was not much longer lived. For though theſe two did outvie that of Sparta by far at firſt, yet the latter ſoon grew to ſuch a height of power and ſplendor, as both to eclipſe and overpower them in the wars which they had afterwards with them. To avoid repetitions we ſhall defer the further account of them till we come to ſpeak of Sparta. All that need be added here is, that Creſphontes, who, as we obſerved before, had juggled himſelf into Mycenæ, ſoon loſt his new-gotton kingdom and his life, being murdered by the nobles with two of his ſons, for his extraordinary largeſſes to the people. His third ſon Ægyptus, or rather Ægytus fled to Cypſelus king of Arcadia, who was his grandfather by the mother's ſide, and when of age obtained his aſſiſtance to regain his kingdom, killed the uſurper of it, and by wiſely dividing his favours and largeſſes between the nobles and the people gained the affections of both to ſuch a degree, that the kings, who had till then been called Heraclidæ, were from thenceforth called Ægytidæ in honour of him [g]. But this popular liberality, though now ſo ſucceſsful, proved fatal to the regal dignity; the ſubjects grew daily more and more encroaching, and the kings more tenacious of their prerogative, till it ended in the exciſion of monarchy and a total change of government.

[e] Polyæn. ubi ſupra. Apoll. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. in Meſſentic. [f] Apollod. ubi ſupra. [g] Vid. Pauſan. in Meſſenic.

SECT.

SECT. III.

The History of the antient kingdom of Attica.

Geography. ATTICA was ſituate along the north coaſt of the gulph of Saron, bounded on the weſt by Megara and part of Bæotia, on the north by the Euripic gulph, now Stretto de negro ponte, and on the eaſt by the Ægean ſea. It reached in length from north-weſt to ſouth-eaſt, about ſixty miles, that is from 24 deg. 40 min. to 25 deg. 41 min. eaſt longitude. Its breadth from north to ſouth, where it was broadeſt, was about fifty-ſix miles, and decreaſing as it came nearer to the ſea [a].

Natural and Artificial rarities. THE ſoil is naturally barren and craggy, and made fertile chiefly by the indefatigable induſtry of the people; hence it was, that it often enjoyed a profound quietneſs, when other more fruitful countries were expoſed to frequent incurſions. So that having above all others preſerved its antient inhabitants, gave riſe to their extravagant notion, that they, like inſects, were the ſpontaneous product of the ſoil, and as a badge of it, Thucydides tells us, they wore a golden graſhopper in the curls of their hair. However, they were much more advantageouſly ſituated for commerce, having ſeveral good ports, the chief of which was that of Pyræus, whoſe haven diſtant from Athens the metropolis of Attica about two miles, had a communication with it by a channel, guarded on each ſide with two ſtrong walls, reaching from the one to the other, for the ſecurity of the merchandiſe that went up to the capital. It had moreover a wide harbour capable of containing above 100 ſhips [b]. There were ſome other

Cities. ports and cities of note in this kingdom, the chief of which next to Athens was Eleuſis, on the ſame gulph, and near the coaſts of Megara, upon which account it had been once ſo ſtrongly fortified that it was reckoned impregnable

[a] Mela, Cluver. Byzant. & al. [b] Thucydid. l. ii.

ble (A). 2. Rhamnus, famed for the temple of Amphiaraus, and the ſtatue of Nemeſis (B). But the largeſt and moſt opulent was the metropolis, called at firſt Cecropia from Cecrops the founder of it; but afterwards Athens, from the goddeſs Minerva (C), whom the Greeks called Athene, and to whom that city was dedicated, and in whoſe honour were inſtituted the yearly games called Panathenæa. It was chiefly famed, beſides for its ſtrength, beauty and opulence; 1. For the inviolable faith of its citizens, whence Fides Attica became a common proverb; 2. For being the nurſery of the beſt ſcholars and orators, choiceſt wits, and greateſt philoſophers; and 3. For having produced the greateſt number of brave generals of any city in the world, Rome not excepted, upon all which accounts it was juſtly eſteemed one of the eyes of Greece [c]. Athens.

The chief river in this kingdom is the Aſopus, which flowing from the lake Copais, through Bœotia and Attica, and ſplitting itſelf into two ſtreams, which divide the famous plains of Marathon, empties itſelf into the Ægean ſea.

The

[c] Juſtin. lib. ii. c. 6. Pauſan. it Attic.

(A) This city is ſaid to have been built by one Eleuſius, who having entertained Ceres there, when ſhe went in ſearch of her daughter, ſhe taught him agriculture as an acknowledgment for his hoſpitality. Hence that goddeſs is ſometimes called Eleuſina by the poets (1).

(B) The goddeſs of Juſtice, called alſo Rhamnuſia from this town where her temple ſtood (2).

(C) The occaſion of it, as the ſtory goes, is, that Cecrops not knowing what name to give to this new built city, an olive-tree and a fountain of water, or, as others have it, a horſe, appeared. The oracle being conſulted, anſwered, that Neptune and Minerva were contending for the honour of naming it, that the olive was the gift of Minerva, and the fountain (or horſe, that of Neptune; and that that which they eſteemed the moſt beneficial to mankind ſhould adjudge the prize to the giver. The men and the women being aſſembled to give their judgment, the former gave it for the god, but the women, who were more in number, gave it for the goddeſs, and the city was called from her Athene. Neptune in revenge of the affront, drowned their territories about it, and the men to appeaſe

(1) Vid. Steph. de urb. in voc. (2) Id Plutarch. &c.

Government. THE government from its firſt foundation to the Archontes, continued altogether monarchical, under a ſucceſſion of ſeventeen kings. What is moſt remarkable of all is, that they did not reduce it, like other kingdoms, into a commonwealth, and out of a diſlike to the regal dignity, but rather changed only the name of it, out of a deep reſpect to the laſt monarch, who bore the title of king. For this glorious prince, having generouſly ſacrificed his life to the ſafety of his ſubjects, the grateful Athenians reſolved, that no man from thenceforth ſhould bear the title of king, and gave that of Archon to his ſon and ſucceſſor, which continued during ten ſucceſſions. So that the only difference between the kingly and the Archontic government was, that the former deſcended by inheritance, and the latter by election, and that theſe were accountable to the people whenever it was required.

Riches. THE riches of this kingdom, occaſioned by its great commerce and frugality, are ſaid to have amounted to 1200 (Attic) talents a year [d]; this vaſt income gave them a conſiderable ſuperiority over all their neighbours, not only as it enabled them to keep a greater army and navy than they,

Coin. but alſo as they could make uſe of it to gain any other ſtates to their ſide; and as their coin was commonly ſtamped with the figure of an ox, hence was the phraſe ſo frequent among the Greeks, of a thing being worth ten or a hundred oxen [†]. Hence alſo came the common proverb, Bovem habet in lingua, when a man was thought bribed to ſpeak contrary to his own ſentiments.

Chronology. THIS kingdom is generally allowed to have been founded by Cecrops an Egyptian, who brought hither a colony peaſe his anger paſt three votes againſt the women, the one, that they ſhould not be called Athenians, but Atticans; the ſecond, that they ſhould have no vote in public matters; and laſtly, that no children ſhould thenceforth bear their mother's name. The poets have embelliſhed this ſtory after their way, by pretending, that thoſe deities did viſibly contend for thoſe places, as they did alſo for ſeveral others, and that either Jupiter, or themſelves, left the arbitration of the diſpute to ſome proper judges. We ſhall meet with ſome further inſtances of this kind of contention in the ſequel (3).

[d] Thucydid. ubi ſupra. [†] Vid. Plutarch. in vit. Theſ.

(3) Apollod. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. in Attica.

lony of Saits[e], a people who lived upon one of the mouths of the Nile called Saiticum, about the year of the world 2448, and of the flood 1443, or, according to Eusebius's chronology, 780 years before the first olympiad (D). It continued under its monarchs 487 years, according to the same chronology, during which time it doth not appear that the Athenians felt any grievances, that could induce them to exchange that form of government for any other. The Archontic government which followed, though made elective by their law, yet continued in the family of their last king 312 years longer, that is till the year of the [e] Diodor. Sic. lib. i.

(D) Some authors, who make Ogyges to have been king of Attica at that time in which it was destroyed by the deluge which bears his name (4), place the foundation of this kingdom still further off, namely 200 years earlier. Who this Ogyges was, is not easy to guess: Some make him an Egyptian, and some an Arcadian: Some think he reigned in Attica, and others at Thebes. Under this uncertainty we chuse to date the foundation of the kingdom from Cecrops, who, if Ogyges had really reigned there, may at least be reckoned the restorer of it, and the person from whom the succession of Attic princes is derived.

We must own, however, that according to this supposition of his being the first founder of the kingdom, those of Thebes and Sparta will stand foremost in point of antiquity, though in no other respect; but this is not worth inverting the order we gave them at first in our plan of this work.

This Cecrops is feigned by the poets to have been partly man and partly serpent or dragon that is, according to Justin (5), because he was the first that coupled male and female in matrimony, or, according to Demosthenes and the rest of the vain Grecians, because he had the wisdom of a man and the strength of a dragon, or came a dragon or barbarian out of Egypt and polished himself into a man in Greece; but more probably, either as he was the first institutor of marriage, or because he understood the Egyptian and Greek tongues. Some authors have, though without any foundation, affirmed him to have been drowned in the Red-Sea with Pharoah's host in whose time he lived (6), (4) De hoc vid. Hellanic. Castor Thal. Polyhist. Euseb. & al. Apollod. l. ii. (5) lib. ii. c. vi. (6) Euseb. Chron. vid. Polyhist. Rawleigh. Heyl. & al.

world 3252, and of the flood 2247, from this time to that of receiving the government into a common-wealth, A. M. 3412, there elapsed 160 years. The whole duration then of this government from Cecrops to Solon amounts to 960 years.

The antient Kings of Athens.

1	Cecrops	10	Theseus
2	Cranaus	11	Mneſtheus
3	Amphictyon	12	Demophon
4	Erichtonius	13	Oxyntes
5	Pandion	14	Amphydas
6	Erectheus	15	Thymætes al. Thymedes
7	Cecrops II.	16	Melanth
8	Pandion II.	17	Codrus
9	Ægeus

The Names of the thirteen Archons who succeeded these kings were

1	Medon		Codrus.
2	Accaſtus		Medon.
3	Archyppus		Accaſtus.
4	Therſippus		Archyppus.
5	Phorbas		Therſippus.
6	Megacles		Phorbas.
7	Diagnetus	the ſon of	Megacles.
8	Phereclus		Diagnetus.
9	Auritthon		Phereclus.
10	Theſpiæus		Auritthon.
11	Agameſtor		Theſpiæus.
12	Æſchylus		Agameſtor.
13	Alcmæon		Æſchylus.

Cecrops. 1. CECROPS built the city of Athens, as we ſaid before, married the daughter of Actæus, ſuppoſed to have been king of Attica before him, and in right of her laid the foundation of a new monarchy. He is ſaid to have been the firſt who deified Jupiter, and ordained ſacrifices to be offered to him [f] as the ſupreme deity. He is likewiſe affirmed to have been the firſt who ſet up altars and idols, [f] Pauſan. in Attic.

idols, offered ſacrifices, and inſtituted marriage among the Grecians, who before his time, it ſeems, lived promiſcuouſly, and coupled as their fancy led them. Pauſanias tells us, that he forbad ſacrificing any living creatures to the gods, or any ſort of offerings, except a kind of forked or horned cakes, called by the Athenians Palanous, and in Greek Βους, which ſignifies likewiſe an ox. This led Euſebius into the miſtake which we find in the firſt book of his chronicle, where he affirms, that Cecrops was the firſt who ſacrificed an ox to Jupiter; whereas that creature, ſo eſteemed by the Athenians on account of its ſerviceableneſs in agriculture, was not ſacrificed by them till the time of Erectheus, who offered one to Jupiter Polieus, or protector of the city; and then, Pauſanias tells us, that the prieſt who knocked it down, being ſeized with horror at the fact, flung his hatchet down and fled out of Attica. From Cecrops the Athenians affected to call themſelves Cecropidæ during the five following reigns, after which they changed it for that of Erecthydæ, in honour of Erectheus their ſixth monarch. Cecrops reigned fifty years, according to Euſebius and St. Jerom, and left only three daughters, viz. Herſe, Aglauros, and Pandroſos, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in a following note. As for his ſon Eryſicthon, he died before his father. So that after Cecrops's death, Cranaus, one of the wealthieſt citizens of Athens and in the greateſt credit, found means to aſcend the Attic throne, probably by the marriage of one of his daughters.

2. Cranaus. CRANAUS enjoyed the kingdom about ten years, during which time having unfortunately married one of his daughters named Attis to Amphictyon the ſon of Deucalion, he was by him dethroned and forced to retire into the city of Lamprea, where he led a private life to the laſt, and where the Lampreans ſhewed his tomb. From his daughter Attis the country, till then called Actæa, took the name of Attica.

Amphictyon. AMPHICTYON (E), after he had reigned about ten, or, according to the laſt quoted authors, twelve years, was on himſelf depoſed, and outed by (E) Not that Amphictyon who was the firſt inſtitutor of the court of the Amphictyons or common council of Greece, but his uncle.

Erichthonius. 4. ERICTHONIUS, who was the reputed ſon of Vulcan and Tethys (F). He is ſaid to have been the firſt inventor of coaches, being lame of his feet; he reigned fifty years.

Pandion. 5. PANDION, the ſon of Erichthonius, and father of Progne and Philomela; whoſe hard fate, ſo famous among the poets, is ſuppoſed to have broke his heart after he had reigned about forty years.

Erectheus. 6. ERECTHEUS, Pandion's ſon, was reckoned the moſt powerful prince of his time; wherefore Boreas king of Thrace, who ſought his alliance, demanded his daughter Orithia in marriage, and being denied carried her away by force. Erectheus, after he had reigned fifty years, was unfortunately killed in a battle againſt the Eleuſians. He left ſeveral ſons, who equally contended for the kingdom, and at length agreed to refer the deciſion to their brother-in-law Xuthus, who adjudged the kingdom to Cecrops who was the eldeſt. For this the other two brothers bore Xuthus ſuch ill-will, that they forced him to fly their country, whither he had taken refuge when driven from Theſſaly by his brethren.

Cecrops II. 7. CECROPS II. the eldeſt ſon of Erectheus: this prince is generally allowed to have been the firſt who gathered the people into twelve towns, who had till then lived in houſes and cottages, ſcattered here and there without order or regular diſtance; but he was, after forty years reign, outed the kingdom by his two diſcontented brethren Metion and Pandorus, and forced to fly into Ægialea, and died there.

Pandion II. 8. PANDION II. the ſon of Cecrops II. was likewiſe driven out of Athens by the ſons of his uncle Metion who took the adminiſtration for ſome time. Pandion fled into Megara, [z] Apollod. l. iii. c. 3.

(F) He is feigned by the poets to have ſprung ex ſpermate Vulcani in terram delapſo, by the aſſiſtance of Minerva who alſo brought him up. The fable adds, that ſhe having one day laid the child in a covered coffer, gave it in charge to Cecrops's three daughters, with expreſs orders not to open it upon any account. Pandroſos obeyed the goddeſs; but her two ſiſters, more curious than ſhe, having ventured to open it, were immediately taken with ſuch a phrenſy, or, according to the fabulous phraſe, ſo tormented with furies, that they flung themſelves down the ſteepeſt place of the citadel, and ended their lives.

Megara, where Pylas then reigning gave him his daughter Pelia, and afterwards made him his ſucceſſor. During his abode there he had four ſons, with whom he came into Athens (G), whence he expelled the ſons of Metion, and after he had reigned a ſhort time, either left the kingdom among his four ſons, or they agreed to divide it among themſelves after his death; notwithſtanding which the royal dignity did in effect remain with the eldeſt [h] Ægeus.

Ægeus. 9. ÆGEUS, when he came to the crown, finding himſelf deſpiſed by his ſubjects, becauſe he could get no children by his wives, and ſometimes inſulted by his brother Pallas, who by that time had got no leſs than fifty ſons beſides daughters, went to conſult the Delphic oracle, and was anſwered, that he muſt forbear the uſe of women till his return into Athens [i]. This puzzling anſwer forced him to apply himſelf to Pittheus king of Trœzen, who was then famed for his extraordinary wiſdom and ſkill in expounding oracles, where this prince eaſily prevailed with him to lie with his daughter Æthra whom he got with child. As none but theſe three were privy to the ſecret, Ægeus before his return to Athens, hid a ſword and a pair of ſhoes under a ſtone long enough to cover them, and left orders with the princeſs, that if the child proved a boy, ſhe ſhould ſend him to Athens with thoſe tokens, as ſoon as he was able to lift up the ſtone. He charged her moreover to uſe all imaginable ſecrecy, leſt the ſons of his brother Pallas, getting knowledge of it, ſhould way-lay and murder him in his way to Athens.

ÆTHRA being ſoon after delivered of a ſon, Pittheus gave out, that Neptune was the father of it; and when he was ſixteen years old, ſhe brought him to the ſtone, [h] Pauſan. Apollod. ubi ſupra. [i] Plutarch. in vit. Theſ.

(G) It is indeed much more likely, that he never returned into Athens, but that after his ſons were grown up, he ſent them to recover that kingdom from the Metionidæ, ſo that having all ſhared alike the danger, they thought it reaſonable to ſhare alike in the conqueſt.

The ſpace therefore of twenty-five years, allowed by chronologiſts (7) to their father's reign, ſeems rather deſigned to mark the interval of the interregnum or uſurpation, from Cecrops's expulſion to his grandſon Ægeus's reign.

(7) Pauſan. Apoll. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Theſ.

which ſhe ſaw him lift up with eaſe, upon which ſhe diſcovered to him the whole ſecret of his parentage, bade him take up the ſword and ſhoes, and prepare himſelf to go to his father. Both ſhe and Pittheus, however, adviſed him to go by ſea, alledging, that ſince Hercules's departure, who had been the great ſcourge of robbers and banditti, the roads were again ſo infeſted with them, that it was extremely hazardous to travel by land. Theſeus, this was the young prince's name, who had by that time ſhewed uncommon marks of courage and ſtrength, no ſooner heard Hercules named upon ſuch an occaſion, than he was fired with a deſire to imitate ſo noble a pattern; ſo that all their intreaties could not diſſuade him from taking his journey by land. The exploits which he performed in his way to Athens, having no connection with either his father's reign or his own, may be beſt ſeen in the margin (H).

WHILST Theſeus was ſtill at Trœzen, his father laboured under no ſmall perplexities from his ſubjects and his haughty brother; and an accident happened which had almoſt driven him to diſpair. Androgeus, the ſon of Minos

(H) His firſt encounter after he left Trœzen was with Periphetes the ſon of Vulcan, ſirnamed alſo Corynetes, or Club-bearer, from the club he uſed to fight with, whom he ſlew in ſingle combat, and afterwards carried his club with him. The next he overcame was Sinnis the ſon of Polyphemon, ſirnamed Pityocamptes, from his bending the heads of two tall pines and tying paſſengers between the oppoſite branches, which by their ſudden return, did tear them in pieces: him Theſeus put to the ſame death.

His next exploit was killing the fierce Cromyonian ſow called Phœa, which others take to have been a female robber of that name, infamous for theſts, murders, and lewdneſs.

Sciron a famous robber, who uſed to throw paſſengers down a ſteep rock after he had made them waſh his feet; fell the next victim to his valour. Having next ſignalized himſelf in the Eleuſian games by killing Cercyon a famous Arcadian wreſtler, he went to Termione, where he killed Damaſtes, otherwiſe called Procruſtes, by diſtending his limbs to the length of his bed, as he uſed to do to thoſe who unhappily fell into his hands.

Laſtly, He went and fetched the famed bull of Marathon and brought him alive to Athens, where he ſacrificed him to Apollo (8).

(8) Philochor. ap. Hind. Hiſt. Græc. lib. i.

nos king of Crete, who was come to Athens to be present at one of their feasts, had unhappily contracted such an intimacy with the fifty sons of Pallas, that the jealous old king, fearing some fatal consequences from it, had caused that prince to be privately murdered. Others say, that the young prince, having undertaken to encounter the Marathonian bull, was killed by it. However that be, Minos, having received the news of his son's death and made several vain attempts to revenge it on the Athenians, prayed to the gods to do it for him; upon which the Athenians were punished with pestilence, famine, and several other plagues; and were told by the oracle, that they must expect no relief, till they were reconciled to the Cretan king. Minos, resolving to make them pay dear for their deliverance, imposed a yearly tribute upon them of seven young men and seven young virgins, whom he condemned to be devoured by the Minotaur (I), during the space of seven [k], or, according to others, nine years [l]; these unhappy victims were to be drawn by lot, and what heightened the people's murmurs was, that Ægeus, the cause of these misfortunes, being childless, was the only person who was exempt from the punishment.

It was now the third time that Minos had sent his bloody messengers to exact the tribute, when Theseus, having performed all those glorious exploits abovementioned, was [k]. Diodor. ubi supra. [l]. Plutarch ubi supra.

(I) Feigned by the poets to have been half man and half bull, and begot by a bull upon Pasiphae Minos's queen; and who as soon as born was by the king's order thrown into a labyrinth and fed with human flesh; but more reasonably supposed to have been a man of great strength and ferocity, and upon that account to have been firnamed Taurus or Bull. He seems also to have been in great power at the Cretan court, either for his constant victories at the games which Minos had instituted in the memory of his son, or for some other exploits, or perhaps rather for his fierce and cruel nature; upon which account it may be reasonably supposed, that all the Athenian captives in particular were given to him by that exasperated prince, to be used with uncommon severity. For we are told (9), that he was grown to such a height of insolence and cruelty, that he was by this time become odious to the whole kingdom, and not unlikely to the king also, upon his being suspected to have too great a familiarity with the queen.

(9) Plutarch, ubi supra.

was arrived at his father's capital. The unfortunate king, who had received some years before into his court the famous enchantress Medea, in her flight from Corinth, and had been deluded with hopes, that she would renew his age, and make him capable of getting children, had by that time been also prevailed upon to marry her. Theseus, whose birth was a secret to every one there, was soon discovered by Medea, who conceived such jealousy of him, by reason of his noble exploits, that she easily filled her weak husband with fears, and persuaded him to invite the young stranger and to poison him in a glass of wine. As soon as they were sat at table, Theseus, willing to give his father an agreeable surprise, did happily draw his sword, as if he designed to help himself with it, which the old king no sooner saw, than he hasted to throw down the poisoned draught, and embracing his son, owned him for such before all the court. This declaration, and the known valour of Theseus, did so quash the sanguine hopes of Pallas and his sons, that they broke out in open rebellion, but were soon after discomfited by him.

After this Theseus, who resolved at any rate to deliver his father's country from the bloody Cretan tribute, having encouraged his old father with hopes of killing the Minotaur, went and willingly offered himself to be one of the unhappy victims, and embarking with them in one ship, he gave the pilot two sails, the one black to sail by, and the other white, to be hoisted up at their return in case he came off victorious. At their arrival at Crete he offered himself to Minos, and demanded the liberty to fight the Minotaur, or rather his champion Taurus, in single combat, which the king did the more readily grant, because he had some just reason to suspect, that his queen, a woman of no singular chastity, had some criminal commerce with him. Thesus after this had all the success he could wish: He killed his enemy, released all the Athenian captives, prevailed upon Minos to remit the tribute, and obtained his daughter Ariadne in marriage, not indeed with her father's consent; but she, having been an eye witness of his valour and address in the late fight, conceived such a passion for him, that she resolved to run away with him. He left her, however, in the isle of Naxos: and some add, that, after the conquest of the Minotaur, Minos fell in love with Peribea, one of the seven virgins which Theſeus had brought with him, and would have detained her. Theſeus ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, which ſo exaſperated the Cretan king, that, among other ill language which he gave him, he told him, that he was not the ſon of Neptune, unleſs he would fetch his ring which he then flung into the ſea. Theſeus immediately plunged after it, and brought up with the ring a golden crown which Amphitrite had put upon his head. Minos, however, would not be pacified without Peribea, and Theſeus, ſtill perſiſting in his denial, was by his order caſt into the labyrinth, in which the Minotaur uſed to be kept; but he ſtayed not long there, before Ariadne furniſhed him with a clue by the help of which he extricated himſelf out of it, and ſetting out with his fleet for Athens, left Ariadne behind at the iſland above-mentioned, where Bacchus fell in love with her and carried her off, whilſt Theſeus ſailed homewards towards Athens. Unfortunately for them and for Ægeus, their extraordinary joy for their late ſucceſs made them forget to diſplay the white flag in token of victory, as had been agreed; and the old king, who went from time to time to eſpie them from a high rock, obſerving the ſhip afar off ſtill hanging out its ſable colours, doubted not, but that his ſon had like the reſt fallen a victim to the Minotaur; and, in a fit of ſudden diſpair, threw himſelf into the ſea, which from him was ſince called the Ægean ſea; ſo that when Theſeus landed at Athens, he found the city divided between grief, for Ægeus's death, and joy, for the ſafe return of his valiant ſon and ſucceſſor. Ægeus reigned forty years.

which

10. THESEUS was of too active and warlike a temper, and too fond of imitating the great Hercules, to ſpend his time in the civil affairs of his kingdom; ſo that he began, upon his firſt acceſſion to it, to think how to diveſt himſelf of that care, that he might the better indulge his military genius. To this end he began with gathering all the people of Attica into the old and new town, which he incorporated into one city. After this he diveſted himſelf of all his regal power, excepting only the title of king, the command of the army, and the guardianſhip of their laws. The reſt he committed to proper magiſtrates, choſen out of three different orders of the people, which he divided into nobles, huſbandmen, and artificers. The firſt he inveſted with the power of interpreting and executing the laws and regulating all things that related to religion, Theſeus.

religion. The other two choſe their inferior magiſtrates from among themſelves, to take care of whatever related to their ſeparate orders: ſo that the kingdom was in ſome meaſure reduced to a commonwealth, in which the king had the greateſt poſt; the nobles were next to him in honour and authority; the huſbandmen had the greateſt profit; and the artiſts excelled them in number. He inſtituted two annual feſtivals, the Panathenæa, in memory of the Athenians being now united into one, and that called the Metoecia, beſides the famous Iſthmian games in honour of Neptune, which we have mentioned formerly, and were ſo called from the Iſthmus in which they were celebrated. All theſe were chiefly deſigned to draw a concourſe of ſtrangers thither, and, as a further encouragement for them to come and ſettle there, he endowed them with the privilege of natives. He likewiſe aboliſhed all their diſtinct courts of judicature, and built one common council-hall called Prytaneum, a ſumptuous building which ſtood for many ages [m]. We obſerved before, that the Athenian money was ſtamped with an ox; this coin was ſuppoſed to have had that figure, either in memory of Theſeus's killing the bull of Marathon, or the Minotaur, or perhaps to recommend agriculture to the people, to which the ox was moſt ſubſervient.

AFTER he had thus new-modelled the government, his next care was to join the kingdom of Megara to his own, in right of his grandfather Pandion the ſecond, who had ſucceeded Pylus his father-in-law, as we have ſeen above. It was then, that Theſeus erected that famous pillar in the Iſthmus, which ſhewed the limits of the two countries which met there, and which had this inſcription on the one ſide, This is not Peloponneſus but Ionia; and on the other, This is Peloponneſus not Ionia. What we read concerning his two expeditions againſt the Amazons, is ſo blended with fable, ſo differently related [n] and ſo uncertain, that we ſhall give it in a ſhort note, becauſe they do not appear upon the whole to have an immediate relation to the kingdom of Athens (K).

SOMETIME

[m] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Vid. & Thucydid. l. ii. [n] Conf. Herodot, Plutarch & Meurs. in Theſ. Juſtin, l. ii. c. 4.

(K) The firſt expedition was only undertaken in favour of Hercules, whoſe companion in all ſuch exploits Theſeus always affected

SOMETIME after theſe expeditions, Theſeus contracted an intimacy with Pirithous the ſon of Ixion, and, being invited to his nuptials, helped him to kill a great number of Centaurs, or rather Theſſalian horſemen, as we ſhall ſee in the ſeque!, who in their cups had offered violence to their female gueſts; and drove the reſt out of the country. Theſe two went from thence to Sparta, and ſtole away the famed Helena out of the temple of Diana Ortia, where ſhe happened to be dancing °. This princeſs was the reputed daughter of Jupiter by Leda, the wife of Tyndarus king of Œbalia in Peloponneſus; and though then but nine years old was already famed for the greateſt beauty in the world; inſomuch, that though Theſeus was then, as is reckoned above fifty years old, yet could not his virtue be proof againſt her charms. However variouſly the time, and place, and circumſtances of this rape are reported, we have followed Plutarch's account of it as the moſt allowed. According to him the two raviſhers were purſued as far as Tegea; but they happily made their eſcape out of Peloponneſus, and thinking themſelves now ſecure of their prey, they agreed to caſt lots for her, upon condition, that he to whoſe lot ſhe fell ſhould help the other in getting ſome other celebrated beauty in lieu of her; and fortune having declared for Theſeus, he aſſiſted his companion in the like attempt upon Proſerpina, daughter

° Plutarch. ubi. ſupra. Apollod. Pauſan. in Attic.

affected to be. As a reward therefore for his aſſiſtance, that victorious hero gave him Antiope one of the Amazonian queens whom he had taken priſoner. Juſtin ſays, Hippolyte the other queen, aud that Hercules kept Antiope for himſelf.

However, this gave occaſion to a ſecond expedition, in which ſome affirm, that the Amazons made a deſcent into Attica to recover their loſt queen, having with them beſides their own forces a powerful ſupply of horſemen obtained from Sagillus king of Scythia, with his ſon Panaſagorus at their head, who did afterwards upon ſome miſunderſtanding withdraw his troops and left them in the lurch. Others ſay, that Theſeus went and attacked them near the Caſpian ſea: however, they all agree, that he gained the victory over them, and that in one of theſe two expeditions he took the queen Hippolyte, whom he afterwards married. After this the Amazons were forced to clap up a peace with the Athenians, and theſe, either in memory of this or of their late victory, erected a pillar near the temple of Tellus Olympia.

ter of Aidoneus king of the Molossi in Epirus, who being the next beauty to Helena was guarded by the dog Cerberus, and was not to be won but by the death of that monster. However, when the king understood that they designed to steal her away, he threw Pirithous to be torn in pieces by Cerberus, and Theseus into prison, from which he was afterwards released at the intercession of Hercules.

During his absence Mnestheus, the son of Peteus grandchild of Erechtheus, had taken care to ingratiate himself so far with the nobles and commons, that when he returned he found them very cold towards him. Soon after this, the war, which Castor and Pollux waged against him, for the recovery of their sister Helena, raised a more powerful faction against him: and as soon as the two brothers were got to the gates of the city, Mnestheus harangued the citizens, and told them, that, since their quarrel was only against Theseus, their safest way was to open their gates to them, and Theseus, finding it impossible to resist the torrent, conveyed himself and family away privately, after he had pronounced a solemn curse against his faithless subjects, which did not go unheard (L). His design was to have sailed into Crete, and to have obtained either a succour or sanctuary there from Deucalion the son of Minos and his now brother-in-law (M); but he was unfortu-

(L) The ungrateful Athenians, who expressed more joy for their new king than grief for their old one, were in process of time made so sensible of the effects of his curse, that to appease his ghost they appointed solemn sacrifices and divine honours to be paid to him. The place where he pronounced his dire imprecation against them was from thence-forth called Aratherion, or the place of cursing (10).

(M) Theseus had a son by the Amazonian queen named Hippolytus, and having soon after married Phœdra, the sister of Deucalion the son and successor of Minos, by whom he had two sons, he sent Hippolytus to be brought up by his mother Æthra queen of Trœzen; but he coming afterwards to be present at some Athenian games, Phœdra fell in love with him, and having sollicited him in vain to a compliance, in a fit of resentment accused him to Theseus of having made an attempt upon her. The fable says, that Theseus prayed to Neptune to punish him by some violent death, and that as Hippolytus was riding along the sea-shore, Neptune sent two sea-calves who frightened the horses

(10) Plutarch. in Thes.

unfortunately caſt by a tempeſt upon the iſland of Scyros. Here he was at firſt kindly received by king Lycomedes, but was ſoon after killed by a fall from a high mountain, in the 40th year of his reign. Some ſay, that he was decoyed thither by that king, who, either out of fear of him, or, as is moſt likely, at the inſtigation of his Athenian rival, threw him headlong down that precipice, tho' others ſay, that, that place being his uſual walk after ſupper, his foot unfortunately ſlipt in the dark. We omit for brevity's ſake many other famous exploits of this renowned hero, which the reader may more fully find in Plutarch's life of him. All we ſhall add here is, that the Athenians did ſometime after dedicate a temple to him, and that Cimon, the famous ſon of Miltiades, did raze the whole iſland of Scyros in revenge of his death, and carried his bones to Athens, after he had, by the advice of the oracle, been at a great deal of pains to find them out.

Mneſtheus.

II. MNESTHEUS or Meneſtheus was the ſon of Peteus, and great grandſon of Erectheus the ſixth king of Athens, and conſequently had a better right to the crown than Theſeus, whoſe father was uncertain, and who was at beſt but the ſon of Ægeus, and this but the adopted ſon of Pandion, as we have ſeen above. Whilſt therefore Theſeus was either purſuing his amours, or was impriſoned for the rape of Proſerpine, it was eaſy for his rival to perſuade the Athenians to raiſe him to the throne. What gave him another lift to it was, that Caſtor and Pollux, taking the advantage of Theſeus's confinement, came and beſieged Aphidne a town in Attica, where he had ſent his mother and his wife Helena; and theſe two heroes, having taken and reſcued their ſiſter out of revenge to her raviſher helped his competitor to mount the throne.

MENESTHEUS, being thus choſen, was in no great care about the ſons of Theſeus, but dreaded his known valour, in caſe he ſhould ever get into his dominions again. To prevent which, he prevailed ſo far upon the Athenians, what with gifts and careſſes, that they would not ſuffer him to come into Attica. And as ſoon as he heard, that he

was

horſes, overturned the chariot, and tore him in pieces. The poets add, that the luſtful queen hanged herſelf for grief, but as for Hippolytus, Diana, being taken with his chaſtity, and pitying the ſad fate it had brought upon him, prevailed upon Æſculapius to reſtore him to life, to be a companion of her diverſions.

was retired into the island of Scyros, he prevailed on Lycomedes to dispatch him by the stratagem we lately mentioned. Menestheus reigned twenty-four years, and was one of the chiefs that went to the siege of Troy, where having lost his life, the kingdom of Athens returned again to the Thesean line.

Demophon. 12 DEMOPHON, one of the sons of Theseus by Phœdra, succeeded him both in the kingdom and in the command of the Athenian forces that were before Troy. He was one of those that came back safe from that siege: in his return he landed in Thrace, where Phyllis, king Lycurgus's daughter, entertained him for some time both at bed and board. Upon his departure he promised to return to her, but broke his word and her heart. In his reign was erected the famous court of the Ephetæ, consisting originally of fifty Athenians and as many Argivi, for trying of wilful murders and lying in wait to kill. The occasion of erecting this court, and of the Argives being admitted to sit judges in it, was as follows: Agamemnon, others say Diomedes, returning with his forces from Troy, was driven one night into an Athenian port called Phalerus, and thinking themselves in an enemy's country, began their usual trade of ravaging and plundering, upon which the surprised Athenians fell upon them and killed a considerable number of them. On the morrow they found the palladium upon the ground among the slain, by which they knew that they were their friends the Argives. The oracle, having been consulted, ordered them to give the slain an honourable burial in the place where they fell, to build a temple upon it, and dedicate it to Minerva, and set up the palladium in it. Immediately after this it was ordered, that this court should be erected to try all cases of murder, manslaughter, and chancemedly. It consisted of fifty members, who were to be above fifty years old, men of sense and known probity, and had power of life and death. Upon its first setting up, Agamemnon insisted that there should be an equal number of Athenians and Argives to sit in it; the Athenians readily granted it. Demophon submitted himself afterwards to be tried by this court, for having unfortunately killed one of his subjects by the turn of his horse, as he was coming from Troy. It subsisted a considerable time in the same form; but Draco, one of their Archons, new-modelled it, excluded the Argives out of it, and made it consist of fifty-one

fifty-one Athenians, who were all to be turned of fifty years of age [p]. Demophon reigned thirty-three years, and was succeeded by his son, or, according to others, his brother.

13. OXYNTES, who reigned twelve years, and left the crown to his son. Oxyntes.

14. APHYDAS, who was murdered by Thymœtes in the first year of his reign. Aphydas.

15. THYMOETES, the bastard-son of Oxyntes, betrayed his base nature in many things besides the murder of Aphydas, by which he got the crown. We shall only mention the last instance of it which justly bereaved him of it. He had reigned about eight years, when Xanthus king of Bœotia had a contest with him about one of their frontier towns. Xanthus offered to decide the matter in single combat, and Thymœtes as cowardly declined it. It happened, that Melanthus, a noble Messenian who had been driven out of his country by the Heraclidœ, was come to Athens about this time, and offered to answer the chartel. Upon their very first onset Melanthus called to his adversary, and asked him why he brought a second along with him contrary to their articles, and whilst Xanthus turned about to see who followed him, he ran him through with his lance [q]. This victory, though it was more owing to his cunning than bravery, did so please the Athenians, that they not only deposed their pusillanimous king, who was the last of the line of Erechtheus, and set their Messenian champion upon the throne; but instituted a feast in memory of this action, and called it Apatheria from the stratagem that gave occasion to it [r]. Thymœtes.

16. MELANTHUS, as soon as he had mounted the throne, persuaded the Athenians to receive the banished Messenians and Nestoridæ, and after a reign of thirty-seven years left the kingdom to his worthy son Codrus [s]. Melanthus.

17. CODRUS reigned about twenty-one years, during which time the Dores and Heraclidæ had regained all Peloponnesus and were entering into Attica. Codrus was informed, that the oracle had promised them victory, provided they did not kill the king of the Athenians, and that they Codrus.

[p] Euseb. Chron. lib. i. [q] Vid. Frontin. Stratag. lib. ii. c. 5.
[r] Polyen. Stratag. l. i. c. 9. [s] Pausan. Achaic.

they had taken all proper precautions againſt it; but he who had reſolved to ſacrifice his life to the ſafety of his kingdom, took this method to elude them: he diſguiſed himſelf like a peaſant, went into their camp, fell a quarreling with ſome of the Dorian ſoldiers, from thence they went to blows, and he ceaſed not fighting till he was killed. On the morrow when they found who he was, they were ſo terrified, that they decamped without ſtriking a blow [t].

WITH Codrus ended the regal ſucceſſion and title of kings of Athens. His ſubjects conceived ſuch veneration for that magnanimus prince, that they eſteemed none worthy to bear the royal title after him, and therefore committed the management of the eſtates to elective magiſtrates, to whom they gave the title of Archons, and choſe Medon the eldeſt ſon of Codrus to that new dignity. His election, however, was oppoſed by his brother Nileus, who pretended, he could not ſubmit to Medon's authority, becauſe he was lame of one foot; but the oracle having confirmed it [u], all the Archons that ſucceeded him were from him ſurnamed Medontidæ, becauſe they were all choſen by ſucceſſion: ſo that the Athenian government continued in the family of Codrus under twelve perpetual Archontes, ſomewhat above the ſpace of two-hundred years.

THEIR names need not be repeated here, having added them to the liſt of the Athenian kings: neither ſhall we dwell upon the tranſactions which happened under each ſeveral archonſhip; this epocha having proved very unactive and barren, except that the people, always fond of a change, did ſhew from time to time their diſlike to that dignity being made perpetual, as having too near a reſemblance to monarchy, and giving its poſſeſſor too great a handle to tyrannize over them. They began to give ſome marks of their diſcontent under their firſt Archon. Attica had enjoyed ſo much quiet during a long ſeaſon, that it ſwarmed with exiles and foreigners, who flocked thither from other parts which were more haraſſed with wars, ſo that they were forced to diſcharge them in great multitudes upon the maritime coaſts of Leſſer Aſia. Upon the very firſt of theſe expeditions Nileus and the reſt of Codrus's ſons, who would not brook to be under their brother Medon, drew drew a great number of Athenians to them, joined with the Ionians and Thebans, and left Athens for Leſſer Aſia, where they diſperſed themſelves in different parts, and founded the twelve following cities, viz. Epheſus, Miletum, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenæ, Erithræ, Phocea, Chios in the iſle of that name, and Samos. Theſe were at firſt each under a petty prince, but being forced at length to join together, became afterwards very famous, as will be ſeen in due time.

[t] Juſt. ex Trog. l. ii. c. 6. [u] Caſtor. ap. Euſeb. ubi ſupra.

THIS perpetual archonſhip, however, upheld itſelf ſo long, in ſpight of the people's diſlike to it, that it paſſed through thirteen hands, from Medon the ſon of Codrus to Alcmon the laſt who bore that dignity; but the people at length, impatient to put an end to it, took the advantage of his ſhort reign, which laſted but two years, to clip the power of it, and to reduce its duration to ten years; ſo that Charops the ſon of Eſchylus, was forced to accept of it upon thoſe terms or none. This change happened about the beginning of the ſeventh olympiad, and in the year of the world 3252, the year in which Hezekiah king of Judah was born. This new decennial dignity had ſcarce paſſed through four hands, before they began again to call for a freſh reduction of it; for Hippomenes the laſt of Codrus's line, in whoſe archonſhip this tumult happened, had ſcarce enjoyed it half its time, when his cruelties to the people, and more particularly to his ſon and daughter (N), cauſed him to be depoſed. However, they did not then gain their point; it continued ſtill through three different hands, till at length Eryxias the laſt of them, either dying, or being depoſed in the laſt year of his archonſhip, the Athenians appointed new Archontes to be choſen from among the moſt conſiderable citizens for birth, wealth and intereſt, and voted that dignity annual from henceforth. From that time their government dwindled into a downright democracy, which Solon did afterwards new-model and confirm as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter.

Year of the flood, 2247. Before Chriſt, 752.

(N) He cauſed his ſon to be torn in pieces by horſes for adultery, and his daughter he ſhut up with a horſe without food to be devoured alive, for having ſuffered herſelf to be debauched by a citizen. In memory of this barbarous puniſhment, Suidas (11) tells us, there was a place in the city called Ιππο-και-κυρης, Hippo-kai-Koyres, in memory of the horſe and the young lady.

(11) Sub voc. Ἱππομενης.

SECT. IV.

The history of the antient kingdoms of Bœotia and Thebes.

Antient names.

WE find two antient kingdoms called by the name of Bœotia, the one, and by far the more antient and considerable of the two, founded, or rather restored, by Cadmus, and named by him Bœotia from the ox which is said to have directed him to the place where he built the capital of his new kingdom, better known afterwards by the name of Thebes. The other was in Thessaly, and is said to have been founded by Bœotus, the son of Neptune, and brother of Æolus, by Arne the daughter of Æolus king of Æolis. This last having sent his daughter to Metapontium a city of Italy, she was there delivered of those two sons, the eldest of whom she called after her father's name Æolus; and he possessed himself of the islands in the Tyrrhenian, now Tuscan sea, and built the city of Lipara. Bœotus the younger son went to his grandfather and succeeded him in his kingdom, and called it by his own name, and the capital city Arne from his mother. All that we know of these is, that they held this settlement upwards of two hundred years, and that the Thessalians did expel them from it, and forced them to seek for a new one; upon which they came and possessed themselves of that country which had been till then called Cadmeis, and gave it the name of Bœotia. Diodorus and Homer tell us, that these Bœotians did signalize themselves at the Trojan war, and the latter adds, that five of Bœotus's grandsons, Peneleus, Leitus, Prothoenor, Arcesilaus, and Clonius, were the five chiefs who led their Bœotian troops thither.

ACCORDING therefore to Diodorus *, this last country, though founded into a kingdom, at least ever since the time of Cadmus, was not called Bœotia till the banished sons of Bœotus gave it that name, about three-hundred years after the building of Thebes; but the most current account, count, eſpecially among the poets, is, that this name had been given to it by Cadmus himſelf in memory of the ox, by whom he had been directed thither, according to the command of the oracle (A). However, it is owned, that it had had ſeveral other names, according to thoſe of its ſuppoſed founders; thoſe who aſcribed it to Ogyges called both it and its capital Ogygia; others called it Cadmeis from Cadmus, Aonia from Aon the ſon of Neptune, and Hyanthis from Hyas the ſon of Atlas; but the far greater part ſay, it was originally called Calydna from Calydnus, the firſt founder of the capital and kingdom; that province is now called Stramulippa, and Thebes its antient capital Stibes or Stives.

* Bibl. lib. iv.

Geography. It bordered on the eaſt to Attica, and was in time joined to it, as we have ſeen in the laſt article, and was parted from it by the mountain Cithæron. On the north to the ſtreight Euripus, now called the Negroponte, ſaid to flow ſeven times in twenty-four hours, or rather according to Livy, ſuppoſed to do ſo, becauſe its tides are boiſterous and uncertain. On the weſt it had the kingdom of Phocis, and on the ſouth the gulph of Corinth. Its utmoſt extent from eaſt to weſt was 1 deg. 10. min. and near the ſame length from north to ſouth; but coming near to a point eaſtward [a]. Here is the large lake Copais about fourteen miles in length, and eight in breadth, out of which flow two conſiderable rivers, which water the far greater part of the country eaſtward. Theſe are the Aſopus, which divided the territories of Thebes from thoſe of the Plateans, and running through thoſe of Attica falls into the Ægean ſea; and the Iſmenus, which empties itſelf into the Euripus above-mentioned. The country is partly hilly, eſpecially Aonia properly ſo called; the reſt is low and flat, abounding with excellent paſturage; but whoſe air is ſo thick and foggy, that Horace thought it the occaſion of the inhabitants being ſuch famous dunces.

Natural rarities.

[a] Strab. Mel. & al.

(A) The fable goes, that Cadmus, tired with going in ſearch of his ſiſter Europa, whom Jupiter, in the ſhape of a bull, or, as is ſuppoſed, in a ſhip, which had a bull painted on the deck, had carried into Crete, was adviſed by the oracle of Delphos to follow the track of the firſt ox he ſaw, and where he reſted himſelf to build there the city of Thebes, which he did accordingly (1).

(1) Pauſan. in Bœot. & al.

Places of note.

PLACES of note in Bœotia were; 1. The Trophonian cave (B), and the oracle, ſaid to have been there given by Jupiter whence he was ſirnamed Trophoniius. 2. Theſpia, a town ſituate on the river of that name, and ſhadowed on the north by the famous Helicon, whence the muſes to which theſe were dedicated were called Theſpiades. 3. Aulis, a ſea-port on the Negropont, famous for being the place where the Grecian chiefs ſwore the deſtruction of Troy. 4. The famed ſtreights of the mountain Oeta, not above twenty-five feet in breadth, and commonly called the ſtreights of Thermopylœ from the hot waters of that neighhourhood; but the moſt famed place was the city of Thebes, ſituate near the river Iſmenus, and ſirnamed Heptapylos from its ſeven gates. It is generally allowed to have been founded by Cadmus, as we obſerved before, and to have been made by him the capital of the Bœotian kingdom, from which his ſucceſſors, who did adorn it with many ſtately temples, palaces, and other ſumptuous buildings, ſome of whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention by and by, were alſo called kings of Thebes [b].

Laws and cuſtoms.

THE government was altogether monarchical like thoſe we have ſeen already, but perhaps more deſpotic here than in the reſt, and having no other laws than the king's will; ſome of whom governed more like tyrants than natural monarchs. We have nothing left of their antient cuſtoms, except what Plutarch tells us in his morals of their manner of introducing their new-married women into their new habitation. They were brought thither in a kind of chariot or cart, the axle-tree of which was immediately burnt, to give the bride to underſtand, that ſhe was fixed with her huſband for life, and muſt not expect to return to her parents.

Chronology.

The foundation of this antient kingdom we ſhall only date from the building or rebuilding of its metropolis by Cadmus, to avoid all the fables and uncertainties which preceded that period, and con-

Pauſan. in Bœot.

(B) So called from a old ſoothſayer, who inhabited it, and uſed to be conſulted as an oracle. No man was admitted into it, till after many waſhings, anointing, and the like ſuperſtitious preparations. It is added that thoſe who had once been in it, were never ſeen to laugh afterwards. Hence came the proverb, when a man was over melancholly, he has been in the Trophonian den.

concerning which, whether we make Ogyges or any other hero to have reigned in Bœotia, we cannot gather any light, from even what we have left, out of the fable writers. Even the times which elapſed between Cadmus and the celebrated war between the two contending ſons of Œdipus, and which is the moſt antient piece of hiſtory that we have of all Greece, are ſo ſtuffed with the vileſt and moſt abſurd fables of gods turned into ſatyrs and devils, and of men turned into monſters of cruelty and luſt, that we hope we ſhall be excuſed for ſkipping over all that has not ſome affinity with the hiſtory itſelf. The time in which chronologiſts place the rape of Europa being about the year of the world 2550 [c], and of the flood 1545, the rebuilding of Thebes may be ſuppoſed to have been within a very few years after. From thence to the time of its being totally deſtroyed by the Epigoni it had ſtood above 230 years, under the government of eleven kings, two whereof were not of the Cadmean race, but uſurpers. After this there reigned in Thebes two kings more of the race of OEdipus, and three of the race of Peneleus the great grandſon of Bœotus. Beſides theſe we find Homer mentioning Æetion as king of Thebes. We have ſpoken of him in another place †, and ſhall omit him here in our liſt, becauſe it doth not appear that he was of Cadmean race, nor is he mentioned by Pauſanias among the Theban kings, though he may have ſignalized himſelf in the defence of that city *

Of the flood 1545.

[c] Vid. Hind. Hiſt. Græc.

† Vol. V. p. 599. f.

* The authors of this hiſtory have inadvertently placed Æetion in the number of the kings of the Bœotian Thebes; whereas he was king of Thebes in Cilicia, and ſlain by Achilles in the Trojan war.

The Liſt of the kings of Thebes, according to our Author, is as follows:

1 Cadmus
2 Polydorus
3 Labdacus
4 Lajus
5 Amphion an uſurper
6 Zethus his brother
Lajus reſtored
7 Œdipus
8 Eteocles and
9 Polynices
10 Laodamas the ſon of Eteocles.
11 Therſander ſon of Polynices.
12 Tiſamenes
13 Autefion
14 Damaſichton
15 Ptolomeos
16 Xuthus

After this laſt the Thebans, grown weary of kingly government, reſolved themſelves into a commonwealth, as ſhall be ſeen in the next chapter.

CADMUS, according to the Greeks, was the ſon of Agenor king of Sidon, or, according to others, of Tyre; but according to the Sidonians his countrymen he was no more than the king's cook: theſe add, that his wife Hermione was likewiſe a mere minſtrel at court, with whom he ran away into Greece †. The former tells us, that his father, ſending him and his two brothers in queſt of Europa, had forbad them to return without her. Cadmus therefore, having ſought her far and long in vain, and deſpairing of ſucceſs, came into Bœotia, where, as we have ſeen above, he rebuilt this city, and laid the foundation of this new kingdom. He was at firſt oppoſed by the Hyantes and Aones, who were then in poſſeſſion of that territory: the former he overcame in fight and forced them to retire into Locris; but the latter he admitted, upon their ſubmitting themſelves to him, to continue there, and to be incorporated with his own people (C). Here he † Vid. Athenæus. l. xiv. c. 22.

(C) Who and whence thoſe people were, whom Cadmus brought hither, is variouſly conjectured: ſome think, that he and they came from Thebais in Egypt (2) and that he therefore gave that name to his new metropolis. Others believe them to have been a colony of Phænicians; but we think Bochart's conjecture

(2) Vid. Uſſer. an. ſub. A. M. 2549.

he built the city of Thebes, and a citadel, which he called by his own name Cadmea [d], which name it retained many ages after.

THE fable adds, that when Cadmus married his wife Hermione, whom the poets make the daughter of Mars and Venus, the gods came to Cadmus and assisted at his wedding; and that he had by her one son named Polydorus and four daughters, Semele the mother of Bacchus by Jupiter (D), Ino, Autonoe, and Agave. After this the Enchelœ, who were at war with the Illyrians, being commanded by the oracle to chuse him their general, he left jecture (3) the most reasonable, that they were Canaanites driven out of their land by Joshua, whose time falls in with Cadmus exactly. Hence it is far from improbable, that this latter was of the family of the Cadmonites mentioned by Moses (4), who were the same with the Hivites, and were called Cadmonim, or Easterlings, because they inhabited mount Hermon the most eastern part of Canaan, from which the same author supposes Cadmus's wife to have been called Hermione or Harmonia.

[d] Pausan. ubi supra.

The fable of these two being turned into serpents, he thinks to have sprung from their retaining their common name of Hivites, which in the Syriac signifies a serpent.

These conjectures are further confirmed by the name of his capital Thebes, for the above quoted book mentions a city of the same name in the land of Canaan (5), and written in the plural Θηβη by Josephus (6): this is therefore a much more probable etymon, than that of those who derive it from Theba the daughter of Prometheus (7).

(D) The reason why the poets make Cadmus grandfather to Bacchus, is generally thought to have been his bringing the extravagant rites of that god into Greece: for it is intirely contrary to the chronology of those who make Bacchus to be the same with Nimrod and of those who make him the son of Jupiter Ammon, since in either opinion he must have been vastly more antient (8).

However, Bacchus is feigned to have been the first who found out the use of wine, to have gone upon a three years expedition, at the head of an army of men and women into India, even to the utmost parts of it, and to have reduced and civilized the Barbarian inhabitants of those parts: and lastly, to have returned in triumph upon an elephant (9).

(3) Canaan. l. i. c. 19. See before, Vol. II. p. 339. & seq. (4) Gen. xv. 19. (5) c. ix 50. (6) Ant. l. v. c. 5. (7) Vid. Steph. Byzant. sub Thebæ. (8) Vid. Bochart. ubi supra. Ch. xviii. (9) Vid. Diodor. Sicul. lib. iv.

left Thebes to his ſon Polydorus, and headed them; and here it was, that he and his wife are feigned to have been turned into ſerpents (E), or, as ſome interpret it, to have degenerated from their priſtine civility into barbarians. In this place he begat another ſon, whom he either called Illyrius from the name of the Illyrians his new-conquered ſubjects, or elſe that people took their name from him.

Brings letters into Greece

CADMUS is univerſally allowed to have introduced the uſe of letters into Greece from Phœnicia. The Alphabet at firſt had but ſixteen letters, and was not compleated till a long time after. He alſo was the firſt that ſet up ſchools there: he taught them moreover trade and navigation, and braſs had the name of Cadmean given it in memory of his being the inventor of it, or rather of his introducing the uſe of it into thoſe parts [c].

CADMUS being retired to Illyrium, as we have ſeen, left the Theban government to his ſon Polydorus, in whoſe reign his great favourite and nephew, Pentheus the ſon of Echion by Agave, having had the inſolence to prophane the rites of Bacchus, was torn in pieces by his mother and ſiſters. Polydorus, whoſe ſon Labdacus was yet under age, when he found himſelf dying, committed the care of him and of the kingdom to Nyctеus, whoſe daughter Antiope (F), the greateſt beauty then in all Greece, being ſoon after carried off by Epopeus king of Sicyon, he was forced to leave the government and the young prince to his brother Lycus, whilſt he undertook a war againſt the raviſher of his daughter. He went ſoon after him at the head of his Theban troops, and a bloody fight enſued, in which

[c] Vid. Herodot. l. v.

(E) Another fable of him is, that having killed a great ſerpent, he ſtrowed the teeth of it upon the ground, which immediately became living men, and fell a fighting againſt each other till they were all killed except five: hence a dear-gotten victory came to be called Victoria Cadmea.

(F) This young princeſs, who was married to Zethus, is ſuppoſed to have been carried off by her own conſent, becauſe her dying father gave him orders to puniſh her, if ever he got her into his hands. But when he had got her, and found that ſhe was pregnant, he contented himſelf at firſt with divorcing her, though he was afterwards perſuaded by his next wife to clap her into a priſon, out of which ſhe was afterwards releaſed by her two ſons. (10).

(10) Pauſan. in Corinth. c. v.

which Nyctеus received a mortal wound and loſt the battle, upon which he cauſed himſelf to be brought back to Thebes, where he left once more his brother guardian of the king and kingdom, and gave him in charge to revenge his death on Epopeus, and to reſcue his daughter Antiope. In the mean time Epopeus, fluſhed with his victory (G), neglected a ſlight wound which he had received, and which gave him his death ſome time after, and put an end to the war. Lycus recovered his niece, and as ſhe was coming back to Thebes, ſhe fell in labour, and was delivered of two ſons, Amphion and Zethus (H), of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak by-and-by.

2. Labdacus, when of age, finding that Laomedon, who had ſucceeded Epopeus in Sicyon, was attacked by two powerful enemies, Archandes and Architeles, the ſons of Achæus, thought it proper time to demand his aunt Antiope to be reſtored; and Laomedon, though then aſſiſted by Sicyon, whom he had invited from Athens (I), yet choſe rather to deliver up that princeſs, than to exaſperate the Theban king by a refuſal *. We have ſeen what reception ſhe met with in a late note. Labdacus,

* Pauſan. in Corinth. ch. vi.

(G) He is ſaid to have built the temple of Minerva, as an acknowledgment for his late ſucceſs, and that when it was finiſhed, he prayed to the goddeſs, that if ſhe accepted of it, ſhe would ſhew ſome particular token of it, upon which they add, that an olive-tree grew up immediately before the gate of the temple (11).

(H) Theſe twins, Homer ſays (12), were begot, not by Epopeus, but by Jupiter, who fell in love with Antiope. Their firſt exploit was to murder Lycus and his wife, and to reſcue their mother out of her confinement. After this they ſeized on the government, and performed wonders in the building of the walls of that metropolis, as we ſhall ſee in due time.

Antiope is alſo called Nyctеis from her father Nyctеus, and the antient Samotic poet celebrates her in verſes to this purpoſe; That ſhe had Aſopus for her father; Epopeus and Jupiter for her gallants; and Amphion and Zethus for her ſons (13).

(I) Who, the Sicyonians ſay, was not the ſon of Marathon, the ſon of Epopeus, but of Metion the ſon of Erectheus (14). Heſiod makes him the ſon of Erectheus, and another of Pelops (15). We are all in the dark about it; the reader may ſee what we ſaid of him in the ſecond ſection of this chapter.

(11) Id. ibid. (12) Odyſſ. l. ii. (13) Aſius ap. Pauſan. ubi. ſupra. (14) Id. ibid. (15) Ibyc. ap. eund.

cus, dying ſoon after, left his ſon Lajus and the government to the care of Lycus.

4. LAIUS being then very young, Amphion and his brother Zethus, taking the advantage of his minority, invaded the country at the head of a powerful army. Lycus having made it his firſt care to ſecure the perſon of the young prince, the only ſurviving one of the Cadmean race, went and gave battle to the invaders, and loſt the day. Amphion ſeized the Theban crown, and called its metropolis, or at leaſt the lower city, Thebes, in honour of Thebe their aunt by the mother's ſide (K), whilſt the upper city or citadel retained its antient name of Cadmea. It is to theſe two heroes that Homer attributes the incloſing and fortifying of the former with a famous ſtrong wall, with ſeven gates, and a number of ſtately towers at a convenient ſpace from each other, without which their valour could never have held that city long againſt the Theban forces (L). A grievous plague raged ſoon after, which deſtroyed great multitudes, and among the reſt Amphion and his family. His brother Zethus, who ſucceeded him, fell under other misfortunes; his only ſon was killed by his own mother, the grief of which ſhortened his days, and gave the Thebans an opportunity of ſetting Lajus again upon the throne.

LAJUS having married Jocaſta, or, as ſhe is called by others, Epicaſte, the daughter of Creon, was forewarned by Apollo's oracle, that if he had a ſon by her, he ſhould be killed by him. Œdipus, was the unhappy fruit of this mar-

(K) Some pretend, that ſhe was one of the three daughters of the river Aſopus, or rather of Aſopus the Phliaſian, from whom that river had its name: but the Bœotians affirm, that ſhe was the daughter of Aſopus the Bœotian, probably the ſame which was alſo called Nycteus the father of their mother Antiope, whom Aſius above quoted calls Aſopus.

(L) What the fable adds, concerning the miraculous effects of Amphion's lyre in the building of thoſe walls, is ſo well known, that we need not ſay any thing further about it, than that Amphion had firſt brought muſick into Greece, from Lydia, where he had learned it (16). and that it was ſo admired for its novelty and excellence, that he eaſily captivated the people to carry on that work, whilſt he diverted them with the muſick of his harp; aud probably alſo by his eloquence, which he was no leſs a maſter of, perſuaded that as yet barbarous and wild people to live ſociably and in community.

(16) Vid. Plin. lib. vii. c. lvi. Pauſan. in Bœotic. & al.

marriage, whom Lajus therefore gave to a ſhepherd to be ſlain (M); but he, moved with compaſſion, left him expoſed in a place, where he was ſoon after taken up by the herdſman of, and preſented to, Polybus king of Corinth, who healed his feet, and, from the ſwelling which the boring and anguiſh had left in them, called him Œdipus, and brought him up as his own [f]. When he came of age, and underſtood that he was not the ſon of the Corinthian king, he went to the oracle at Delphos to enquire after his parents, and at the ſame time Lajus led by his fate went likewiſe to enquire what was become of his ſon. They met at Phocis, and, ſome ſcuffle happening between them, Œdipus unwittingly killed his father and went to Thebes, where he married his mother Jocaſta, and obtained the kingdom by expounding the Sphinx's riddle (N). Eteocles and Polynices were the unhappy fruit of their inceſtuous embraces (O). Some add, [f] Conf. Plutarch. in Theſ. Diodor. Sicul. l. iv. Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Apollod. l. iii. c. 5. & al.

(M) Or according to others to have his feet bored, and to be hung up by them to a tree, and to be devoured by the wild beaſts.

(N) This was a miſchievous monſter which infeſted the neighbourhood of Thebes, it had a face and body like a dog, and deſtroyed all the paſſengers that could not expound her riddle. Creon the father of Jocaſta ruled then at Thebes, and having conſulted the oracle, was anſwered that there would be no end of this miſchief till ſomebody gave her a ſolution; whereupon he cauſed it to be proclaimed through Greece, that the man that expounded it ſhould have Jocaſta to wife; and OEdipus proved the perſon who gained the fatal prize, and from that inceſtuous marriage had the two ſons who were the occaſion of this bloody war.

(O) This is at leaſt the account which all the antient poets, except Homer, have left us of it, probably to inhance the horror of that marriage, and to raiſe the greater compaſſion for that unhappy couple and their progeny; but Homer on the contrary, who introduces Ulyſſes, ſaying, that he had ſeen in hell the fair Epicaſte, who through imprudence had married her own ſon, who became at once the unhappy murderer of his father and huſband of his mother, makes him add, that the gods, by haſtening this prince's death, prevented the ſad effects of that inceſtuous marriage. For, as Pauſanius juſtly obſerves add, that he had alſo two daughters by her, but others ſay they were by another woman.

As ſoon as Œdipus was appriſed, by a fatal train of calamities, of his parricide and inceſt, the horror of his guilt threw him into ſuch a fit of diſtraction, that he tore his own eyes out, and, having curſed his unhappy poſterity, was led by his daughter Antigone to Attica, where he took ſanctuary in Eumenides's grove, and ſoon after ended his miſerable life. As for Jocaſta, ſhe hanged herſelf for grief even before he left the kingdom.

His two ſons, after his departure, agreed, that each of them ſhould reign alternately one year, and then yield the government to the other; but Eteocles having refuſed to reſign after he had reigned his year, Polynices went to Argos, where having married Adraſtus's daughter, as we have ſeen in a former ſection, he engaged that prince to aſſiſt him in recovery of his right: theſe two came ſoon after with a powerful army, and beſieged Eteocles at the ſeven gates of his capital. Eteocles at the ſame time put himſelf in the beſt poſture of defence, and went and conſulted an old blind Theban ſouthſayer about the ſucceſs of the war; and was anſwered, that victory ſhould infallibly fall on his ſide, if Menecœus, the ſon of Creon and the laſt of the Cadmean race, would voluntarily ſacrifice himſelf to the god of war. The brave prince being informed of it, made no delay, but went to the gates of the city and ſacrificed his life to the ſafety of his country [g]. This did not, however, prevent hoſtilities being carried on with the utmoſt fury, and with ſuch terrible ſlaughter on both ſides, that it was at length agreed, that the contending princes ſhould decide the conteſt by ſingle combat, which they did with ſuch deſperate fury, that both fell by each other's ſword. The Argives ventured to give the Thebans a ſecond battle, wherein both ſides loſt ſeveral of their brave commanders, and ſuch a number of men, that though the latter got the victory, yet they were almoſt ruined by it.

[g] Id ibid. vid & Cicer. Stat. & al.

ſerves (17), how could they be ſaid to ſtop the courſe of that inceſt, if OEdipus had had four children by his mother?

He adds upon the authority of a poem, intitled, OEdipiad, or the adventures of OEdipus, that he had thoſe children by Euriganea the daughter of Hyperbas.

(17) In Bœotic. cap. vi.

it. A treaty was then expoſtulated by the Argive king for burying of their dead, but Creon, who had then taken the government upon him, was ſo exaſperated againſt them, that he not only abſolutely refuſed it, but cauſed the princeſs Antigone to be buried alive, becauſe ſhe had cauſed the body of her brother Polynices to be decently interred. For this cruel deed he was ſoon after killed by Theſeus, who came with an army againſt him, and obliged the Thebans to permit the Argives to bury their ſlain, as we have ſeen elſewhere.

In the mean time the ſons of thoſe ſeven generals, who fell before Thebes, reſolving to revenge themſelves on that city for the ill ſucceſs of the laſt expedition, entered into a confederacy, from which they were called Epigoni, and renewed the ſiege afreſh. Laodamus the ſon of Eteocles, who by this time came to age and had taken the government upon him, gave them a warm reception, and with his own hand killed Ægyaleus one of their chiefs. But being himſelf ſoon after killed, or forced to fly into Illyrium [h], the Thebans began to ſue for a treaty, and whilſt that was tranſacting, conveyed themſelves away with their families and effects by night, and went and built the town of Hæſtiœa, leaving Thebes to the mercy of the Epigoni. Some ſay, that theſe, being appriſed of their flight, plundered the city, and quite eraſed her walls. Others affirm, that Therſander Polynices's ſon diſſuaded them from it, recalled the fugitive citizens, and reigned over them; ſoon after which he led them to the Trojan war, and in the way ſignalized himſelf at Myſia, and was killed by Telephus. His ſon Teſamenes, being then too young to command the Theban forces, Peneleus was choſen their chief, and was alſo killed there by Eurypylus the ſon of Telepus. After his death Tiſamenes took the government upon him, and reigned peaceably enough, but the fates, which purſued the unfortunate offspring of Œdipus, did not prove ſo favourable to his ſon Autesion, who, we are told, was ſeized with ſuch a dreadful phrenſy, or, according to the poetic phraſe, was perſecuted by the furies to ſuch a degree, that he was forced by the oracle's advice to retire among the Dorians.

After his departure the Thebans raiſed Damaſichton, the grandſon of Peneleus, to the throne, who left it to his ſon son Ptolomeos, and he was succeeded by Xanthus, who was the last who enjoyed the regal dignity in Thebes, and was treacherously killed by Melanthus in single combat, as we have seen in the history of Athens. After his death the Thebans, weary of a kingly government, resolved to put it into many hands, and to settle themselves into a commonwealth [i], as we shall see in the next chapter.

[h] Conf. Pauſan. Bœotic. & Apollod. l. iii. c. 7.

[i] Pausan. ubi supra.

End of the FIFTH VOLUME.

AN

AN INDEX

TO THE FIFTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and Letter n to the Notes.

A.

ABAS, king of Argos, 624.

Abouillona, the lake of, in Myſia, deſcribed, 564.

Abraham, the Perſians give out that they had their Religion from him, 40. Not probable that he lived among them, ibid. & 41.

Abretana, part of the kingdom of Myſia, 561.

Abydos in Leſſer Phrygia, by whom built, 521, 581. Famous for the ſtory of Hero and Leander, 521. A mine of gold diſcovered in it, 549.

Acaliđe, the wife of Tros, her Progeny, 542.

Acamas, the ſon of Antenor, 544. Commands the troops of Dardania, ibid.

Acdeſtis, the ſon of Jupiter, by the rock Agdus, 505. Tamed by Bacchus, ibid.

Achæmenes, king of Perſia, 57.

Achaia, part of ancient Greece, 604.

Achæans, ancient Grecians, 604, 605, & n.

Achilles, his exploits before Troy, 555, & ſeq. His tomb, 523.

Acmon, father of Uranus, prince of the Clie, 421.

Adraſtia, whether the ſame with Parium, 563.

Adraſtus king of Argos, 623. His kindneſs to Polynices and Tydeus, 633, & ſeq. Gives them his Daughters, ibid. Wars againſt Eteocles, 634. Of all the generals alone ſurvives the war, 635. ——— In him ends the royal family of Phrygia, 519.

Adrymetes, king of Lydia, 579.

Adultery, ſtrangely puniſhed by Hippomenes, 659 n.

Ægeus, king of Athens, the father of Theſeus, 647. Releaſed by him from Minos's tribute, 650. Flings himſelf into the Ægean ſea, 651.

Ægialeus, gives the name of Ægiala to Sicyon, 615. Peloponneſus ſo called, ibid.

Ægiſthus, the murderer of Agamemnon, killed by Oreſtes, 632.

Ægium, the Greeks rendezvous againſt Troy, 551.

Ægypt, conquered by Cambyſes, 87. Revolts againſt Darius, 121. Againſt the Perſians, 156. Reduced, 159. Reduced again by Ochus, 201. By Alexander, 221.

Ægyptian ſculls, why harder than thoſe of the Perſians, 86, 87 n.

Ægyptus, king of Mycenæ, vid. Æpytus. ——— Wars with his brother Danaus, 623.

Ægira, metropolis of Achaia Proper, founded by Ægirus king of Sicyon, 617.

Æneas, ſaid to have betrayed Troy, 556, 557. Whether he retired into Italy, 558, & n. & ſeq.

Æolis, part of Asia Proper, 486.
Æpytidæ, so called from Æpytus king of Mycenæ, 639.
Æsacus, the son of Priam, 549.
Æsculapius practised physic at Pergamos, 566.
Æthiopians pay tribute to the Persians, 29. Their king's brave answer to Cambyses's embassadors, 88.
Ætolia, part of Græcia Proper, 604.
Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ, 631. Murdered in his return from Troy, 632.
Agathyrsian Scythians described, 463.
Agdus, a famous rock, 505
Agenor, a great Warrior, 544.
Agesilaus, his sudden expedition against the Persians, 177. Defeats them and the Phrygians, ibid. & 178. Made commander by sea and land, 179. Recalled by the Ephori, 180. His expedition into Egypt, 192. Despised by Tachos, and helps to dethrone him, ibid. & 193.
Aglauros, the daughter of Cecrops, her fatal curiosity punished, 646, n.
Agriculture, unknown to the ancient Greeks, 607, 608.
Ahasuerus, the same with Artaxerxes Longimanus according to Usher, 154. vid. Artaxerxes.
Ahriman, the Persic name of the devil, 46. Was written inverted, ibid. Believed to have been created out of darkness, ibid. His war with God, 47.
Ajax shipwrecked, 557. His tomb, 523.
Alba, the kingdom of, whether founded by Æneas, 558.
Albion, whence so called, 400, n.
Alceus, king of Lydia, 580.
Alcmon, archon at Athens, 659.
Alcymus, king of Lydia, 579.
Alexander the son of Priam, vid. Paris, 549.
——— the son of Amyntas, king of Macedon, noble revenge against the Persians, 107.
——— king of Macedon, his offers to the Athenians rejected, 144. His attachment to the Greeks, 146.
——— the great chosen generalissimo of the Greeks, 204, & seq. Invades Persia, 204, & seq. Gains the first victory at Granicus against them, 205, & seq. Received by several Persian cities, 207. Gains the streights of Cilicia, 210. Defeats the Persians near Issus, 213, & seq. His generosity to the Family of Darius, 215. Gains immense booty from him, 214. His answer to that prince's haughty letter, 218. Cruelty to Betis and Gaza, 219. Conquers Egypt, 221. Answer to Darius's embassadors, 222. Defeats the Persians near Arbela, 224, & seq. Takes Babylon and Suza, 227, & seq. His behaviour to Sysigambis and Madates, 228. Gains the streights of Persia, 229. Takes and burns Persepolis, 230. Marches in pursuit of the traytor Bessus, 233. His grief for the death of Darius, 234. Kindness to his relations, ibid. Subdues the remainder of the Persian empire, ibid. & seq. Some account of him out of the oriental writers, 237, & seq. Visits the tomb of Achilles, 523. Outwitted by the Lampsacenians, 563, & seq.
Alexandria. vid. Troas, 525.
——— in Cilicia, by whom built, 597.
Alps and Apennine hills, whence so called, 401.
Altars, their structures among the Scythians, 451.
Alyattes, king of Lydia, his wars with Cyaxares, the Scythians, &c. 582. Outwitted by Thrasybulus, king of Miletes, 583, 584. His tomb, 571.
Alyxothoe, Priam's wife. vid. Arisba, 549.
Amasis king of Egypt, his body dug up and abused by Cambyses, 387.
Amazons, mothers of the Sarmatians, 439. Their Scythian name, 461, 462. An account of those female warriors, 464, n. Overcome by Hercules and Theseus, 653, n.
Amisodarus, king of Lycia, 593.
Amphiaraus, a famous soothsayer, betrayed into the Theban war, 634. Wins the prize at the Nemean games, 635. His temple at Rhemnus, 641.
Amphictyon, son of Deucalion, king of Athens, 645.
Amphitryon's wife defloured by Jupiter, 628. Kills his uncle Electryon, ibid.
Amur, river in Scythia, 441.
Amyntas invades Egypt, 220. Cut off by the Persians, ibid. & n.
Anacharsis put to death for introducing the Grecian worship into Scythia, 447, n. 479.
Anazarbum, a city in Cilicia Propria, 597.
Ancharus's great love to his country, 517, & seq.
Anchiale in Cilicia Propria, by whom built, 597.
Anchises, king of Troy, saved from the flames, 542.
Ancyra, by whom built, 515.
Androgeus, the son of Minos, killed at Athens, 648, 649.
Antalcidas, the peace of, 182.
Antenor, grandson of Cleomestra, his embassy into Greece, 542. Suspected of treachery, 543. Comes with a mixed multitude of Heneti and Trojans, to the Adriatic shore, ibid. His progeny, 544.

Antigone buried alive for interring her brother, Polynices, 671.

——Daughter of Laomedon, a proud princeſs, 548. Transformed into a ſtork, ibid.

Antigonia, vid. Troas, Alexander 525.

Aon, the ſon of Neptune, ſettles in Bœotia, and gives it the Name of Aonia, 661.

Aones, whether ancient Grecians, 607. Admit Cadmus in Bœotia, 664.

Apamea, metropolis of Phrygia Major, 493. Whence ſirnamed Cibotos, 494, n.

Apheresiab, king of the Turks, according to the oriental writers, 260. His wars with the Perſians, ibid. & ſeq. Subdues them, 265. Driven out of Perſia by Zalzer, 267, 274, & ſeq. Defeated by the Perſian general Ruſtan, 286. Driven from his Dominions by the Perſian king, 287. Taken priſoner and put to death, ibid.

Aphydas, king of Athens, murdered by Thymætes, 657.

Aphrodiſias, in Cicilia Aſpera, why ſo called, 595.

Apis, the Egytian god, killed by Cambyſes, 90.

—— king of Sicyon. 617. Split into two by chronologers, 616.

—— king of Argos, a great tyrant, 622.

Apologues, among the Perſian writers, a ſpecimen of them, 294, 295, 296, n.

Apollo, worſhipped by the Scythians, 415. The Trojans, 531.—Why ſirnamed Sminthian, 533.

Apollonia, where ſituate, 564.

Arabians, tribute to the kings of Perſia, 29.

Arbela, the city, and battle of, 224 & ſeq.

Arcadia, part of ancient Greece, 604.

Arcadians, ancient Grecians, 605.

Archilochus commands the Dardanian forces, 544.

Archon's liſt of thoſe mentioned in hiſtory. When begun, 644, 658. Made decemnial, 659.

Ardſhir, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 343. The ſame with the Greek Artaxerxes Longimanus, 344. Recovers the provinces of Sijiſtan, &c. from the ſon of Ruſtan. 345. Reſigns his crown to his queen Homai, 349.

Ardyes, king of Lydia, 581.

Arg jaſp, prince of Touran, according to oriental writers, 335. Wars againſt Perſia, ibid. Takes the city of Balch, 336. Killed by the prince of Perſia, 338.

Argippeans, their character, 444.

Argives, ancient Grecians, 604, 622. From whom deſcended, 618, 622. War againſt Thebes, 635, & ſeq. 670, & ſeq.

Argon, king of Lydia, 580.

Argos, king of Argos, by whom begot, 622.

Argos kingdom, part of ancient Greece, 604. By whom founded, 618, 622. Its ſituation, ſoil, government, &c. 619, 620. When founded, 620. Tranſlated to Mycenæ, ibid. Kings of Argos, 621, & ſeq. Kingdoms divided, 625. Re-united, ibid. & ſeq. Invaded by the Heraclidæ, 636. Conquered, 638. Reduced into a democracy, 639.

Argyrippa, or Argos Hippim, a city in Apulia, 636. By whom built, ibid.

Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, married to Theſeus, 650. Carried off by Bacchus, 651.

Ariantes, king of Scythia, his large copper, 456, 481.

Arimaſpea Scythia deſcribed, 442.

Ariobarzanes beaten out of the ſtreights of Perſia, 229. Killed, ibid.

Aripithes, king of Scythia, 479.

Ariſba, a city of Phrygia Minor, 520.

——Priam's wife, 549.

Ariſtagoras, Rebels againſt Darius, 110, & ſeq. His death, 174, 175.

Ariſtomachus, grandſon of Hercules, defeated at the iſthmus of Corinth, 636, 637.

Ariſtotle, his character, 358. According to the oriental writers, 369, 370, 371.

Arius, the laſt king of Myſia, killed by Amphialus, 569.

Arne, the daughter of Æolus gives her name to the metropolis of Bœotia, 660.

Arſes raiſed to the Perſian throne by Bagoas, 202. Murdered by him, ibid.

Artaphernes, general of Darius's expedition againſt Greece, 115, & ſeq. Shamefully beaten by the Athenians, 119.

Artabanus diſſuades Xerxes from a ſecond attempt againſt Greece, 126, 127. Conſents to his own diſgrace, 125, & ſeq.

Artabanus, his treaſons, 153. Death ibid. Whether he reigned ſeven months, 154, n.

Artabaſus, governor of Cilicia, 158. Sails towards the Nile, ibid. Defeats the Egyptians, ibid.

Artaxerxes, the ſon of Xerxes raiſed to the throne, 153. The Ahaſhuerus of ſcripture, 154 & 155, n. Defeated by the Egyptians, 157. Makes peace with the Greeks, 159. His injuſtice to the Athenian priſoners, 160. Ingratitude to Megabyſus, 161. Anſwer to the Greek embaſſadors, 162. His death and character, ibid.

—— II. Sirnamed Mnemon. Succeeds Darius Nothus, 168, & ſeq. Marches againſt his revolted brother, 172. Kills him in a ſet battle, 173. Defeats the Lacedæmonians, 181. Makes peace with them, 183, & ſeq. Invades Cyrus, 185. Conquers it, 186, & ſeq. Goes in perſon againſt the Caduſians, 188. His prodigious army, ibid. Ready to periſh with famine, ibid. Saved by a ſtratagem of Tiribazus, ibid. Invades Egypt, 189, & ſeq. His great army and fleet, 190. Their broils and ill ſucceſs, 191. Invades it afreſh 12 Years after, 192. Diſcovers a conſpiracy made againſt him, 194, & ſeq. His death and character, 165.

———III. Vide Ochus, 195.

Artemiſia, queen, diverts Xerxes from engaging the Greeks at ſea, 142. Her bravery, ibid. & ſeq.

Arts and ſciences unknown to the ancient Greeks, 608, 609.

Aſcalon, by whom founded, 574. Temple of Venus plundered by the Scythians, 472.

Aſcania, a city in Leſſer Phrygia, 530. Built by Aſcanius, 560 n.

Aſcanian lake, ſo called from Aſkenaz, 530.

Aſhes, a dreadful Perſian puniſhment, 163, & n.

Aſia, the daughter of Teucer, 535.

Aſia, whence ſo called, 489. Deſcribed, 490. How divided at preſent, ibid. Conquered by the Scythians, 469, & ſeq.

Aſia Proconſular deſcribed, 487, & ſeq.

Aſia Proper deſcribed, 484, & ſeq. Part of Aſia Minor, 486.

Aſiatic, dioceſs deſcribed, 488.

Aſius, the ſon of Cotys, Aſia, named from him, 574.

Aſſaracus, one of the three ſons of Tros, 541, 542.

Aſopus, a river in Attica, 641.

Aſſos of Æolis, and Aſſos Myſia the ſame 486.

Aſtrologers, and aſtronomy, a remarkable account of both, 341, n. & ſeq. n.

Aſtyages's two dreams concerning his daughter, 58. Interpreted by the Magi, ibid. Marries her to Cambyſes, an obſcure Perſian, ibid. Orders her Child to be murdered, ibid. His cruelty to Harpagus for not obeying, 62. Revenge on the Magi for their wrong advice, 66. Defeated by Cyrus, and kept priſoner to his death. ibid.

Atheas, king of Scythia, 481, & ſeq. Out-wits the Macedonians, 482.

Athene, the Greek name of Minerva, 641.

Athens, whence ſo called, 641, & n. Why famed above other Greek cities, ibid. Deſtroyed by Mardonius, 145. Rebuilt by Conon, 182.

Athenians, their government, kings, &c. 643. Curſed by Theſeus, and puniſhed, 654, & n. Change their government into archonſhips, 658, into a democracy, 659. Aſſiſt the Ionians againſt the Perſians, 112. Their treatment of Darius's heralds, 117. Invaded and diſtreſſed by him, 118. Gain a compleat victory over him by ſea and land, 119, & ſeq. Prepare againſt Xerxes, 134. Forſake their city and country, 145. Defeat the Perſian fleet, 140, & ſeq. & 143. Aſſiſt the revolted Egyptians and Lacedæmonians, 156. Defeated by the Perſians in Egypt, 158. Reſtored to their former ſtate, 183, & ſeq. Make an advantageous peace with Perſia, 183, & ſeq. Break it by aſſiſting the king of Cyprus, 185.

Athos, the mountain of, a paſſage cut through it by Xerxes, 128, & ſeq.

Atlas, the Nephew of Jupiter, whence ſo named, 433, n. Reigned in Mauritania, 539, n.

Atreus, king of Mycenia, his cruel revenge, 631, & n. Killed by Ægyſthus, ibid.

Attalus, the inventor of tapeſtry, 566.

Attica, whence ſo called, 645. Part of Græcia Propr. 604. Its extent, ſituation and ſoil, 640. Cities and ports, ibid. Government, ibid. Opulence, origin kings, &c. 642, & ſeq. Religion, 645. Change of government, 658. Invaded by Xerxes, 136, & ſeq. Forſaken and ravaged by the Perſians, 145.

Attica fides, a proverb, 641.

Attic coin deſcribed, 642.

Attis, how conceived and preſerved, 505. His fatal wedding, 506.

———, the daughter of Cranaus king of Athens, 645.

Atyadæ, a race of Lydian kings, 574.

Atys, the ſon of Cotys king of Lydia, 574, 578.

———, ſon of Cræſus killed by a wild boar, 586.

Aulæa, a famous kind of tapeſtry at Pergamus, 566

Aulis, in Bœotia, the Greek chiefs ſworn there, 662.

Auteſion, king of Thebes, runs mad, 671.

B.

BABYLON, when, and by whom taken, 91, & ſeq. 227, & ſeq.

Babylonians revolt from the Perſians, 103, & ſeq. Straightly beſieged by Darius, ibid. & ſeq. Their bloody method of ſtopping all uſeleſs Mouths, 104. Surrender, ibid. To Alexander, 227.

Bacchus, worſhipped by the Phrygians, by the name Sabazios, 511. Why ſuppoſed the grandſon of Cadmus, 665, n.

Bagoas, general of Ochus, 220. Strives in vain to ſave the Egyptian temples, 202, & ſeq.

& seq. Redeems their records, ibid. Poisons Ochus, ibid. Sets up his youngest son, ibid. Kills him, and sets up Darius Codoman, 203. His new treason discovered and punished, ibid.

Bahaman, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 342 & seq. Vide Ardshir.

Balch, made the seat of the Persian empire, 287, 294. Taken by the king of Touran, 336.

Batia, the daughter of Teucer. Vide Asia, 535.

Bazab, king of Persia. Vide Zab. 267.

Bec or Bek, wild inferences about that word, 503.

Bellerophon, falsly accused to Prætus, 625. Why said to kill the Chimæra, 592

Belus, king of Lydia, 580.

Bessus, his treachery to Darius, 231, & seq. Invades Bactria, 232. His punishment, 236.

Beth-sheam, taken by the Scythians, 472.

Betis, governor of Gaza, murdered by Alexander, 219.

Bias, obtains part of the kingdom of Argos, 625.

Biblos surrendered to Alexander, 217.

Boar Erymanthian, brought alive by Hercules, 629, n.

Boat, a dreadful punishment among the Persians, 12.

Bœotia, part of Græcia Propr. 604.

Two countries of that name, 660. By whom founded and named, ibid. & 661. Described, 661. Famed for dunces, ibid. Since called Thebes, 663. Its government, kings, &c. Vide sub Thebes, 662, & seq. Made the seat of War by the Persians, 145.

Bœotians expelled by the Thessalians, 660. Signalize themselves at Troy, ibid.

Bœotus, founder of the Thessalian Bœotia, 660.

Bog, river in Scythia, 443.

Borysthenes or Nieper, river in Scythia, 443, & 445, n.

Bos, in Lingua, a proverb, 642.

Bous, Βους, Eusebius's mistake about that word, 645.

Brass, the invention of, ascribed to Cadmus, 666.

Brigians, whether the same with Phrygians, 500.

Britain, the etymon of that word, 399, 400, n.

Britons, different from the Celtes or Gomerians, 400, n.

Britain, the isles of, first inhabited by the Gomerians, 399, n.

Brutus not the first who peopled Britain, 399, 400, n.

Bryges, a people of Thrace, destroy part of Darius's Army, 116.

Budian, Scythians, men-eaters, 463.

Bulls blood, a sure poison, 519.

C.

CABIRI, who, 511.

Cadmea, the citadel of Thebes, 665.

Cadmea victoria, a proverb, 666, n.

Cadmeis, one of the ancient names of Bœotia, 660, 661.

Cadmus, founder and king of Bœotia, 660, 661, n. What people his followers were 664, 665. n. His original, 664. The fable of him, ibid. & n. & seq. Introduces learning into Greece, 666. Retires into Illyria, ibid.

Cadusians, invaded by the Persians, 188. Betrayed by a stratagem, ibid.

Caicobad, king of Persia. vid. Keykobad, 273.

Callirhoe, the wife of Tros, her progeny, 541.

Calydna, one of the antient names of Bœotia, 661.

Cambletes, king of Lydia, a debauched prince, 579.

Cambyses, an obscure Persian, married to Mandane, 58.

——— The son of Cyrus, succeeds him, 85. Called in scripture Ahashuerus, ibid. Conquers Egypt, 87. Puts the Egyptian king to death. ibid. His expedition against the Ethiopians, 88. His army forced to eat one another, 89. Kills the Egyptian Apis at Memphis, 90. Some instances of his madness and cruelty, 91, & seq. Dies at Ecbatan according to the oracle, 94.

Candaules, king of Lydia, dethroned for his folly, 580, & seq.

Capys marries Thermis, 542. Gives name to Caphya in Arcadia, ibid.

Caramania. Vide. Cilicia, 595.

Caria, part of Asia Propr. 485. Where situate, 487.

Carnus, a soothsayer, killed by the Heraclidæ. 637.

Cassian mountains divide Scythia from Seres, 440.

Cavalry not used in Persia till after Cyrus, 70, n.

Caucasus, mountain in Scythia, 441.

Cayster, river in Phrygia. 497, n. 573.

Cecropia, Athens antiently so called, 641.

Cecrops, an Egyptian fugitive, introduces religion into Greece, 642, 644, & seq. The fable of his giving name to Athens, 641, n. The founder of the Athenian monarchy, narchy, 644. His reign, ibid. & seq. Civilizes the people, ibid.

Cydnus, river in Cilicia, 598.
Celæne, where situate, 493.
Celtes. Vide Gomerians, 383, & seq.
Celtiberia, Spain anciently so called, 387, n.
Cerberus, fetched out of Hell by Hercules, 630, n.
Chariots of war, by whom invented, 18, n.
——— those of Cyrus described, 74.
Chilminar in Persia, by whom adorned, 270.
Chimæra, mountain in Lycia, 591.
——— the fable of, explained, ibid & seq.
Chios, by whom founded, 659.
Choaspes river, whether the same with the Euleus, 8, 9, n.
Chomer, Capital of Bactria, 393, n.
Chonos, in Phrygia, vid. Coloss. 496.
Chryse, the wife of Dardanus. her Dowry, 537.
Chrysorrhoas, river in Lydia, vid. Pactolus, 573.
Cidaris, or Persian diadem, described, 5, 6.
Cilicia, whence so called, 594. Described, 595. Its cities, ibid. & seq. Rivers, &c. 598. Government and various fates, 599, & seq. Kings, 600, & seq. Invaded by Alexander, 209, & seq.
Cilicians, their treachery and cruelty past into a proverb, 599, & n. By whom conquered, 600, & seq.
Cimmerians invade Asia-Minor, 581. Take Sardis from the Lydians, 582.
Cimon's conquests in Cyprus, 159 Beats the Persians by Sea and land, 160. Banished into Cyprus, 176. Made admiral of the Persian fleet, 176.
Circassian Tartary, part of Scythia, 441.
Citheræan mount described, 635.
Clazomenæ, by whom founded, 659.
Cleo, a famous robber, 496, & n.
Cleomestra, daughter of Tros, 542.
Clytemnestra, Agamemnon's faithless wife, 632. Killed by Orestes, ibid.
Codrus, the noble king of Athens, sacrifices his life for his country, 657, 658.
Coin first invented by the Lydians, 576.
Colchians tribute to the kings of Persia, 29.
Colchis, part of Scythia, 441.
Colophon, by whom founded, 659.
Coloss, a city in Phrygia, 496.
Conon, beats the Lacedæmonians at Sea, 181. Accused before Artaxerxes, 183. Condemned ibid.
Contracts, how made among the Scythians, 453.
Coon, the son of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon, 544.
Copais, the spring head of the Asopus, 641. Described, 661.
Corinth, the kingdom of, part of Greece, 604.
Coritus, king of Samothrace, 537, 538, & n.
Coribantes, whence descended, 507, 508, & n.
Corybas, the son of Cybele, by Jasius, 508, n.
Cotys, second king of Lydia, 578.
Cranaus, king of Athens, 645. Dethroned by Amphictyon, ibid.
Creon, prince of Thebes, his cruelty to his niece, 671.
Cresphontes, chief of the Heraclidæ, made king of Mycena, 638, Murdered by his nobles, 639.
Cret, the son of Jupiter, gives name to the island of Crete, 432.
Cretan historians account of Jupiter, 432.
Criasus, king of Argos, 622.
Cræsus, king of Lydia's conquests and wealth, 584. Interview with Solon, 585. Allied with the king of Babylon, 74, 586. Commands his army against Cyrus, ibid. & seq. Taken prisoner at Sardis, 74, 587. Ordered to be sacrificed, 78, 588. Saved and restored to his Kingdom, ibid.
Crotopus, king of Argos, 623.
Ctesias, an account of him and his writings, 377, n. & seq. n.
Cubbee, vid. Cybele, 504, & seq.
Cunaxa, the famous battle of, 172.
Cupid, a famed statue of him at Parium, 563.
Curetes, their office among the Celtes, 405, 406, & n.
Cybele, the chief deity of the Phrygians, 504, & seq. The ceremonies of her worship, 509, & seq. Her priests, 510. Her different genealogies, 507, n. & seq. Worshipped by the Trojans, 531. Her temple burnt at Sardis, 113.
Cybernisicus, king of Lycia, 593, & seq.
Cycnus, king of Colone in Troas, his character, 527. From whence called, 528, n.
Cyprus revolts from the Persians, 114. Reduced again, ibid. Invaded by the Athenians, 159. Recovered by Evagoras, 184, 185. Invaded by the Persians, 185. Taken, 186.
Cyrus's fabulous birth and exploits according to Herodotus, 58. Brought up by the king's herdman, 59. Discovered and sent ſent to his parents, 63, & ſeq. His ſtratagem to ſtir up the Perſians, 64, & ſeq. Conquers the Medes, 66. Keeps his grandfather priſoner, ibid. His head cut off by the queen of Sychia, 67. A more authentic account of him out of Xenophon, 68, & ſeq. Called out of Perſia, by Cyaxares, 70, & ſeq. Aſſiſts him againſt the king of Babylon, ibid. Kills that king, 72. Wars againſt Cræſus, 74, & ſeq. Takes him in Sardis, 78. His behaviour towards him, ibid. & n. & 79, n. Takes Babylon by ſtratagem, 80, 81. Aſcends the throne, 81. His favour to the Jews, ibid. Death, 83. Prophecies concerning him, 311, n. & ſeq. n.

——— the ſon of Darius Nothus made governor of Aſia Minor, 166. His pride and cruelty, 167, & ſeq. Conſpires againſt his brother, 168. Is ſentenced to death, ibid. Cauſes a revolt, 170, & ſeq. His fleet and army, 171. Killed in battle, 173.

Cyzicus, a famed city of Myſia, deſcribed, 561, & ſeq.

——— king of Myſia, killed by the Argonauts, ibid.

D.

DACIANS, vid. Getæ, 442.

Dactyli, why ſo called, 508, & n.

Dahac, vid. Dehoc, 251.

Damaſcus betrayed to Parmenio, 215, & ſeq.

Damaſichton, king of Thebes, 671.

Danae debauched by Jupiter, 625, 626.

Danaus, king of Argos, his ſeverity againſt his daughter, 624.

Dances uſed by the Phrygians in their worſhip, 512.

Danube ſeparates the Celtes from Scythia, 397.

Darab I. prince of Perſia, according to oriental writers expoſed in a wooden ark, 349. Acknowledged by his mother, 350. Succeeds her, 351, & ſeq. Wars with the king of Macedon, 353.

——— II. his war with Aſcander, king of Macedon, 354, & ſeq. Defeated by him twice, ibid. & ſeq. Murdered by his own ſubjects, 357.

Darab-gerd, a city built by Darab, 353.

Dardana, built by Dardanus, 537.

Dardanels. why ſo called, 521, n. & 522.

Dardania, vid. Troas, 519, & ſeq.

Dardanus in Phrygia Minor, 522. Marries the daughter of Teucer, 535. His deſcent and reign, 537.

Daric, an ancient gold coin, 14.

Darius, one of the Perſian nobles, choſen king by the neighing of his horſe, 101. Revenue, ibid. Long ſiege of Babylon, 103, & ſeq. Takes it by ſtratagem, 104. His unſucceſsful expedition againſt Scythia, 105, & ſeq. Fleet and conqueſt of India, 108. War with the Ionians, ibid. & ſeq. Firſt attempt againſt Greece unfortunate, 116. Second attempt, 117, & ſeq. Numerous army, 118. Defeated by the Athenians, 119. His loſs at ſea and land, 120 n. His deſign againſt Greece and Egypt, 121. His death and character, 123.

——— the ſon of Xerxes unjuſtly murdered, 153.

——— Nothus, natural ſon of Artaxerxers, mounts the Perſian throne, 164. His ſevere and uneaſy reign, ibid. & ſeq. Loſes Egypt, 166. Too much influenced by his queen, 167. His death and laſt words to his ſon, 168.

——— Codomanus raiſed to the Perſian throne, 203. His pedigree and character, ibid. Invaded by the Greeks, 204. Defeated at Granicus, 205, & ſeq. Loſes ſeveral cities and provinces, 207, & ſeq. His beſt general Memnon, ibid. Goes to ſuccour Cilicia, 212. The order of his march, ibid. Defeated near Iſſus, 213, & ſeq. His haughty letter to Alexander, 216. Offers of a ranſom for his family, 218. Raiſes a new army, 221. Makes new offers of peace, 223. Rejected by Alexander, ibid. Defeated near Arbela, 225, & ſeq. Flies into Armenia, 227. Into Media, 231. Treacherouſly impriſoned by his own generals, ibid. & ſeq. His dying meſſage to Alexander, 234. Death, character, and burial, ibid. & 235

Datis, general of Darius, his expedition againſt Greece, 117, & ſeq. Shameful defeat, 119.

Daunus. king of Apulia, relieved by Diomedes, king of Argos, 636. Kills him, ibid.

Dead-ſea, its various names, 440.

Dehoc, ſixth king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 251. His cruel reign and baniſhment, ibid. & ſeq.

Deiphontes made king of Argos, 638, 639.

Delphi, plundered by Xerxes, 140. His dreadful puniſhment, 141.

Demophon king of Athens, 656. Erects the court of the Ephetæ, ibid. Tried by it ibid.

Dercyllidas, general of Lacedæmon, his ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 176, & ſeq.

Diana, worſhipped by the Lydians, 576.

Dictys, prince of Seripus, brings up Perſeus as his own, 626. Raiſed to the throne by him, 627.
Dimas, the ſon of Dardanus, his colonies in Aſia, 539.
Dindymus mount, whence ſo called, 504, & 505, n.
Dioſcorides, where born, 597.
Dis, or Pluto, a prince of Celtic race, 419, 433.
Divination, uſed among the Celtes, 408. Inhuman cuſtom uſed in them, ibid.
Doeas brother of Acmon, a Celtic prince 418. Places that bear his name, ibid.
Don river, vid. Tanais, 439.
Donetz, or Little Tanais River, 443.
Doris, part of ancient Greece, 604.
Drunkenneſs, abhorred by the Scythians, 460.
Dunbavand, al. Dumavand, a remarkable mountain in Perſia, 340.
Dwina river in Scythia, 443.

E.

EARTH and Water demanded in token of ſubjection, 19, & 20 n.
Eclipſe of the Moon, ſcares the Macedonians, 221. How interpreted by the Egyptian Southſayers, 222.
Eetion, king of Thebes, killed by Achilles, 600.
Electra, daughter of Atlas, and mother of Dardanus, 537.
Elements, all reverenced by the Perſians, 41. Way and laws for preſerving them from pollution, ibid.
Eleuſis, a ſea port of Attica, 640, & 641.
Elis, kingdom, part of antient Greece, 604.
Elymæi of Sicily, whence ſo called, 542
Emathia, ſo called from Emathion, king of Troas, 547.
Enchelæ, chuſe Cadmus their general, 665.
Epheſus, a city of Lydia, 487. By whom founded, 658, 659. Opens its gates to Alexander, 207. Greatly inriched by Alexander, ibid.
——— the temple of, the only one that eſcapes the Perſian fury, 150.
Ephetæ, the court of, why inſtituted, 656.
Ephira, or Ephyra in Epirus, by whom built, 557.
Epichnemidia, part of ancient Greece, 604.
Epictetus, part of Phrygia Minor, 520.
Epigoni, whence ſo called, 671. The war of, ibid. & ſeq.
Epiphania, a city in Cilicia Proper, 597.
Epiſtropus, king of Lyrneſſus in Cicilia 601. Sides with the Trojans and is killed by Achilles, ibid.
Epopeus, king of Sicyon, 617. Raviſhes Antiope, 666. Dies of his wounds. 667.
Er, or Erus, the name of the Pamphylian Zoroaſter, 305.
Erectheus, king of Athens, 646.
Eretria, taken and deſtroyed by the Perſians, 117.
Eretrian priſoners ſent to people Ciſſia, 121.
Erichthonius, king of Athens, 646. The fable of his birth, ibid. & n.
Erithræ, by whom founded, 659.
Eryſichthon, the only ſon of Cecrops, his death, 645.
Eryxias, laſt archon of Athens, 659.
Eſkihiſſar, Vide Laodicea, 494.
Eſtiotis part of ancient Greece, 604.
Eteocles, king of Thebes, his injuſtice to his brother, 633, 634. The cauſe of a bloody war, ibid. & ſeq. & 670, & ſeq. Kills, and is killed by him, ibid.
Evagoras, king of Cyprus, invaded by the Perſians, 184. Aſſiſted by the Athenians, 185. Forced to yield, 186.
Evenus, king of Lyrneſſus in Cilicia, 601.
Euripus, vide Negropont, 661.
Eurybiades, Spartan admiral, ſurprizes the Perſian fleet, 141.
Eurypilus, the ſon of Telephus king of Myſia, 569.
Euryſtheus, king of Mycena's hatred to Hercules, 628, & ſeq.
Euthria, taken by the Greeks, ſet fire to their ſhips, and burns herſelf, 584.
Euxine ſea, whence ſo named, 530.

F.

FABLES, why mixed with ancient hiſtory, 603. n.
Fabulous and heroic times, a general account of them, 602.
Feaſts of Aſia kept at Philadelphia, 572.
Feramors, the ſon of the great Ruſtan, killed by Ardſhir king of Perſia, 345.
Feridoun, king of Perſia, Vide Phridun, 254.
Fire, in what ſenſe worſhipped by the antient Perſians 35. How preſerved and fed. 38. Ceremony of praying to it, 49.
Fourtiſſar, river miſtaken for the Granicus, 565, n.
Funerals among the Scythians, how performed, 449, & ſeq. 461.

G.

GAlatians, ancient Gomerians, 391, 392.
Galen, born at Pergamos, 566.

Gallus, river, 510.
Ganymedes, the ſon of Tros, abuſed by Tantalus, 540, & ſeq.
Garſiaveſch, prince of the Turks, aſſaſſinates the prince of Perſia, 280. Killed in an engagement by Ruſtan, ibid.
Gauls, vide Gomerians, 383, & ſeq.
Gaugamela, the battle of, 224, & ſeq.
Gaza, in Palæſtine taken by Alexander, and its inhabitants put to the ſword, 219.
Gelonian Scythians deſcribed, 463.
Getæ, or Dacians, where ſeated, 442.
Geneva lake deſcribed. 400, 401.
George, the Arian biſhop, born at Epiphania, 597.
Georgia, a province of Scythia, 441.
Geryon's oxen fetch'd by Hercules, 630, n.
Gherſchap, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 268.
Gjamaſp, a famed Perſian aſtrologer, 340. Foretels the coming of the Meſſiah, 341, & n.
Giemſchid, fifth king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 247. His pride and puniſhment, ibid. & ſeq.
Gnoſſus, Jupiter's ſepulchre ſhewn there, 432.
Gold, firſt coined by the Lydians, 576.
——— ſand of the river Hermus, 499.
Gomer, the eldeſt ſon of Japhet, the father of the Gomerians, 383. Whether he came into Europe, ibid. & ſeq. Whether the father of the Phrygians, 500. Gomeraeg, or Celtic language deſcribed, 410. Preſerved ſtill by the preſent Welſh, ibid. & ſeq Its affinity to the Hebrews, ibid. n. & 411, n.
Gomerians, or Celtes, deſcended from Japhet, 383, & ſeq. Their various names, 386, n. & 392. A different nation from the Scythians, 384. Their migration into Europe, 390. Extent of their territories there, 393, 394. Names of their rivers, &c. of Celtic extraction, 401, 402. Their government, laws, religion, &c. 404, & ſeq. Cruel cuſtoms, 408. Poetry and military diſcipline, language, &c. 409, 410, 411, 412 Diet, 412. Confounded with the Scythians, 415, n. Their kings, 419, & ſeq. Their kingdom diſmembered, 435.
Gordium, a city of Phrygia, deſcribed, 426.
——— by whom built, 514.
Gordius, I. ibid. & 502. How raiſed to the Phrygian throne, 513. Ties the Gordian knot, 514.
——— II. 517.
——— III. 518. Invaded by the Cimmerians, ibid.
Graicoi, Graii, } ancient Grecians, 604, & n.
Granicus, river in Myſia, 565, & n.
Greece, anciently deſcribed, 604, & ſeq. It various names, ibid. & ſeq.
Greek hiſtorians, their partiality againſt the Scythians, 452. The cauſe of it, ibid. & 453.
——— tongue affirmed to be the language of the gods, 503, 504, & n.
Greeks, the moſt ancient of them, 602, & ſeq. Their rude beginnings, 607, & ſeq. Ancient government, 609, & ſeq. Religion, 611. Antiquity, 613, Ancient kingdom 614. Their expedition againſt Troy, 549, & ſeq. Fleet, 552. Commanders, ibid. & ſeq. Firſt eight years war, 555, & ſeq. Infeſted with peſtilence, 556. Take and burn Troy, 557. The various fates of their chiefs, ibid. & ſeq.
Greeks, invaded by Xerxes, 131, & ſeq. Their brave defence, 136, & ſeq. Noble defence at Thermopylæ, 137, & ſeq. Their fleet, 141. Victorious over the Perſians, 143. Force them out of Greece, 147. Victorious by ſea and land on the ſame day, 148, & ſeq. Make peace with Artaxerxes, 160, & ſeq. Aſſiſt Cyrus againſt his brother, 170, 171. Advance into Perſia, ibid. Their noble retreat after Cyrus's death, 174. Invade Perſia, 204. Chuſe Alexander for their general, ibid. The battle of Granicus, 205, & ſeq.
Groves, ſacred among the Scythians, 451.
Guſhtaſp, prince of Perſia, according to oriental writers, rebels againſt his father, 295. Forced to fly to Touran, his odd marriage with that king's daughter, 296. Perſuades him to declare war againſt his father, 298. Declared king of Perſia by his father, ibid. Kills two terrible monſters, 300, 301. His horſe cured by Zoroaſter, 320, & ſeq. Made a convert to Zoroaſter, 323. Wars with the king of Touran, 335, 336. Enſnares his brave ſon Iſphendyiar, 337, & ſeq. Reſigns the crown to his grandſon, 339. Whether the ſame with the Greek Hyſtaſpes, ibid.
Gyants, their war with Jupiter, 428, & ſeq.
Gyges's treaſon againſt Candaules, 580, 581. His reign ibid.

H.

HAlicarnaſſus, taken by Alexander, 207, 208.
Hameſtris, Xerxes's queen, ſeveral Inſtances of her cruelty, 152, & ſeq.
Hamilcar, general of Carthage, ſerves under Xerxes, 127.

Harmonia, princeſs of Samothrace, 537. Married to Cadmus, 539.

Harpagus, general of Cyrus, bravely oppoſed by the Lycians of Xanthus, 593, & ſeq.

——— commanded to kill young Cyrus, delivers him to Mitradates, 59. Aſtyages's brutal revenge againſt him, 62, 63. And his againſt the king, 64, & ſeq.

Hector, the ſon of Priam, killed, 556.

Hecuba, Priam's wife, 549, & ſeq.

Helen, whoſe daughter ſhe was, 653. Stolen by Theſeus, ibid. & ſeq. Married to Menelaus, 551. Stolen by Paris, ibid. Cauſes the Trojan war, 550 Whether detained in Ægypt, 553, & ſeq.

Helenus, the ſon of Priam, 549. Retires into Macedonia, 558.

Helicaon, ſon-in-law to king Priam, 544.

Helicon, in Bœotia, 662.

Hellenes, ancient Grecians, 604.

Helleſpont, what, 521, n.

Helleſpontiac, part of Phrygia Minor, 520.

Helum, river in Scythia, 441.

Heneti, chuſe Antenor their head, 543.

Heptapylos, Thebes ſo called for its ſeven gates, 662.

Heraclidæ, a race of Lydian kings, 574.

——— deſcended from Hercules, ibid.

——— invade Peloponneſus, 637. Plagued by Apollo, ibid.

Hercules, how many of that name, 628, n.

——— the ſon of Jupiter by Alcmena, ibid. Kills a lyon when a child, ibid. His twelve labours, 629, 630, n. Kills Laomedon, and four of his Sons, 548.

——— the print of his foot on a ſtone, two cubits long, 445.

Hermes, a great philoſopher, counſellor to Saturn, 424. Mercury, why called by that name, 433, & n.

Hermione, the wife of Cadmus, her original, 664, & ſeq.

Hermodica, the wiſe queen of Midas, 515

Herſe the daughter of Cecrops, puniſhed for her curioſity, 646, n.

Heſione, daughter of Laomedon, taken by Hercules, 548. Suppoſed the cauſe of the Trojan war, 550.

Heſperian apples fetched away by Hercules, 630, n.

Hierapolis in Phrygia, famous for mineral waters, 495. Deſcribed. ibid.

Hieromname, wife of Aſſaracus, king of Troy, 542.

Hippoboton and Hippim, the ancient names of Argos, 618.

Hippo-kai-koures, whence ſo called, 659, & n.

Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons, her conteſt with Theſeus, 466, n. Married to him, 653, n.

Hippolytus, the ſon of Theſeus, his chaſtity fatal, 654, 655, n.

Hippomedes, archon of Athens, reduced, 659. His cruelty, ibid. n.

Hippopodes, why ſo called, 444, n.

Homai, or Khamani, queen of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 349. Expoſes her ſon Darab, ibid. Acknowledges him and leaves her crown to him, 350. Her ſtately palace at Iſtachr, 351.

Horſes eſteemed among the Scythians, 452.

——— a fine breed of in Argolis, 618.

Huſhang, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 245.

Hyanthes, whether ancient Greeks, 607. Expelled Bœotia, by Cadmus, 664.

Hyanthis, one of the ancient names of Bœotia, 661.

Hyllus, the ſon of Hercules, killed in ſingle combat, 631.

Hyperborean ſea, vid. Dead-ſea, 440.

Hyperboreans were men-eaters, 444.

Hypermneſtra, daughter of Danaus, ſaves her huſband, 624.

Hyſtiæus's treachery to the Scythians, 106. Rewarded by Darius, 109, n. Crucified for joining with the Ionians, 115.

Hyſtaſpes introduces learning into Perſia, 15.

I.

JAcick, vid. Iaxartes, 441.

Jancyrus, king of Scythia, the Indathyrſus of Herodotus, 474. His anſwer and preſents to Darius, ibid. Defeats him, 478, & ſeq.

Janus, king of the Aborigines, 427.

Jardanes, king of Lydia, 579. Gives a bad example of lewdneſs to his ſubjects, ibid.

Jaſius, huſband of Cybelle, 508, n.

——— prince of Samothrace, his deities, 537.

Javan's poſterity, the firſt peoplers of Greece, 606, n. 607. Sounded more properly Jaon, ibid.

Jaxartes, river in Scythia, 441.

Iberia, vid. Spain, 389, n. By whom firſt peopled, ibid.

——— another of that name in Scythia, 439.

Ichthyophagi, why ſo called, 245.

Ida mount, 504. 523.

Idæi, why ſo called, 508, & n.

Idæus, the ſon of Dardanus, 539.
Jeruſalem taken by the Perſians according to oriental writers, 294.
Jews reſtored by Cyrus, 82. His decree in their behalf, 82, 83, n. Obſtructed by the Samaritans, 83 & 99. Reſume the building of the temple under Darius, 102. Obtain a freſh decree from him, 103. Conquered by the Perſians, according to oriental writers, 294. Favoured by Alexander, 597.
Ilium in Phrygia, vid. Troy, 523, & ſeq.
——— in Macedonia, by whom built, 558.
Ilus the ſon of Tros adorns Troy and calls it Ilium, 545. Subdues Tantallus, 544. His reign, ibid. Saves the Palladium from the flames, 545.
Illyrians, overcome by Cadmus, 666.
Imaus, mountain parts the two Scythias, 540.
Inachus, founder of the Argolic kingdom, 620, & ſeq.
——— metropolis of Argos, 619.
——— river of Argos, 619.
Inarus cauſes a revolt in Egypt, 156. Reduced by the Perſians, 159. Crucified, 160.
Indathyrſus, king of Scythia, vid. Madyes and Jancyrus, 474, & ſeq.
India, couquered by Darius, 108.
Ingratitude, puniſhed by the Perſian laws. 22, & n.
Ino, one of the daughters of Cadmus, 665.
Intaphernes, one of the ſeven Perſian conſpirators, 96, & ſeq. Put to death by Darius, 102.
Io, the daughter of Inachus, whether raviſhed by the Phœnicians, 550. Why ſirnamed Phoronis, 621.
Jobates, king of Lycia's behaviour to Bellerophon, 593, 594, 625.
Jocaſta, the unhappy mother and wife of OEdipus, 668, & ſeq.
Ion, the ſon of Xuthus, the ſuppoſed father of Iones, 606, & n.
Iones, the moſt ancient name of the Greeks 605, Ionia, part of Aſia Proper, 485,
Ionian confederacy, 659.
Ionians, their original, 606, 659. Go with Nileus in queſt of new ſettlements, 658, 659. Treachery to the Scythians, 478. Revolt from the Perſians, 108. Succoured by the Athenians, 112, 113. Their army deſtroyed by the Perſians, 114. Shake off the Perſian yoke, 150.
Iphicrates, commands the auxiliaries againſt Egypt, 189, 190. Falſely accuſed by the Perſian general, 191, 192. Acquitted, 192.
Ipidamas, the ſon of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon, 544.
Iphigenia worſhipped by the Taurian Scythians, 462.
Irege, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 255. Murdered by his two brothers, 256.
Iſmenus river in Bœotia, 661.
Iſphendyiar, prince of Perſia, defeats the king of Touran, 336. Takes and kills him by a notable ſtratagem. 337, 338. Killed by Ruſtan in ſingle combat, 338, 339.
Iſſus, a city in Cilicia Proper, 597.
——— the gulph of, ibid.
Iſtachr, in Perſia, vid. Chilminar, 350.
Iſter, vid. Danube, 439, 443.
Juliopolis, vid. Tarſus, 597.
Juno, Jupiter's queen, 430.
Jupiter worſhipped by the Celtes, under the name of Taran, 405. His birth concealed by his mother, 425, 426, & n. His other names, 428 n. 430, n. Dethrones his Father, 427, & ſeq. Wars with his uncle Titan, ibid. Divides his empire, 431. Deflowers his niece Maia, 432. Has Mercury by her, ibid. His death and ſepulchre, ibid. & ſeq. Challenged by the Scythians as their progenitor, 475. His ſtatue and temple at Cyzicum, 562.

K.

KAiantes, the dynaſty of, in Perſia, 240.
Kalendar, rectified in Perſia by Giemſchid, 248.
Kaoh a ſmith, dethrones the tyrant of Perſia, 252, 253. Made general by the lawful prince, 254. Reduces the revolted provinces, ibid.
Key-choſrau, prince of Perſia takes Ardevil, 281, 282. Declared ſucceſſor on that account by his grandfather Keykaus, 282. Succeeds him according to oriental writers, 284, & ſeq. Invades Turkeſtan, 285. Conquers it, 287 288. Reſigns the Crown to his ſon, ibid. Retires into a cell, ibid. His character and valour, 289, & ſeq.
Keykaus, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 276. Twice delivered by his general Ruſtan, ibid. & ſeq. Reſigns the crown to his grandſon, 282 Whether the Nimrod of the Hebrews, ibid.
Keykobad, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 273, & ſeq. Said to have converſed with Samuel, 276.
Keyomaras, choſen king of Perſia, for his virtues, according to oriental writers, 242, Invents various manufactures and civilizes vilizes his people, ibid. Reſigns the crown to his grandſon Siamek, 243.

Kuareſm, the province of, why ſo called 287.

L.

Labdacus, king of Thebes, 666.

Laboroſoarchod, his tyranny, 72. Murdered, 73.

Lacædemonians preparations againſt the Perſians, 134, & ſeq. Defeat them by ſea and land, 147, 148, & ſeq. Make a general peace, 182, & ſeq.

Laconia, part of ancient Greece, 604. Plundered by Conon and the Perſians, 181.

Ladoga, the lake of, 443.

Lajus, king of Thebes, the father of OEdipus, 668, & ſeq.

Lambinus, ſuppoſed the laſt king of Scythia, 484.

Lampeto, queen of the Amazons, 465, n. Carries their conqueſts into Aſia, ibid.

Lampſacians outwit Alexander, 563, & ſeq.

Lampſacum, a city in Myſia, by whom built, 563. Famous for its wines, ibid.

Laodamas (king of Thebes) ill ſucceſs againſt the Epigoni, 671.

Laodicea in Phrygia, 494. Famous for its wool, ibid. Deſtroyed, 495, & n.

Laomedon, ſon of Ilus, 545, Builds the citadel of Troy, 547. His reign and exploits, ibid. & ſeq. Slain by Hercules, 549.

Latinus, ſon of Telephus, king of Myſia, 569.

Lebedos, by whom founded, 659.

Leleges, whether ancient Greeks, 607.

Lemnian women murder all their males, and turn Amazons, 634.

Lena, river in Scythia, 441.

Leon, king of Lydia, 580.

Leonidas, king of Sparta, his brave anſwer to Xerxes, 136. His gallant death, 137. His body abuſed by that monarch, 139.

Leontidas, Athenian general, branded by Xerxes, 139, n.

Leotychides I. puts an end to the Perſian war, by a complete victory, 148.

Lephyrium, the grove of, 595.

Leſbos iſland, ſubject to the Trojans, 531.

Leucophrys, vide Tenedos, 527.

Lipara, by whom built, 660.

Lityerſes, king of Celæne, his ſtrange character, 517.

Lockman, a Perſian philoſopher, his character and writings, 290, & ſeq. Whether the ſame with Æſop, 291, & 292, n. & ſeq.

Locris, part of ancient Greece, 604.

Lohraſp, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 293. Quells his rebellious ſon, 295. Reſigns his crown to him, 298. Retires from the world, ibid. Difference of authors about him, 299. His death, 336.

Lud, whether the father of the Lydians, 570.

Lud, what is meant by that word, 570.

Lycia, deſcribed, 589, & ſeq.

Lycians, ſide with the Trojans, 553. Their original government, religion, &c. 592, & ſeq. Bravery, 593. By whom ſubdued, ibid. Their kings, 593. Declared a free people by the emperor Claudius, ibid.

Lycomedes, king of Scyros, his reception of Theſeus, 655.

Lycurgus, the infant prince of Nemea killed by a ſerpent, 634.

Lycus, the ſon of Pandion, king of Athens, 592.

—— river different from the Marſyas, 498.

Lydia, deſcribed, 485, & ſeq. 570. Part of Aſia Proper, 485. Anciently called Mæonia, 570. Its original, 573. Government, ſoil, religion, &c. 574, & ſeq. Revolts againſt Cyrus, 575, n Laws and cuſtoms, 576. Remedy againſt famine 577. Riches, ibid. & 578. Monarchs, ibid. & ſeq. Conquered by the Perſians, 588, 589.

Lydus, the ſon of Atys, king of Lydia, 570, 579.

Lyerſus, father of Antenor, 542.

Lyncæus, the ſon of Egyptus, ſaved by his wife, 624. Made king of Argos, ibid.

M.

Macedonians invade Perſia, 204, & ſeq. Defeat the Perſians, 213, & ſeq. Gain an immenſe booty, 214, & ſeq. Frighted by an eclipſe of the moon, 221.

Madyes, king of Scythia, conquers great part of Aſia, 471, & ſeq. The Indathyrſus of Strabo, ibid.

Magi of Perſia, enemies to idolatry, 35. Aſſerters of the one true god, ibid. Their care to preſerve the Elements pure, 42, & ſeq. Their ſect almoſt deſtroyed by the Perſians, 99. Their religion, how old, 307, & ſeq. & n.

Magneſia part of ancient Greece, 604.

——, a city of Lydia, 572.

Magog, the father of the Scythians, 386.

Maia, the daughter of Atlas, defloured by Jupiter, 432. Mother of Mercury, ibid.

Man, or Maneus, firſt king of the Celtes, 419.

Manes,

Manes, the ſon of Jupiter, by Tellus, 674.
——— firſt king of Lydia, 578.
Manis, king of Phrygia, 513.
Manugjar, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 259.
Marathon, king of Sicyon, 617.
Marble, of Synnada, famed, 496.
Mardonius's unſucceſsful attempt againſt Greece, 116 Is left by Xerxes with the command of his army, 143, & ſeq. Defeated and killed by the Greeks, 147, 149.
Mares milk, how forced down by the Scythians, 460.
Mars, how worſhipped by the Scythians, 450, 451.
Marſyas, king of Lydia, 579.
——— a famous muſician, 498, & n. & 499, n.
—— a river in Phrygia, 498.
Marthefia, queen of the Amazons, 465, n. Invades Aſia, and is there ſlain, 466, n.
Maſiſtes, Xerxes's brother, put to death, 152.
Maſiſtius, general of Perſia, 145.
Maſſagete Scythians deſcribed, 467. Their barbarous cuſtoms, 468. Their worth, 469.
Matheas, Macheas, king of Scythia, Vide Atheas, 481.
Meander, a river in Phrygia, 497, 570.
Medea, princeſs of Colchis, whether carried off by the Greeks, 550.
Medes revolt from the Perſians, 166. Reduced, ibid.
Medon, the ſon of Codrus, firſt archon of Athens, 658.
Metontidæ, archons of Athens, ſo called from him, ibid. Their office, &c. ibid.
Medo-Perſic empire, conjectures about it out of the oriental writers, 272, & ſeq.
Megabyzus revolts from Artaxerxes, 160, 161. His bravery ill re-paid, 161.
Megapenthes king of Tyrin, 625. Exchanges it for Argos, 627.
Megara, part of ancient Greece, 604. Joined to Attica by Theſeus. 652.
Melampus, obtains part of the kingdom of Argos, 625.
Melanthus, a noble Meſſenian, choſe king or Athens, 657.
Meltas, king of Argos, depoſed 639.
Memnon, ſon of Tithonus his ſucceſsful expedition againſt the Æthiopians, 546. Brave exploits, ibid. Aſſiſt the Trojans, ibid. Slain by Achilles, ibid. Vocal ſtatue, ibid. & ſeq.
Memnonian birds, why ſo called, 546, n.
Memnon, Darius's general, his brave exploits, 207, & ſeq. Dies before Mitylene, 209.
Memphis, taken by Cambyſes, 87. His cruelty to the citizens and prieſts, 89, 90. Taken by Alexander, 220, 221.
Menalippe, the famed Amazon, her conteſts with Hercules, 466, n.
Meneceus, a Cadmean prince, ſacrifices his life to his country, 670.
Menelaus marries the fair Helen, 551. Sends a vain embaſſy to recover her, 553. Goes to Egypt for her, 554.
Mentor the Rhodian, one of Ochus's brave auxiliaries, 200. Amply rewarded by him, 201.
Meon the father of Cybelle, 508, n. 570.
Meonia, the ancient name of Lydia, 486, n. 570.
Mercury, ſon of Jupiter by Maia, 432. Why ſo called, 413, & n. Why worſhipped by the Celtes, ibid. His other names, 433, & n. Succeeds his father, ibid. Poliſhes the Celtes, 434.
Mermnadæ, a race of Lydian kings, 574.
Meroe, the daughter of Cyrus, married to her brother Cambyſes, 91. Killed by him, 92, & n.
Metellus reſcues the Palladium from the flames, 532.
Midas king of Phrygia, 513.
—— The ſon of Gordius, 514, 515, n. His riches, &c. 515.
—— II. 518. III. ibid. IV. ibid.
Miletum, or Miletus, taken by the Perſians, 175. By Alexander, 207.
Milias, part of Lycia ſo called, 589.
Miltiades, Athenian general, defeats the Perſians with a ſmall army, 119.
Minerva, worſhipped by the Trojans, 531. Her temple burnt at Aſſeſus, 583.
Mines, king of Lyrneſſus in Cilicia, 601.
Minos, king of Crete, his bloody tribute on the Athenians, 649.
Minotaur, deſcribed, 649, n.
Mitradates, Aſtyages's herdman, ordered to murder young Cyrus, 59. Brings him up as his own, 60. Confeſſes the cheat, 61, Puniſhed for it, ibid. & ſeq.
Mneſtheus, Meneſtheus, undermines Theſeus at Athens, 654. Aſcends the throne, 655. Goes to the ſiege of Troy, ibid. His death after the Trojan war, 557, 656.
Mogli, the ancient name of Muſcovy, 389, 438.
Moloſſi, ancient inhabitants of Greece, 604.
Monarchs, how honoured by the Scythians, 448, & ſeq.
Mopſueſtia, a city in Cilicia Propr. 597.
Morena, part of Myſia, 561.
Moſcovites deſcend from Magog, 389, & ſeq.
Muſic, introduced into Perſia, 248.

Mycena, Meſſania, part of ancient Greece, 604. The kingdom of, founded by Acriſius, 620. The kings of, 621, & ſeq. Challenged by the Heraclidæ, 631. Taken by them, 638. Regal dignity aboliſhed, 639.
—— a city in Argos, 619. Founded by Perſeus, 627.
Myra, a city of Lycia, 590.
Myſia deſcribed, 485, 486. Part of Aſia Propr. ibid. & 561, & ſeq. Why ſo called, ibid. Its ſoil, antiquities, &c. 566. Conquered by Cræſus, 568.
Myſians, ſide the Trojans, 553. Their character, 567. Their hiſtory, ibid. Subdued by Cræſus, 568.
Myſias, river in Phrygia, 499.

N.

NAbarzanes, his treachery to Darius, 231.
Nabonadius murders Laborſoarchod, 73. Seizes on the crown, ibid. Governed by his mother, ibid. His war againſt Cyrus, 74, & ſeq. Killed before Babylon, 80, 81.
Nagidus in Cilicia Aſp. a Samian colony, 595.
Nana, daughter of king Sangarius, impregnated by a pomegranate, 505.
Nannachus, king of Phrygia, 513, & ſeq.
Napis, king of Scythia, 470.
Naudar, king of Perſia. Vide Nudar, 264.
Naupactus, why ſo called, 637.
Nauruz, a Perſian feſtival, by whom inſtituted, 248. The ceremonies attending it ibid.
Naxus, the iſland of, taken and deſtroyed by the Perſians, 117.
Nectanebis. Invaded by the Perſians, 190. His defence and ſucceſs, ibid. & ſeq.
Nactanebis invaded by Ochus, 200. Defeated, 201. Forced to retire into Æthiopia, ibid.
Nemea, a city in Argos, 619.
Nemean games, by whom inſtituted, 619.
—— wood, 629, n.
Nemeſis, worſhipped by the Myſians, 567. Her ſtatue at Rhamnus, 641.
Nerigliſſar, king of Babylon, wars againſt the Medes, 70. Defeated and killed by Cyrus, 72.
Neſtorian family expelled Mycena, 638. Settles at Athens, ibid.
Neuri, where ſeated, 442. Deſcribed 463.
Nieper, river. Vide Boryſthenes, 443, & 445, n.
Nieſter, river. Vide Tyras, 443.
Nileus the ſon of Codrus, withdraws ſome Athenians and others into new ſettlements, 658, 659. Cities built by them, 659.
Ninus, king of Lydia, 580.
Nomade, Scythians deſcribed, 463, &ſeq.
Nudar, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 264, & ſeq. Put to death by Aphereſiab king of the Turks, 266.

O.

OAks, ſacred among the Scythians, 551.
Obrima, river in Phrygia, 499.
Oby, river in Scythia, 441.
Ochus I. king of Perſia changes his name for that of Darius, 164. See Darius Nothus.
—— II. ſon of Artaxerxes Mnemon, gets the crown by the death of his brother, 194, 195. His cruelties, 196, & ſeq. To the Sidonians, 217. Loſes ſeveral provinces 198. Invades Egypt in perſon, 199, & ſeq. Returns triumphant, 201. Kills the god Apis, 202. Plunders the Ægyptian temples, ibid. Murdered by Bagoas, ibid.
Octomaſades, king of Scythia, 481.
Oedipus expoſed when born, 669. Kills his father, ibid. Expounds the riddle of the Sphynx. Marries his mother, ibid. Runs diſtracted, 670.
Oenians, who, and whence ſo named, 444, n.
Oeta, the ſtreights of, deſcribed, 662.
Ogygia, one of the ancient names of Bœotia, 661.
Olbiopolitan Scythians, their agriculture, 459.
Olympic games, by whom inſtituted, 534.
Olympus, firſt king of Myſia, 568.
——, mountain of Myſia, 565. The place of Jupiter's reſidence, 431.
—— a city of Lycia, 590.
Omphale, queen of Lydia, 580.
Onega, the lake of, deſcribed, 443.
Ophiogenes, who, 563.
Oracles, famed among the ancient Greeks 609, 610. How conſulted, 610, n & ſeq. n. Deceitful, ibid.
Oreſtes king of Mycena, his unhappy reign, 632, 633.
Oriental accounts of Perſia, 237. to the end of the ſection. An apology for them, 239.
Orithia, princeſs of Athens, ſtolen by Boreas, 646.
Ormus, or Hermus, river in Phrygia, 499.
Oromaſdes, one of the Perſic names of god, 46. Whom they believe to be ſelf-exiſtent, ibid.
Orpheus poliſhes the ancient Greeks, 612.
Ortara queen of the Amazons, famed for her valour and virginity, 466, n.
Ortanes diſcovers the ſham Smerdis by the help of his daughter, 96. Declares for a republican lican government, 100. Gives up his claim to the empire, ibid. Hath great privileges granted him, ibid.

Otreus, king of Phrygia, 517.

Ox, why ſtamp'd on the Athenian coin, 642.

Oxus, river in Scythia, 441.

Oxyllus, the three-eyed general of the Heraclidæ, 637. Made king of Elis, 638.

Oxyntes, king of Athens, 657.

P.

PActolus, river in Lydia, 573.

Padua, by whom built, 543.

Paleſtine invaded by the Scythians, 472.

Palladium of Troy, 531. Brought to Rome by Æneas, 532. Various accounts about it, ibid. n. 533, n. & 538, n.

Panathenea, by whom inſtituted, 652.

Pandion I. king of Athens, 646.

——— II. ——— expelled the kingdom, ibid.

Pandroſos, daughter of Cecrops, the fable of her, 646, n.

Panoti, why ſo called, 444, n.

Papyrus, a kind of paper, the exportation of, forbid, 565, 566.

Paraſang, whence derived, 275.

Parium, a city of Myſia, deſcribed, 563.

Paris, the ſon of Priam, 549. Entices Helen away, 551. Kills Achilles, 556.

Parthians, whether originally Scythians or Celtes, 417.

Paryſatis's great ſway with Darius Noth. 164. Inſtances of her cruelty, 169, 174, 175.

Patara, a city in Lycia, 590.

Patroclus, killed by Hector, 556. His death revenged by Achilles, ibid.

Pauſanias, the Spartan general, rewarded with the tenths of the ſpoil, 148.

Pelaſgia, one of the ancient names of Peloponneſus, 605.

Pelaſgi, ancient Greeks, 605.

Pelaſgiotis, part of ancient Greece, 604.

Pelaſgus, father of the Pelaſgians, 605. Reforms the Greeks, 607.

Peleg, whether the father of the Pelaſgians, 605, 606, n.

Peloponneſians bring their fleet againſt Xerxes to Salamis, 142.

Peloponneſus, part of ancient Greece, 604. Invaded by the Heraclidæ, 636, & ſeq.

Pelops the ſon of Tantalus, ſubdued by Ilus, 544.

Peluſium, one of the keys of Ægypt, 86. Taken by Cambyſes, ibid.

Peneleus killed before Troy, 671.

Pentheſilea, queen of the Amazons, 466, n. Killed by Pyrrhus, ibid. Inventreſs of the battle-axe, ibid.

Pentheus torn to pieces by his mother, 666.

Penthilus king of Mycenia, 633.

Percote, a city of Phrygia Minor, 520.

Pergamos, a city in Myſia deſcribed, 487, 565.

Perſees, no idolaters, 29, & ſeq. Unjuſtly accuſed by the Mahommedans, 33, 34, n. In what ſenſe they worſhipped the ſun, moon, &c. 35, & ſeq. Their prayers directed to God alone, 38. Whence they had their religion, 40, 307, & ſeq. Their veneration for the other elements, 41. Temples, 44, & ſeq. Account of the creation, 48. Their prieſts, ib. & ſeq. Initiating of children, 51. Marriages, ib. & ſeq. Funerals, 54.

Perſepolis, how taken and burnt by Alexander, 229, 230.

Perſeus the ſon of Jupiter by Danae, 626. Fetches the famed Gorgons head and ſaves Andromeda, ibid. & ſeq. Kills his father-in-law, 627. Exchanges Argos for Tyrin, ibid. Builds the city of Mycena, ibid.

Perſia, Government, 4. Reſpect paid to their monarchs, ibid. and 22, & ſeq. Palaces deſcribed, 7, 8, & ſeq. Education of children, guards, &c. 10. ——Divided into twenty Satrapies, 101. Exempt from all taxes, ibid. Kings of Perſia according to oriental writers, 240.

Perſian religion vindicated from idolatry, 29, & ſeq.

Perſians, their manners and cuſtoms, 11. Puniſhments, 12, & 13. Polygamy and inceſt, ibid. Coin, 14. Arts, &c. 15, & ſeq. Military diſcipline, 15, 16, & ſeq. Severity, 16, 17, n. Weapons, 16, 17. Chariots and order of marching, 18, 19. Manner of computing their army, 19. Laws and ſchools, 21. Slaviſh reſpect to their monarchs, 22, & ſeq. Secrecy, 25. Preſents, ibid. Kings ſat as judges, ibid. Their ſentence not to be revoked, ibid. Their concubines, children, revenues, 27, 28. Wars with the Greeks, 135, & ſeq. Defeated at Salamis, 123, & ſeq. By land under Mardonius, 147, & ſeq. Their camp forced by the Greeks, ibid. Their army deſtroyed, ibid. Driven out of Greece, 148. The cataſtrophe of the Grecian war, 149.

Peſſinus, whence ſo called, 545.

Phanes revolts from the King of Ægypt, 85. His children murdered before his face, 86.

Phaſelis, a city in Lycia, 590. A famous neſt of pyrates, ibid.

Philadelphia, a city in Lydia, 572. Whence ſo named, ibid.

Phocea, by whom founded, 659. A famous neſt of pyrates, ibid.

Phocis, part of ancient Greece, 404.

Phœdra's inceſtuous love to Hippolytus puniſhed, 654, n.

Phœnice invaded by Alexander, 217.
Phorbas, king of Argos, 622.
Phoroneus, king of Argos, 622.
Phoronium, a city of Argos, ibid.
Phridun, king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 254. His ſingular wiſdom and goodneſs, 256. A remarkable advice of his, 258.
Phrygia, part of Aſia Proper, 485, & ſeq. Deſcribed, 490, & ſeq. Whether Æneas regined in it, 558, n & ſeq. n.
Phrygia Minor, vid. Troas, 492, & ſeq.
Phrygians, their origin, antiquity, and character, 500. Government, trade, and language, 502, & ſeq. Religion, 504. Kings, 511, & ſeq. Invaded by the Cymmerians, 518. Subdued by the Lydians, ibid. & ſeq. Side with the Trojans, 553.
Phryx, a river in Phrygia, 499.
Phthia, part of ancient Greece, 604.
Pirithous, king of Lapitha, the conſtant companion of Theſeus, 653, & ſeq.
Piſchdadian, dynaſty of Perſia, deſcribed, 240.
Pittheus, king of Trozen, famous for his ſkill in expounding oracles, 647. Gives his daughter to Ægeus, ibid.
Pluto, vid. Dis. 419.
Plutonium, of Hierapolis, deſcribed, 495, n.
Podarces, ſon of Laomedon, vid. Priam, 549.
Poetry, how uſed among the Celtes, 409, 412.
Polygamy allowed by the Scythians, 460. By the Perſians, 12.
Polydorus the ſon of Cadmus, king of Thebes, 666.
Polynices, prince of Thebes, comes to the Argolic court, 633. Marries the daughter of Adraſtus, 634. His war with his brother Eteocles, ibid. & ſeq. Kills, and is killed by him, 670. Buried by his ſiſter, 671.
Prexaſpes ſent to kill Cambyſes's brother, 91. His own ſon killed by him, 92. Declares the impoſture of Smerdis the Mage, and throws himſelf headlong from a tower, 97.
Prætus, king of Argos, 625. His behaviour towards Bellerophon, ibid.
Priam, king of Troas, whence ſo called, 549. His reign, power, ibid. & ſeq. Progeny, ibid.
Priapus worſhipped at Lampſacus, 563.
Priene, by whom founded, 659.
Prophets, among the Scythians deſcribed, 448, 449, & n.
Proſerpine, princeſs of Epirus, guarded by Cerberus, 654.
Proteſilaus killed by Hector, 555. His tomb, 523, n.
Prytaneum, the court of, erected by Theſeus, 632.
Pſammenitus, king of Egypt, invaded by Cambyſes, 85, 86. Killed, 87.
Ptolemeus, king of Thebes, 672.
Puniſhments, among the Perſians, 12, & 163, 164, n.
Pylades, the faithful friend of Oreſtes, 633.
Pylæ-Ciliciæ, deſcribed, 595.
Pyramus, river in Cilicia, 598.
Pyrates ſwarmed in ancient Greece, 608.
Pyreum, one of the havens of Athens, 640.
Pythius, a Lydian immenſely rich, 577, 578.
Pythoneſs, the woman who delivered the oracle at Delphi, 611, n. Their frequent cheats and evaſions, 637.

R.

RHA, or Volga, a river in Scythia, 441.
Rhamnus, a city in Attica, 641, & n.
Rhea, the wife and ſiſter of Saturn, 424.
Rhœtum, a city in Phrygia Minor, 523.
Riches, deſpiſed by the Scythians, 446.
Riphæan mountains, 439, & n. Uninhabited, 443, n.
Riphat, the ſon of Gomer, 440, n.
Robbers ſwarmed in antient Greece, 608.
Romus, prince of Troy, one of the founders of Rome, 547.
Roxana put to cruel death by Paryſatis, 169.
Ruſtan and his father reſtore the Perſian throne to the right line, 273, & ſeq. Made generaliſſimo of Perſia, 276. His noble exploits, 277, & ſeq. Defeats the Turks, 286. Kills the prince of Perſia in ſingle combat, 339. Betrayed by his treacherous brother, 346. Murdered, ibid. Remarks on his romantic hiſtory, 347, 348, n.

S.

SAccæ, from whom deſcended, 416. Why ſo named, 417, n. Poſſeſs Armenia, ibid. & ſeq. Since called Titans, 414, & ſeq. & 415, n.
Sacrifices among the Scythians, 451.
Sad-der, or canon of the antient Perſic faith ſtill extant, 40, n. Contains a compendium of the Zendevaſta, 328.
Sadyates, king of Lydia, 582.
Sagillus, king of Scythia, 471. Aſſiſts the Amazons againſt Theſeus, ibid.
Salamis, by whom built, 557.
—— Iſland, the naval fight of, between the Greeks and Perſians, 141, & ſeq.
Samaritans obſtruct the building of the temple, 83, 99.
Sangarius, river in Phrygia, 499.
Sardis, a city of Lydia, 571. Taken and ſpared by Cyrus, 77. Taken and burnt by the the Ionians, 113. Surrenders to Alexander, 207. Taken by the Cimmerians, 582.

Sarmatians, from whom descended, 439, 461, & n.
Sarpedon, driven from Crete, settles in Lycia, 592.
Saturn, first king of the Celtes, 423. Why so called, ibid. n. Why surnamed Cronos, ibid. Marries his sister Rhea, 424. Taken prisoner, and released by Jupiter, ibid. & 425. Dethroned by him, 427. His death, 428.
Saudabad, queen of Persia, her unlawful amour with her son-in-law, 278, & seq. Her wickedness discovered, ibid.
Saulius, king of Scythia, 479. Kills Anacharsis for introducing Græcian rites, ibid.
Sauromatia, or Sarmatia, described, 439, 442.
Scamander, the father of Teucer, 535, & 536, n.
—— river of Troas, 525.
Scandeloro, a city in Cilicia, 596.
Scholotes, Scythians, described, 481, n.
Sciron, an infamous robber, killed by Theseus, 648, n.
Scolopitus settled in Thermosciria, 465, n.
Scythes, the fabulous father of the Scythians, 470.
—— king of Scythia, killed for introducing Grecian customs, 479, 480.
Scythia described, 439, & seq. Uninhabited towards the North, 440.——In Europe, described, 442, & seq. The extent of both Scythias, 444.
Scythians, whence so called, 438. Described, 439, & seq. Descended from Magog, the second son of Japhet, 384, & seq. Different from the Celtes or Gomerians, ibid. & seq. Their migrations towards the north of Asia, 390. And of Europe, ibid. Their territories described 439, & seq.——Royal Scythians, where situate, 444. Their government, 445, & seq. Laws, character, valour, &c. 446, & seq. Why misrepresented by the Greek historians, 452. How populous they were, 455. Their language, manufactures, &c. 457, 458. Discovery of the Amazons, 464, n. & seq. Kings, 469, & seq. Conquer great part of Asia, 471, & seq. Dispossest of it by treachery, 472. Their return home opposed by their slaves, ibid. Overcome them by stratagem, 473, & seq. Plunder the temple of Venus at Ascalon, 472. Their punishment, ibid. Invaded by Darius, 105, & seq. 474. Message to that monarch, 475. Their brave defence, ibid. & seq. Force them out of Scythia, 478. Betrayed by the Ionians, ibid. Outwit the king of Macedon, 482, &. seq. Overthrown by him, 483.
Scythopolis, Bethsheam in Judea, so called from the Scythians, 472.
Sebaste, a city of Cilicia, 595.
Seleucia, in Cilicia, by whom founded, 596. A free city under the Romans, ibid.
Serbonis, a dangerous lake between Egypt and Phœnice, 200.
Serviere, the lake of, in High Dauphiny, 401.
Shushan, vid. Susa, 6, n.
Siamek, second king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 243.
Sicyon gives name to the kingdom, and to Peloponnesus, 615, 618.
—— the kingdom of, part of antient Greece, 604. Its antient names, situation, &c. 615. Kings, 617. Afterwards governed by priests, ibid. Invaded by the Heraclidæ, 618.
Sidonians revolt from Persia, 198, & seq. Betrayed by Mentor, 199. Die desperate, ibid. Surrender to Alexander, 217.
Signet-ring, by whom first used in Persia, 250.
Sigeum, a city in Phrygia Minor, 523. Gives name to a sea, ibid.
Simois, river described, 525, & seq.
Sipilus, a city in Phrygia, 496.
Smerdis put to death by his brother Cambyses, 90, 91.
—— the mage substituted to the real one, mounts the Persian throne, 94, & seq. Discovered by the want of his ears, 96. Murdered by the Persian nobles, 98. Called Artaxerxes in scripture, 99, 100, n. Regretted by his subjects, ibid.
Smyrna, a city of Lydia, 487.
Sogdianus murders Xerxes, 162. Mounts the Persian throne, 163. His cruel death, ibid. & n.
Solecism, whence derived, 596.
Solon, converses with Crœsus, 585.
Spain, first inhabited by the Celtes, 396, & seq. Called originally Iberia, 389, n. By whom peopled, ibid. Signification of its name, ibid.
Spartans, their treatment of Darius's heralds, 117. Brave defence against Xerxes, 135, & seq. Defeated, 147, & seq. The rest vid. sub. Lacedæmonians.
Spauhawm, by whom built, according to oriental writers, 192.
Stater, a beautiful Cizican coin, 562.
Statira, the wife of Artaxerxes, her power and cruelty, 169. Poisoned by Parysatis, 175.
Stenobea, the wife of Prœtus, her unchastity, 625.
Sthenelus, king of Argos, outed his kingdom by Danaus, 623.

Stymphalian birds killed by Hercules, 629, 630, n.

Sun, moon, and ſtars, in what ſenſe worſhipped by the Perſees, 35, & ſeq. Sun, deity of the Perſians, 101.

Suſa, or Suſhan, metropolis of Perſia, deſcribed, 6, n. Taken by Alexander, 227, & ſeq.

Swine, abhorred by the Scythians, 452.

Syavek, prince of Perſia, according to oriental writers, his great chaſtity, 278. Accuſed by his mother-in-law, and impriſoned by his father, ibid. Acquitted, ibid. Aſſaſſinated at Turkeſtan, 280. His death revenged by Ruſtan, ibid.

Sydra, a city in Cilicia Aſpera, 595.

Syeneſis I. II. III kings of Cilicia, 601.

Synneda, a city in Phrygia Salutaris, 496.

Sypilene, the Cybele of the Lydians, 576.

Sypilus, mount in Lydia, 572.

Syria ſurrenders to Alexander, 216. Conquered by the Perſians, according to oriental writers, 218.

T.

TAbiti, the Scythian name for Veſta, 450.

Tachos, king of Egypt, invaded by the Perſians, 192. His untimely contempt of Ageſilaus, ibid. Depoſed and flies to Perſia, 193, n.

Tamuraſh, 4th king of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 246.

Tanais river parts the two Scythias, 439, & n.

Tantalus, king of Sypilus in Phrygia, 202. His reſentment againſt Tros, 540. Abuſes Ganymede, ibid. Subdued by Ilus, 544.

Tarſus, a city in Cicilia Propria, 596. By whom built, ibid. & ſeq. Taken by Alexander, 210.

Tartary, part of ancient Scythia, 440.

Tarteſa in Spain, Jupiter defeated at by the Tytans, 429.

Taurian, Scythians deſcribed, 462.

Taurus, mount in Scythia, 441. The biggeſt in all Aſia, 591.

Telamon's ill uſage of Heſione, 548, 550. Treats Laomedon's embaſſy with contempt, 548.

Telephus, the ſon of Hercules, king of Myſia, 568. Sides with Priam, and is wounded by Achilles, 569.

Tellus, the Athenian, why the happieſt man, 585.

Telmeſſus, a city in Lycia, 589. Famous for ſoothſayers, 513

Temenus, one of the Heraclidæ made king of Argos, 628. Murdered, ibid.

Temples of Greece plundered and deſtroyed by Darius, 113, 117, 150.

——— none among the Scythians, 451.

Tenedeian piper, axe, and advocate, proverbs, 528, n.

Tenedos, iſland, deſcribed, 526, 527. So called from Tenes, 527. His character, ibid. & ſeq. and 52, n. ibid. & ſeq. & 528, n.

Tenues, king of Sidon, betrays his country, 199. Put to death, ibid.

Teos, by whom founded, 659.

Teſamenes, king of Thebes, 671.

Teucer, ſuppoſed the firſt king of Troy, 529, 535.

——— the ſon Telamon ſettles in Cyprus, 535.

Teucria, vid. Troas, 536.

Teuthras, king of Myſia, 568. Father of Tecmeſſa, ibid.

Thais, an Athenian harlot, cauſes Xerxes's palace to be burnt, 230.

Theano, wife of Antenor, chief prieſteſs of Pallas, 544.

Theban kingdom, part of ancient Greece, 604. By whom founded, 660. Government, monarchs, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Diſſolution, 672. War, the cauſe and ſucceſs of it, 634 & ſeq. Its fatal cataſtrophe, 670, & ſeq.

Thebans, their treachery to the other Greeks, 138. Part of them join with the Ionians, in queſt of new ſettlements, 659.

Thebes, capital of Bœotia, by whom founded, 664, 665. Why ſo called, ibid. n. Gives names to the Bœotian kingdom, 664 Fortified by Amphion, 668. Deſtroyed by the Epigoni, 671.

——— of Egypt plundered by Cambyſes, 89.

Theft, a great crime among the Scythians, 446.

Themiſtocles, choſen admiral againſt the Perſians, 144. His ſtratagem to retain the fleet at Salamis, 142. Highly rewarded by the Athenians, 144.

Theoclymenes, king of Lydia, 579.

Thermodon, the famous battle of, 466, n. & ſeq.

Thermopylæ, the ſtreights of, vide Oeta, 662.

Therſander, king of Thebes, killed before Troy, 671.

Theſeus, where born, 648. His firſt adventures, ibid. n Arrives at his fathers court, 650. His narrow eſcape from poiſon, ibid. Quells the rebellion of Pallas, ibid. Sails with the unhappy victims into Crete, ibid. Kills the Minotaur, and releaſes the Athenian captives, ibid. Forgets to hang out the victorious flag, 651. Succeeds his father, ibid. New-models the government, ibid.

ibid. Diveſts himſelf of the regal power to follow Hercules, ibid. His famous pillar on iſthmus, 652. Expedition againſt the Amazons, 652, 653 n. Steals Helen away, 653, n. His dangerous attempt upon Proſerpine, ibid. & ſeq. Undermined at Athens by Mneſtheus, 654. Repulſed by the Athenians, ibid. His death, 655. Cruelty to his ſon Hippolitus, 654, n.

Theſpia, a city in Bœotia, 662.

Theſſalians, highly rewarded by Alexander, 216.

Theſſaliotis, part of ancient Greece, 604.

Theſſaly, part of ancient Greece, 604.

Theutat, one of the names of Mercury, its etymon, 434, n.

Tomyris, queen of Scythia, her encounter with Cyrus, 67, 474. Her bloody revenge, 67.

Traſybulus, tyrant of Miletum, his ſtratagem to obtain a peace, 583.

Thyatira, a city in Lydia, 572. Its preſent ſtate, ibid.

Thyeſtes, brother of Atreus, his inceſt, 630, 631, & n.

Thymbra, by whom founded, 537.

Tiribaſus, Perſian general, invades Cyprus, 185. Recalled and diſgraced, 187. Saves Artaxerxes and his Army, 188. Reſtored, 189. Put to death for conſpiracy, 194.

Tiſamenus, king of Mycena, 633. Killed in Achaia, ibid.

Tiſaphernes's expedition againſt Greece, 175. His cowardice, 176. Treachery to Ageſilaus, 177. Put to death, 178.

Tit, the Celtic name for the earth, 422, & n.

Titan, brother of Saturn, conteſts the crown with him, 425. With Jupiter, 428.

Titanic war, 428, & ſeq.

Titans, ancient Gomerians, 392. Name ſynonimous with the giants, 422, n. War againſt Jupiter, 428, & ſeq. Defeated in Spain 429.

Titea, the jealous wife of Uranus, 424,

Tithonus, the ſon of Laomedon, 545. His bravery, ibid. Serves with honour in the Aſſyrian army, ibid. Made governor of Perſia, ibid.

Triopas, king of Argos, 623.

Troas, where ſituate, 492.

—— called Phrygia Minor, 519. Deſcribed, 520. Its cities, rivers, ſoil, &c. ibid. & ſeq.

Troas, Alexandria, deſcribed, 525.

Troezen, in Argos, the ſeat of Pittheus, 619.

Trojan kingdom its extent, 520. Origin &c. 529. Blended with other nations, 530. Its government, religion, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Kings, 535.

—— war, the cauſe of, 549. The fatal end of, 557.

—— Horſe, how explained, ibid.

Trophonian cave in Bœotia, deſcribed, 662, & n.

Tros, king of Troas, founder of Troy, 540. His unſucceſsful war with Tantalus, ibid. & ſeq. Numerous progeny, 541. Phrygia Minor, from him called Troas, ibid.

Troy, by whom built, 523. Deſcribed, ibid. Different fates, ibid. & 540, & ſeq. —— Its walls, how, and by whom built, 547, & 548, n. Taken and burnt, 557. By whom rebuilt, 559, 560.

Tubal, whether he peopled Spain. 389, n. 439.

Turk, the ſon of Japhet, an account of him from oriental writers, 255, 256.

Turks, whence ſo called, 256. Their wars with Perſia, ibid. & ſeq. Conquered by them, 288.

Tyndareus, the father of Helen's oath to her ſuitors, 551.

Tyras, river in Scythia, vide Nieſter, 443.

Tyre, taken by Alexander, 218.

Tyrin, the kingdom of, ſevered from Argos, 625.

Tyrrhenians, whence ſo called, 577.

V.

VEnus, the worſhip of, introduced into Perſia, 35. Condemned by their mages, ibid. Worſhipped by the Scythians, 450. By the Trojans, 533. Her temple at Aſcalon plundered, 472.

Veſta, worſhipped by the Scythians, 450. Challenged as their progenitrix, 475. Worſhipped by all the Greeks, 533.

Virgins, Phrygian, obliged to waſh in the Scamander before marriage, 526. Cuſtom why abrogated, ibid.

Viſtula, a river in Sarmatia, 445.

Ulyſſes's adventures, 558.

Umbrians, a branch of the Gomerians, 395. Firſt inhabitants of Italy, ibid. & ſeq.

Volga, a river in Scythia, vide Rha, 442.

Uranus, father of Saturn, ſecond king of the Celtes, 422. Why ſo called, ibid. Impriſoned by his ſon Jupiter, ibid. Breaks his heart, 423.

Uxians, after a gallant defence reduced by Alexander, 228.

W.

WAR, Theban, 634, & ſeq.

Waters, mineral, of Hierapolis, expoſed to air putrify, 495.

—— Thermopylæ, 662.

Whips, why preſented by the Muſcovite women to their huſbands, 474, n.

Wine, the invention of, aſcribed to Bacchus, chus, 665, n. How, and when introduced into Persia, 248. Muscate of Tenedos famed, 529, n. Of Lampsacus, 563. Timolus, 573. Of Lydia, 576.

Wolves, Neurians fabled to transform themselves into Wolves, 463.

Wool, of Laodicea famed, 494.

Women, esteemed great propheteſſes among the Celtes and Scythians, 464, n. Preside in their councils, ibid. Held in common among some Scythians, 463. Of Scythia, their martial bravery, 454, 459. Their way of preserving their beauty, 461.

——— of Sarmatia, their martial genius 462. Treachery to their husbands, 472. Punishment, 473.

X.

XAnthians, why so called, 591.

Xanthippus, Athenian general, defeats the Persians, 148, & seq. Conquers the Thracian Chersonesus, 150.

Xanthus, king of Bœotia's contest with the Athenians, 657.

——— river of Troas, 525. The same with Scamander, ibid. River of Lydia described, 591.

Xenophon's noble retreat out of Persia, 174.

Xerxes succeeds his father Darius. 124. Confirms all his father's grants to the Jews, ibid. Dissuaded by his uncle from invading Greece, 125. Pushed on it by a threefold dream, 126, 127, & n. Allies with the Carthagenians, 127. Grows insolent, 129. His army and fleet, 131, & seq. Defeats the Spartans at Thermopylæ, 139, & seq. Engages the Athenians at Sea, 140, & seq. Outwitted by Themistocles, 142. His fleet defeated at Salamis, 143. Flies to Sardis, 144. The hardship of his army, ibid. Goes into Persia, 149. Burns all the Grecian temples, 150. Loves his brother's wife, 151. His wife's cruelty to that princess, 152. His barbarity to his brother, ibid. Is killed by Artabanus, 153.

——— II. his short reign, 162. Murdered by Sogdianus, ibid.

YEmen, the king of, his war with Keykaus, king of Persia, 277.

Yezad, one of the Persic names of god, 45.

Yezdan, the same with Yezad, 309. Some account of him, ibid. n.

Z.

ZAB, Zoub, or Bazah, king of Persia, 267. Remits of his prerogative to make his people easy, 268.

Zabians, corrupt the Persic religion, 34.

Zacynthus peoples the island of that name, 539.

Zal-zer, the father of Rustan, his history, 261, Recovers the Persian crown from the Turks, 267. Taken prisoner by the king of Persia, 345.

Zembla, north part of ancient Scythia, 441. Unknown to the ancients, ibid.

Zende-vasta, the book of, 328, & 329, n.

Zethus, Theban tyrant, his only son killed by his own mother, 668. Dies of grief, ibid.

Zeuxippus, last king of Sicyon, 617.

Zoak, tyrant of Persia, vide Dehoc, 251.

Zopyrus's stratagem to betray Babylon to Darius, 104. Amply rewarded, 105.

Zoroaster, or Zerdust, introduces learning into Persia, 15. Reforms the Persic religion, 34, n. Had his own from the Mosaic writings, 40. His life, doctrine, and character, according to oriental writers, 302, & seq. Said to have been brought up under one of the prophets, 308. Converts the king of Persia, 316, & seq. His miracles, 319. Religion, 324, & seq. Liturgy, 327. Laws and writings, ibid. & seq. Foretold the coming of the Messiah, 330, His death, 334.

Zoub, king of Persia, vide Zab, 267.

The End of the Fifth Volume.

Directions to the BINDERS, VOL. V.

Map of the Migrations of the Celtes, Page 383
Asia Minor, 484
Græcia Antiqua, 602

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

COMPILED FROM

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological, and other TABLES.

VOL VI.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ καλανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Baſil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed for R. OWEN, S. HYDE, G. RISK, J. LEATHLEY, G. and A. EWING, W. SMITH, J. SMITH, P. Crampton, G. FAULKNER, A. BRADLEY, T. MOORE, E. EXSHAW, C. WYNNE, C. CONNOR, O. NELSON, P. WILSON, W. POWELL, I. KELLY, T. BUTLER, and W. BRIEN, Bookſellers.

M DCC XLV.

I. 9337

AN

UNIVERSAL

HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

CHAP. XVII.

SECT. V.

The Hiſtory of the ancient Kingdom of ARCADIA.

Names.

ARCADIA, ſo called from Arcas the ſon of Jupiter and Caliſto, was anciently called Pelaſgia, being inhabited by the ancient Pelaſgi, who boaſted themſelves to be deſcended from Pelaſgus their pretended founder, of whom we have ſpoken in a former ſection of this chapter †, as having been ſuppoſed by a late author to be the ſame with Peleg the ſon of Eber in ſcripture. The Pelaſgians did alſo ſurname him Autochton [a], which was a name the Grecians gave to thoſe whoſe original was not known. It is true, we find the Pelaſgians in ſeveral other parts of Greece, as was there obſerved; but their chief and primitive ſeat is generally † See vol. v. ſect. i. par. 5.

[a] Xenoph. Strab. Mel. & al.

ſuppoſed to have been this of Arcadia, whoſe inhabitants are univerſally allowed the ancienteſt people in Greece, and boaſted themſelves to be older than the moon.

Geography. THIS country was ſituate in the heart of Peloponneſus (A), having Elis on the weſt, Argolis on eaſt, Laconia and Meſſenia on the ſouth, and Sicyon and Corinth on the north [b]. Its ground, which afforded excellent paſturage, made it famous for the vaſt number of herds it bred; for the tuneful ſtrains of its ſhepherds, who excelled all others in their paſtoral performances, and the ſweetneſs of their vocal and inſtrumental muſic; and for the extraordinary worſhip that was paid here to their god Pan. Here was alſo a famous temple of that deity in the city of Tegea, and another dedicated to Minerva in the city of Stymphalus, ſituate at the foot of a ridge of hills of that name.

Natural rarities. Here alſo bred upon the lake Stymphalis a kind of fowl, called from it the Stymphalian birds, which grew to ſuch a ſize and number, that they darkened the ſun-beams at noon-day, and terribly infeſted this territory, till they were all either killed or driven hence by Hercules, as we have ſeen elſewhere.

HERE was alſo the famed lake Phenaus, from which ſprings the river Styx, famous for the coldneſs of its water which chills them to death that drink it; it is alſo of ſuch corroſive nature that it will eat iron and braſs [c]. The poets feign it to be the river of hell, whoſe name is ſo ſacred among the gods, that if any of them broke his oath after he had ſworn by it, he was deprived of his deity, and of the uſe of Nectar for a hundred years.

THE Arcadians were at firſt a rude wild people, living in the woods and fields, and feeding indifferently on the product of the ground, till taught by Pelaſgus to build huts, to live ſociably, to exchange their common food for nuts, acorns, or beech-maſt (B), and to cloath themſelves with the [b] Strab. D. Sicul. Pauſan. Mela, & al. [c] Idem ibid.

(A) The Arcadians were conſequently at a diſtance from the ſea, and accordingly Homer tells us, that they had neither ſhips, nor any knowledge of ſailing (1); ſo that when they are ſaid to have imbarked for the ſiege of Troy, we muſt underſtand it of Agamemnon's fleet, which tranſported them thither.

(B) Which kind of food, Pauſanias tells, they continued to live upon a long time after the death of their founder, inſomuch, that the ſkins of wild beaſts. They began afterwards to give themſelves up to feed cattle, invited to it by the fertility of their ſoil. But as this country abounded with excellent paſture grounds, ſo it was expoſed to continual incurſions from thoſe, who were either forced out of their own country, or were diſcontented with it. And this put them upon the neceſſity of exchanging the crook for the ſword, and to inure themſelves to ſome warlike diſcipline in their own defence, who would otherwiſe in all likelihood have preferred a paſtoral life to any other. Hence it was, that they, eſpecially the highlanders, became ſuch excellent ſoldiers, that their alliance was very much courted in all the wars between the other ſtates. They commonly uſed to come to the wars clad with the ſkins of wolves and bears, and carried either a little bundle of javelins, or a lance in their hands, which they uſed with a peculiar dexterity. Their very women became at length ſuch expert warriors, eſpecially in a defenſive war, that they have ſometimes proved the means of gaining a victory, when it was in all appearance wholly leaning on the other ſide: witneſs that famous expedition of the Lacedæmonians againſt Tegea, when, fluſhed by a dubious oracle, with hopes that they ſhould take that city, they brought with them chains to bind their future captives, but were in the heat of the battle diſcomfited by a party of women who had lain in ambuſh, and their king Charilaus with a great number of his men bound with thoſe very chains they had brought with them *. Having therefore ſuch brave females to defend their country in caſe of invaſion, they uſed to be hired as mercenaries by all their neighbouring ſtates, in the ſame manner as the Suizzers are now; and this made them ſome amends for their want of commerce, occaſioned by their diſtance from the ſea.

(1) Iliad. lib. ii.

THIS extraordinary change in ſo rude a nation was as quick as it was ſurprizing. Lycaon the ſon of their founder, of whom we ſhall ſpeak more fully in the following note, that the Lacedemonians conſulting the oracle about a war which they were going to wage againſt them, received this anſwer from the pythoneſs, that though Jupiter and the gods were on their ſide, yet could they expect no ſucceſs againſt a warlike people, whoſe chiefeſt dainties were the fruit of the beech (2).

* Herodot. l. i. & Pauſan. in Arcad.

(2) In Arcadic. ch. i.

improving what his father had done towards civilizing his ſubjects, by introducing the worſhip of Jupiter among them, though not with the ſame prudence that Cecrops had done among his Athenians (C). His ſons, of whom he had a conſiderable number, ſet themſelves on building each of them a city which they called by their own names, and which we ſhall mention in their proper places[d]. In theſe they gathered the people into bodies, and brought them ſtill nearer to a ſocial life; and in the next reign they began to ſow corn, make bread, ſpin wool, and to make themſelves garments of it [e]. Another author adds [f], that they learned the uſe of bees, honey, and milk, of rennet for making cheeſe, of oil, and ſome other conveniencies of life (D). Thus in four generations, the Arcadians, from being [d] In Arcad. ch. iii. [e] Id. ibid. [f] Juſtin, ex Trog. l. xiii. c. 7.

(C) Cecrops, as we have ſeen in a former ſection, forbad the ſacrificing of any living creature, whereas Lycaon is reported to have ſacrificed a youth to him, for which the angry god changed him into a wolf.

The poets have improved this fable, which perhaps took its riſe only from the ſavage nature of that prince implyed in his name, λυκος, ſignifying a wolf: the account which Ovid gives of him is as follows;

Jupiter, deſirous to know whether wickedneſs of men anſwered the report he heard of it, in his travels came one night to Lycaon's palace, where having made himſelf known, the people were going to ſacrifice to him. Lycaon, not believing his gueſt to be what he gave out, attempted to murder him in the night, in order to undeceive the people. But having miſſed his blow, he killed and dreſſed a Moloſſian youth, whom he kept as a hoſtage, and ſet him before his gueſt to eat, for which the exaſperated god overthrew his palace with thunder and lightening, and turned his inhuman hoſt into a wolf.

(D) This laſt author ſays, that Ariſtæus, who taught the Arcadians all theſe things, was the ſon of Jupiter by Cyrene, a beautiful Theſſalian princeſs, whom that luſtful god carried off to the top of mount Pelion, and of whom he got four ſons, the three firſt of which ſettled in Theſſaly, and the other, viz. Ariſtæus, came and reigned in Arcadia. This ſtory, however, is contradicted by Pindar and Siculus, who affirm, that ſhe had but one ſon by Jupiter, namely Monius, who was alſo ſurnamed Agrius, as being a lover of hunting and feeding cattle; and Pauſanias ſays, that this Ariſtæus inſtructed Arcas the 4th king of the country, without taking any notice of his reigning there. We ſhall have occaſion to ſay ſomething more of this Cyrene, when we come to ſpeak of Theſſaly.

ing but one remove from wild beasts, became civilized, industrious, inured to society, husbandry, and a regular government. To all these we may add, that these advantages, which exposed them to frequent invasions from abroad, put them likewise upon the necessity of cultivating the martial arts, first in their own defence, and afterwards for interest and gain, whence they became such brave soldiers and expert warriors, as we observed they were. Hence it was, that most of the Grecian princes courted their alliance above that of any other nation; but especially the Messenians, with whom they seem to have maintained an inviolable friendship. But Hercules, of all the antient heroes, had the greatest confidence in them, insomuch, that we seldom find him ingaged in any extraordinary exploit without having some Arcadian forces to assist him. While they thus improved their martial genius, they did not forget to cultivate their pastoral life, for which they have been so highly celebrated by the poets above all other Grecians[g]. Arts and husbandry.

THEIR government, like that of all their neighbours, was at first altogether monarchical and arbitrary, yet by degrees the subjects began to claim something like a negative power, especially in matters of great moment, so that their kings could not well undertake any great affairs, such as a war, alliances, or foreign expeditions, without their consent. This may perhaps be one main reason why they continued longer under a monarchy than any other state of Greece; but this will be best seen in the next chapter. We shall confine ourselves here within our epoch, and to that series of kings which that nation pretended to be descended from Pelasgus their first founder, and which Pausanias has given us from their traditions and records. And herein if he differs sometimes from Apollodorus, Justin, and other ancient writers, we may suppose he had his reasons for so doing, and, if we except the remotest times which were wrapped up in inextricable darkness, the standing monuments of each country to direct and confirm his judgment. However, they were not always united under one king; for it sometimes happened, that the kingdom was divided by the father between his sons, and continued so, till want of issue, alliances, or some other circumstance united it again. Besides this, the several cities, built by the sons of Lycaon, seem to have been divided into cantons under their several chiefs; but whether always under Govern-ment.

[g] Apollod. D. Sicul. Pausan. &c.

one ſovereign or not, is not ſure. Hence it is, that we read of theſe cantons, as of ſeparate people, who made alliances, not only among themſelves, but with foreign ſtates, and ſignalized themſelves during ſeveral centuries under their reſpective names, ſuch as Tegeans, Trapæzans, Mantineans, Peretheans, and many more, which we ſhall give our readers in its proper place, to prevent their being miſtaken in the ſequel of the Grecian hiſtory for ſo many diſtinct people from the Arcadians.

THE ſucceſſion of the kings of Arcadia, who reigned from their founder to Ariſtocrates, who was murdered by his ſubjects for his treachery to the Meſſenians [h]; is as follows.

1 Pelaſgus	8 Aleus	14 Cypſelus	20 Æginetes
2 Lycaon	9 Lycurgus	15 Lajus	21 Polymeſtor
3 Nyctimus	10 Echemus	16 Bucolion	22 Echmis
4 Arcas	11 Agapenor	17 Phialius	23 Ariſtocrates I.
5 Clitor	12 Hippothous	18 Simus	24 Hicetas
6 Azan	13 Epytus II.	19 Pompus	25 Ariſtocrates II.
7 Epytus I.

IT were in vain to expect an exact chronology of this kingdom, conſidering the uncertainty of its beginning. If Pelaſgus, the ſuppoſed founder of this monarchy, were the ſame with Phaleg or Peleg the ſon of Eber, in whoſe days the earth is ſaid to have been divided [i]; it muſt have begun at leaſt as early as Terah's time; but we hope we have ſufficiently confuted this opinion heretofore †, as well as the other conjecture of the ſame learned man, that Peleg was the father of the Scythians *. Thoſe who place the foundation of it about Moſes's time ſeem ſtill to have antedated it [k], neither would we venture to place it before the expulſion of the Canaanites out of their native land, at which time they were obliged to go in ſearch of ſome more peaceful habitations. But whether in Joſhua's time, or after it, were hard to determine. Sir Iſaac Newton is of opinion, that Pelaſgus was cotemporary with Inachus, Cecrops I. Lelex, and other chiefs, who brought their colonies out of Egypt; according to him this was about 1120 years years before Chriſt, but according to our chronology in the year of the flood 1443, or before Chriſt 1556, at which time we have placed the foundation of Athens by Cecrops. And it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that Pelaſgus could be of recenter date than he, if we conſider the rude beginnings of either kingdom, or the ſucceſſions of their kings; and that Pauſanias thinks, that Lycaon was cotemporary with the Athenian founder[1]. Upon this ſuppoſition therefore, that they began near about the ſame time, it will follow, that this of Arcadia laſted in the line of Pelaſgus about 880 years, that is till the year of the flood 2351, and firſt of the 28th olympiad, in which Ariſtocrates, II. and the laſt of that race, was ſtoned to death. This is the utmoſt we dare venture to advance concerning an epocha, whoſe beginning is ſo dark and remote. We ſhall in the next place ſubjoin what we find moſt material concerning theſe monarchs.

[h] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. ch. ii. & ſeq. [i] Gen. x. 25. vid. & Stillingfl. Or. Sacr. l. iii. c. S. † See vol. i. p. 473. * Vol. v. p. 388. & ſeq. [k] Vid. int. al. Rawl. hiſt. of the world, l. ii. c. 6. ſect. 4.

We have already ſaid all we know concerning Pelaſgus and his ſon Lycaon, except that this laſt built a city on the mountain Lycæas, and called it Lycoſura, cauſed Jupiter to be worſhipped there under the name of Jupiter Lycæus, and inſtituted the Lycæan games in honour of him. As for the cities which were built and peopled by his numerous iſſue, the reader may ſee them in the margin (E).

Among

[1] Arcad. c. i.

(E) Theſe cities were Pallantium built by Pallas, Oreſthaſium, by Oreſtheus, Phigalia by Phigaleus, afterwards called Phialia from Phialus the ſon of Bucolion, Trapezonte from Trapezeus, and ſo of the reſt, which were built by his other ſons Daceates, Macareus, Heliſſon, Acacus, (from whom this laſt tribe pretends Mercury has that ſurname in Homer which ſignifies without evil, implying, that the good he doth is without any mixture of ill) and Thochnus. Hypſus built Hypſuntes, Menelea, and Thyrea, Menalus, Tegeates, and Mantineus, the three cities of their name. The reſt of thoſe cantons, bearing their founders names, are the Cromians, Chariſians, Tricolones, Peretheans, Aſeatians, Lyceatians, Sumatians, Hereans, and Alipholians. Orchomenos the father of the Orchomenians, the richeſt canton of all in cattle, was the only one who did not call the city of his building by his own name, but by that of Methrydion †. The youngeſt of Lycaon's ſons called OEnotrius, inſtead of following the example of the reſt, obtained a ſum of money and forces from his brother Nyctimus, † De his. Vid. St. Byzant. ſub. voc. & Pauſan. ubi ſupra.

Among ſo many ſons Lycaon had but one daughter named Caliſto, with whom Jupiter having had an intrigue, Juno turned her into a ſhe-bear, and Diana, to pleaſe that jealous goddeſs, ſhot her to death (F). Lycaon was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon

3. Nyctimus, and he dying, we ſuppoſe childleſs, left the kingdom to

4. Arcas, the ſon of Caliſto by Jupiter, who gave his name to the kingdom; he it was whom we mentioned above for having introduced and improved huſbandry. He had three ſons, not by a mortal woman, if we believe the poets, but by a nymph called Erato (G), beſides a natural ſon he had before he married the nymph, and at his death divided his kingdom between them. Azan the eldeſt called his portion by his name Azania. Aphydas had the canton of Tegea, and Elatus had mount Cyllene (H), from which he went afterwards and ſettled in Phocis, and built a city which he called by his name.

5. Azan was ſucceeded by his only ſon

6. Clitor, who inſtituted funeral games in honour of his father, built a city which he called by his name, and was mus, who ſucceeded Lycaon, ſailed into Italy, and ſettled there, and was the firſt who brought a colony from Greece thither (3). Hence that of Virgil:

Eſt locus Heſperiam Graii Cognomine dicunt,
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere glebæ (4),
OEnotrii coluere viri.

(F) The fable adds, that Mercury, out of compaſſion to the young princeſs, and by Jupiter's order, ſaved the infant ſhe was pregnant with, and placed the unhappy mother in heaven, where ſhe became a conſtellation, or, if you pleaſe, that conſtellation was called by her name in honour of her.

(G) Not the muſe of that name who preſides over matters of love; but a wood-nymph, ſuch as they call Dryades. Thoſe who inhabited the mountains were called Oreades; thoſe of the water Nereides; and thoſe of ſprings and rivers Naiades (5).

(H) Which name it did not receive till afterwards from Cyllen the ſon of Elatus. This is the ſame mountain on which Jupiter is ſaid to have begot Mercury on Maja the daughter of Atlas †.

(3) Pauſan. in Arcad. ch. iii. (4) Vid. Gedoyn. Not. in eund. ch. iii. (5) Vid. Serv. Comm. in Virg. Pauſan. ubi ſupra c. iv.

† See vol. v. p. 432.

was the powerfulleſt prince of his time, but died childleſs; ſo that his ſhare of the Arcadian kingdom fell to

7. Epytus, eldeſt ſon of his brother Elatus, who was bit to death by a venomous ſerpent as he was hunting, and left the kingdom to his couſin

8. Aleus, the ſon of Aphydas. This prince made Tegea his metropolis, and built in it a temple to Minerva Alea. He had three ſons, Lycurgus, Amphidamus, and Cepheus; and a daughter named Auge, whom he condemned to be drowned for her criminal converſe with Hercules, during his abode at Tegea (I). He was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon

9. Lycurgus, whoſe two ſons dying before him (K), he left the kingdom to Echemus, the great grandſon of Aleus.

10. Echemus aſſiſted Atreus the ſon of Pelops againſt the Heraclidæ, who firſt entered Peloponneſus with a powerful army, and with Hyllus the ſon of Hercules at their head. We have ſpoken of this expedition in a former ſection, and of the ſucceſs of Echemus againſt that champion whom he killed in ſingle combat, he left his kingdom to a ſon of Ancæus the ſon of Lycurgus, named

11. Aga-

(I) This princeſs having captivated the famous Hercules, whilſt he was at Tegea, was left with child by him, which her father no ſooner perceived, than he ordered her to be drowned, or, according to others, to be put into a cheſt with her child and flung into the ſea; ſhe was taken up about the mouth of the Caicus by Teuthras king of Myſia, who was ſo charmed with her beauty, that he married her, and brought up her ſon Telephus as his own, and made him his ſucceſſor (6).

Others ſay, that Aleus committed his daughter to Nauplius, to be drowned in the ſea, and that ſhe being delivered in her way to Nauplia, an Argolic port, ſhe left her child there, and that he, inſtead of drowning the mother, ſold her to Teuthras. The child was ſuckled by a deer, from which he was called Telephus, and when of age, having been directed by the oracle, who his parents were, went into Myſia, where he was adopted by his father-in-law (7).

(K) Theſe were Ancæus, who, being returned from the Argonautic expedition, was killed by the Calydonian wild boar, and Epochus, who was carried off by ſickneſs.

(6) Pauſan. ubi ſupra. (7) Apollod. l. ii. Diod. Sicul. l. iv. Pauſan. ubi ſupra.

11. Agapenor, who commanded the Arcadian troops at the ſiege of Troy (L), and in his return thence, being, like the reſt of the ſurviving Grecian chiefs, toſſed about by contrary winds and tempeſts, was caſt at length upon the coaſts of Cyprus, and ſettled at Paphos, where he built a temple to Venus, who, till then, if we believe Pauſanias, was only worſhipped at the ſmall city of Golgos [m]. From him the kingdom paſſed to the line of Stymphalus the ſon of Elatus, who was the youngeſt ſon of Arcas.

12. Hippothous, the great grandſon of Stymphalus, was the perſon who ſucceeded him, of whom we have nothing memorable, except that he transferred the ſeat of the kingdom from Tegea the ancient metropolis to Trapeza; he was ſucceeded by his ſon

13. Epytus II. in whoſe days Oreſtes the ſon of Agamemnon, being warned by the oracle, retired into Arcadia, and died, and was buried in or near the city of Tegea [n] (M). Epytus was afterwards ſtruck blind for his pre-

[l] Arcad. c. ii. [m] Arcad. c. v. [n] Vid. Herodot. l. i. c. 66. Pauſan. ubi ſupra.

(L) Moſt probably as an auxiliary hired by Agamemnon, by whoſe ſhips they were tranſported to and from that ſiege, as we obſerved in a former note.

(M) Herodotus tells us, that the Lacedæmonians, having proved unſucceſsful againſt the Arcadians, were told by the oracle, that they would continue ſo, till they had brought back the bones of that prince. The difficulty was to find them out, and here they were forced to conſult the oracle again, from which they received the following remarkable anſwer, as it is engliſhed by Littlebury.

In the Arcadian plain lies Tegea,
Where two impetuous winds are forced to blow;
Form reſiſts form, miſchief on miſchief ſtrikes;
Here mother earth keeps Agamemnon's ſon,
Carry him off, and be victorious.

The ſolution of this puzzling anſwer was afterwards accidentally found out by Liches, an eminent Spartan, who being one day at Tegea, and obſerving, with ſome attention, a ſmith working at his ſhop, was told by him, that in the ſinking of a well, he had found a coffin ſeven cubits long, and that having had the curioſity to open it, to ſee if the body anſwered the length of the coffin, he had found it exactly fitting, and had laid it again where he found it.

Liches,

preſumption in venturing into the temple of Neptune at Mantinea, and dying ſoon after it left the crown to his ſon

14. Cypſelus, in whoſe days Creſphontes, having by indirect means gotten the kingdom of Meſſenia, was murdered with two of his ſons. The third named Æpytus, by others Ægyptus, fled to Cypſelus, who was his grandfather by the mother's ſide (N), and by his aſſiſtance regained the Meſſenian kingdom, revenged his father's death, and killed the uſurper Polyphontes. We find nothing conſiderable during the reigns of his four next ſucceſſors, Lajus, Bucolion, Phialius, and Simus, except that in the time of this laſt, an ancient ſtatue of Ceres, ſurnamed the Black, was ſet on fire, which was looked upon as a preſage of that monarch's ſpeedy death, which happened accordingly ſoon after: he was ſucceeded by his ſon

19. Pompus. This prince, by the help of the Æginetæ, opened a commerce by land-carriage from his inland towns to the ſea-port of Cyllene, to and from which the merchandizes uſed to be conveyed upon mules. This trade proved ſo beneficial to the kingdom, that in gratitude to thoſe iſlanders Pompus called his ſon and ſucceſſor by their name Æginetes. This laſt was ſucceeded by his ſon

21. Polymeſtor, in whoſe days happened that fierce invaſion we ſpoke of at the beginning of this ſection, in which

Liches, comparing the place he was in and the anſwer of the oracle, did eaſily conceive, that by the ſmith's bellows were meant the two winds, by the hammer and anvil the two contending forms, and by the double miſchief thoſe which are cauſed by iron; upon which, having acquainted the Spartans with this diſcovery, it was agreed, that he ſhould be baniſhed for ſome fictitious crime, that he might be the leſs ſuſpected, and return to Tegea, which he did accordingly, and having with ſome difficulty hired the ſmith's incloſure, did privately dig up the bones, and carry them away to Sparta (8).

(N) About the beginning of his reign the Dorian fleet having invaded Peloponneſus, not by the iſthmus of Corinth, as they had done three generations before, for want of taking the right meaning of the oracle; but by landing above the cape of Rhion, Cypſelus was forced to make an alliance with Creſphontes, and to give him his daughter in marriage, to help him to make head againſt them, in conſideration of which, his ſon helped Æpytus to regain his father's kingdom (9).

(8) Herodot. l. iv. c. 66. (9) Pauſan. ubi ſupra.

which the Lacedæmonians, being come againſt Tegea, were diſcomfited by the help of the Arcadian women, and both they and their king Charilaus bound with the chains they had brought for the Tegeans: however, Charilaus was ſoon after releaſed, upon his oath and promiſe, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould not fight againſt them any more. The chains were afterwards hung up as trophies in the temple of Minerva Haliea, where they ſtill continued in Herodotus's time [o]. Polymeſtor was ſucceeded by his brother

22. Echmis, who aſſiſted the Meſſenians, the old and conſtant allies of the Arcadians, againſt the Lacedæmonians, and was ſucceeded by his own ſon

23. Ariſtocrates I. This prince, among other wicked actions, being fallen in love with a young virgin, prieſteſs of Diana Hymnia, a deity highly reverenced by the Arcadians, and having in vain tried to debauch her, went and raviſhed her at the very altar of the goddeſs. For this fact he was ſtoned to death by his ſubjects, who, to prevent the like ſacrilegious attempts for the future, ordained, that from thenceforth none but married women ſhould be admitted to the prieſtly function.

We know nothing concerning his ſon Hicetas, except that he was father to

25. Ariſtocrates II. the laſt of the royal line of Cypſelus, and with whom we ſhall cloſe this ſection; he was ſtoned to death by his own ſubjects for his treachery to the Meſſenians his allies, whom he betrayed to the Spartans, with whom they were at war. We ſhall ſee the ſequel of it in the next chapter: and all that we ſhall add here is, that the Arcadians, not content with his death, caſt his body out of their territories, left it expoſed without burial, and, to perpetuate his infamy, erected a pillar in a grove of mount Lycæus, on which they cauſed an inſcription to be ingraved, the purport of which you may read in the margin (O), as we find it engliſhed by Mr. Hind in his Grecian hiſtory [p].

SECT.

[o] Herodot. ubi ſupra. [p] p. 167. Vid. & Pauſan. ubi ſupra, & in Meſſenic.

(O) The baſe betrayer of Meſſene's ſtate
Has met at length a well-deſerved fate.
In vain perfidious traitors juſtice ſhun;
Hail, mighty Jove! ſave the Arcadian throne.

SECT. VI.

The History of the ancient kingdom of Thessaly, with a short account of that of Phocis.

THESSALY is supposed to have received its name from Thessalus [a], the father [b], or, according to others [c], the son, of Græcus, an ancient king of an obscure village, from whom the Greeks are said to have been descended [d]. It was also anciently called Æmonia, either from the famous mountain of that name, or from the daughter of Deucalion, or perhaps rather from Æmon the son of Chlorus, the father of Thessalus and grandson of Pelasgus [e]. From this last it was also called Pelasgia, and Pyrrhæa from Pyrrha Deucalion's wife; but it was most commonly known by that of Thessaly, as it is now by that of Janna. Name.

It was anciently divided into four districts, or perhaps kingdoms. Thessaliotis, Istiœotis, Pelasgiotis, and Phthiotis. Deucalion was king of this last when the deluge which goes by his name happened, which destroyed all the inhabitants of this and the neighbouring countries, except only such as happily escaped into the high mountains of Thessaliotis, and Deucalion and his wife, who were carried in an ark upon the waters nine days and nights, and rested at length upon Parnassus, from which they are feigned to have repeopled the country by throwing of stones behind them [f]. However, the name of Thessaly and Thessalians in time prevailed, and came to signify all the four parts. Sometimes it included Magnesia and Phthiotis, and sometimes not; sometimes it was joined with Macedonia, and sometimes severed from it, and again rejoined to it [g]. Division.

Thessaly, properly so called, had on the east the provinces of Magnesia and Phthia abovementioned, and these two were bounded by the Ægean sea. On the west it had Illyricum and Epirus, now Albania; on the north Macedonia and Mygdonia, and on the south Grecia Propria. Situation and extent.

[a] Steph. Byzant. sub voce Θεσσα. [b] Eusеb. Chronic. vid. & not. Scalig in eund. [c] Vid. Byzant. sub voce Γραικος. [d] Id. ibid. & Cluver. lib. iv. c. 8. [e] Byzant. sub voce Αιμον. [f] Ovid. Metam. init. Apollod. l. i. c. 7. [g] Cluver. ubi supra. Mela, l. ii. c. 3, & 4.

pria. It extended from weſt to eaſt about 1 deg. 20 min. that is, from 24 deg. 10 min. to 25 and a half eaſt longitude, and from north to ſouth, from 39 deg. 50 min. to about 41 deg. north latitude.

It was famous for its twenty-four hills, the moſt remarkable of which were thoſe that follow:

Natural rarities. 1. Olympus, celebrated among the poets for its extraordinary height: 2. Othrys, where king Pirithous reigned over the Lapithæ: 3. Pelion: 4. Oſſa, which with Nephele were, according to the fable, inhabited by Centaurs, who were afterwards killed or driven away by Hercules, for their luſtful attempt upon the women that aſſiſted at Pirithous's nuptials. Here were alſo the plains of Pharſalia, and the delightful valley of Tempea, about ſix miles in length and five in breadth, ſo pleaſantly ſituate between the mountains of Oſſa, Pelion, and Olympus, ſo beautified with nature's gifts, and watered by the river Peneus, which ran through the midſt of it, that it was reckoned the garden of the muſes. On the ſouth borders of Theſſaly were ſeated the Dolopes and Myrmidons (A), whom Achilles led to the Trojan war.

Rivers. The whole kingdom of Theſſaly was very pleaſant and fruitful, being watered by ſeveral great rivers which run quite acroſs the country. The chiefeſt of them are the Peneus abovementioned, the Aliacmon, Erigon, and Axius; all which empty themſelves into the Ægean ſea by the gulph of Theſſalonica, anciently called Sinus Thermaicus. This country ſeems alſo to have been above others productive of poiſonous weeds and drugs. Hence Plautus makes uſe of the word Theſſalus to expreſs a poiſonous thing; but upon the whole it was ſo fruitful and delicious a country, that, like many others of the ſame rich nature, it was ſeldom free from foreign invaſions from ſome neighbouring nation or other.

Cities of note. Cities of note were; 1. Lariſſa, famed for giving birth

(A) The latter were ſo called from μυρμηξ a piſmire, not, as the poets feign, becauſe Æacus the ſon of Jupiter, ſeeing his country diſpeopled by a grievous plague, obtained a freſh ſupply of ſubjects from his father, by turning ants into men; but becauſe, as Strabo ſays, this people were very excellent in cultivating the ground, and imitated the piſmires in their diligence and œconomy, or took the hint of digging, tilling, and other huſbandry from that inſect.

birth to Achilles, called from thence Lariſſeus (B). Its ſituation was excellent, being near the gulph above-mentioned, and upon the river Peneus near the foot of Olympus, and at one end of the valley of Tempea: 2. Demetrias, ſituate on the Sinus Pelaſgicus, now Golfo dell Armiro, and ſtrongly fortified by art and nature: 3. Pegaſa on the ſame gulph, famous for being the place where the ſhip Argo was built, which carried the Argonauts to their famed expedition of the golden fleece, of which we ſhall ſpeak by-and-by. Pythion, celebrated for the Pythian games, which were inſtituted here in honour of Apollo, and, as ſome ſay, in memory of his killing the ſerpent Python (C). The metropolis of Theſſaly was, according to Heliodorus [h], called Hypatha, and ſituated near the Sinus Malaicus, now Golfo de Ziton, and at a ſmall diſtance from mount Oeta, upon which Hercules ended his life, after he had put on the poiſoned ſhirt.

Theſſaly was famous, among other things, for ſuch an extraordinary breed of oxen, that Neleus king of Pylus refuſed to give his daughter in marriage to Melampus king of Tiryas, except he procured him ſome of them, which he ſoon after did by the help of his brother Bias

[h] Hiſt. Æthiop. ap. Heylin.

(B) Others ſay, that he was born at Phthia, eſpecially the poets. This difference might be owing either to the nearneſs of thoſe two places, or perhaps to his being born in the one, and making his reſidence in the other.

(C) We have already ſpoken of ſome others inſtituted upon particular accounts, and celebrated in ſeveral parts of Greece. The four moſt conſiderable were, the Iſthmian, the Olympic, the Nemean, and the Pythonian; theſe made four annual meetings for all the Grecians, who reſorted to thoſe places in great number, but which were ſtill much more eſteemed for the concourſe of the nobleſt and greateſt youths, who came to ſignalize themſelves there, ſome for their ſtrength, others for their activity, courage, wit, learning, and other valuable accompliſhments.

The prize, which was given to the victors at theſe Pythian games, was originally a garland of oaken boughs, which was afterwards changed into one of laurel. The reader may ſee a fuller account of all theſe games in Potter's antiquities (1).

(1) ch. xxi. & ſeq.

Rarities. Bias (D) [i]. What fine horſes they bred, and how expert they were in the uſe and management of that noble creature, we need not tell our readers, ſince the fiction of the centaurs (E) is allowed to have taken its origin from them [k]. This fable, however, reflects no leſs a brand upon them for their brutiſh incontinency, than it commends them for their ſkill in horſemanſhip. The attempt which they made upon the women at the nuptials of their neighbours, by Pirithous king of the Lapithæ, mentioned a little higher, is a pregnant proof of the one, and the hiſtory of their wars with other nations afford us a conſtant proof of the latter, ſo that in ſpight of their debauchery they have ſtill ſhewed themſelves a warlike nation, and as ſuch their alliance, as well as aſſiſtance, eſpecially that of their cavalry, was ever highly courted by contending powers. And indeed, if we conſider how liable the pleaſantneſs and fertility of their country made them to foreign invaſions, it will be no wonder they ſhould be ſo well inured to the trade of war. Nor can it be ſuppoſed, that any thing, but their extraordinary valour, could have ſaved them from being ſwallowed up by ſome of their neighbours, conſidering

[i] Pauſan. in Meſſenic. c. xxxvi. [k] Oſor. Serv. Vattabl. & al.

(D) we have already ſpoken of theſe two brothers in a former ſection, and ſhewn how they came to their ſhare of the Argolic kingdom *. Our author adds, that Bias, to oblige his brother, having undertaken to fetch the oxen from Theſſaly, was caught in the attempt, and flung into priſon. But being a famous diviner, he plied his arts ſo well with Iphiclus the owner of them, by foretelling many ſurprizing events to him, that he obtained them as a recompence of his extraordinary ſkill. Bias brought them to Melampus, who preſented them to Neleus, and he left them to Neſtor, who cauſed them to be kept in a ſtable under ground, which was ſtill to be ſeen in our author's time.

(E) The centaurs were fabled to have the upper part of their bodies, that is, from the navel upwards, like a man, and from thence downwards like a horſe, and to have been the monſtrous offspring of Ixion, when he embraced a cloud inſtead of Juno. The ground of this ſtory was, that theſe people did manage their horſes ſo well, that they were ſuppoſed by other nations, to be but one creature with them, and as the moſt famous of them dwelt in a canton called in Greek Νεφελη, which ſignifies a cloud; hence came the fable of their being begotten of Ixion on a cloud.

* Sect. iii. of the preceding volume. c. de his vid. & Pauſan. in Meſſenic. ch. xxxviii.

ing, that their ſcanty territories conſiſted only of four ſmall kingdoms or diſtricts, as often disjointed from each other under different princes, as united together under one.

For this reaſon we ſhall not pretend to give here a liſt of their kings, much leſs of thoſe petty tyrants, who reigned, ſome over one or more, others over all the four diſtricts; but ſhall content ourſelves with mentioning what we find moſt remarkable under any of them, during this fabulous and heroic epocha (F). At the head of all muſt be placed the celebrated Argonautic expedition, which happened in the reign of Pelias king of Theſſaly about the year of the world 2720, or a hundred years before the taking of Troy. We do not, however, pretend, to ſettle this epoch with any certainty; but have followed that of archbiſhop Uſher, without entering into the difference between Sir Iſaac Newton and him. The occaſion of this expedition was as follows:

Year of the Flood, 1714. Year before Chriſt, 1285.

Æson, the third in deſcent from Æolus, being either worn out with age or weary of government, whilſt his ſon Jaſon, whom he had by Polymela, or according to others by Alcimede, was yet very young, appointed Pelias, his brother by the mother-ſide, guardian of the kingdom till his ſon came of age. Pelias on the other hand, who had reſolved to ſecure the government to himſelf, ſent to conſult the oracle about it, and was bid to beware of the man that had but one ſhoe. It happened ſome time after, that, as he was ſacrificing to Neptune, he called his nephew to him, who was on the other ſide of a rivulet, and Jaſon, making more haſte than good ſpeed to croſs the brook, dropped one of his ſhoes, and gave him occaſion to think, that he was the perſon pointed at by the oracle. He then aſked him what courſe he would take with a perſon of whom the oracle had bid him beware, Argonautic expedition.

(F) Among the fabulous exploits of the gods we muſt not omit the rape of Cyrene a beautiful virgin, daughter to Hyſeus king of Theſſaly, by Jupiter, who conveyed her from the mountain of Pelion to that of Cyra, upon which Battus, ſo called from his ſtammering, ſettled a colony, and built a city which he called by the name of that princeſs, after which he is ſaid to have recovered the free uſe of his ſpeech, as the oracle had obſcurely foretold (2). There is alſo a fountain of the ſame name near that city, which was dedicated to Apollo (3).

(2) Juſtin l. xiii. c. 7. (3) Pauſan. in Lacon.

and Jaſon readily anſwered, that he would ſend him to Colchis in ſearch of the Golden Fleece (G). His uncle took him at his word, and ſent him immediately upon that enterprize [l]. Jaſon made no difficulty to obey, and haveing engaged a conſiderable number of young noblemen, the flower of all Greece, to this expedition; he procured a ſhip to be built for his purpoſe at Pegaſa, by one Argus, from whom he called it Argos, and hence he and his gallant company were called Argonautæ.

THESE adventurers, after many ſtrange difficulties and exploits, which the reader will find in the margin (H), arrived [l] lib. i.

(G) This fabulous fleece was then in poſſeſſion of Æetes king of Colchis, a country lying between the Euxine ſea and Iberia, and now called Mengrelia. It then had ſome conſiderable mines of gold which gave riſe to the fable of the fleece. The country abounding alſo with poiſonous drugs and plants, which Medea, king Æetes's daughter, knew how to prepare and make uſe of; the poets thought fit to turn her into an enchantreſs. The fable adds, that the fleece was hung upon a large oak in the grove of Mars, and was guarded by a dragon who never ſlept.

(H) The firſt place they touched at was the iſland of Lemnos in the Ægean ſea, inhabited by female warriors, who, though they had killed their huſbands in order to lead an Amazonian life, yet were ſo charmed with theſe brave youths, that they took them to their beds. They ſailed next to the country of the Deliones, where they were kindly received by their king Cyzicus, but looſeing from thence in the night, and being driven back by contrary winds, they were miſtaken for Pelaſgians, with whom they were then at war. A fierce engagement enſued, in which Cyzicus and a great number of his men were killed on the ſpot. The return of day-light having diſcovered the unhappy miſtake, they only ſtayed to bury the dead, and ſailed to Myſia, a country in Aſia Minor near the Helleſpont †.

Here Hercules plying his oar with more might than ſkill, unluckily broke it, and whilſt he was gone into the wood to cut himſelf a new one, Hylas, his beloved boy, was ſtolen by a nymph, as he was drinking at a fountain, ſo that whilſt he and his brother-in-law's ſon Polyphemus went in ſearch of him, the Argonautæ left them behind and ſailed into Bithynia.

Here Amycus the ſon of Neptune, king of the country, a man of prodigious ſtrength, having obliged them, as he did all ſtrange comers, to fight with him at hurlebats, was killed by Pollux one of arrived at length at the land of Colchis, where the golden fleece was kept. They went immediately to the metropolis, where Jaſon acquainted Æetes king of the country with Pelias's command, and demanded the fleece of him. Æetes promiſed to deliver it to him, provided he could yoke together, by his own ſingle ſtrength, two fierce and terrible bulls (which had braſen hoofs, and breathed out fire and flame, and had been preſented to him by Vulcan), and plow the ground with them, ſowing it with the dragon's teeth which Minerva had given him, and were the remainder of thoſe which Cadmus had ſown at Thebes [m].

† See vol. v. ch. xiv. ſect. 2. par. 2.

[m] Id. ibid. Vid. Hind. ubi ſupra, l. i.

of the Argonautic heroes. The Berbraces ſeeing their king fallen would ſoon have revenged his death on the victor, had not his brave companions reſcued him from the danger, after which they ſailed immediately to Salmydeſſus a city in Thrace, where they conſulted the famous blind ſoothſayer Phinæus, concerning the ſucceſs of their expedition.

This perſon, who, according to the fable, was continually infeſted with Harpyes, a monſtrous kind of bird with womens faces and foul long claws, who devoured one part of his proviſions, and poiſoned the reſt with the ſtench they left upon it, promiſed to direct them ſafely to Colchis, provided they would rid him of that infectious vermin, which they accordingly did. He then, among other directions, bid them beware of the Simplegades, two rocks, or, according to others, two iſlands, about half a league diſtant from the ſtraits of Boſphorus, and ſo near together, that at a diſtance they ſeem to run againſt each other, and which, the poets ſay, were often puſhed ſo cloſe by the force of the winds, that they ſhut up the paſſage. He therefore adviſed them to let a pigeon through it, and not to attempt the ſtraight, unleſs they ſaw him got ſafe to the other ſide; they followed his advice with ſome ſucceſs, the pigeon having loſt only one part of his tail, and the ſhip received a ſmall bruiſe on its hinder part.

From this ſtraight they ſailed to the mouth of the river Parthenius, and were honourably received by Lycus king of that country. Here Idmon, the ſon of Apollo and Aſteria, and a ſouthſayer of their company, was killed by a wild boar. Typhis their pilot did likewiſe die here, and was ſucceeded by Ancæus. At length, having croſſed the river Thermodon and mount Caucaſus, they arrived ſafe at Colchis, which was the end of their journey *.

* Apollon. Argonaut. l. ii. Apollod. l. i. Vid. Hind. Hiſt. Græc.

JASON, perplexed how to perform theſe conditions, was happily relieved by Medea the king's daughter, who was fallen in love with him. She promiſed him, that if he would marry her ſhe would aſſiſt him in it, and he had no ſooner agreed to it, than ſhe gave him a medicine, with which having anointed his body and armour, he was to be proof againſt the violence of the bulls, or, according to others, ſhe taught him how to tame thoſe fierce creatures, ſo as to be able to yoke and make uſe of them. She told him moreover, that the teeth which he was to ſow would preſently ſpring up into armed men, which would infallibly deſtroy him, unleſs he raiſed an immediate diſſenſion among them by throwing ſtones at them, during which he might eaſily cut them off. Jaſon, having ſucceſsfully performed the taſk, went and demanded the fleece according to Æetes's promiſe, whilſt he, inſtead of delivering it, was contriving how to deſtroy him and his company and burn their ſhip. To prevent this miſchief, Medea went, and by her inchantments caſt the watchful dragon into a deep ſleep, ſtole the fleece and brought it to her lover, who took her, and, at her deſire, alſo her brother Abſyrtus, into his ſhip, and ſailed away immediately with his companions. Æetes, who was ſoon informed of his daughter's treachery, purſued immediately after them, which when ſhe perceived, ſhe cut her brother in pieces, and ſcattered his mangled limbs about, in hopes to ſtop his further purſuit, as it actually did. For the diſconſolate king, ſurprized at her unnatural barbarity, ſtayed to gather up the fragments of his ſon's body, and buried them in a place called from thence Tomi, and in the mean time ſhe and the Argonauts eſcaped into Theſſaly, not without having firſt felt the effects of Jupiter's anger for the murder of Abſyrtus (I), and after having ſpent four whole months in this expedition.

DURING

(I) The fable adds, that Jove having purſued the Argonauts with dreadful ſtorms, and caſt them upon unknown coaſts, the ſhip Argos, to their great ſurpriſe, ſpake to them, and aſſured them, that that god would never be appeaſed, till they were cleanſed from their murder by Circe, a famed ſorcereſs, ſuppoſed to have been the daughter of Sol by the nymph Perſe, who lived in the iſland of Æea. They had no ſooner obeyed this miraculous order, than, ſailing by the coaſts of the Syrens, they were delivered from the danger of their inchanting muſic, by the more harming

DURING his abſence, Pelias, who never expected his return from Colchis, had taken ſome means to cut off his father, in order to fix the kingdom upon himſelf and his ſon Acaſtus, and the old king, being appriſed of his plots, had poiſoned himſelf by drinking a draught of bulls blood. His queen likewiſe, oppreſſed with grief for his death, and the ſuppoſed loſs of her ſon and kingdom, had hanged herſelf, ſo that Pelias now thought himſelf ſecure on his throne, when, contrary to his expectation, Jaſon returned ſucceſsful and victorious, and brought the fleece to him (K). However, he had ſo well ſtrengthened himſelf in it, charming voice of Orpheus. Thence they ſailed between Scylla and Charybdis, invironed with the fire and ſmoke, which ſeemed to iſſue out of thoſe and the neighbouring rocks. They were, however, delivered from this danger alſo, by Tethys and the Nereids at Juno's command, and came at length to Corcyra the iſland of the Phæaces, where Alcinous then reigned. Here they were overtaken by the Colchians, whom Æetes had ſent in purſuit of them. Theſe went immediately to the king, and demanded Medea to be delivered to them, which he promiſed to do, in caſe ſhe was not already married to Jaſon. But his queen being appriſed of this promiſe, went and married them privately and out of hand, ſo that the Colchians, being forbid to return home without her, were forced to ſettle in this iſland, whilſt the Argonauts ſailed towards Crete.

Here Medea was again forced to make uſe of her inchantments to deliver the ſhip from being ſunk by the ſtones, which Talus, a man of braſs and the preſent of Vulcan to Minos, then king of that iſland, threw at it. This extraordinary man is feigned to have had one continued vein from his neck to his heel, the end of which was cloſed with a braſen pin; hence they pretend, that Medea, under pretence of making him immortal, only plucked out the pin and let out all his blood; others ſay, ſhe poiſoned him with ſome deadly potion. From Crete they came to Ægina, an iſland inhabited by the Myrmidons, whom they were forced to fight to get a ſupply of freſh water. Hence ſailing by Eubæa and Locris, they arrived at length at Jolcos, the place where they firſt ſet out *.

(K) We have obſerved already in a former note, that by this golden fleece was underſtood ſome mines in the country of Colchis. Theſe are ſuppoſed by ſome mythologiſts to have been contiguous to ſome of thoſe torrents which fall from the neighbourhood that Jaſon, brave and well accompanied as he was, did not dare undertake any thing againſt him openly. Medea was forced to have recourſe to her magic to be revenged on the tyrant, and, as ſome ſay, reſtored Jaſon's father to life. After this ſhe perſuaded Pelias's daughters to boil their old father, on pretence ſhe would reſtore him to life and youthful vigor, but upon her non-performance Acaſtus mounted the throne, and, having performed his father's funeral obſequies, baniſhed Jaſon and his wife from Theſſaly, who went and dwelt at Corinth, where we ſhall find them again in the next ſection.

* Id. ibid. vid. & Pauſan. Paſſ.

ACASTUS is famed for having been a great hunter, and for the incontinency of his wife Hippolyta, or, as ſhe is called by others. Cretheis; which proved fatal to him. She was in love with Peleus the ſon of Cacus, and had ſolicited him in vain for ſome time, till, inraged at length at his conſtant refuſal, ſhe accuſed him to her huſband for having made ſome attempts upon her honour. Acaſtus, believing her and endeavouring to kill Peleus, was himſelf and his unchaſte wife ſlain by him.

THE next Theſſalian prince, both in time and fame, was the celebrated Achilles, the ſon of Peleus and Tethys the goddeſs of the ſea. This hero was king of Phthia, one of the four provinces of Theſſaly, and is feigned to have been dipped by his mother in the river Styx (L) when he was a child, and to have become invulnerable by it in every part, except the heel by which ſhe held him. After this ſhe ſent him to be brought up by the centaur Chiron, where he learned muſic, arms, and the riding of the great horſe. Being afterwards warned by the oracle, that if he went bourhood of mount Caucaſus, and to have brought down with them ſome quantities of gold duſt, which the inhabitants ſaved by ſetting fleeces of wool acroſs ſome of the narrow paſſages of thoſe currents. This is indeed the moſt rational account that can be given of that matter, which the fabulous poets afterwards diſguiſed after their cuſtom, and embelliſhed with the ſtories of dragons, braſen bulls, dreadful ſeas, dangerous paſſages, and many ſuch difficulties which attended the ſearch after that precious metal.

As for the account which Suidas gives of it, that it was a parchment book made of ſheeps-ſkin, and in which was written the whole ſecret of tranſmuting all metals into gold: it ſcarcely deſerves to be mentioned.

(L) We have already ſpoken of this river in the hiſtory of Arcadia.

went to the Trojan war he ſhould meet with his death there, ſhe diſpatched him privately in woman's apparel to Lycomedes king of Scyrus, an iſland in the Ægean ſea and one of the Cyclades, where, among other exploits, he debauched Dejanira one of the king's daughters, by whom he begot the celebrated Pyrrhus, afterwards king of Epirus. This tranſaction, as Pauſanias obſerves, ſeems to have been deſignedly omitted by Homer as unworthy of his hero, though it has been preſerved by all the other poets.

In the mean time, the Grecian chiefs being likewiſe forewarned by an old prophecy, that their enterpriſe againſt Troy would prove unſucceſsful, unleſs they had Achilles with them, Ulyſſes undertook to find him out, and to bring him to that war, which he accordingly did. Tethys, finding that her ſon was determined to prefer a glorious death before the walls of Troy to an inglorious immortality, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him an unpenetrable armour, with which he went at the head of his bold Myrmidons to the fatal ſiege. Here he forbore acting for ſome time, upon a pique he had taken againſt Agamemnon on account of a beautiful female captive; but his reſentment being at length ſwallowed up in the death of his dear friend Patroclus, who had been killed by Hector, Achilles thenceforth ſought nothing but to revenge it, which he ſoon after did. Hector was not only ſlain, but moſt barbarouſly uſed by him after his death, he having cauſed his body to be tied to his chariot, and dragged thrice round the walls of Troy. This inhumanity did not go long unpuniſhed, and Priam having redeemed his ſon's ſhattered remains at an exceſſive price, Paris, another of his ſons, ſoon after ſhot Achilles in the heel, the only place in which he was not invulnerable *.

The two moſt memorable things, which the Theſſalians are ſince recorded for, are, their driving the Bœotians from their country of Arne a ſmall territory in Theſſaly, ſo called from its metropolis built by Bœotus, the ſon of Neptune by Arne, the daughter of Æolus (M) the ſecond

* See vol. v. ch. xiii. at the latter end.

(M) This Æolus finding his daughter pregnant, is ſaid to have ſent her to Metapontium, a city in Italy (4), where ſhe was delivered of two ſons Æolus and Bœotus, the former of whom poſſeſſed

(4) Id. ſub voc. Μεταπονται.

cond of that name, who was the ſon of Hyppotes and grandſon of Mimas king of Æolis; and their conſtant wars againſt the Phocians. The former of theſe happened, according to Thucydides, ſixty years after the taking of Troy, and about a hundred after their firſt ſettlement in that territory; when the Bœotians, being driven thence, went and poſſeſſed themſelves of a country then named Cadmeis, and called it by their name Bœotia. We have elſewhere ſpoken of that country, and given another etymology of it, to which we refer the reader.

As for their wars with the Phocians (N), it is not eaſy to gueſs at the true ground of them, only we find, that there was an irreconcileable hatred intailed between thoſe two nations, which proved a conſtant ſource of freſh and bloody encounters, in which the Theſſalians, though ſuperior in ſtrength, eſpecially on account of their cavalry, were very often worſted by the policy of their enemies, witneſs thoſe ſtatues of Apollo, Minerva, Diana, and other trophies, which, Pauſanias tells us, they ſet up, both on their borders and at the temple of Delphos, in memory of their ſignal victories over them. The truth is, the kingdom of Phocis was very mountainous, and the avenues to it very rugged, ſo that the Theſſalians, who ſeem ſtill to have been the aggreſſors, could receive but little benefit from their horſe. On the contrary, the ſame author gives us a remarkable inſtance, in which it even proved detrimental to them. We ſhall give it our readers pretty near in his own words [n]. 'The Phocians having got intelligence, that ſeſſed himſelf afterwards of the iſles in the Tyrrhenian ſea, ſince called by his own name Æolides, in one of which he built the city Lipara. Bœotus went to Æolis to his grandfather and ſucceeded him in his kingdom, calling the country Arne from his mother, whilſt his people retained that of Bœotians from him (5).

[l] Lib. i. [m] In Phocid. c. xiii. [n] Ibid. c. 1. Vid. & Herodot. l. i. & viii. Juſtin. Diod. & al.

(N) The Phocians were a people who inhabited that tract of land, which lies between the ſouth border of Theſſaly and the iſthmus of Corinth. It ſeems therefore, that this their neighbourhood was a conſtant ſource of their wars, whatever other motives there might be for their invincible hatred. We ſhall give a fuller account of this warlike nation in the cloſe of this ſection.

(5) D. Sicul. c. 4.

that the Theſſalians were invading them by the road of Hyampolis (a city ſituate near the mount Parnaſſus), they ſtrewed all that way with empty pots and potſherds, which they covered, however, ſo well with earth, that the Theſſalian horſe, who came riding full ſpeed, did not perceive it, till they were ſo intangled in it, that they were all cut in pieces by them °. Their deſire of revenge ſoon made them raiſe a more powerful army than the former, which ſo alarmed the Phocians, who dreaded above all their cavalry, more formidable for their famed dexterity than for their number, that they ſent to conſult the Delphic oracle concerning the event of this invaſion. The anſwer they received was, That a mortal and a deity were going to engage in a bloody fight; that both would come off victorious; but that the mortal would get the better. Upon receiving this anſwer, they ſent Gelon with 300 men in the night to obſerve the motions of the Theſſalians, but with expreſs orders not to engage with them, but to return by ſome by-ways. But he falling unfortunately into their hands with his men, they were all either trampled to death by their horſes, or put to the ſword. The news of this threw the Phocians into ſuch conſternation, that they reſolved either to conquer or periſh to the laſt man. Their firſt care was to ſecure their wives and children, the ſtatues of their gods, and what elſe they had that was valuable, in a convenient place, near which they reared a large pile of wood. They committed the care of all theſe to ſome thirty of their moſt reſolute men, with orders, that, if they loſt the day, they ſhould murder their wives and children, and ſet fire to the pile of wood, and fling all their other riches into it.

THIS deſperate reſolution, which gave riſe to the proverb of the Phocian deſpair, was no ſooner taken, than they marched directly againſt their enemies, and the remembrance, that the fate of their wives, children, country, and all that was dear to them, depended on the ſucceſs of this combat, made them engage with ſuch deſperate fury, that they gained a complete victory, which ſoon unfolded the meaning of this oracle. For upon enquiry they found, that the Theſſalian word for the onſet was Minerva Itonia, and that of the Phocians was the name of Phocus their founder; in gratitude therefore to the Delphic god, they erected a ſtatue to him, together with thoſe of their their moſt famous heroes and generals, in his temple at Delphos [p].

° Herodot. l. viii. Pauſan. in Phocid.

THE Theſſalians were ſtill more ſtrangely outwitted upon another expedition againſt the Phocians, when having entered their territories, and forced them as far as mount Parnaſſus, they were routed by the following ſtratagem, deviſed by Telias, a famous diviner, who was then in the Phocian army and highly eſteemed amongſt them. They took ſix-hundred choſen men, and covered their armour and faces all over with plaiſter, and ſent them into the Theſſalian camp in the dead of the night, with orders to kill every man they met with, that was not plaiſtered over like themſelves. Theſe in their march being firſt perceived by the outguard, and afterwards by the whole camp, and miſtaken for ſome ſtrange army of ghoſts, threw their enemies into ſuch pannic fear, that they killed 3000 of them upon the ſpot, routed the reſt, and got a conſiderable ſpoil, the tenth of which they ſent to the Delphic Apollo, together with one-half of the ſhields of the ſlain; the other-half was hung up as a trophy in the city of Aba [q]. Theſe frequent foils, however, did but the more heighten their implacable hatred againſt them, inſomuch, that they never ceaſed their hoſtilities againſt each other, till each ceaſed to be a nation. But this, as well as their affairs with the other ſtates of Greece, will be beſt ſeen in the following chapter.

The ancient kingdom of Phocis.

HAVING ſaid ſo much of the Phocians war againſt the Theſſalians, we ſhall here ſubjoin an account of that brave nation and of their territories, inconſiderable indeed with reſpect to the ſmallneſs of them, yet richly deſerving our notice upon ſeveral accounts, though not worth being treated of in a ſeparate ſection, conſidering how little we know of its original foundation, ſucceſſion of kings, government, and laws, and other ſuch-like particulars.

Situation and limits.

¶ Phocis was ſituate in Græcia Propria, and, as we lately obſerved, between Theſſaly and the bay of Corinth, having the former on the north, and the latter on the ſouth. On the weſt it was bounded by Ætolia, Locris, and Ozolea, and on the eaſt by Bœotia and Megaris, ſo that it was hemmed in from the ſea on all but the ſouth ſide. Its greateſt length was from north to ſouth, that is from 38 deg. 45 min. to 39 deg. 20 min. or about 35 miles; but very narrow from eaſt to weſt, ſcarcely extending tending 30 miles, that is, from 23 deg. 10 min. to 23 deg. 40 min. at the wideſt, but about 20 miles towards the Corinthian bay, and much narrower ſtill towards the north [r].

[p] Id, ibid. [q] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

THIS country is generally allowed to have took its name from Phocus the ſon of Ornytion, a native of Corinth; but having been ſoon after invaded by the Æginetæ, under the conduct of another Phocus, who was the ſon of Æacus king of Ænopia (O), the memory of the firſt did inſenſibly give way to that of the ſecond. Name.

Phocis is famed for ſeveral celebrated mountains, the three principal of which were, 1. that of Parnaſſus, ſacred to Apollo and extolled by all the poets. Its height was ſuch, that Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha with many others are ſaid to have ſaved themſelves on the tops of it from the deluge, which happened in that prince's time, and has ſince gone by his name. 2. Helicon, and 3. Cythæron, both conſecrated to the muſes, and on that account highly celebrated alſo by the poets. They are ſaid to contend with that of Parnaſſus for height and bigneſs [f]. Phocis had no rivers of any note except the Cephiſus, which runs from the foot of Parnaſſus northward, and empties itſelf into the Pindus, which laſt was near the boundary of that kingdom. Mountains.

IT had ſeveral conſiderable cities, the chief of them was that of Delphos, or Delphi (P), famous for the temple of Apollo, whoſe oracle was reſorted to from all parts of Europe, Aſia, and Africa. We have had occaſion to ſpeak [r] Strab. Pauſan. Mela. Cluver. &c. [f] Id. ib. Vid. & Virg. Ovid. Perſ. &c.

(O) This Æacus was the reputed ſon of Jupiter by Ægina queen of Ænopia, called afterwards from her Æginea. He is recorded to have been a prince of ſuch ſtrict juſtice, that, after his death, Plato appointed him one of the three judges of hell. It is no wonder therefore, if his ſon Phocus, whom he had by his ſecond wife, who was the daughter of Nereus, one of the gods of the ſea, did quite eclipſe and obliterate the fame of his predeceſſor.

(P) So called, as is ſuppoſed, from the Greek Αδελφοι, brethren, becauſe Apollo and his brother Bacchus were both worſhipped there. The fable ſays, that Bacchus, having been terribly torn and mangled by the Titans, was brought to Apollo, who both reſtored him, and ordered divine honours to be paid to him in this temple.

ſpeak ſomething of the name, antiquity, richneſs, and magnificence of it in a former ſection, and there given an account of the manner in which that oracle was conſulted and delivered; and ſhall now add ſuch other particulars as we find recorded concerning the original of it. We have already hinted, that Apollo was the deity who preſided over it. How he came by it is variouſly reported, and may be ſeen in the margin (Q). Its firſt diſcovery was owing to ſome goats who were feeding on mount Parnaſſus, upon which was a miraculous, deep, and large cavern, but with a narrow entrance. Theſe goats having been obſerved by the goat-herd, whom Plutarch calls Coretas, to friſk and leap after a ſtrange and unuſual manner, and to have uttered ſtrange and unheard-of ſounds immediately upon their approach to the mouth of the cavern, he had the curioſity to go and view it, and found himſelf ſeized with the like fit of madneſs, ſkipping, and dancing, and foretelling things to come. At the news of this whole multitudes flocked thither, many of whom were poſſeſſed with ſuch phrenetic enthuſiaſm, that they threw themſelves headlong into the vorago; inſomuch, that they were forced to iſſue an edict to forbid the approach of the cavern. After this they placed the tripod at the mouth of it, upon which a virgin being ſeated received and returned the anſwers of the deity, in the manner we have elſewhere deſcribed [c]. We meet with ſome different accounts of this wonderful place, which Pauſanias has given us upon the credit

[c] Vid. Diod. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. iv.

(Q) Some ſay, that this oracle did originally belong to the earth, and uſed to give its anſwers by dreams. Others, that Neptune and the earth were at firſt partners in it, but that he reſigned his ſhare to the earth, who was ſucceeded by her daughter Themis, the ſame who was conſulted, according to Ovid, by Deucalion and his wife after the flood, and taught them how to repeople the earth. Themis in time reſigned it to her ſiſter Phœbe, and ſhe to Apollo (1).

Some ancient poets do indeed tell us, that he did not come ſo fairly by it, but that he took it by main force from the earth, for which ſhe was like to have precipitated him into the infernal regions, had not Jupiter come to his aſſiſtance (2), who ſeems on all hands to have confirmed the poſſeſſion of the oracle to him.

(1) D. Sicul. lib. xvi. Pauſan. in Phocid. (2) Pindar. Euripid. in Iphigen. Scholiaſt. in Æſchyl.

credit of the Phocians, and which the readers may ſee in that author [d]. This miraculous place was ſoon after covered with a kind of chapel, which, the ſame author tells us, was originally made of laurel boughs, and was more like a large hut. This, if we may credit the Phocian tradition, was ſucceeded by one of wax, and reared up by the bees. After this a third was built of ſolid copper, and ſaid to have been the workmanſhip of Vulcan. This laſt was deſtroyed by an earthquake according to ſome, or by fire which melted the copper according to others, and then a ſumptuous one, all of ſtone, was erected by Agamedes and Trophimus.

DELPHOS, among ſeveral other cities of Greece and Peloponneſus, contended for being ſituate in the middle, or, as the Greek expreſſes it, the navel of the world (R) [e], becauſe the navel is in the middle of the body. It had ſo convenient a harbour, and was ſo excellently well ſituated, being rather in the heart of Greece than of the world, that it became in time a ſeſſions-town for all the Grecian ſtates. Here ſat the court of the Amphictyones, choſen out of the prime cities of Greece, and called ſo from Amphictyon the firſt founder of this high court [f]. The time of their aſſembling was in ſpring and autumn; cauſes of all kinds were brought before them from all parts of Grecia, and their ſentence was deemed definitive. We ſhall have frequent inſtances of the power of this court in the courſe of the Grecian hiſtory. The following one which relates to the Phocians ſhall ſuffice for the preſent.

THE Phocians, having preſumed to plow the territories of Cyrra, which were conſecrated to the Delphic god, were ſummoned by the other Grecian ſtates before this court, and had a conſiderable fine impoſed upon them for their ſacrilege. They refuſed to pay it, on pretence that [d] Pauſan. in Phoc. ſupra. & Corinth.

[e] Vid Strab. Geogr. l. ix. Pauſan. ubi

[f] Pauſan. in Phocid. ch. ii.

(R) The fable ſays, that Jupiter, deſirous to know the exact middle of the earth, let looſe two eagles, Pindar ſays crows, and others ſwans, the one from the eaſt, and the other from the weſt, and that they met in this place. The city of Philus and ſome others pretend to the ſame; but Strabo places it in the middle of Greece (3).

(3) Geogr. l. ix. Vid. & Pauſan. in Corinth.

that it was too large, and the next ſeſſion their dominions were adjudged confiſcated to the uſe of the temple. This ſecond ſentence did but exaſperate the Phocians the more, who at the inſtigation of one Philomelus, or as he is called by Plutarch Philomedes, went and ſeized upon the temple, plundered it of its treaſure, and held the ſacred depoſitum for a conſiderable time. This ſecond crime brought all the ſtates of Greece upon them. A war was decreed againſt them, which was called the holy war, and laſted ten years, during which the Phocians, having hired a number of foreign troops, made a noble defence, and would in all probability have held out much longer, had not Philip of Macedon given the finiſhing ſtroke to their total defeat and puniſhment. The war being ended, the grand council aſſembled again, and impoſed an annual fine of ſixty talents upon the Phocians, to be paid to the temple, and continued till they had fully repaired the damage it had ſuſtained from them; and till this was done they were excluded from dwelling in any walled towns, and from haveing any vote in the grand aſſembly. They did not, however, continue long under this heavy ſentence; their known bravery made their aſſiſtance ſo neceſſary to the reſt, that they were glad to remit it; after which they continued to behave with their uſual courage and gallantry, and ſoon obliterated their former guilt, as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter.

CONSIDERING therefore the great concourſe of people which this Amphictyonic court, the Delphic oracle, and the games celebrated in honour of Apollo, brought into the city of Delphi; to ſay nothing of the vaſt offerings and preſents which were ſent from all parts of the world, even by the very Scythians, unto that oracle, we ſhall not need wonder at its having been one of the richeſt and moſt opulent of all Greece; though that proved likewiſe the occaſion of its being ſo often plundered by other nations, as we ſhall ſee it was in the very next chapter.

THE next in dignity, both for its ancientneſs and grandeur, was the city of Elatea, ſituate on the river Cephiſus, and ſaid to have been built by Elatus, the ſon of Arcas the fourth king of Arcadia, and to have been peopled by a colony of that ancient nation which came with him into Phocis [g]. Aba was likewiſe conſiderable for having Abas, the the ſon of Lyncæus and Hypermneſtra, for its founder, and for having alſo an oracle of Apollo. This was alſo the only city that was not levelled with the ground after the holy war, when all the reſt were deſtroyed; but whether ſpared out of reſpect to Apollo, to whom it was conſecrated, or, as Pauſanias affirms, becauſe it had no hand in the plundering of the Delphic temple, we will not affirm. Cirrha, on the ſea-ſide of Delphi, was the port-town to it, and Criſſa, ſo called from Criſſus the ſon of Phocus, was another ſea-port. Theſe were both ſituate on the bay of Corinth, which was ſometimes called Sinus Criſſeus from the latter. The laſt city of any note was Daulis, not ſo much for its bigneſs or richneſs, as for the tallneſs and ſtoutneſs of its inhabitants, and much more for the inhuman repaſt which was ſerved there to Tereus king of Thrace by the women of this city, by whom he was ſoon after murdered, for the double injury he had done to his ſiſter-in-law Philomela, daughter of Pandion king of Athens (S). As for the other exploits of the Phocians, they will be beſt ſeen in the next chapter.

[g] Ibid. c. Vid. Byzant. ſub voc. Ελατεια,

SECT.

(S) The fable goes, that Tereus, after having married Progne, did likewiſe raviſh her ſiſter Philomela, cut out her tongue, and caſt her into priſon, to prevent her diſcovering his villany, but ſhe fonnd means to acquaint Progne with her double misfortune, by working the whole ſtory of it on a piece of embroidery, which ſhe ſent to her. Progne took the opportunity of the approaching feaſt of Bacchus when they were all to meet together, and having got her ſiſter out of priſon, made her kill her ſon Itis, whom ſhe had by Tereus, and having baked him in a pie, ordered it to be ſet before him. When Tereus was appriſed of this, he endeavoured to kill both his wife and her ſiſter, but they, by the help of the Daulian women, got the ſtart of him and killed him. Ovid has ſince turned him into a lapwing, Itis into a pheaſant, his mother into a ſwallow, and Philomela into a nightingale who is ſtill bewailing the misfortune of her family.

Pauſanias adds, that no ſwallows hatch or breed in all that canton, either in chimnies or houſes, as they do every-where elſe (4).

(4) Phocid. c. iv.

SECT VII.

The hiſtory of the ancient kingdom of CORINTH.

THIS little ſtate was ſituate on the iſthmus of Corinth, having the bay of that name, now called Golfo de Lepanto, and the iſthmus or neck of land, which joins Peloponneſus to the continent, on the north, Sicyon on the weſt, the gulph of Saron on the eaſt, and the kingdom of Argos on the ſouth. Its utmoſt extent from eaſt to weſt was about half a degree, that is, from 23 deg. 50 min. to 24 deg. 20 min. eaſt longitude, and from north to ſouth about half that ſpace, that is, from 38 deg. 36 min. north latitude. It had no rivers of any note, but abounded with mountains, the chief of which was called Acrocorinthium, at the foot of which the city of Corinth, and on the top of which the citadel were built. It was alſo famed for the fountain Pyrene, ſacred to the muſes, and ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſame that was called Fons Caballinus, in Greek Hippocrene, or the fountain of the horſe, which was feigned by the poets to have ſprung from the horſe Pegaſus ſtriking his foot againſt the rock. Others place this laſt fountain on the hill Helicon, but the greateſt part on that of Parnaſſus. As for that of Pyrene we ſhall ſpeak more of it by-and-by.

CORINTH is ſaid to have been founded by Siſyphus, the ſon of Æolus and grandfather of Ulyſſes. This Siſyphus is the ſame who was killed by Theſeus for the many robberies he committed in Attica, and afterwards condemned by Jupiter to an endleſs puniſhment in hell (A), for having caught that intriguing god in the heighth of an amour with Ægina, the daughter of Aſopus king of Bœotia. The antient name of this city was Ephyra, which it took from a nymph of that name, ſaid to have been the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or, according to others of Myrmex the wife of Epimetheus, the ſon of Japetus and brother of Prometheus. The time of its foundation by Siſyphus

(A) This puniſhment as it is feigned by the poets, conſiſts in the rowling of a great ſtone to the top of a hill, which he has no ſooner reached, than it tumbles down again, ſo that his labour is never to be at an end.

phus is placed about the year of the world 2490, or ſix years before Deucalion's flood [a].

Its new name of Corinth is variouſly traced, ſome thinking, that it was ſo called from the Greek κορινθος, ſatiety or abundance, implying the opulence of the place; others go ſtill farther for its etymon [b]; but the ancient inhabitants pretended, it had its name from Corinthus the ſon, as ſome of them ſaid, of Jupiter, or, as others, of Marathon, and brother of Sicyon (B). But moſt authors aſcribe the name and building, or rebuilding, of it to Corinthus the ſon of Pelops. Among other names it anciently had, we find that of Heliopolis or city of the ſun, for which this reaſon is commonly given, that the poets feign Apollo and Neptune to have contended for it, and that Jupiter having appointed Briareus the cyclop their umpire, he adjudged the iſthmus to the latter, and the promontory which commands the city to the former (C) [c].

[a] Vid. Hind. hiſt. of Greece, lib. i. [b] Id. ibid. [c] Vid. Apollod. Dio. Pauſan. & al.

(B) Pauſanias quotes an ancient Corinthian poet called Eumelos (ſome fragments of whoſe poems are ſtill preſerved in that author and in the works of Athenæus), according to whom, Marathon was the grandſon of Aloeus, who was the ſon of the ſun. And being for ſome reaſon afraid of his mother Epope's anger, he retired into ſome of the maritime coaſts of Attica; but after his father's death, being returned into Peloponneſus, he divided the territories of Sicyon and Corinth between his two ſons Sicyon and Corinthus, from whom they took their names. Sicyon being formerly called Aſopis, and Corinth Ephyra (1).

(C) If Dion Apollodorus and other mythologiſts may be believed, the gods were ſo fond of Greece, that in Cecrop's time each of them contended to have, at leaſt, one city, where he might be particularly worſhipped. Neptune came the firſt into Attic, where ſtriking the ground with his trident he formed a fountain or horſe. Minerva came ſoon after, and in Cecrop's preſence planted an olive-tree, which the laſt quoted author tells you was ſtill to be ſeen in his time (2). Theſe two deities diſputing their claims to the country on account of the preſent each had made to it, Jupiter cauſed the controverſy to be decided by the twelve gods, who adjudged the city of Athens and all Attica to Minerva.

(1) Pauſan. in Corinthiac. c. i. (2) Apollod. l. iii.

However, we meet with a number of other ancient cities of that name, or rather appellative, it being common in thoſe days to dedicate cities to ſome of the gods, and firname them accordingly, without loſing their original name.

Corinth had, beſides the abovementioned citadel on the eminence called from it Acrocorinthus, two port towns, namely, Lecheum, ſituate on the bay of Corinth, and Cenchrea (D), on that of Saron. Theſe were the only two havens, and indeed the only two cities of any note next to Corinth, that belonged to this territory. And theſe were ſo well ſituate for naval commerce, and ſo near the metropolis, that they made ample compenſation for the barrenneſs of the ſoil. Theſe two naval roads, which opened a way into the Ionian and Ægean ſeas, might eaſily have gained them a ſuperiority, if not a command, over all Greece, had not this advantagious ſituation inclined them more to commerce than war. For their citadel being almoſt impregnable by nature, and commanding both thoſe ſeas, they could eaſily cut off all communication from one-half of Greece to the other, ſo that it was not without reaſon called one of the fetters of Greece. But their genius leading them to improve theſe advantages more to navigation and commerce, than to martial exploits, they became in time exceeding opulent, ſo that the little influence they had over the other ſtates was rather owing to their wealth, than to their valour.

As their opulence daily increaſed, not only by their commerce, but by the great numbers of ſtrangers that flocked

But whether Corinth was called Ηλιοπολις from its being adjudged by Briareus to Apollo, or from Corinthus's being reputed the great grandſon of the ſun, or from the heighth and dryneſs of its ſituation and territory, is ſcarce worth enquiring. Only we cannot omit a conjecture of the learned Gronovius (3), that it was originally called Ηλοπολις from the ruggedneſs and barrenneſs of its ſituation and territory, for ſuch, Strabo tells us (4), it really was.

(D) That this laſt was a diſtinct city from Corinth, at leaſt in St. Paul's time, we may gather from Acts xviii. 18. and from his epiſtle to the Romans, Ch. xvi. 1. though it had the epithet of Corinthiaca in the poets, for being one of the havens of that little ſtate, as Corinthus had that of Bimaris, for being ſo conveniently ſituated between two ſeas.

(3) Not in Byzant. ſub voc. Corinth. (4) Geogr. l. viii.

ed thither from Europe and Aſia, their city became in time one of the fineſt in all Greece; being adorned with ſumptuous buildings, ſuch as temples, palaces, theatres, porticoes, cenotaphs, baths, and other edifices, all of them inriched with a beauteous kind of columns, capitals, and baſes, from which the Corinthian order took its name, with numberleſs ſtatues done by the moſt famous artiſts [d]. Inſomuch, that with reſpect to its riches (E), greatneſs, and excellent ſituation, it was thought by the Romans equally worthy of empire with Carthage and Capua. Among other artificial rarities we may reckon the ſumptuous embelliſhments of the fountain of Pyrene we mentioned a little higher (F), conſiſting of ſeveral caves in form of grottoes, all covered with white marble, from which the water of that fountain falls into a large baſon, and is very pleaſant to drink. 2. The theatre. 3. The ſtadium or courſe, both which are of white marble. 4. The temple of Neptune, whoſe avenue was lined on one ſide with the ſtatues of all thoſe who had won the prize at the Iſthmian games (G), and on the other with ſtately pines

[d] Pauſan. in Corinth. c. ii. & ſeq.

(E) We need not a more pregnant inſtance of their wealth and luxury than that of the courteſan Lais, who uſually exacted 10,000 drachms for every night's lodging, which made the famous Demoſthenes ſay, that he did not deſign to buy repentance at ſo dear a rate. But ſhe met with a worſe fate in Theſſaly, whither ſhe went in ſearch of freſh cuſtomers; for there the women, envious of her beauty, and jealous of their huſbands and ſons, put her to death.

(F) Pauſanias tells us, this fountain owed its firſt origin to the tears which Pyrene ſhed for the death of her ſon Cenchreus, who was unfortunately killed by Diana. He adds, that it was commonly believed, that the Corinthians dipped their copper in that water, as ſoon as it came out of the furnace, to give it a better temper; but he aſſures us, that it was a vulgar error, ſince they had no copper among them (5).

(G) The origin of thoſe games is variouſly reported; ſome ſay, they were inſtituted by the Corinthians in honour of Melicertes, the ſon of Athamas and Ino (6). The fable ſays, that Athamas king of the Orchomenians, having taken Ino the daughter of Cadmus in ſecond marriage, after he had had two ſons by his firſt wife Nephele, Ino proved ſo cruel a ſtep-mother to them, that her huſband grew enraged at her, and, having put Learchus one of ſet in regular rows. The temple itſelf, which was not very ſpacious, was adorned with a multitude of brazen Tritons, or Sea Gods. Here were alſo the chariots of Neptune and of his wife Amphithrite, both drawn by horſes covered all over with gold, except their hoofs, which were of ivory. The two deities were carved in a ſtanding poſture, and Neptune had young Palæmon riding on a dolphin by his ſide. The baſes of the chariots were likewiſe adorned with curious baſ-reliefs, and the temple with a multitude of other embelliſhments. It were endleſs to deſcribe all the other edifices, and maſter-pieces of architecture, carving, and painting, with which this ſmall ſpot of ground was inriched, the reader, if he pleaſe, may ſee them deſcribed more at large by Pauſanias abovementioned.

(5) Corinth. c. iii. (6) Id. ibid.

But while the Corinthians ſeemed ſo wholly given up to traffick and luxury, that they neglected the encouragement of the liberal arts and ſciences, and even that noble thirſt for glory and conqueſt, for which their neighbours did ſo much value themſelves; they did not forget to cultivate a good diſcipline, both in peace and war; their wealth of the ſons he had by her to death, would have killed her and her other ſon; but that ſhe, to avoid her huſband's fury, haveing thrown Melicertes down into the ſea, and herſelf after him (7), a dolphin took the young prince upon his back, and ſwam with him to Corinth, where the Corinthians received and highly honoured him, changing his name into that of Palæmon, and inſtituting thoſe games in memory of his deliverance. The victors were, according to our author, crowned with pine leaves.

But the generality attribute them to Theſeus in honour of Neptune; the reader may ſee what we have ſaid of that hero in a former ſection *.

They were afterwards obliged to appoint new games, accompanied with ſacrifices, in honour of the ſons of Medea, whom they had unjuſtiy put to death, and for which it ſeems they had been puniſhed by the gods, with the death of their own children, who uſed to expire unaccountably in their cradles, till the murder was, by the advice of the oracle, expiated by thoſe annual ceremonies. In further memory of this murder they erected a ſtatue repreſenting fear, in honour of Medea, and their children uſed to go in black, and with their hair cut, and this cuſtom laſted till all the old race of the Corinthians was extirpated with their city (8).

(7) Apollod. l. i. * Vol. v. Ch. xvii. Sect. iii. par. 20.
(8) Vid. Pauſan. Cor. c. iii.

wealth and opulence, which made them inſolent at home and envied abroad, made both indeed very neceſſary. And though they ſeldom, if ever, engaged in any war with a view of enlarging, but chiefly either of defending, their territories, or to protect ſome neighbouring ſtate, to maintain the liberty of Greece; yet has this little kingdom furniſhed many brave and experienced generals to the reſt of the Grecian cities, inſomuch, that it was common for theſe to prefer a Corinthian general to one either of their own, or of any other ſtate. The truth is, the Corinthians were of all others the greateſt aſſertors of liberty, and though they continued ſome centuries under a monarchical government, yet they always ſhewed an averſion to tyranny, and a readineſs to aſſiſt thoſe who groaned under it.

THE Corinthian monarchy did not, however, continue in the lineal ſucceſſion of their founder Siſyphus, who is ſuppoſed to have begun it about the year of the world 2490, above ſeven or eight generations, or about 470 years, when his line became extinct, or, as others affirm, was dethroned, and expelled the kingdom by Aletes, one of the Heraclidæ, about the year of the world 2960. From him we meet with a long ſucceſſion of kings of his line concerning the greateſt part of whom little elſe remains but their names and the years they are ſaid to have reigned; for this reaſon we think it needleſs to give here a liſt of thoſe monarchs, whoſe names the reader may ſee in Euſebius's chronicle, and ſhall content ourſelves with mentioning the moſt remarkable tranſactions that happened during this epocha. After the ending of Siſyphus's line, the kings who deſcended from Aletes affected to call themſelves Heraclidæ, he being the great grandſon of Antiochus the ſon of Hercules [c]. This name, however, they changed for that of Bacchiadæ, from Bacchis the fifth in deſcent from Aletes, whom we may therefore ſuppoſe to have been upon ſome account or other more famous and eſteemed than his anceſtors. Theſe Bacchiadæ held the kingdom of Corinth near as long as the Heraclidæ, by which time they grew ſo numerous on the one hand, and on the other ſo weary of kingly government, that they intirely diſſolved it in the reign of Teleſtes their laſt king. This prince being become very odious to his ſubjects, his two kinſmen Arieus and Perontas formed a conſpiracy againſt

Year of the Flood, 1915. Year before Chriſt, 1084.

[c] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. c. iv.

againſt him, and at once deprived him of his kingdom and life, after he had reigned twelve years [f], in the year of the world 3104. After his death two hundred of the principal Bacchiadæ ſeized upon the government (H), and ſhared the adminiſtration of affairs among themſelves, electing a ſupreme magiſtrate out of their own body, whom they called Prytanis, to preſide over the reſt. Corinth continued under the Bacchiadal ariſtocracy till the year 3349, when Cypſelus, deſcended from them by the mother's ſide (I), having received ſome obſcure hint from the oracle

Year of the Flood, 1099. Year before Chriſt, 1960

[f] Id. ibid. vid. & Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

(H) Some ancient authors do indeed tell us, that Automnes, the ſon of Teleſtes, did reign one year after the death of his father (9), and it is not unlikely, that he made ſome vain effort to keep the crown; but Pauſanias takes no notice of him, but tells us, the diſſolution of their monarchy did immediately follow the murder of that king (10), but whether in the laſt year of this or in the firſt of that, 'tis agreed, that the government was then changed into an ariſtocracy.

(I) His mother Labda, the daughter of Amphion, one of the Bacchiadæ, was lame, and ſo deformed, that none of her tribe cared to marry her. Wherefore her father gave her to one Eetion, a man deſcended at a great diſtance from the Lapithæ, contrary to the ſettled maxim of the Bacchiadæ, who had till then refuſed to intermarry with other families, the better to ſecure the government to their own.

This Eetion, having no children, went to conſult the oracle of Delphi, where he was told, though in very obſcure terms, that he ſhould have a ſon by his lame wife that would prove a ſcourge to Corinth. On the other hand the Bacchiadæ, having likewiſe been forewarned by the ſame oracle, and in the ſame intricate terms, againſt Eetions's off-ſpring, ſent ten men of their own body to murder the boy Labda had lately brought forth; and as theſe were going to Eetions houſe they agreed, that he to whom the child was delivered ſhould kill him. Their pretence was, to congratulate Eetion on the birth of it in the name of their whole body, and Labda, ignorant of their real intent, readily gave him to the firſt that aſked for it; but the infant at that inſtant ſmiling in his face, and he not having power to ſtrike the blow, he gave it to his next companion, and he, moved with the ſame pity, gave it to a third. The child was thus handed through all the oracle that he would be king of Corinth, and that he ſhould be ſucceeded by his ſon, but not by his grandſon, found means to wreſt the power out of their hand. The time of this uſurpation, which according to the oracle continued only in Cypſelus and his ſon, happened about the 30th year after the annual archontat of Athens, and is therefore beyond our preſent epoch. From Siſyphus, the firſt founder, to this Cypſelus, the Corinthian government had ſtood almoſt 840 years, or 430 years in the line of Siſyphus, 130 in that of Aletes, 130 in that of Bacchis, and about 150 under the Ariſtocratic government of the 200 Bacchiadæ.

(9) Euſeb. D. Sicul. & al. (10) Corinth. c. iv.

SISYPHUS is generally allowed the firſt founder of the Corinthian kingdom (K), he was the ſon of Æolus, and was

the ten, and reſtored unhurt to the mother, after which they withdrew.

They were no ſooner got out of the houſe, than they began to blame each other for not performing the deed, and agreed to go in again and be equal ſharers in the murder ; but the mother, who had overheard their diſcourſe, took care to convey the child under a buſhel or corn-meaſure, called in Greek κυψελη Cypſele, from which he afterwards took his name. Pauſanias calls it a coffer or cheſt, and adds, that it was made of cedar, and adorned with ſome fine carvings in gold and ivory, and that it was afterwards conſecrated by his deſcendants to Juno Olympia, in memory of his wonderful eſcape (11). However that be, the bloody deputies, having ſearched the whole houſe in vain, returned to their brethren, and, being aſhamed to own their weekneſs, made them believe that they had executed their orders, and Cypſelus, thus wonderfully preſerved, became in time the tyrant of Corinth, as ſhall be ſhewn in the next chapter (12).

(K) Pauſanias doth indeed quote an ancient poet, named Eumelos, who pretends, that this country had been given by the ſun to Æetes, and that he, accompanying Jaſon in the Argonautic expedition, left the government to Butus the ſon of Mercury, from whom it having paſt in time to Corinthus the ſon of Marathon, who died without iſſue, or according to Apollodorus left only one daughter, the Corinthians invited Jaſon and Medea to come and reign over them ; and that, Jaſon having taken a diſlike at Medea and gone away from her, ſhe appointed Siſyphus her ſucceſſor (13).

But

(11) Pauſan. in Elid. c. xvii. (12) Id. in Corinth. c. iv. Vid. & Herodot. l. v. (13) Corinth. c. iv.

was killed by Theſeus for the many inroads which he made into Attica, as we hinted at the beginning of this ſection. He left ſeveral ſons, and amongſt them Glaucus who ſucceeded him, and Orynthus, or as he is generally called, Ornytion the father of Phocus, who carried a colony into Phocis, and called the country after his name, as we have ſhewn before.

GLAUCUS, called by Euripides Creon (L), received Jaſon and Medea into Corinth, after they had been both expelled Theſſaly by Acaſtus the ſon of Pelias. Here they lived about ten years quietly enough, till Creon having married his daughter Glauce to Jaſon, the ſlighted ſorcereſs Medea was ſo inraged at it, that ſhe ſet the palace on fire, murdered all the children ſhe had had by Jaſon, and fled to Athens [g]. Pauſanias adds, that Glaucus, haveing aſſiſted at the funeral games, which Acaſtus had inſtituted in memory of his father, was trampled to death by his own horſes [h], and that Glauce flung herſelf into a fountain, in hopes that the water of it would preſerve her from Medea's inchantments, and that the fountain was ſince called by her name [i].

BELLEROPHON, ſo called from his killing a man named Beller, was the ſon of Glaucus or Creon. We have ſeen in a former ſection how he was forced to retire into Argos for that manſlaughter, and there falſely accuſed by Stenobœa of an attempt upon her, for which he was ſent by Prœtus [g] Vid. Apollod. l. i c. 9. D. Sicul. Bibl. Hiſt. l. iv. & Eurip. in Medea. [h] Elid. c. iii. [i] Id. in Corinth. c. iv.

But there are two ſolid arguments againſt this poetic fiction, the one, that Siſyphus was the brother of Cretheus, and this the grandfather of Jaſon, ſo that theſe two could not be contemporaries. The other is, that Siſyphus muſt have been dead ſome time before Jaſon came to Corinth, ſince Euripides tells us in his Medea, that Creon did then reign there, who is ſuppoſed to be the ſame with Glaucus the ſon and ſucceſſor of Siſyphus (14), as we ſhall ſee immediately.

(L) The author above quoted ſuppoſes him to be ſo called, not as it was his real name, but as it implied his regal dignity, Creon in Greek ſignifying the ſame as reigning or governing.

(14) Vid. Paulmier. & Gedoyn. in eund. ibid.

Prœtus to Jobates king of Lycia, to be put to death (M). The firſt dangerous expedition, which the Lycian king ſent him upon, was to ſubdue the Solymi a neighbouring people, againſt whom he ſent him with a very ſmall number of forces; but that defect being ſupplied by his bravery, he overcame them; and, as the learned Bochart ſuppoſes, their three gods, which they painted on their enſigns [k], one in the ſhape of a lion, a ſecond of a goat, and the third like a dragon, and which he probably joined together in his own in memory of this conqueſt; and gave birth to the fable of his killing the monſter Chimæra (N). His [k] Phaleg. lib. i. c. 6.

(M) It is likely, as Pauſanias obſerves (15), that Bellerophon never reigned at Corinth, and that he was forced to fly into Argos before his father's death; but what the ſame author adds, that both he and the Corinthians were then ſubject to the Argives, doth not ſo well appear. It is true, thoſe Corinthian troops that went to the ſiege of Troy, are ſaid by Homer, not to have been led thither by one of their kings, but to have marched under the enſigns of Agamemnon. But might they not have gone as mercenaries under him, as alſo did the Arcadians?

However, as Bellerophon never returned from Lycia to Corinth, we find Thoas his couſin, the ſon of Ornytion, on the throne there; and 'tis likely, that he aſcended it after Glaucus's death, and during Bellerophon's abſence.

As for the exploits of this hero, they have been ſo blended with fable, that we hope our readers will be contented with a bare mention of them, diveſted as much as poſſible from the poetic fictions, with which thoſe writers have diſguiſed them.

(N) This monſter the poets feign to have had the head and breaſt of a lion, the body of a goat, and the hinder parts or tail of a dragon, and that it ſpit out fire and flame (16). We have ſeen what the learned Bochart thought of it. The reader may ſee his arguments, which are far from being deſpicable, in the place above quoted. Others think, that it was a mountain in Lycia, which had ſome volcano on the top; that the upper part of it was only frequented by lions, the middle by goats, and the foot by ſerpents, and that our hero having cleared it of all that vermin, gave riſe to the fable of this Chimæra (17).

Others again ſuppoſe it to have been a noted pirate among the Lycians, named Chimarras, who had the lion, goat, and dragon, painted (15) In Corinth. (16) De hac vid. Heſiod, Theogn. Lucret. Horat. Ovid, &c. (17) Vid. Serv. Comm. in Virg.

His next expedition was againſt the Amazons, from which he not only came off victorious, but extricated himſelf alſo from an ambuſh of Lycians, which Jobates had ſet to way-lay and murder him in his return, and killed every one of them. Jobates at length, ſtruck with admiration at his bravery and ſucceſs, ſought no more how to be rid of him, but how to reward his ſervices, which he did by giving him his daughter Philonoe in marriage and declaring him his ſucceſſor [l].

ALL theſe atchievements, however, if we may believe the poets, were not done without an extraordinary aſſiſtance. For Minerva, who took pity of the innocent prince, lent him the famous horſe Pegaſus (O), after ſhe had been at the pains to tame and break him to his hands, to whoſe help he is affirmed to have been beholden for the moſt ſignal of his exploits, eſpecially that of killing the Chimæra [m], againſt which Neptune was likewiſe pleaſed to give him his aſſiſtance. After theſe ſucceſſes and great change of fortune, he is ſaid to have grown ſo inſolent and preſumptuous, that it brought a new ſeries of miſchiefs upon him, which gave occaſion to the fable mentioned in the laſt note, of his having attempted to fly up to heaven upon Pegaſus, by whom he was flung down into the valley of Cilicia, where he died blind [n].

WE took notice above, that Thoas the ſon of Ornytion ſucceeded Creon or Glaucus; from him the crown deſcended to his ſon Demophon, to his grandſon Propidas, and painted on his ſhip, and was overcome by Bellerophon, after having infeſted thoſe patts a conſiderable time, and done great damage to Lycia, and all the neighbouring kingdoms (18).

[l] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. [m] Apollod. l. ii. c. 3. [n] Id. Ibid. Pauſan. Sicul. & al.

(O) This famous winged creature is feigned to have ſprung from Meduſa's blood. The Corinthians had a temple dedicated to Minerva, whom they ſirnamed Chalinitis, from the Greek Καλινος a bit or curb-bridle, becauſe ſhe had clapt one in his mouth, in order to break him for our hero's ſervice.

The fable adds, that Bellerophon being got on the back of Pegaſus, was ſo affrighted at his mounting in the air, that the horſe finding himſelf without a rider, flew up to heaven, where he was turned into the conſtellation that ſtill bears his name.

(18) Plutarch. de virtut. Mulier. & Hind. Hiſt. Græc.

and laſtly to his two great grandſons, Doridas and Hyanthidas. It was in the reign of theſe two that the Dorians invaded the kingdom, with Aletes one of the Heraclidæ at their head, who forced the two brothers to yield the crown to him, and to lead a private life at Corinth. Aletes was the ſon of that Hippotes, who had been baniſhed Peloponneſus for ten years, by order of the Delphic oracle, for killing one Carnus an Acarnanian prophet in the war of the Epigoni againſt Thebes, mentioned in a former ſection.

He met, however, with an obſtinate reſiſtance from the Corinthians, who ſhewed upon that occaſion a great reluctance to ſubmit to a foreign prince; but unfortunately for them, Aletes and his brave Dorians proved too ſtrong, beat and expelled them out of that metropolis, and got at length the quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom. From him it paſſed through a ſucceſſion of his deſcendants, under the names of Heraclidæ and Bacchiadæ, till Teleſtes the ninth from him. This prince, being very young when Ariſtomedes his father died, had been left to the care of his uncle Agemon, who ſoon after mounted the throne, and not only held it from him ſixteen years, but left it to his own ſon Alexander, who reigned alſo twenty-ſix years; but was at length killed by Teleſtes, whom it ſeems they had ſtill ſuffered to live during this long uſurpation, and who then ſeized upon his right, and enjoyed it till he was himſelf killed by a faction, as we hinted above; immediately after which followed the ariſtocracy of the 200 Bacchiadæ under their annual Pyrytanes [o].

[o] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Euſeb. Chron. li. D. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

SECT. VIII.

The hiſtory of the ancient kingdom of Lacedæmon or Sparta.

The original name of this country was Laconia, a name which this nation ſtill prided themſelves in, when it was afterwards changed into thoſe of Sparta and Lacedæmonians. As for thoſe of Sparta and Lacedæmon, though they be often confounded by writers ancient and modern, yet, in propriety of ſpeech, the former was only the name of the metropolis, ſo called, according to the tradition of that

The name. that people, from Sparte, the daughter of Eurotas, and the latter of the kingdom or nation, and ſo called from Lacedæmon, the huſband of Sparte and heir and ſucceſſor of Eurotas. The ſame tradition adds, that Eurotas was the grandſon of Lelex, ſirnamed alſo Autochtos becauſe he was ſuppoſed to have been originally a native, and from him his ſubjects bore the ancient name of Leleges. Lelex was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Myles, and this by his ſon Eurotas, who finding the country very unhealthy and incommodious, by reaſon of the bogs and marſhes with which it was covered, cut a ſpacious channel through it, into which ſuch quantities of water drained themſelves, that it became a large river, which he called by his own name. Eurotas, having no male iſſue, married his daughter Sparte to Lacedæmon, the ſuppoſed ſon of Jupiter by Taygeta (A), and appointed him his ſucceſſor, from which time they agreed to call the kingdom by his name, and the city, which he built ſoon after and made the ſeat of the kingdom, by that of his wife [a], Thus far the Laconic tradition: others, however, derive the name of Sparta from Spartus, the ſon according to ſome, or according to others the brother, of Phoroneus [b], the ſon of the great Inachus the founder of Argos. Others make him the ſon of Amydas [c]. Stephen of Byzantium [d] tells us of one Sparton, who is in all likelihood the ſame perſon whom others call Spartus, and this is by ſome reckoned the brother, and by others the ſon, of Phoroneus [e]; but this laſt is

And their etymon.

[a] Pauſan. in Laconic. ch. i. Vid. & St. Byzant. ſub. voce Sparta & Laconia. [b] Euſeb. Chron. [c] Euſtat. in Iliad. B. [d] Sub voce Lacedemon. [e] Idem in voce Mycenas.

(A) This princeſs was the daughter of Atlas, king of Mauritaia and uncle of Jupiter and is ſaid to have been raviſhed both by him and by his brother Neptune; from her the mountain Taygetus had its name, on which was a noble monument erected in honour of her ſon Lacedemon. Near this place was alſo a village called Aleſies, from the Greek Αλεω, to grind, becauſe Myles the ſon of Lelex is reported to have found the firſt mules there, and to have made uſe of it for grinding corn (1).

This mountain was like famous for furniſhing huntſmen with a great variety of wild beaſts, ſuch as boars, deer, and vaſt quantities of wild goats (2).

(1) Pauſan. in Laconic. c. 20. (2) Id. ibid.

is confuted by Pauſanius, who tells us, that he doth not believe, that Phoroneus had any ſon of that name, and that the Lacedæmonians themſelves did not acknowledge any ſuch perſon. We omit that monſtrous account which ſome give of Sparta's being ſo called from Cadmus making an irruption into Laconia with his Sparti, who were ſaid to have had that name given them, becauſe they ſprang from the teeth of the dragon which he had ſown, and which we have mentioned elſewhere. This monſtrous ſtory is even rejected by the Greeks themſelves as a fiction. Under this variety and uncertainty of opinions, we think it would be vain to make further inquiries concerning the original of that name; as for that of Lacedæmon, it is generally agreed to be from the Lacedæmon mentioned above (B).

Geography. LACONIA was ſituate on the ſouth-eaſt nook of Peloponneſus, having Argos and Arcadia on the north, Meſſenia on the weſt, the bay of Argos on the eaſt, and the Mediterranean on the ſouth. Its extent from eaſt to weſt, where it reached furtheſt, was 1 deg. 45 min. that is, from 23 deg. 10 min. to 24 deg. 55 min. eaſt longitude; but it grew ſtill narrower, as it extended itſelf northward. The extent of it from north to ſouth was about fifty miles, that is, from 26 deg. 50 min. to 27 deg. 40 min. north latitude [g]. We do not pretend to ſay, that this extent of their dominions was ſuch from the beginning; it is likely, on the contrary, that their boundaries were anciently contained within a much narrower compaſs, and that a great number of thoſe cities both maritime and inland, which we find in this kingdom, were originally governed by kings of their own, and were not brought under the Spartan government till a long time after. Of this nature were the Heliots, Gythians, and many others, which were forced to yield [f] In Corinth. Vid. & Bochart. Phaleg. lib. i. c. 22. [g] Vid. Strab. Mela, Pauſan. & al.

(B) Beſides the names of Lacedæmonia, Sparta, and Laconia, we find in ancient greographers thoſe of Lelegia, from the Leleges, whom Strabo makes the firſt inhabitants; ſo that the name of Laconia is poſterior to it according to him. It was afterwards called Oebalia from Oebalus the ſixth from Eurotas. It had alſo the name of Hecatompolis from the hundred cities which it is ſaid once to have had (3). It is now called Tzaconia.

(3) Vid. Strab. Geogr. lib. viii.

yield to the ſuperior power of the Lacedæmonians, eſpecially after the Ephori had ſo far clipped the royal prerogative, and enſlaved the people, that they were glad to make war a trade, and to fall foul upon all thoſe neighbouring ſtates, rather than live an idle and ſlaviſh life under thoſe upſtart and tyrannic magiſtrates.

As all the ſouth part of this kingdom was incompaſſed by the ſea, and the eaſt and north-eaſt part by the Argolic bay, it had a great number of promontories, the chief of which were thoſe of Malea and Tanara (C), now Capo Malio and Capo Matapan. Theſe two, being ſituate on the Mediterranean, form the large Laconian gulph which lies between them, and is now called the Golfo de Colochina, into which the famed river Eurotas, mentioned a little higher, and now better known by the name of Baſilipotamo, vulgarly Vaſilipotamo, or royal river, diſcharges her waters with an eaſy and gentle courſe.

Sea-ports.

ALL the ſea-coaſts of Laconia were likewiſe furniſhed with a conſiderable number of ſea-ports, towns, and commodious harbours. The greateſt and moſt convenient were thoſe of Trinaſſus and Acria, ſituate on each ſide of the mouth of the Eurotas and Gythium, at a ſmall diſtance from Trinaſſus. This laſt, Pauſanias tells us, had the remains of a caſtle ſtill ſtanding, which might be at firſt built to guard the mouth of that river, which was navigable quite up to Sparta, if not beyond. Gythium was famous, according to the tradition of its inhabitants, for having been built by Apollo and Hercules (D); but the moſt noted

(C) This cape, which juts out a great way into the ſea, had two ports, one named Achilleus, and the other Pſamatheus. Here was alſo the famous temple of Neptune built in form of a grotto, falſely ſuppoſed by the poets to be the paſſage out of which Hercules brought out Pluto's dog Cerberus, ſince there is no ſubterranean place under it; but what ſeems to have given riſe to this fancy was, that here was bred a moſt dreadful ſerpent, whoſe bite was ſo mortal, that it was thence called hell-hound, and which was afterwards killed by Hercules, and carried by him to Euryſtheus (4).

(D) They pretend, that theſe two, having diſputed a long while about a tripod, and at length amicably ended their quarrel, agreed to build this city at their common charge, for which reaſon the inhabitants of it pretend themſelves not to be ſprung from mortal men, and had the ſtatues of thoſe two gods in their market place, as of the authors of their origin (5).

(4) Id. ibid. Pauſan. Mela, &c. (5) Pauſan. ubi ſupra.

noted of all Epidaurus, now Malveſia, ſeated on the gulph of Argos, now Golfo de Neapolis, a town well built and well peopled, and famed among other things for its excellent wine called Malveſy, or Malmeſy, which grew round the neighbourhood of it, and with which it ſupplied other parts of Greece. There were about twelve more ſea-port towns along the Laconian coaſts, and what made theſe ſtill more famed, was a kind of ſhell-fiſh caught in that neighbourhood, whoſe blood was of excellent uſe for the dying of purple, and was inferior to none except that which was caught in the Red-Sea [h].

INLAND towns did likewiſe abound in this kingdom, the moſt conſiderable of which was Sparta the metropolis, called alſo improperly Lacedæmon, and ſituate upon the river Eurotas, at about thirty miles diſtance from the mouth of it. This city, if not founded, was at leaſt beautified, by Lacedæmon the firſt king of it. The next for antiquity and grandeur was Amyclæ, built by Amyclas the ſon of Lacedæmon, and famed afterwards for the birth of Caſtor and Pollux the ſons of Tyndareus, eighth king of Lacedæmon, and diſtant about eighteen miles from the metropolis. It was afterwards famed for ſending a conſiderable colony of its own inhabitants into upper Calabria, who built there a city which they called by the ſame name. This city was afterwards deſtroyed by the Dorians, and turned into an inconſiderable hamlet, in which, however, there were ſeen ſome of the ruins of its ancient grandeur. One of the fineſt buildings that eſcaped the common ruin was the temple and ſtatue of Alexandra, whom the inhabitants pretended to be the ſame with Caſſandra the daughter of Priam. 3. Helos, ruined by the Spartans (E). 4. Thulana, near to which is the famous lake

Cities of note.

[h] Pauſan. in Laconic. ch. xxi.

(E) Theſe people, whoſe city had been built by Helius the ſon of Perſeus, had a worſe fate than any of the reſt. For having refuſed to pay the tribute impoſed upon them by Agis, the third king of the Heraclidæan line, the Lacedæmonians fell upon them with an army, took them priſoners, reduced them to the loweſt and moſt miſerable ſlavery, and, to complete all, made a law, which forbid their maſters either giving them their liberty, or ſelling them into other countries (6).

(6) Strab. ubi ſupra, p. 363. & 365.

lake of Lerna, where Hercules ſlew the Hydra. 5. Leuctrum, upon the bay of Meſſenia and ſituate near the ſea. We find two other cities of this name, one in Arcadia, and the other in Achaia; but this was the moſt remarkable of the three [i].

MOUNTAINS they had in great number, the country was divided from Meſſenia by one ridge of them, and from Arcadia by another; and this latter was a very long one [k], beſides thoſe which were in the heart of it. The greateſt part of them, however, were more celebrated for ſome fabulous exploits of their gods and heroes, than for any thing elſe they were remarkable for, and may therefore be paſt by. Rivers of note, beſides the Eurotas abovementioned, were the Smenus, which had its head near the foot of the mountain Taygeta, and thence empties itſelf into the ſea, and whoſe waters are famed for their ſweetneſs and pleaſantneſs. The Thiaſus, ſaid to have had its name from the daughter of Eurotas. The Scyras, where Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles landed, after he came from Scyros to marry Hermione. This river, having till then no name, was from thenceforth called Scyras. We omit ſome others of leſs note.

Soil. THE ſoil was very rich, eſpecially in the low and flat grounds, and their being ſo well watered by rivers, and from the mountains, made it excellent for paſture-ground; but their being ſo overthwarted with hills and mountains, hindered them from being ſo well tilled as they might have otherwiſe been. But the country was much better ſituated for trade and navigation, by having the ſea round above half the kingdom, and ſo many fair havens upon it. How well they improved theſe advantages, how powerful they became, and what noble fleets they entertained, and brave experienced admirals they bred, will be ſeen in the ſequel of their hiſtory. The truth is, the Lacedæmonians were a brave couragious people, hardy, and inured to the trade of war both by ſea and land, averſe to ſloth and luxury, jealous of their honour and liberty, as well as of their neighbours power; they were wanting in no civil or military diſcipline, in order to ſecure the one and curb the other. And by theſe means it was, that they became ſo powerful, and made ſo conſiderable a figure in Greece [l].

THEIR

[i] De his Vid. Pauſan. ibid. & Byzant, ſub voce. [k] Mela. lib. ii. c. 4. & alib. Strab. ubi ſupra. [l] Vid. Thucydid. l. ii. Pauſan in Laconic. Plutarch. in Lycurg. Diodor. Sicul. &c.

THEIR government was like all others originally monarchical. Their kings had indeed ſome magiſtrates under them, whoſe advice and council they made uſe of upon all emergent occaſions; but as theſe were choſen by the prince and might be turned out at pleaſure, they ſeldom had courage enough to contradict him in any thing, ſo that his will was ſtill the ſupreme law. In this manner it paſſed through a ſucceſſion of twelve princes from Lacedæmon, the ſon-in-law of Eurotas and founder of this monarchy. Not indeed conſtantly in the male-line, which being extinct in Caſtor and Pollux the ſons of Tyndareus their ſeventh monarch, it paſſed to Menelaus, then king or Meſſenia, in right of his wife Helena Tyndareus's daughter. From him it paſſed to his ſons by a former wife, after which it returned again to the deſcendants of Helena, in Oreſtes the ſon of Agamemnon, whoſe ſon Tiſamenes, being outed by the Heraclidæ, went and reigned in Achaia, leaving the kingdom of Lacedæmon to the ſons of Ariſtodemus, Euryſthenes and Procles. For though ſome have placed their father at the head of the Herculean liſt, yet it is more likely, that he had been dead before they had finiſhed the conqueſt of this kingdom, if not even before they entered into Peloponneſus (F). Government.

HOWEVER, whether under him, or his twin-ſons, Euryſthenes and Procles (G), abovementioned, the govern-

(F) We have already taken notice, that this prince, who was the ſon of Ariſtomachus and brother to Creſphontes and Temenus is ſaid to have been killed by lightning at Naupactus in Ætolia, whilſt their navy was getting ready for this expedition; here it was that he left his twin-ſons Euryſthenes and Procles, whom he had by Argea the daughter of Auteſion (7) his ſucceſſors, both to the expedition and to all the conqueſts they ſhould make in it.

Pauſanias ſays, he was killed by the ſons of Pylades and Electra, who were couſin-germans to Tiſamenes the ſon of Oreſtes, before this expedition. And the Lacedæmonians pretended, that Apollo had ſhot him to death at Delphos, becauſe he came thither, not to conſult the oracle, but to adviſe with Hercules, who was there at that time, about the means of invading Peloponneſus; ſo that upon the whole it appears, that he was dead ſome time before the conqueſt of that peninſula by the Heraclidæ.

(G) This laſt is ſometimes called Procles, and ſometimes Protocles by Strabo, Plutarch calls him Patrocles; but Herodotus, Apollodorus, Cicero, and Pauſanias, always call him Procles; it ment took a quite new form, and inſtead of one ſovereign became ſubject to two. For theſe two brothers did not divide the kingdom between them, as had been done at Argos, Meſſenia, Arcadia, and elſewhere; neither did they agree to reign alternately, as Eteocles and Polynices had done at Thebes; but, whether purſuant to their father's will, or by virtue of ſome mutual contract, they reſolved to govern jointly, and with equal power and authority; both bearing the title of king of Lacedæmon, and both being acknowledged and obeyed as ſuch. Pauſanias adds, that the Delphic oracle being conſulted about this new form of government, the pythoneſs did not make any objection againſt it [m]. What is ſtill more ſurpriſing is, that this biarchy, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, did not end with thoſe two brothers, though, from their mutual jealouſy and antipathy, one would hardly have expected it to have outlived even them, but continued in this condition under a bipartite ſucceſſion of thirty princes of the line of Euryſthenes, and twenty-ſeven of that of Procles, and ended in both near about the ſame time (H).

But, though this title and ſucceſſion continued thus long in thoſe two lines, yet was the power and authority ſoon curtailed, through the diſcords which muſt inevitably have reigned between them. Euryſthenes was ſucceeded by his ſon Agis, from whom all the deſcendants of that line were ſirnamed Agidæ, as the other line took the name of Eurytionidæ from Eurytion the grandſon of Procles. Theſe two ſoon came to divide themſelves into two diſtinct parties, under which the people, who are not always the dupes of thoſe that govern them, did liſt themſelves according as their affection or intereſt led them; and this obliged their heads to court them, by largeſſes, by ſome new privileges, and other ſuch-like condeſcenſions, which though they ſerved the preſent purpoſe, yet could not but prove in the end prejudicial to the royal prerogative. This the Lacedæmonians ſoon perceived, and being become conſcious how impoſſible it would be for either ſide to hold the [m] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. c. i.

it is likely, this difference is owing to the inadvertency of copyiſts, ſome of whom were uſed to abridge words and names, and others to write them at length.

(H) When Cleomenes III. the laſt of the firſt line, having killed his copartner Eurydamidas, was ſhortly after vanquiſhed by Antigonus, as ſhall be ſeen in the following chapter.

the reins of government under ſuch diſadvantageous circumſtances; they became the haughtier and more inſolent, as they found their affection and aſſiſtance neceſſary to either competitor. This gave birth to freſh complaints, murmurs, and every pretence or ſtratagem, which did but weaken the regal power. The conſequence of all this was, that the people, inſtead of becoming more tractable by any conceſſion, grew the more turbulent and headſtrong, taking every advantage they could againſt thoſe, who, thro' either their eaſy nature, or neceſſity, were glad to court their affection, and vexing and blackning thoſe, who had courage enough to curb and uſe them with any ſeverity. By theſe diviſions the regal dignity was brought into ſuch contempt, that the government was upon the brink of falling into anarchy and confuſion, when the great Lycurgus took the reins of it, during ſome part of his nephew Charilaus's minority.

THIS great patriot and lawgiver was the ſon of Polydectes, the ſixth king of the Eurytionian line, but by a ſecond wife. However, his elder brother dying without children, the right of ſucceſſion remained in him, and he accordingly took the adminiſtration upon him, waiting, however, to ſee, whether his ſiſter-in-law was with child. This princeſs finding herſelf pregnant, acquainted him with it privately, and with a promiſe that if he would marry her, ſhe would take ſome effectual method to deſtroy the embryo. Lycurgus, though ſhocked at the propoſal, yet gave her ſome diſtant hopes that he would comply with it, but withal uſed all proper means to prevent her miſcarying, till the time of her delivery was come, when he ſent for ſome perſons of note to be preſent at her labour. She was ſoon after brought to-bed of a ſon, the news of which being ſent to him whilſt he was at ſupper with ſome noble Spartans, he came immediately, and taking the child in his arms, ſaid to thoſe who were preſent, This is your king, laid him on a chair of ſtate, and gave him the name of Charilaus. This generous action did not, however, ſatisfy all the Spartans; the incenſed queen, by the help of her brother Leonidas, perſuaded many of them, that he was only acting a game in order to ſeize and make himſelf the more ſure of the crown by the death of the young prince. To prevent therefore ſo vile an inſinuation, and ſo far from his intention, from gaining credit, Lycurgus withdrew himſelf into a voluntary exile, from which he returned not till Charilaus was married, and had had a ſon to ſucceed him. This laſt action having at once put an end to all thoſe unjuſt ſurmiſes which had been raiſed by his enemies, and procured him the eſteem of all thoſe that wiſhed well to their country; he met with leſs difficulty in the proſecution of his more glorious deſign of new-modelling the government. Another circumſtance which facilitated this change was, that during his abſence, ſuch depravity of manners and corruption in the government had crept into that miſerable ſtate, that not only his friends, but even thoſe who had been his moſt zealous enemies, were glad to repeat their embaſſies, to entreat him to come back and ſave his country from ruin [n].

THESE were the inevitable conſequences of that fatal diviſion of the regal authority between two competitors, which, however, Lycurgus took a quite different method of remedying, than by confining it again to either of the lines, which might have proved too dangerous a taſk. He contented himſelf therefore with reducing their authority, by conſtituting a ſenate endowed with the ſupreme power in all civil matters, and leaving to the kings, beſides the title and honour, only the management of military and religious affairs, as ſhall be ſhewn in the next chapter, in which we ſhall give a more particular account of the form of government which he eſtabliſhed, the body of laws which he framed, and the extraordinary method which he took to give both a ſure and laſting ſanction.

THUS was the Spartan monarchy changed into a commonwealth, after it had continued in the line of Lacedæmon 610 years, that is, from the year of the world 2290, in which we place the building of Sparta according to the chronology we have hitherto followed, to its becoming ſubject to the Heraclidæ about A. M. 2900, and continued in the double line of theſe laſt during ſeven reigns, making in all about 280 years more. In the following liſt therefore of thoſe kings, we ſhall begin it only from Lacedæmon the ſon-in-law of Eurotas, who may be properly looked upon as the founder of that ſtate. As to his ſuppoſed predeceſſors, Lelex, Myles, and Eurotas, we ſhall content ourſelves with having mentioned them in the beginning of this ſection.

AND as for thoſe of the Herculean family, who reigned after the change of government made by Lycurgus, beſides that they are all out of our epoch, they are more to be [n] Vide Auct. ſup. citat.

be looked upon as generals of the Lacedæmonian army, than as royal ſovereigns, and conſequently their names need not be mentioned here.

A List of the royal Lacedæmonian line.

1 Lacedæmon
2 Amyclas
3 Argalus
4 Cynorta
5 Œbalus
6 Hippocoon
7 Tyndareus his brother
8 Caſtor and Pollux
9 Menelaus
10 Nicoſtratus and Megapenthes
11 Oreſtes the ſon of Agamemnon
12 Tiſamenes

The Herculean line.

1 Euryſthenes
2 Agis
3 Echeſtratus
4 Labotas
5 Doryſſus
6 Ageſilaus
7 Archelaus

1 Procles
2 Sous
3 Eurytion
4 Prytanis
5 Eunomus
6 Polydectes
7 Charilaus

1. Concerning Lacedæmon, we know little more beſides what we mentioned at the beginning of this ſection, except that he built a temple to two of the graces whom he called Phaenna and Clete, celebrated by an ancient poet [o], and that his deſcendants raiſed a ſtately monument to him near the town of Aleſies, where Myles is ſaid to have found the firſt mule.

2. Amyclas his ſucceſſor is ſtill more unknown (I), except [o] Alcman. ap. Pauſan. Lacon. c. xviii.

(I) The fable ſays, that of all the ſons he had, he was moſt exceſſively fond of Hyacinthus the youngeſt, becauſe he excelled all the reſt in beauty, inſomuch, that Apollo and Zephyrus became enamoured with him at the ſame time. Apollo being one day at play, unfortunately ſlew him with a quoit, and from his blood cauſed the flower of his name to ſpring up.

His diſconſolate father erected a ſtately tomb with his ſtatue, both which outlived the ruin of that city, and appointed a feaſt to be kept in memory of him. Ovid in his metamorphoſes makes this youth the ſon of OEbalus; but Pauſanias, who had ſeen his monument, ſays he was the ſon of Amyclas (8).

(8) Lacon. c. i, & xix.

cept for building the city of his name, mentioned a little higher, concerning which there goes a ſtory, that, whether by reaſon of its ſituation, or any other cauſe, it was ſo ſubject to frequent and ſtrange noiſes as of enemies comeing upon them, when there was really nothing like it, that the Amycleans made a law, that none ſhould dare to alarm the town upon any ſuch occaſion. The Dorians, taking the advantage of it, came upon them on a ſudden and took the town; and hence came the old proverb, I will ſpeak, knowing how the the Amycleans were ruined for holding their peace; and the old ſaying of Amyclas vivere, was uſed to ſignify to ſee, and hear, and ſay nothing. The people of this city became afterwards famous likewiſe for their ſtrict adherence to the Pythagorean doctrine, which forbids the killing of any living creature, and which they did ſo ſtrictly keep, that they forbore the deſtroying them. We have very little left concerning Amyclas's three ſucceſſors, Argalus, Cynorta, and Œbalus, except that this laſt gave his name to a canton of Lacedæmonia, which he had either conquered, or which he divided afterwards from the reſt, and gave to his ſon Hippocoon, whilſt the reſt of the kingdom was aſſigned to his other ſon Tyndareus. Œbalus married Gorgophone the daughter of Perſeus, by whom he had this Tyndareus, to whom he left the kingdom; but his brother, who reigned in Œbalia, came ſoon after and deprived him of it.

WHILST Hippocoon reigned in Sparta, Hercules happened to come thither to be expiated for the murder of Iphitus. Hercules, it ſeems, after having put away Megara, went to Œchalia, where he won Iole the daughter of Eurytus king of that country, at ſhooting againſt him and his ſons, an exerciſe which that king always propoſed to thoſe who came to court his daughter. But the king and his ſons, remembering how he had uſed Megara, refuſed to give Iole to him, in revenge of which affront he drove away Eurytus's horſes, and taking his ſon Iphitus, who was ordered to go in ſearch of them, up the top of a high tower, under pretence of ſhewing him where they were, threw him down headlong and killed him. Hippocoon therefore and all his ſons did ſtoutly oppoſe his being expiated, becauſe they thought the action too black to deſerve ſuch a favour [p], and Hercules ſtayed only for an opportunity of being revenged on him for his refuſal.

HE

[p] Id. ibid. c. xv.

He did not wait long for it; for a firſt couſin of his, named Œonus, who was come with him to Sparta, walking one day along the ſtreets of that city, paſt by chance before the houſe of Hippocoon, out of which a maſtiff came and flew upon him. Œonus flung a ſtone at him, which being perceived by Hippocoon's ſons, they ruſhed out upon him with cudgels in their hands and beat him to death. There wanted no more to rouſe the fury of that ſanguine hero, he fell upon them with what men he had about him, but, being wounded in the ſcuffle, he was forced to retire, but came not long after with a ſtrong reinforcement, and gave them battle, killed Hippocoon and ten of his ſons, beſides a great number of Lacedæmonians; and having taken the metropolis, he recalled Tyndareus, and left the kingdom, which was now become his conqueſt, to that baniſhed monarch in truſt for his own poſterity, as we have elſewhere hinted (K).

Tynda-

(K) Hercules, having ſucceeded ſo well in this expedition, is reported to have built a temple to Juno, becauſe ſhe had not thwarted him in it, as ſhe had formerly done upon all occaſions, and for want of a better victim offered up a goat, from which ſhe was afterwards worſhipped by the Lacedæmonians under the name of Juno Ægophage, or Goat-eater, and that creature became the conſtant victim which they offered to her there (9).

His laſt exploit, and with which this is a proper place to finiſh the hiſtory of that renowned hero, was againſt Eurytus, who retained, as he thought, unjuſtly Iole from him. He went therefore againſt him, ſlew him and his ſons, and carried off his daughter with him. Coming ſoon after to the Cenæan promontory in Eubœa, to offer ſome ſacrifice there, he ſent his ſervant Lychas to Trachin, to his wife Dejanira for the ſhirt and coat in which he uſed to perform that ceremony.

This princeſs had ſome time before been attempted by the centaur Neſſus, as he was ferrying her over the river Euenus, and Hercules, beholding it from the ſhore, had given him a mortal wound with an arrow. The monſter finding himſelf dying, adviſed her to mix ſome oyl with the blood which flowed from his wound, and to anoint her husband's ſhirt with it, pretending, that it would infallibly ſecure him from loving any other woman; and ſhe, too well appriſed of his inconſtancy, had actually prepared the poiſoned ointment accordingly (10).

Lychas, coming to her for the garments, unfortunately acquainted her with his having brought away Iole, and ſhe, in a fit of jealouſy, failed not to anoint his ſhirt with the fatal mixture, which had no ſooner touched his body, than he felt the poiſon diffuſe it

ſelf

Tyndareus, or, as he is otherwiſe called, Tyndarus, more glad to accept the Lacedæmonian kingdom upon any conditions, than ſollicitous about the performance of them, was no ſooner reſeated upon his throne, than he began to find out means to ſecure it to himſelf and deſcendants againſt the Heraclidæ. He had two brave ſons by his wife Leda, Caſtor and Pollux, and two daughters, the famous Helena and Clytemneſtra, whoſe ſtrange birth, as is fabled by the poets, the reader may find in the margin (L). Helen's ſelf through all his veins; the violent pain of which cauſed him to diſband his army and to return to Trachin. His torment ſtill encreaſing, he ſent to conſult the oracle for a cure, and was anſwered, that he ſhould cauſe himſelf to be conveyed to mount Oeta, and there rear up a great pile of wood, and leave the reſt to Jupiter,

By that time he had obeyed the oracle, his pains being become intolerable, he dreſſed himſelf in his martial habit, flung himſelf upon the pile, and deſired the by-ſtanders to ſet fire to it; others ſay, that he left the charge of it to his ſon Philoctetes, who, haveing performed his fathers commands, had his bow and arrows given him as a reward for his obedience.

At the ſame time, Jupiter, to be as good as his word, ſent a flaſh of lightening which conſumed both the pile and the hero, inſomuch, that Iolaus, coming to take up his bones, found nothing but aſhes, from which they took up the notion that he was paſſed from earth to heaven, and was joined to the gods. A fit ſon indeed for ſuch a father, and a fitter god for ſuch votaries, who could deify, raiſe altars and temples, offer ſacrifices, and inſtitute feaſts to a mortal, who had ſullied his beſt actions with ſo many murders, rapes, and adulteries. Hercules bequeathed Iole to his ſon Hyllus; as for Dejanira, ſhe hanged her ſelf as ſoon as ſhe was appriſed of the fatal effects of the pretended philtre.

(L) The fable goes, that Jupiter having had an amorous intrigue with her in the ſhape of a ſwan, ſoon after her matrimonial commerce with her husband, the reſult of theſe amphibious embraces was, that ſhe was brought to bed of two eggs, out of one of which came Pollux and Helena, and out of the other Caſtor and Clytemneſtra; whence Caſtor, as Tyndareus's ſon, was mortal, but Pollux, as the ſon of Jupiter, is ſaid to have been immortal, and to have divided his immortality with his brother.

The Greeks, however, according to Pauſanias (11), pretended, that Helena was the daughter of Nemeſis, and that Leda was only her nurſe, and brought her up as her own, but this is a piece of Grecian mythology not worth diſputing.

(11) In Lacon. c. xv.

len's fatal beauty had cauſed her to be ſtolen away by Theſeus, as we have ſeen before, and after ſhe was recovered by her two brothers, Tyndareus, ſtill afraid leſt ſhe ſhould be carried off again, had obliged all her ſuitors by an oath to leave it to her to make choice of the man ſhe liked, and that in caſe ſhe ſhould be ſtolen by any other, they would all join their forces to bring her back to her huſband. She choſe ſoon after Menelaus the ſon of Atreus, after which ſhe being ſtolen away again by Paris, her huſband, encouraged by his brother Agamemnon, challenged all thoſe princes, who had been her admirers, to the performance of their promiſe, and engaged them to the Trojan war, of which we have ſpoken at length in a former chapter.

Tyndareus, vexed at the incontinency of his two daughters, (for Helena was carried off by her own conſent, and Clytemneſtra, as we have ſeen elſewhere, not only lived in adultery during her huſband's abſence, but murdered him immediately after his return) is ſaid to have built a temple to Venus (M), and erected a ſtatue of cedar to that goddeſs, with a veil over her face and chains about her legs, either, as ſome think, to expoſe her as the cauſe of their unlawful love, or, as Pauſanias thinks, to intimate to poſterity the indiſſoluble tie of wedlock [q]. He began likewiſe to build a ſtately temple to Minerva, whom he ſirnamed Poliuchos, or guardian of the city, but died before he could finiſh it, and left both that work and his kingdom to his two ſons, after he had reigned about forty years [r].

8. Caſtor and Pollux went on with the building, deſigning to have enriched it with the ſpoils of the city Aphidne, out of which they had reſcued their ſiſter Helene, but left it likewiſe imperfect. The Lacedæmonians did afterwards build a new one in that place which was of maſſive braſs, from which it was called Chalciæcos. Theſe two heroes likewiſe ſignalized themſelves in the Argonautic expedition, and when they came home, they built a temple to Minerva Aſia, in acknowledgment of their ſucceſs

[q] Lacon. c. xvi. [r] Ch. xvii.

(M) Pauſanias adds, that this temple, which himſelf ſaw, was built after a particular manner, being rather two temples reared the one upon the other, the upper of which was called Morpho, which is but another name of Venus (11), and ſignifies form or figure, implying, that ſhe was the goddeſs of beauty.

ceſs and ſafe return from Colchis, from which they are alſo ſaid to have brought away a famous ſtatue of Mars. They had likewiſe a bloody combat with the ſons of Aphareus, Ida and Lyncæus, the latter of whom is ſaid to have had ſuch piercing eyes, that he could ſee even into the trunk of a tree (N). The occaſion of their quarrel is variouſly reported, Theocritus ſays, that they had ſtolen the daughters of Leucipus the brother of Aphareus, but Pauſanias and Pindar ſay, it was only about a herd of oxen. However, in this combat Pollux killed Lyncæus, and Ida was ſtruck dead with lightening. The remainder of their exploits is too fabulous to deſerve a place here, we ſhall give a ſpecimen of them in the margin (O) [s].

9. Menelaus

[s] De his vid. Plutarch. in Theſeo. Diod. Apollod. & Pauſan.

(N) Hence the ſaying of Lyncæan eyes, and Pindar tells us, that he could diſcover Caſtor hid in the trunk of a tree from mount Taygetus (12).

(O) Theſe two famous brothers are celebrated by the ancient poets under ſeveral names, ſuch as Anactes, from the Greek Ανακ which ſignifies a king or prince, ſuch as were originally all the Heathen gods. Ambulii, moſt probable likewiſe from the Greek Αμβολιη, procraſtination, delay, to imply their lengthening of life. Jupiter is alſo called by that name. They were alſo called Apherei, as ſuppoſed to preſide over the liſts; but the name they were moſt commonly known by was that of Dioſcuri, from Διος and κουροι, becauſe they were reputed the ſons of Jupiter.

They are reported to have cleared the country of robbers, and the ſea of pirates, and from this laſt they were worſhipped as gods of the ſea, and are ſaid to have appeared to mariners in ſtorms, and the notion was, that if only one was ſeen, it betokened ſhipwreck, but if both together, it was taken for a good omen.

They are likewiſe ſaid to have appeared at land upon ſeveral occaſions: they once facilitated the eſcape of the Lacedæmonians under their king Anaxander, when they were cloſely purſued, and likely to be cut in pieces, by Ariſtomenes and his Meſſenian troops. At another time they came to the very houſe where they had lived when upon earth, and begged of Phormio, who was then in poſſeſſion of it, to take them in for that night, pretending they were ſtrangers come from Cyrene. They asked moreover to lie in one particular chamber, which they had been formerly fond of; but Phormio told them, that the whole houſe was at their ſervice, except that chamber, in which was a young woman whom he

(12) Nemeen. Ode 10.

9. Menelaus the ſon of Atreus ſucceeded them in the kingdom in right of his wife. We have ſpoken of the war which her rape occaſioned, and the ſucceſs of it in a former chapter. At their return from the Trojan war, being, upon ſome difference, parted from his brother Agamemnon, after having weathered many violent ſtorms, he arrived ſafely in Egypt with his wife Helene, whither Homer tells us he was driven by contrary winds. Herodotus gives us a quite different account of his going into Egypt, and gives us his reaſons for it; but as it contradicts moſt of the ancient poets and hiſtorians, we ſhall relate it in the margin (P). Menelaus was ſucceeded by his two ſons by a former wife, or rather by a ſlave, namely, he kept. They ſeemingly agreed to accept of any other apartment, but on the morrow, both the young women and thoſe that waited upon her were gone as well as the gueſts, and nothing found in her chamber but the two ſtatues of the Dioſcuri, and a table with ſome ſweet gums upon it (13).

10. Nico-

The fable adds, that when Caſtor died, his brother Pollux, who was immortal, prayed to Jupiter that he might ſhare his immortality with him, which being granted, they are ſaid to have lived and died by turns, and to have been at length transformed into the ſign Gemini, of which two of the ſtars are called by their names, and one of which goes down when the other riſes.

(P) He tells us, upon the credit of the Egyptian prieſts, that as Paris was carrying off that fatal beauty, they were driven by contrary winds upon the coaſts of Egypt, where he was accuſed of the theft by ſome of his ſervants, who went and took ſanctuary in the temple of Hercules. Proteus, then king of the country, having examined the ſtory, detained the woman and the goods ſhe had brought with her till her husband came to demand them, and let the raviſher go as being a ſtranger.

When therefore the confederate Greeks, who were ignorant of this, came to demand her of the Trojans, and were anſwered that ſhe was left in Egypt, they believed it a mere pretence, and carried on the ſiege; but when the city was taken, and ſhe not found in it, then Menelaus went to demand her of the Egyptian king.

What inclined our author to believe that this was the real truth of the ſtory is, as he tells us, that if Helene had really been in Troy, it had been madneſs in Priam to have ſacrificed that noble city, and the lives of ſo many noble Trojans, only to defend Paris in the poſſeſſion of another man's wife, ſince he was neither heir to (13) Pauſan. ubi ſupra. c. xvi.

10. Nicoſtratus and Megapenthes, but the Lacedæmonians, unwilling to ſubmit themſelves to a ſpurious offspring, Oreſtes eaſily obtained the kingdom, and without any blood-ſhed.

11. Oreſtes, the ſon of Agamemnon king of Meſſenia, came to the Lacedæmonian crown in right of his mother Clytemneſtra, the other daughter of Tyndareus. We have already mentioned in the hiſtory of that kingdom, how he revenged his father's murder on his faithleſs mother and her paramour, and aſcended the Meſſenian throne *. He was, however, accuſed of that parricide, not, indeed, by his grandfather Tyndareus, who muſt have been dead long before, but by his uncle Perilaus, the ſon of Icarius, and couſin-german, and conſequently the neareſt relation, of Clytemneſtra. He it was who cited him before the great Athenian court called Areopagus, after he had recovered his ſenſes. What their ſentence was, our author doth not inform us [t], but tells us elſewhere, that he had ſeen an old building which was called Oreſtes's manſion, in which he was forced to live ſeparate from the reſt of mankind, except that they took care to ſupply him with food and other neceſſaries, till he had quite expiated his crime [u]. He died and was buried in Arcadia, whither the oracle adviſed him to retire, as we have ſeen in a former ſection.

12. Tiſamenes, the ſon of Oreſtes by Hermione the daughter of Menelaus and Helena, ſucceeded him both in this kingdom and thoſe of Argos and Meſſenia, and was ſoon after outed out of all by the Heraclidæ, who, having by this time invaded Peloponneſus, claimed the latter, as being of the line of Perſeus, and he only of that of Pelops; and the former, becauſe Hercules, having conquered it from Hippocoon, had only left it in truſt with Tyndareus, as we have lately ſeen. What became of Tiſamenes is variouſly reported, ſome ſay he was killed as he was defending the kingdom of Argos [w]; others, and with more probability, ſay, he eſcaped into Achaia and reigned there; ſome to the kingdom, nor equal in worth to many of thoſe that fell in the defence of that city (14).

* See vol, v. ch. 17. ſect. 3. [t] Pauſan. Arcad. ch. xxxiv. [u] Id. Corinth. c. xxxi. [w] Apollod. l. ii. c. 8.

(14) Herodot. l. ii. c. 113. & ſeq.

ſome time after which he was killed one of the firſt in a combat againſt the Ionians, and was buried in the city of Helice, whence the Lacedæmonians, by the oracle's advice, afterwards fetched his bones and buried them in Sparta [x]. However that be, Philonomus, betrayed that métropolis to the ſons of Ariſtodemus, who with their forces entered it with the ſound of the flute [y], an inſtrument then reckoned very martial and proper to inſpire the ſoldiers with courage, as well as to keep them in their ranks, for which reaſon the Lacedæmonians made uſe of it from that time, whenever they ſounded to battle [z].

Euryſthenes and Procles having thus obtained the kingdom, at firſt divided it into ſix parts, every one of which they endowed with all the privileges of the city of Sparta, where they ſtill kept their reſidence. This, though for the preſent it had the deſired effect of ingratiating themſelves to the Lacedæmonians, yet in the following reigns proved the cauſe of many grievous diſturbances. For Agis, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Euryſthenes, finding, that the people were grown headſtrong by it, endeavoured to curb them, not only by depriving ſeveral cantons of thoſe privileges, but by laying a tribute upon all the Lacedæmonians. They did indeed all ſubmit to it, except the Helots, who were made a ſevere example to the reſt; but theſe ſeverities failed not to alienate the affections of the people from him.

On the other hand, his copartner Sous the ſon of Procles, a valiant and warlike prince, gained their eſteem by his bravery and new conqueſts. We have an inſtance of his conduct recorded very much to his honour, which is as follows; that prince being beſieged by the Chlorians in a dry ſtony place, where his army ſuffered very much for want of water; he was at length reduced to make a treaty with the enemy, by which he obliged himſelf to reſtore to them all the places he had taken from them, upon condition that he and all his men ſhould drink of a ſpring at a ſmall diſtance from his camp. After the mutual ratifications of the treaty on both ſides, Sous, having called his ſoldiers together, offered the kingdom to him that would forbear drinking; but they being all oppreſſed with exceſſive thirſt, not one could be tempted to accept his offer upon that condition. As ſoon therefore as he had ſeen them drink their fill of water, he took took ſome of it in the hollow of his hand, and ſprinkled his face with it without drinking one drop, and marched off in the face of the enemy. The conſequence of which was, that his abſtinence having made the contract void, ſeeing he and all his men had not drank at the ſpring, he could ſafely refuſe to reſign his conqueſts to them [a].

[x] Vid. Pauſan. Achaic. c. i. & Strab. Geogr. l. viii. [y] Strab. ibid. [z] Polyæn. Stratagem. l. i. c. 10.

Agis, from whom the deſcendants of that line had the name of Agidæ, or Agiadæ, for they are indifferently called by both, was ſucceeded by his ſon Echeſtratus, and Sous, not long after, by his ſon Eurytion, otherwiſe alſo called Eurypon and Euryphon; from him this line, which had till then took the name of Proclidæ, exchanged it for that of Eurytionidæ or Eurypontidæ, &c. In this reign, ſome ſeeds of diſcord between the Lacedæmonians and Argives began to appear, which were, however, ſtifled by the prudence of thoſe two monarchs. The Cynoſureans, who were a colony of Argives, and ſettled in the neighbourhood of that kingdom by Cynoſurus the ſon of Perſeus, were complained againſt by the Argives, for not only ſuffering a parcel of banditti to ravage their frontiers, but likewiſe for doing the ſame themſelves, and ſometimes leading their plundering troops as far as their metropolis. For this the Lacedæmonians baniſhed all the Cynoſureans that were able to bear arms out of their territories, and by that ſeverity not only prevented all ſuch ravages for ſome time, but reſtored a good underſtanding between the Argives and them.

But this peaceful diſpoſition did not laſt but till the next reign, when Labotas (Q), the ſon of Echeſtratus, and Prytanis, the ſon of Eurytion, declared war againſt them. The ground of it was, that though the Lacedæmonians poſſeſſed the town and territories of Cynoſura, by right of their late conqueſt, yet the Argives were ſtill incroaching upon ſome part of it, and endeavoured to withdraw their confederates from their alliance and friendſhip. It doth not appear, however,

[a] Plutarch. in Lycurg. vid. & Apothegm. Laconic. ap. Hind. ubi ſupra. [b] Pauſan. Meurs. &c. [c] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. c. ii. & iii.

(Q) Herodotus, who calls him Leobatus, tells us in his hiſtory of Crœſus, that the great Lycurgus had been his tutor; but he was certainly out in his chronology, as a learned critic has ſince ſhewn (15), ſince that prince had been dead ſome time before the lawgiver was born.

(15) Meurſ. antiq. Lacedem. ap. Gedoyn. in Pauſan. Lacon.

ever, that this war was of any duration, at leaſt we find not, that any thing remarkable was done on either ſide. After this things continued in a peaceful ſtate, at leaſt with their neighbours abroad, though they grew worſe within doors through the jealouſies and miſunderſtandings of the princes, both between themſelves, and between them and the people. Labotas was ſucceeded by his ſon Doryſſus, and Prytanis by his ſon Eunonus, the former of theſe, as well as his ſon and ſucceſſor Ageſilaus, are by ſome ſaid to have reigned but a ſhort while [d], and yet a modern critic hath proved from the authority of Euſebius and St. Jerom, that the former reigned twenty-nine, and the latter forty-four years [e]. As for Eunonus, he enjoyed a long reign, and lived to a good old age, but was at length ſtabbed, as he was endeavouring to quell a riot, in which the parties were come to blows, and left two ſons behind him, Polydectes by a former, and Lycurgus by a ſecond wife. He was ſucceeded by the former, and he dying ſoon after left the kingdom to Lycurgus, who only kept it till his brother's wife was delivered of a ſon, to whom he immediately reſigned it, and baniſhed himſelf out of Lacedæmon, during which time he meditated that new form of commonwealth into which he afterwards modelled that government.

[d] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. c. ii. Hind. hiſt. Græc l. ii. p. 97.
[e] Meurs. ap. Gedoyn. in loc.

SECT. VIII.

The Hiſtory of the ancient kingdoms of Elis, Ætolia, Locris, Doris, and Achaia.

WE ſhall join theſe ancient kingdoms together in one ſection, becauſe they made but a ſmall figure in the world, in compariſon of thoſe that have gone before, and becauſe they have been either conquered by, or blended with, them; whilſt their being ſo often mentioned in the foregoing ſections, and in the following hiſtory of Greece, will not permit us to paſs them by without taking notice of their ſituation, original, antiquities, and hiſtory, as far as it can be got out of ancient authors, their wars and exploits, and other ſuch particulars, for which they were formerly remarkable and are worth our notice here.

THE

Elis names. THE principal of them is the kingdom of Elis, at firſt peopled, as is reaſonably ſuppoſed, by the deſcendants of Eliſha, the ſon of Javan and grandſon of Japhet [a], if not by Eliſha himſelf, from whom this territory at leaſt, if not the whole peninſula, was called Elis (A), and in the Chaldean Hellas, and by the prophet Ezekiel Eliſha, where he celebrates its fine purple dye [b] (B). According therefore to this ſuppoſition, which is far from improbable, that this country was peopled by that patriarch or ſome of his immediate deſcendants, it was not without good reaſon, that the inhabitants of this country and of Arcadia boaſted themſelves to be Aborigines of Peloponneſus, whereas the others were looked upon as interlopers, which came from more remote parts to ſettle there, and by degrees elbowed them out of the greateſt part of that peninſula [c].

Extent. ELIS was ſituate on the weſtern ſide of Peloponneſus, having the Ionian ſea on that ſide, Arcadia on the eaſt, Achaia on the north, and the bay of Cypariſſos or Chalonites, now Capo di Torneſe, with Meſſenia on the ſouth: its extent from eaſt to weſt was at the wideſt about forty-eight miles, that is, from 22 deg. 10 min. to almoſt 23 deg. eaſt longitude; and from north to ſouth about 60 miles, or from 27 deg. 20 min. to 28 deg. 20 min. north latitude [d].

ITS

[a] Gen. x. 2, & 4. [b] Ch. xxvii. 7. Vid. & Bochart. Phaleg. l. iii. c. 4. [c] Pauſan. Elid. c. i. & ſeq. [d] Conf. Strab. Geogr. l. viii. Mela, l. ii. c. 4. Cluver. Wells, & al.

(A) The poets derive that name from Eleus the ſon of Neptune, whom they make the firſt founder and king of it (1). Pauſanias tells us, that Æthlius, the ſon of Jupiter and Protogenia the daughter of Deucalion, was the firſt who reigned here, and gives ſome other etymons of the word not worth notice, ſince we have a much ancienter one, and clearer from fiction, in the patriarch Eliſha.

(B) It is true, the prophet here ſpeaks of iſles and not of a continent; but we have often ſhewn, that the word in the language of ſcripture doth not ſtrictly imply an iſland, but the maritime countries, eſpecially thoſe about the Mediterranean †;

and

(1) Vid. int. al. Ovid. Metam. & Steph. Byz. ſub voce Ηλις & Gronov. not. in eund. † Vid. ſupra, vol. i. p. 472. & vol. v. p. 384.

Cities.

It chief cities were, 1. Elis, ſituate on the river Peneus, and almoſt in the heart of the kingdom and the metropolis of it. It was famous among many other things for a large ſpacious place called the Xyſtos (C), where the candidates for the olympic games were obliged to initiate themſelves for ſome time by diet, exerciſe, and other ſuch preparatives, before they were admitted to appear on the olympic plains [e]. In this place their ſenate did likewiſe uſe to aſſemble themſelves, and the candidates for all kind of dignities and employments came to give proofs of their abilities and merit. In this city was likewiſe a temple dedicated to Fortune, with the ſtatue of that blind goddeſs of a ſurpriſing bigneſs, and made of wood, covered all over with gold, except the face, hands, and feet. They likewiſe had ſeveral others dedicated to Diana, Minerva, Jupiter, and Bacchus. This laſt deity was held in the greateſt veneration, and the Eleans pretended, that he appeared to them on the day in which his feaſt was celebrated (D).

[e] Pauſan. Elid. c. xxiii.

and we have the teſtimony of ſeveral ancient authors, that the coaſts of Elis, and quite up to the Corinthian bay, were famous for a ſhell-fiſh which they uſed in this die, and in which they exceeded all nations except Egypt (2).

(C) So called from the Greek ξυω, to trim or poliſh. This place was ſurrounded with a wall, and lined on the inſide with plantane-trees of great heighth, to caſt an agreeable ſhade on the courſe. Here Hercules, in order to inure himſelf to hard labour, is ſaid to have ſpent ſome time every day in clearing it from weeds, thorns, and briars. Near the incloſure of this place was a famous cenotaph or monument erected in memory of Achilles, by the advice of the oracle, to which the women uſed to repair about ſun-ſet during the time of the olympic games, and to lament the death of that hero by ſeveral mournful actions, eſpecially by ſmiting upon their breaſts (3).

(D) This feaſt-day they called Thya. The chapel where they celebrated it was about a mile from the city. Thither his prieſts repaired on the night-before, with three empty flaſks which they left there, ſhut up the temple, and ſealed the locks of it, every by-ſtander being permitted to clap his own ſeal to them; and on the

(2) Pauſan. in Laconic. Vid. & Bochart. ubi ſupra. & auctor. ab eo citat. (3) Pauſan. in Elid. c. xxiii.

Elis had likewiſe a citadel, in which was a temple of Minerva, and on the helmet of that goddeſs was carved a cock, becauſe he is ſuppoſed the moſt couragious of all winged creatures [f]. Here was alſo the palace of Augeas one of their kings, and the famous ſtables, the cleanſing of which proved a taſk fit only for the great Hercules (E). †

Olympia.

2. THE city of Olympia was the next in dignity, ſituate on the famous Olympian plains, on which were celebrated the olympic games, inſtituted by Pelops in honour of Jupiter, and, after ſome ſuſpenſion, reſtored again by Atreus and Hercules. They were celebrated every fifth year and during five days, but with much greater ſolemnity, and a vaſter concourſe of people, than any of theſe we have hitherto mentioned; and from them came the computation of time by Olympiads to be introduced in Greece (F). This city is famed likewiſe for its magnificent temple

Olympic games.

[f] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. † See vol. v. ch. 17. ſect. 3. Not. I.

the morrow they returned thither, accompanied with Eleans and ſtrangers, and having firſt ſhewed to them that the gates were ſafe and juſt as they had left them, they opened them and went in, and found the flaſks filled with wine (4).

(E) It is ſaid to have held three thouſand oxen, and to have been thirty years without cleaning, ſo that when Hercules undertook to do it in one day, upon condition that he gave him his daughter in marriage, he only turned the river Alpheus, or Peneus according to others into it, which carried off all the filth in the time prefixed. How that monarch rewarded him for this work we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

(F) This ſolemnity, which had been ſo often interrupted, and renewed again by Endymion, Neleus, Pelias, Lycurgus, and others, but without any ſettled time, was at length reſtored by Iphitus and fixed to be celebrated once every fifth year, ſo that between every celebration four complete years expired, which ſome have miſtaken for five. Hence every four years was called an olympiad, which computation was afterwards obſerved for a conſiderable number of centuries, as well as the ſolemnity of thoſe games during many generations, without any interruption.

The time of celebrating them was at the full of the moon, whoſe change immediately preceded the ſummer ſolſtice. Againſt that time the prieſts of Jupiter Olympus, who belonged to the temple of that deity, were to take care to regulate the form of the

(4) Id. ibid.

ple of Jupiter Olympus, said to have been built from the spoils which the Eleans got from their neighbours the Piseans; in which was a famous statue of that god 50 cubits high, and reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world, near which is also the famous Olympian wood or grove dedicated to the same deity. As for its ancient name of Olympi, it hath long since changed it for that of Sconri. 3. Pisa, situate on the river Alpheus (G), and near the year, and to observe every new moon, especially that after which the solemnity was to be celebrated, and to cause it to be proclaimed. They were likewise intrusted with the registering of the names of all the victors at those games, and recording every material occurrence which happened between every olympiad.

We must, however, observe here, that this exact and ready way of computing by olympiads did not begin immediately after the first of them, but commenced only from the first year of the 28th, in which Chorœbus of Elis obtained the victory in the race, after which the Grecian accounts began to go in a regular order of time, and from that Epocha the times began to be reckoned historical, whereas those which preceded it up to the deluge are called fabulous and heroic, because mixed with fable (5), as those who preceded it were deemed unknown.

(G) This river doth run quite through Arcadia, Elis, and along the city Pisa, soon after which it is swallowed up in the earth. From thence it is supposed to run by a subterranean channel under the sea without mixing with the salt water, and so to pass quite into Sicily, where it mixes itself with the fountain Arethusa near the city of Syracuse, insomuch, that any thing that is thrown into it on the Elis side, is said to come out at the fountain above-named (6). Hence the poetic fiction of Alpheus's love to Arethusa, which tells us, that this last, to avoid his amorous pursuit, hid herself under ground, and that he was forced to do the same in order to get at her by some subterraneous passage, which he at length accomplished near the place where that river and fountain mix their streams.

Pausanias adds, that the Eleans had a law, which condemned any woman to death that should either appear at the olympic games, or even cross this river during that solemnity; and the Eleans add, that the only woman who transgressed it, had disguised herself in the habit of a master or keeper of those games, and conducted her son thither; but when she saw him come off victorious, her joy made her forget her disguise, so that her sex was the mouth of it, ſaid to have been founded by Piſus the grandſon of Æolus, and whoſe inhabitants ſignalized themſelves under Neſtor at the Trojan war. This city was afterwards deſtroyed by the Eleans, becauſe the Piſeans took upon them to celebrate the olympic games by their own authority; for this, the Eleans, jealous of their privilege, raiſed a war againſt them, and after many battles fought, in which they had ſtill the advantage, they took, plundered, and razed their city, and baniſhed its inhabitants.

(5) De his vid. Plutarch. Pausan. Var. Scalig. de Emendat. temp. Potter Arcæholog. Hind. & al. plur. (6) Vid. Diod. Pausan. & al. (7) In Elid. ch. vi.

It were fruitleſs to dive into the chronology of this kingdom, ſince we cannot tell, whether the patriarch, from whom it has its name, was the real founder of it, or ſome of his deſcendants. As to what profane authors ſay of it, it is ſo mixed with fable, that there is no receiving any light from it. However, as this is a fabulous epocha, we ſhall give our readers a ſhort ſketch of what we find about it, which is as follows:

Kings of Elis. Æthlius is pretended to have been the founder of this little monarchy, which was at firſt diſtinct from that of Piſa; this laſt having kings of its own for a conſiderable time. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Endymion, who married Aſterodia, or, according to others, Chromia, the daughter of Itomus and grand-daughter of Amphictyon (H), by whom he had three ſons, Pœon, Epeus, and Ætolus. When theſe were grown up, he promiſed his kingdom to him that ſhould win the prize at the olympic race, and Epeus proved the happy victor. Ætolus. Ætolus, however, ſtayed with him at Elis, but Pœon, unable to brook the loſs of ſuch a noble prize, went to ſeek his fortune elſewhere, and ſettled in that canton on the river Axus, which took from him the name of Pœonia. Epeus went to the ſiege of Troy, and is ſuppoſed to have been the architect of the Trojan horſe. It was in his reign that Pelops the Lydian, or, according to others, the Paphlagonian, came from Aſia, killed Œnomaus king of Piſa, ſeized on his kingdom, and took the city Olympia from the Eleans. Epeus died without male iſſue, and was ſucceeded by his brother Ætolus.

This

was diſcovered. She was, however, ſpared on account of her father, ſon, and huſband, who had gained the olympic prize; but from that time an order was made, that the keeper ſhould appear there naked.

(H) The fabulous poets add, that he was beloved by the moon, and that he had fifty daughters by her.

THIS prince had not reigned long, before he had the misfortune to kill Apis the ſon of Jaſon at the funeral games, which were celebrated on the tomb of Azan king of Arcadia, and was forced to leave Peloponneſus, and went to ſettle in Ætolia, where we ſhall find him in the ſequel. He was ſucceeded by Eleus, who is ſaid to have been the ſon of Neptune, by Eurycyde the only daughter of Endymion, and the father of Augeas, who ſucceeded him in the kingdom (I).

WE have already mentioned more than once the large ſtable which this prince is ſaid to have had, and its being cleanſed by Hercules. The truth of the ſtory, if we may believe Pauſanias [g], was, that he kept ſuch large quantities of oxen and ſheep, that they had quite covered the earth with their dung, ſo that it was become incapable of producing either graſs or corn. Augeas therefore hired Hercules to clear his grounds of it, who for his reward was to have his daughter and ſome part of his kingdom. When Hercules had performed the taſk by turning the river over them (K), Augeas refuſed to give him his hire, pretending, that he had done the job more by cunning than by labour. The quarrel was referred to Phyleus Augeas's eldeſt ſon, and he, having given it againſt his father, was baniſhed the kingdom together with his client. Augeas, being afraid of that hero's reſentment, was forced to ſtrengthen himſelf by a double alliance, one with Actor, the ſon of Phorbas by Hyrmine the daughter of Epeus; and the other with Amaryncæus, a Theſſalian, a man well verſed in the art of war, whom he invited into Elis. To g Elid. c. 1.

(I) This is he who, the Greeks pretend, gave his name to this kingdom, which was before called Epea from Epeus mentioned a little higher.

Others willing to do Augeas a greater honour, make him the ſon not of Eleus, but of Elius or the ſun.

(K) This river which ſome pretend to have been the Alpheus, and others the Peneus, as we obſerved in a late note, is by our author here called Minyeus, which name Strabo, who ſays it was the Peneus, thinks was given it by the long ſtay which its waters made upon the ground. This etymon is ſomething forced, and it ſeems more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that that river had thoſe two names, as we find many others to have had (8).

(8) Pauſan. in Elid. c. ii. Vid. & Gedoyn. Not. in eund.

bind these two the faster to his interest, he made them his associates in the kingdom, so that when Hercules came afterwards with a powerful army against him, he met with such stout resistance from them, particularly from Actor and his sons; that he was forced to return and wait for a more favourable time. Not long after, being informed that these brave youths were to go to the Isthmian games, he went and laid in ambush against them, and killed them all, and with such privacy, that it cost the Eleans some time and trouble to find out the murderer. But when they knew that it was Hercules, who by that time was retired to Tirynthus, they sent embassadors in vain to the Argives to punish him, and to the Corinthians to interdict the Argives from the Isthmian games, for suffering the assassin of those who were going to them to live unpunished in their territories. They could prevail on neither to comply with their request; and Hercules, having raised a powerful army of Argives, Thebans, and Arcadians, came and besieged them, took and sacked the city of Elis, and was going to let fly his resentment against the Piseans for assisting them, had not the oracle prevented it. Hercules, who would not sit down contented till he had conquered the whole kingdom, made a present of it to Phyleus the son of Augeas, who had formerly decided the quarrel in his favour, and with the kingdom restored him all the prisoners he had taken (L), and among the rest Augeas, whom he pardoned upon his account, according to Pausanias; others say he killed him and Eurytus, another of his sons [h].

Phyleus, thus recalled to the kingdom, did, however, stay in it but as long as was necessary to settle the affairs of [h] Conf. Diodor. Sicul. l. iv. & Pausan. Elid. c. iii.

(L) These prisoners must have been very few in comparison of those that were killed, since Pausanias tells us, that the Elean women, finding their country almost stript of male inhabitants, prayed to Minerva, that they might conceive at the very first matrimonial intercourse; and that the goddess having granted their request, they built a temple to her and called it, Minerva, the mother of mankind. And moreover in memory of this signal favour, they called both the place and the river that runs by it Badu, which in their dialect signifies the same as ἡδυ, sweet, to express the pleasure of that matrimonial intercourse (9).

(9) Id, ibid. c. iii.

of the ſtate, after which he retired to the iſland of Dulichium (M). And Augeas dying ſoon after, the crown fell to his next ſon Agaſthenes, whoſe ſon Polyxenus, having ſucceeded him, went to the Trojan war, and was one of thoſe who returned from thence, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Eleus II. It was in this prince's reign that the Dorians and Heraclidæ made their laſt but ſucceſsful attempt againſt Peloponneſus under Hippotes their general, after having formerly made ſeveral fruitleſs ones againſt it. We have already had occaſion to ſpeak more than once of this expedition, for the ſucceſs of which, having conſulted the oracle, they were bid to make choice of a three-eyed general to head them, and met with Oxylus an Ætolian, whom they ſuppoſed to be the perſon pointed at by the oracle, becauſe his horſe and he had but three eyes between them.

Oxylus, of the race of Endymion, had been forced to leave his native country a year before for having accidentally killed, ſome ſay, his brother Thermius, others ſay, Alcidocus the ſon of Scopius, as he was playing at quoits. He was then upon his return to Ætolia, when the Heraclidæ met him and invited him to be their general. The condition upon which he accepted this office was, that when they had conquered Peloponneſus they ſhould allot him Elis, not only as a reward for his ſervices, but becauſe he had a title to that kingdom as being the ſixth in a lineal deſcent from Endymion the ſecond king of it. They agreed ſo much the more readily to his demand, as he was moreover related to them by the mother's ſide, his great grandmother being ſiſter to Dejanira, the mother of Hyllus the ſon of Hercules. The ſucceſs of this expedition we have ſeen in the former ſections, as well as the manner in which they divided their conqueſts between them, in which they did not fail to give their general the kingdom of Elis according to their agreement [i].

Oxylus, who expected to have taken poſſeſſion of it without any oppoſition, found himſelf miſtaken, and Dius, who was then upon the throne, refuſed to reſign it to him. However, to avoid expoſing their troops to a battle, they agreed, that each ſhould chuſe a champion, who ſhould decide

[i] Id. ibid. & Apollod. l. ii. Strab. Geogr. l. x.

(M) It is but a ſmall inconſiderable iſland on the Ionian ſea near that of Cephalonia, it is now called Dulicha and Tziakki.

decide the right of it by ſingle combat, and Pyrechmes, an excellent Ætolian ſlinger, having won the victory in favour of Oxylus, he was immediately proclaimed king of Elis. We find nothing remarkable concerning either his reign or thoſe of his ſucceſſors; he had two ſons, Ætolus and Lajus, the former of whom, dying young, was buried under the gate of the city, the oracle having ordered that he ſhould be buried, neither within nor out of it. His ſon Lajus, ſucceeded him, after which we hear no more of his race, nor indeed of any material tranſactions in this kingdom, if we except ſome of their wars with the Arcadian neighbours and with ſome other ſtates of Greece, till we come to the reign of Iphitus, the reviver of the olympic games, and cotemporary with the great Lycurgus mentioned at the cloſe of the laſt ſection.

BEFORE his reign, Greece had been almoſt ruined by wars and peſtilence. Elis ſeems to have ſuffered more than any other ſtate, ſo that thoſe games had been interrupted for a conſiderable time. Iphitus ſent to conſult the oracle concerning the means of appeaſing the angry gods and obtaining a remedy againſt thoſe calamities, and was anſwered, that the reſtoration of thoſe games would prove the ſafety of Greece, to procure which he and his ſubjects were exhorted to ſet about it, immediately and with all their might. He began with offering a ſacrifice to Hercules, whom the Eleans believed to have been upon ſome account or other exaſperated againſt them (N). He next cauſed the olympic games to be proclaimed all over Greece, with a promiſe of free admittance to all comers, and fixed the time for the celebration of them, as we hinted at before: he likewiſe took upon himſelf to be ſole preſident and judge of thoſe games, a privilege which the Piſeans, by reaſon of their neighbourhood, had often ſharply diſputed with his predeceſſors, and which continued in his deſcendants, as long as his line and the regal dignity continued. After this the people took upon them to appoint two preſidents Reſtores the olympic games.

(N) Pauſanius tells us, there was a kind of diſpute between the Eleans and the reſt of the Greeks, whether Iphitus was lineally deſcended from Oxylus, if he was not, it was not without reaſon that he feared the reſentment of that god, whoſe particular kindneſs to all that were related to him, as Oxylus was, would hardly ſuffer ſuch a wrong to go unpuniſhed: and this was probably the motive that induced that monarch to begin with appeaſing his anger by this ſacrifice.

ſidents whom they choſe by vote, and which in time increaſed to ten, and at length to twelve. We have ſpoken a little higher of the place where they ſat, their office was to examine and admit the candidates, and to judge of all diſputes that aroſe concerning the victory in all the ſeveral exerciſes which were performed in them.

§ ÆTOLIA was ſo called, as we have ſeen a little before, Ætolia. from Ætolus, the ſon of Endymion and brother of Epeus, whom he ſucceeded in the kingdom of Elis, and from which he fled into this country after he had accidentally killed Apis, the ſon of Jaſon, at ſome funeral games. What people inhabited this country before his coming, and what names they had, is not to be gueſſed at, only this we find, that both they and their neighbours on both ſides, of whom we ſhall ſpeak by-and-by, were the greateſt robbers in all Greece, and continued ſo, during many centuries, after Hercules, Theſeus, and other heroes, had extirpated thoſe vermin every-where elſe [a].

THIS ſlip of ground, for ſuch it was, had on the eaſt the Locrians, Phocians, and Ozolæans, from whom they were parted by the river Evenus, or Licormas. The Acarnanians on the weſt were alſo parted from them by that of Achelous, on the north it had the Dorians with part of Epirus, and on the ſouth the bay of Corinth; its utmoſt extent from north to ſouth was about forty-eight miles, that is, from 38 deg. 40 min. to 39 deg. 28 min. north latitude; and from eaſt to weſt, where it was wideſt, above twenty miles; that is, from 22 deg. 40 min. to 23 deg. 10 min. but exceeding narrow, as it extended northward and ſouthward, eſpecially the latter, where it ſcarcely reached 10 miles, and had but one ſea-port of any note on the Corinthian bay, namely Œnias, ſituate on the mouth of the Achelous above-mentioned [b]. Its ſituation and extent.

IT had no other rivers but the two we have juſt ſpoken, the former of which was that on which Hercules killed the centaur Neſſus, and the latter, which was alſo called Thoas from its rapidity, deſcended from mount Pindus in Macedonia into the Ionian ſea. Concerning this laſt the poets have feigned many ſtories, or blended the hiſtory with Of Rivers.

[a] Thucyd. l. i. Plutarch. in Theſeo. & al. [b] Vid. Strab. Mela, Cluver, & al.

with many fables which the reader may ſee in the margin (A). As for its name, ſome think it received it from Achelous one of the kings of Ætolia, and others derive it from the Greek, and think it was given it by reaſon of the ſalubrioufneſs of its waters [c]; but as we meet with three rivers of this name [d], and in three different countries, it is not likely, they ſhould all have it upon this laſt account; however, this of Ætolia is by far the largeſt and moſt conſiderable, inſomuch, that Homer calls it the king of rivers.

THE country is very craggy and mountainous, which rendered ſeveral of their cities almoſt impregnable, and the people ſo ſtout, turbulent, and unruly, that the more polite ſtates of Greece, and even the Macedonians, tried in vain to tame them. The moſt noted of thoſe cities were thoſe that follow; Thermus or Thermius, ſituate almoſt in the heart of the kingdom, and which became in time the metropolis of it, ſurrounded at ſome diſtance with ſuch high and craggy mountains, that though it was the place where the ſtates of the country aſſembled, and the repoſitory of all

[c] Euſtat. [d] Vid. Pauſan. in Arcad. c. xxxviii. & Auct. ſup. Citat.

(A) This famous river is feigned by the fabulous poets to have been the ſon of Oceanus and Tethys, and a competitor with Hercules for Dejanira, the king of Calydonia's daughter. Theſe two having engaged in a duel, and Achelous, finding himſelf likely to be worſted by him, changed himſelf firſt into a ſerpent, and then into a bull. Hercules broke both his horns, and gave one of them to Plenty the companion of Fortune. Hence the ſtory of the Cornucopia. Achelous, finding himſelf ſtill inferior to his rival, turned himſelf into the river of his name, in which form he has continued ever ſince, or, as others have it, for grief and ſpight flung and choaked himſelf in it, after he had bribed his rival with the horn of Amalthea or plenty.

This poetic hodge-podge of ſerpents, bulls, and horns, ſeems to have taken its riſe from the ſerpentine turnings and windings, and likely alſo from the rapidity and noiſe of this noble river, which like all others are properly enough ſaid to be the offspring of the ocean and earth. His two horns were its two ſtreams, where it divided itſelf, and the plenty which theſe brought after they were either confined within due bounds, or by ſome other way made ſerviceable to fertiliſe the neighbouring plains, might be not inelegantly figured by the cornucopia.

all their wealth and treaſure in times of danger, yet was it not ſo much as fortified with a wall, the difficult aſcents and narrow paſſages of the neighbouring mountains being deemed ſufficient to guard it both from ſurprize or invaſion. It had its fairs and markets, was inhabited by the nobleſt and wealthieſt Ætolians, and had the firname of Panætolium, upon account of the ſenate holding their meetings there [e]. 2. Calydon, ſituate near the foreſt of that name, where Meleager, accompanied with the nobleſt youths of Greece, ſlew the famous Calydonian boar (B). Hither it was alſo that Hercules came after he had left Peloponneſus, and though he had a numerous ſpurious brood ſcattered over all Greece, yet wanting legitimate iſſue, married Dejanira the daughter of Œneus, king of the country, and father to Meleager, and to ingratiate himſelf to the Ætolians, either turned the current of the river Achelous, or made ſuch improvements upon it, as gave riſe to the fable we mentioned in a late note. This city, which ſeems to have continued for ſome time the ſeat of the ancient Ætolian

[e] Vid. Strab. Geogr. l. x. Polyb. Byzant. ſub. voce Θερμος. & Grenov. not. in eund.

(B) This fierce and monſtrous creature had done ſo much miſchief about the neighbourhood, that Meleager king of the country, who kept his court at Calydon, was forced to call to his aſſiſtance a great number of the flower of Greece to deſtroy it. The chief of theſe were, Theſeus, Telamon, Peleus, Pollux, and Iolaus all of them the faithful companions of Hercules, beſides a number of other heroes. To theſe we may add the famous Arcadian princeſs Atalanta, who behaved with ſuch uncommon courage and intrepidity upon this occaſion, that Meleager became enamoured with her and married her.

If we may gueſs at the bigneſs of this monſtrous boar by the length of his tuſks, Pauſanias, who tells us that one of them was ſtill preſerved in the temple of Bacchus in the imperial gardens, ſays, it was above a yard long (10).

The poets pretend, that it was ſent by Diana as a puniſhment to Oeneus, for having forgotten her when he ſacrified to all the gods beſides at the cloſe of the harveſt. Pauſanias, adds, that he was driven out of his kingdom by a faction, and went to Argos, whence he returned again with an army and recovered it again, but was perſuaded by the Argolic king to return thither and died there.

(10) Arcad. c. xlvi.

lian kings, was built by Calydon the ſon of Ætolus [f], from whom the kingdom was for ſome time called Calydonia, but reſumed its antient one in ſome following reign. The ſituation of this city was very pleaſant and commodious, being ſeated upon the river Evenus, which ran quite through the midſt of it, and having ſome pleaſant plains round it and the Calydonian foreſt at a ſmall diſtance from it: but their continual wars with their neighbours obliged them in proceſs of time to remove the ſeat of the kingdom and ſenate to Thermus abovementioned, 3. Pleuron, which which gave name to a territory, whoſe inhabitants were ſirnamed Curetes, becauſe they ſhaved the fore-part of their heads, leſt their enemies ſhould lay hold on it, but let the hinder part to grow, that they might be caught by it if they offered to run away. Some few more cities of leſs note they had, but fewer in proportion than the more noted ſtates of Greece.

The Ætolians were in general a ſtout warlike people, always inured to the trade of war and plunder, ſeldom at peace with any of their neighbours, and having in general the advantage over them by reaſon of their ſituation. It was chiefly in ſuch excurſive exploits that they ſignalized their courage, without ſtriving to enlarge their territories, till ſome of the Grecian wars invited them out of their dominions, particularly the Theban war, as we may ſee by-and-by.

It were, however, needleſs here to give a liſt of their kings, many of whom have been known to antient authors by little more than their names. We have already had occaſion to mention ſome of the deſcendants of Ætolus, namely Calydon, Œneus the father of Dejanira, and his ſon Meleager (C); and to theſe we ſhall only add the two heroes of his

[f] Vid. Byzant. ſub. voce.

(C) The fable ſays, that when Althea this prince's mother was brought-to-bed of him, ſhe ſaw the three fatal ſiſters ſitting by the fire, one of whom, taking a billet out of it, ſaid, the boy ſhould live as long as it remained unburnt: as ſoon as they were gone, ſhe got up and quenched the ſtick, and repoſited it in a ſafe place.

When Meleager was come to the kingdom, he unfortunately chanced to quarrel with his two uncles at the killing of the boar mentioned in the laſt note. That young prince having preſented the his race, who ſignalized themſelves, the one in the Theban, and the other in the Trojan war.

THE firſt of theſe was Tydeus another ſon of Oeneus, by Althea. We have already had occaſion to mention him in the hiſtories of Argos and Thebes. In the firſt of theſe kingdoms, to which he fled to be expiated for manſlaughter, he and Polynices having married the two daughters of Adraſtus, theſe three princes went jointly againſt Thebes to recover Polynices's right; and here it was that Tydeus performed ſuch glorious exploits againſt Eteocles, as we have given an account of in that famous war between the two contending brothers *. He was there at length mortally wounded by Menalippus, but before he expired, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee his enemy's head brought to him by the brave Amphiareus, and took the brutal revenge of cutting out his brains and ſwallowing them [g].

HIS ſon Diomedes was one of thoſe who ſignalized themſelves at the Trojan war, he had indeed the good fortune to return ſafe from it, but meeting with a worſe enemy at home, in his faithleſs wife Ægiale and her paramour Cometes, he was forced to retire into Apulia, where he ſhared that kingdom with Daunus, as we have ſeen above †. From this time we meet with nothing conſiderable in the hiſtory of this nation, except a few warlike excurſions which they made in conjunction with ſome of the great ſtates of Greece, in which they aſſiſted ſometimes as allies, and ſometimes the head of it to Atalanta, who had given it the firſt wound, and they endeavouring to take it from her, the contention roſe to ſuch a height, that the exaſperated prince killed them both. Althea, ſeeing her two brothers killed, fell into ſuch fury, that ſhe ran to the fatal brand which ſhe had ſaved, and flung it into the fire, upon which her ſon was immediately ſeized with a burning fever in his bowels, and ſoon after expired.

* See vol. v. ch. 17. ſect. 3. and laſt page of that vol. [g] Apollod. l. iii. c. 7. † See vol. v, ch. 17. ſect. 3.

Pauſanias, who tells us that this fabulous ſtory was deviſed by an ancient tragic poet, named Phrynicus (ſuppoſed to have flouriſhed about the 67th Olympiad) doth not give us a much better account of this prince's death, when he tells us upon the credit of two other poets, that Apollo killed him with his own hands, becauſe he had taken the part of the Ætolians againſt the Curetes, mentioned a little higher, in whoſe favour that god had declared himſelf (11).

(11) In Phocid. c. xxxi.

times as auxiliaries, and which have been already interſperſed in the hiſtory of the foregoing kingdoms, till the famous Achæan league which proved ſo fatal to them, and of which we ſhall give an account in its proper place. The reſt of their time was ſpent in mutual excurſions between them and their neighbours the Dorians and Locrians, of whom we are to ſpeak next, and eſpecially with the Ozolæans and Acarnanians whoſe territories lay on each ſide of Ætolia. Theſe two laſt being more obſcure and inconſiderable than any of the reſt, the reader will find all that we think needs be ſaid of them in the following note (D).

THE

(D) The Ozolæans, as we obſerved in the geography of Ætolia, were ſituate on the eaſt of that kingdom. It was a ſmall territory lying on the north coaſt of the bay of Corinth, and extending itſelf about twelve miles northward, where it was contiguous with Locris. On the weſt, it was bounded by the river Evenus, which parted them from Ætolia, and on the eaſt they had the kingdom of Phocis, ſpoken of in the cloſe of the ſixth ſection of this chapter. Its chief towns were Naupactus, ſituate on the mouth of the river abovementioned, which was often contended for by the Ætolians, and at length became wholly theirs. It was called by that name from the Heraclidæ building their navy there, with which they invaded Peloponneſus, but is now known by that of Lepanto, and was taken from the Venetians by Bajaſet.

The Ozolæans bid fair for being ſome of the antienteſt inhabitants of theſe parts, if we admit the etymon which ſome give of their names, and that they were called ſo from the ſtench, which their cloathing (which was the raw hides of wild beaſts without any dreſſing gave to their bodies; for this was all the dreſs which the firſt inhabitants of Greece uſed, till Pelaſgus and ſome other founders taught them a better, as we have ſeen at the beginning of this chapter, and in the hiſtory of Arcadia.

Others think, that this ſtinking name was owing to the ſtench of their rivers and marſhes, and others again to the quantity of Aſphodel or Daffodil which grew in thoſe parts, one ſort of which has an ill ſmell, and uſed to be ſtrowed anciently over graves: a third affirm, that this ſtench was cauſed by the blood which the centaur Neſſus ſcattered upon the earth, when he was wounded by Hercules.

A more fabulous account of this name, though not ſo ill-ſcented is, that in the reign of Oreſtheus the ſon of Deucalion, his bitch brought forth inſtead of whelps, a ſtick of wood, which that prince cauſed to be put into the ground, from which, when the ſpring came, a vine ſprang forth. Hence they pretended, that the name of Ozoles came not from ὀξειν, to ſtink, but from ὀξος, a branch

THE Locrians were either the same people with the Ozoleans, mentioned in the last note, or so blended with them, a branch or sprout: however that be, Pausanias tells us, the Locrians, who were likewise called Ozeles, were so ill pleased with that name, that they changed it for that of Ætolians (12), we shall speak of them in the next place above.

As for the Acarnanians, their territories were parted on the east by the river Achelous, and surrounded by the Ionian sea on the west and south, and on the north joined to Epirus, and became afterwards a province of that kingdom (13).

They were anciently known by the name of Curetes, but whether of the same race with those of the Celtic nation mentioned in a former chapter *, or, whether so called, because like the Pleurones they cut off their fore-locks, or whether both were not originally of Celtic extraction, is not easy to determine.

The name of Acarnanians they afterwards received from Acarnanus the son of Alcmon. This last was the son of Amphiareus the noted southsayer, whose wife Eripyle had been bribed by Polynices with a rich necklace, to determine him to go to the Theban war, for which reason he left orders with his son to murder her, as we have seen elsewhere †. He having executed his father's commands, was so tormented with furies, that he was forced to apply to the Delphic oracle for relief, and was answered, that if he could find out some country which had sprung up out of the sea, since his parricide, and did settle there, he should be freed from his mother's avenging ghost. After much seeking he found this spot of ground, which the Achelous had thrown up, and settled himself there.

He soon after married Callirhoe, the pretended daughter of that river, by whom he had two sons, Arcarnan and Amphoterus, the former of whom gave his name to this country (14). Some think, that the difference between the Acarnanians and Curetes was, that the latter shaved the forepart of their heads, and the other did not. Again, some derive the name of Curetes from the mount Curius, and others from the Greek κυραι maidens, because they affected to go dress like young women, though in this latter sense it should properly be writ κοραι. We have nothing material concerning this nation, except their constant wars with the Ætolians, at least during this epocha. The remainder of their history will be best seen in that of Epirus, of which they afterwards became a province.

(12) Ibid. c. xxxviii. (13) Strab. Mel. & al. * Vid. sup. vol. v. p. 406. & seq. & sub. not. A. † Ibid. ch. 17. sect. 3. (14) Pausan. in Arcad. c. xxiv. (15) Vid. Byzant. sub voce Acarnania.

them, that they are not eaſily to be diſtinguiſhed by their names, or indeed by any thing but their ſituation. In this reſpect they were divided into the Locri Ozolæ abovementioned, which inhabited the ſouthern or maritime parts. 2. The Locri Epicnemidii, ſo called from the mount Cnemis; theſe were ſituate in the middle: and 3. The northern Locri, ſirnamed Opuntii from their chief city Opus or Opoes, near the coaſts of the Ægean or Eubæan ſea; authors, however, are not ſo well agreed in the placing of the two latter, as the former of theſe ancient nations [h]. Ancient indeed, if we conſider that Homer tells us, they came to the Trojan war armed with bows and ſlings, and that the Ozoleans carried an early colony into Italy under the conduct of their princes Evas and Ajax, and built a city there near the Zephyrian promontory, from which they were called Locri Epizephyrii [i].

Their three tribes.

THE Ozolean Locrians were divided from the other two by the whole kingdom of Phocis, of which we have given an account in a former ſection. Their chief city was Amphiſſa, ſituate on the Evenus. Herodotus calls it Amphicea, and the inhabitants Amphiclea. It was afterwards taken by the Phocians, and deſtroyed with the reſt of the Phocian cities in the holy war formerly mentioned, and when it was rebuilt, Pauſanias tells us it took the name of Ophitea, if the text has not been corrupted by his tranſcribers [k]. (E). The Epicnemidian Locrians were the only ones of all the three [h] De' his vid. Ptolem. Strab. Mela, Cluver, & al. ſub. Citat. [i] Pauſan. Achaic. c. xxiii. & Phocid xxxviii. [k] Id. ibid. vid. & Byzant. ſub voce Αμφικαια & Gronov. not. in Loc.

(E) This laſt is more likely to be the caſe, both becauſe Herodotus no where calls it by this new name, but always Amphicea, and more particularly becauſe this laſt name doth better agree with the etymon which Pauſanias himſelf gives of it, which is as follows (16).

A petty king of that country, out of ſome fear for his young ſon, had cauſed him to be brought up privately in a very retired place, where he was one day in danger of being killed by a wolf, but was ſaved by a ſerpent, who twined about and defended him. The father, coming at that inſtant, and in a fright misjudging the matter, let fly an arrow, which killed both the ſerpent and his ſon, and when he was better informed by ſome ſhepherds, who had three who had a right to ſend deputies to the grand Amphictyonian court at Delphos. Their metropolis was Thronium, mentioned by Homer, Ptolemy, and other ancient authors [l]. They had another city called Cnemis, built at the foot of the mount of that name, from which they took their appellative. Thoſe who deſire to know more of theſe ancient cities, as well as of that of Opus or Opoes, belonging to the other Locrian tribe, may ſee an ample deſcription of them in the authors above quoted †. How they came by their common name of Locrians, whether they were colonies of one another, and if ſo, which was the ancienteſt, is paſt our skill to find out. As for their countries they afford little worth our farther notice, and all that we can add concerning their inhabitants is, that they were a brave warlike nation; and we ſhall in the ſequel ſee, that they ſignalized themſelves, as much as any others, in maintaining the liberty of Greece. Towns of note.

(16) Phocid. c. xxxiv.

§ Doris was ſituate on the ſouth of Theſſaly, being parted from it by mount Oeta and a ridge of other hills. It had on the ſouth Phocis and part of Ætolia; on the eaſt it was parted from the Locri Epicnemidæ by the river Pindus, and on the weſt from Epirus by that of Achelous. Other rivers of note it had not. Mountains it had in great number, and thoſe not inconſiderable ones: the moſt famed were Oeta and Pindus, often mentioned in this chapter, which, with ſome others of leſs note, ſurrounded it on the north, as the Callidromians did on the weſt; yet it abounded with ſpacious plains and very fruitful: the air was ſweet and healthy, and the ſoil capable of being improved to all advantages of huſbandry. Its territories were not large, they extended only at moſt about forty miles in length, that is from 39 deg. 10 min. to 39 deg. 50 min. and about 20 miles in breadth at the wideſt, Doris.

† Vid. & Palmer. antiq. Græc. l. 4. & alib. paſſ. [l] Polib Livy. Pauſan. vid. & Palmer. Antiq. Græc. l. v. & Byz. ſub voce. [m] Vid. Ptolem. Strab. Mela, &c.

had beheld the encounter, he cauſed them to be both burnt upon the ſame funeral pile.

It ſeems therefore more probable, that the place was called from thence Αμφικαια, from Αμφικαιεσθαι, both being carried to the ſame pile, than Ophitea, which has no alluſion to that or any other part of the ſtory (17).

(17) Vid. Sylburg. Paulmier. & Gedoyn. in. eund. ibid.

wideſt, or from 23 deg. 10 min. to 23 deg. 30 min. eaſt longitude.

THIS country was called Doris, and the people Dores, from Dorus, the ſon of Hellen, and grandſon of Deucalion, who firſt peopled, or rather conquered, it, at leaſt that part of it, which lies below the mountains Oeta and Pindus: they were afterwards driven from it by the Cadmeans, and forced to inhabit for ſome time about Macednum and the neighbourhood of Pindus, but returned ſoon after to Dryopis (F), and the country about Oeta [n], where they continued till they made that famous deſcent into Peloponneſus with the Heraclidæ, of which we have ſpoken in ſome former ſections, and whither they carried alſo their dialect called from them Doric (G). Their chief city was called Doris from the founder of this kingdom. We find this metropolis mentioned by Homer, Herodotus, and others [o].

2. ERI-

[n] Herodot. l. i. Apollod. l. i. c. 7. [o] De his vid. Ptolem. Strab. &c. Byzant. & Palmer. Ant. Gr.

(F) A country ſituate in the neighbourhood of the mount Oeta and Parnaſſus, and called Dryopis, from Dryope the daughter of Eurypylus, or, as the poets feign, a nymph raviſhed by Apollo; but more probably from δρυς, an oak, and οψ, voice, from the quantity of oaks that grew about the mountain and the ruſtling of their leaves.

However, the Dryopes valued themſelves very much upon their fabulous origin, and called themſelves the ſons of Apollo; wherefore Hercules having overcome them in fight, took them priſoners and carried them to Delphos, where he preſented them to their divine progenitor, who commanded that hero to take them back with him into Peloponneſus, which he accordingly did, and gave them a ſettlement there near the Aſmean and Hermionian territories; hence the Aſmeans came to be blended with and to call themſelves Dryopes (18).

(G) The Dorians gave their name, 1. to this dialect of theirs, which became much in vogue among the Greeks, but was preſerved moſt pure by the Meſſenians, even through all their various tranſmigrations: 2. to the Doric order, one of the five in architecture: and 3. to the Doric muſic, in oppoſition to that of the Lydians and Phrygians.

Theſe three kinds of muſic uſed to be played upon three different kinds of flutes, particularly adapted to each of them, till the celebrated Pronomus invented a fourth ſort, upon which he could play them all indifferently (19).

(18) Pauſan. in Meſſenic. c. xxxiv. (19) Pauſan. in Bœotic. c. xii. Athæn. l. xiv. c. 7.

2. ERINEUS, situate on the most northern verge of the kingdom, near the foot of the hills which part Doris from Macedonia, and mentioned by all the ancient geographers and historians. 3. Lilæa on the southern frontiers, and adjoining to Phocis. 4. Bium, as it is called by Ptolemy, or Bojon, as Strabo and others call it, with some others of less note.

WE have nothing remarkable left concerning these people before their naval descent into Peloponnesus, the particulars and success of which have been seen in the former sections, and need not to be repeated here. After their conquest of and settlement in that Peninsula, in conjunction with the Heraclidæ, they built a stately temple to Jupiter Tropæus, in memory of this great event. Such indeed it was, and answerable to the firname given to that deity, since it almost overturned the whole state of affairs in all the different kingdoms and states of Peloponnesus, whose cities were now forced to receive a garison of Dorians, and to submit to a foreign government.

§ ACHAIA Propria (H), so called from Achæus the son of Xuthus, was originally called Ægialea, from Ægialeus the first king of Sicyon, as some affirm †; others think, it comes from the Greek Ægialos, sea-shore, because above half of it was surrounded with the sea [P], but whether it was originally a part of the Sicyonic kingdom, or was under its own kings, is not certain; the latter indeed seems the more probable, because the king, who reigned there when Ion the brother of Achæus came to invade it, is called Selinus by the last quoted author, whereas there was no Sicyonian king of that name in the list we have left of them, unless perhaps Selinus be the same with Telchin, or Selchin as he is also called, the grandson of Ægialeus. However that be, the country took then the firname of Ionian, and the people were Achaia its names.

† See vol. v. ch. 17. sect. 2. [P] Pausan. Achaic. c. i.

(H) It is called Achaia Propria to distinguish it from the general name of Achaia, by which Greece itself was sometimes called, and which was afterwards given by the Romans to one of the provinces of it, after they had divided it into two, viz. Macedonia, containing Macedonia Thessaly, and Epirus, and Achaia, containing all the remainder of Greece, both inland and the islands about it.

called Ægialean Ionians; and it is likely, that that of Achaia was not given to it till the ſons of Achæus came and invaded it, and drove the Ionians out of it.

Situation and extent.

ACHAIA had Sicyon on the eaſt, and the Ionian ſea on the weſt; the kingdom of Elis, and that of Arcadia on the ſouth, and the bay of Corinth on the north: its utmoſt extent was from eaſt to weſt ſomewhat above fifty miles, but from north to ſouth about half that diſtance [q], being within the 38th deg. of latitude and 23d of longitude. Rivers of note it had not, except the Piereus which diſcharged itſelf into the Ionian ſea, at the mouth of which was the city of Olenus, a famous ſea-port mentioned by ancient authors, and ſo called from Olenus its founder, the ſuppoſed ſon of Jupiter, or, according to others, of Vulcan. We find another city of the ſame name in Ætolia [r]. We ſhall have occaſion to mention the reſt of their cities in the following ſketch of their hiſtory.

XUTHUS, one of the ſons of Hellen, the ſon of Deucalion, having been baniſhed by his other brothers out of Theſſaly after their father's death, under pretence that he had embezzeled the royal treaſury, came to Athens, where Erectheus gave him his daughter Creuſa, by whom he had two ſons, Achæus and Ion. After Erectheus's death, a diſpute ariſing between his ſons, Xuthus was choſen umpire between them, and having adjudged the ſucceſſion to Cecrops II. who was the eldeſt, the others drove him out of the kingdom, whence he came and ſettled in Achaia *, and died there. His ſon Achæus did ſoon after raiſe a ſmall number of Athenian and Ægialean forces, with which he went into Theſſaly, and recovered his grandfather's kingdom. He had not reigned long there, before he was forced to fly for man-ſlaughter, and went into Laconia where he died, and his poſterity continued, till they were expelled from it by the Dores and Heraclidæ.

BUT, in the mean while, his brother Ion, who was grown very great at the Athenian court, obtained a number of forces, and with them invaded this country, then called Ægialea. Selinus then king of it, having but one only daughter, inſtead of repulſing him, gave her to him in marriage, and appointed him his ſucceſſor. Ion, having ſucceeded his father-in-law, built a city, and called it by by his wife's name Helice, and from him the Ægialeans were ſirnamed Ionians; but the country ſeems to have retained its ancient name, ſince, Homer, in the liſt of Agamemnon's forces, makes mention both of it and the city of Helice.

[q] Strab. Mela, &c. [r] Vid. Byzant. in voce. * See vol. v. 17. ſect. 3.

Ion was ſoon after choſen general of the Athenian forces in their war againſt the Eleuſians, and was either killed in it, or died ſoon after; and was buried in a ſmall town of Attica. The crown, however, paſſed to his deſcendants, who enjoyed it undiſturbed for a conſiderable time. In the mean while, thoſe of his uncle Achæus, and known by the name of Achæans, had ſpread themſelves in ſeveral parts of Greece, particularly in the kingdoms of Argos and Lacedæmon. When therefore they came to be driven out of theſe two countries by the Dores and Heraclidæ, they bethought themſelves of laying claim to Achaia, and of driving the Ionians out out of it. They had their brave king Tiſamenes the ſon of Oreſtes at their head, and pleaded a ſuperiority of kindred, being deſcended from the eldeſt ſon of Xuthus; but what they truſted would give them a better title was, that they had a good number of troops, and among them ſome Dores, who agreed to aſſiſt them in this expedition. Accordingly they came againſt them with this army, and ſent a herald to them to demand, that they might be amicably received into their territories, without being put to the trouble of invading them by force. The Ionians, ſurpriſed at ſuch an unexpected meſſage, reſolved, however, to oppoſe their entrance with all their might. They knew, that if they were once ſuffered to ſettle in their territories, they would not let any one reign there except their prince Tiſamenes, whoſe noble extraction and known valour would hardly brook a competitor in the government: they therefore reſolved to march againſt the invaders, and on the very firſt onſet the Achæans loſt indeed their prince, but gained the victory and purſued it to the very gates of Helice. The Ionians thus overpowered were glad to capitulate, and to obtain the liberty of retiring where they thought fit, which being granted to them, they went into Attica, where Melanthus then reigned, and gave them a kind reception; not perhaps ſo much in conſideration of the great ſervices which their progenitor Ion had done to that kingdom, as to make uſe of their aſſiſtance againſt the Dores, whom he now began to fear. Here they ſtayed no longer than till the firſt archontat, when Medon's brethren, unwilling to ſubmit to their lame brother, invited them among other Grecians to go and ſeek their fortune elſewhere *.

As for the Achæans, their prince being dead and the Ionians gone off, his ſons agreed to divide their new conqueſt by lot; this little kingdom chiefly conſiſted of the twelve following cities, well known to all the Greek writers; namely, 1. Helice mentioned above: 2. Ægion or Ægium, to which the aſſembly of the ſtates was removed after the ſubverſion of Helice, as being the next in dignity and bigneſs: 3. Olenus: 4. Phares: 5. Rhyphes: 6. Tritia: 7. Cerynea: 8. Bura: 9. Dymea: 10. Æges: 11. Ægira: 12. Pellene. Theſe twelve cities were at firſt divided between the four ſons of Tiſamenes, Diamenes, Sparton, Telles, and Leontomenes; for as to his fifth ſon Cometes, he was already gone into Aſia. Theſe, together with their couſin Damaſias, the ſon of Penthilus, and grandſon of Oreſtes, having jointly reigned over this new Achaian ſtate for ſome time, agreed again to take into partnerſhip Preagenes and his ſon Patrus, who were the ſovereigns of thoſe Achæans who had been baniſhed out of Lacedæmon, and gave them the ſovereignty and territories of a city which was called from the laſt of theſe Patra. By what appears from this diviſion of the Achaian government, it ſeems, as if it then became a kind of ariſtocracy, rather than a ſeven-fold monarchy, each under a particular prince; but what ſhare the ſubjects had in it we cannot find out; only it ſeems from the ſhort ſketch Pauſanias gives us of it, that all thoſe cities abovementioned, except Pellene, were in ſome meaſure free cities, and that the ſtates of Achaia ceaſed not to aſſemble themſelves, even when the reſt of Greece was terribly haraſſed with wars and peſtilence. In this aſſembly it was, that the famous Achæan league was formed, into which the Sicyonians came the very firſt, and were followed by all the other ſtates, not only of Peloponneſus, but by thoſe on the other ſide of the Iſthmus; even at length by all Greece, except the Lacedæmonians, who ſoon after entered into a war againſt them, as ſhall be ſeen in the next chapter.

[w] See vol. v. ch. 17. ſect. 3. [s] Vid. Pauſan, in Achaic. paſſ. & Plutarch. D. Sicul. & Auct. ſup. citat.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Hiſtory of the ATHENIANS.

SECT. I.

Of the ſtate of ATHENS, from the eſtabliſhing annual archons, to the Achæan league.

THE Athenians acquired that mighty renown which rendered them the moſt glorious nation in Greece, when Greece was in her greateſt glory, and which makes the Athenian name venerable, even in theſe diſtant times, under a democratic government, of the beginning of which we are now to treat. Though Athens, as we have already ſhewn, was in ancient times, as indeed moſt nations were, governed by kings, yet thoſe kings were far from being abſolute. The beſt of them preſcribed bounds to themſelves, and the people preſcribed bounds to the worſt. For the Athenians were always friends to liberty, and reſerved, even in the days of Theſeus, ſuch an authority in their hands, as engaged Homer to difference them from the other nations of Greece [a]. The glorious death of Codrus, who ſacrificed himſelf for his ſubjects, and his ſons diſputing the ſucceſſion, furniſhed the Athenians with a pretence for ridding themſelves of kings. It was improbable, they ſaid, that ever they ſhould have ſo good a prince as Codrus, and to prevent their having a worſe, they could have no king but Jupiter [b]. However, that they might not ſeem ungrateful to his family, they made his ſon Medon their ſupreme magiſtrate with the title of Archon; they afterwards rendered that office decennial, but continued it ſtill in that family. The extinction of the Medontidæ at laſt left them without reſtraint, upon which they not only made this office annual, but created nine Archons [c]; by the latter invention they provided againſt the too great power of a ſingle perſon, as by the former expedient they took away all apprehenſion of their Archons having time to eſtabliſh an optimacy, and ſo change the conſtitution. In one word, they attained now what they had long ſought, the making their ſupreme magiſtrates dependent on the people. THAT [a] Iliad. lib. v. [b] Schol. in nub. Ariſtophan. [c] Dionyſ. Halicarn. Antiq. Rom. lib. 1. Euſeb. Chron. Pauſan.

THAT these magistrates might, however, retain as much authority and dignity as might be sufficient to preserve order and peace in the commonwealth, they had high titles and great honours annexed to their offices. The first was stiled by way of eminence, The Archon, and the year was distinguished by his name. The second was called Basileus, i. e. king. He too had his peculiar function and his particular tribunal. The third had the name of Polemarchos, war was his province especially, though he had the direction of many things besides military affairs. The other six had the title of Thesmothetæ, common to them all, and were looked on as the guardians of their laws and conservators of the constitution. We shall speak of all these offices distinctly in their proper place; at present we intend only to give a general idea of that form of government which took place on the abolition of the decennial magistracy in Athens. As to the reasons on which the names of the three first magistrates and their distinct offices were founded, they are variously, and not very clearly, reported. It may be, their chief end was to transfer that reverence which the common people had for their old magistrates to these new ones, by leaving the latter as much of the exterior pomp of the former, as was consistent with the ends for which this change was made: as the Romans allowed their consuls to have fasces carried before them, and bore with the word Rex, when it implied no more than a supreme sacrificer. This change happened at Athens in the twenty-fourth olympiad, but in what year of that olympiad is not well settled. Creon was the first of the new Archons, and the names of his successors, at least such of them as are recorded in history, the reader will find in the following table, which also shews the years in which they bore that office (A).

An

(A) The Athenian history takes up so great a part of those volumes which are left us of the ancient writers of Greece, that though little has been said by them in a regular manner of the form of that republic, and the power of its magistrates; yet the industry of such of the learned as have laboured in this way, and, by collecting the scattered passages of Grecian writers, have formed treatises of the Athenian government under its several mutations, have given us such lights on this important subject, that it would be unpardonable in us not to set it clearly and distinctly before our readers. But previous thereto, it will be necessary to give some account of those last mentioned authors, that if such as peruse

An exact TABLE of ſuch of the annual archons of Athens as are mentioned in hiſtory.

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
		xxiv
684	Creon	1
683	Tleſias	2
682	Lyſias	3
		xxvii
670	Antoſthenes	3
		xxix

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
663	Archimedes	2
		xxx
658	Miltiades	3
		xxxiii
645	Dropis	4
		xxxv

63 Da-

uſe this work ſhould be deſirous of entering more deeply into the Athenian policy, than the conſtruction of this hiſtory will permit us to do, they may not be at a loſs for guides. William Poſtel, who flouriſhed in the fifteenth and ſixteenth centuries, and was deſervedly famous for his extenſive learning, hath written a very curious treatiſe of the Athenian republic, conſiſting of thirty-five chapters, wherein he handles conciſely the functions of the Athenian magiſtrates, the rights of the people, and the dependency of the ſeveral parts of the Attic conſtitution on each other (1). But if the ſuccinctneſs of Poſtel leaves any doubt on the minds of his readers, Sigonius's four books, with his ſcheme of the Athenian hiſtory, will ſufficiently ſupply it. Sigonius was a man of much reading, vaſt diligence, and had a mighty affection for this kind of writing, as appears from the many other works of the ſame kind which he compoſed (2). This excellent perſon was a profeſſor in the univerſity of Modena, and, by that time he was twenty years of age, had acquired ſuch a ſtupendous knowledge in hiſtory and politics, as rendered him the wonder of all who knew him. As Sigonius exceeded Poſtel, ſo Sigonius himſelf hath been tranſcended by Ubbo Eminius, rector of the univerſity of Groningen, who, having reſolved upon a work of the ſame nature, made his deſcription extend not only to the Athenian, but to all the republics of Greece, and ordering it ſo, that this deſcription made but one-third part of his work, the two former parts containing an exact deſcription of ancient Greece, and a regular hiſtory of its inhabitants collected in the words moſtly of original writers (3). If to theſe we add the almoſt numberleſs treatiſes of the very learned Meurſius on every part of the Athenian government (4), there

(1) Tractatus de Repub. ſive Magiſtratibus Athenienſium. (2) De Republica Athenienſium Venetiis 1565, 8vo. (3) Vetus Græcia Opus diſtinctum in Tomos tres. (4) Themis Attica, Cecropia, Lection.

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
639	Damaſias I.	2
		xxxvi
634	Epænetus	3
		xxxix
623	Draco	2
		xliii
608	Ariſtocles	4
		xlv
599	Megacles	2
598	Phiſombrotus	3
597	Solon	4
		xlvi
596	Dropides	1
		xlvii
591	Euorates	2
590	Cimon	3
		xlix
582	Damaſias II.	3
		li
576	Archeſtratides	1
		lii
569	Auſtomenes	4
		liv
561	Hippoclides	4
		lv
560	Comias	1
559	Hegeſtratus	2
		lvi
552	Euthydemus	2
		lviii
547	Euxiclides	2
		lix
543	Alcæus	2
		lxii
532	Heraclides	1

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
		lxiv
523	Miltiades	2
		lxviii
	Iſagoras	an. incert.
		lxix
	Aceſtorides	an. incert.
		lxx
	Myrus	an. incert.
		lxxi
496	Hyparchus	2
495	Philippus	3
494	Themiſtocles	4
		lxxii
492	Diognetus	2
491	Hybrilides	3
490	Phœnippus	4
		lxxiii
488	Ariſtides	1
487	Anchiſes	2
486	Acratides	3
		lxxiv
484	Leoſtratus	1
483	Nicodemus	2
482	Aphephon	3
		lxxv
480	Callias qui & Calliades	1
479	Xanthippus	2
478	Timoſthenes	3
477	Adimanthus	4
		lxxvi.
476	Phædon	1
475	Dromoclides	2
474	Aceſtorides	3
473	Menon

there can no queſtion be made, but that this point may be as thoroughly underſtood as any thing of the ſame nature can be. But as things are never perfect at firſt, ſo we held it more reaſonable to refer the particular account of the power of the archons, and the conſtruction of the Athenian democracy to its ſettlement by Solon, than to perplex the reader with anticipations or repetitions.

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
473	Menon	4
		lxxvii
472	Chares	1
471	Praxiergus	2
470	Demotion	3
469	Phædon	4
		lxxviii
468	Theagenides	1
467	Lysistratus	2
466	Lysanias	3
465	Lysistheus	4
		lxxix
464	Archidemides	1
463	Tlepolemus	2
462	Conon	3
461	Euippus	4
		lxxx
460	Phaciclides	1
459	Philocles	2
458	Bion	3
457	Mnesitides	4
		lxxxi
456	Callias	1
455	Sosistratus	2
454	Ariston	3
453	Lysicrates	4
		lxxxii
452	Chærephanes	1
451	Antidotus	2
450	Eutydemus	3
449	Pedieus	4
		lxxxiii
448	Philiscus	1
447	Timarchides	2
446	Callimachus	3
445	Simachides qui & Lysimachides	4
		lxxxiv
444	Praxiteles	1
443	Lysanias	2
442	Diphilus	3
441	Timocles	4

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
		lxxxv
440	Myrichides sive Marichidas	1
439	Glaucis	2
438	Theodorus	3
437	Euthymenes	4
		lxxxvi
436	Nausimachus qui & Lysimachus	1
435	Antichides	2
434	Charis	3
433	Apsendes	4
		lxxxvii
432	Pythodorus	1
431	Euthydemus	2
430	Apollodorus	3
429	Epamion	4
		lxxxviii
428	Diotimus	1
427	Euclides	2
426	Scytodorus qui & Euthydemus	3
425	Stratocles	4
		lxxxix
424	Isarchus	1
423	Aminias	2
422	Alcæus	3
421	Arieto qui & Aristion	4
		xc
420	Aristophilus qui & Astyphilus	1
419	Archias	2
418	Antiphon	3
417	Euphemus	4
		xci
416	Aristomnestus	1
415	Chabrias	2
414	Pysander	3
413	Cleocritus	4
		xcii
412	Callias	1
411	Theopompus	2
410	Glaucippus	3

409 Die-

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
409	Diocles	4
		xciii
408	Euctemon	1
407	Antigenes	2
406	Callias	3
405	Alexias	4
		xciv
404	Pythodorus	1
403	Euclides	2
402	Micio	3
401	Zenetetus qui & Epenetus	4
		xcv
400	Laches	1
399	Aristocrates	2
398	Itycles	3
397	Lysiades	4
		xcvi
396	Phormio	1
395	Diophantus	2
394	Eubulides	3
393	Arches qui & Demostratus	4
		xcvii
392	Philocles	1
391	Nicoteles	2
390	Demostratus	3
389	Antipater	4
		xcviii
388	Pyrrhio qui & Pyrghion	1
387	Theodotus	2
386	Mystichides	3
385	Dexiteus	4
		xcix
384	Diotrephes	1
383	Phenostratus	2
382	Menander qui & Evander	3
381	Demophilus	4
		c
380	Pytheas	1
379	Nicon	2
378	Nausinicus	3

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
377	Callias	4
		ci
376	Chariander	1
375	Hippodamus	2
374	Socratides	3
373	Astius sive Asteus	4
		cii
372	Aristhenes sive Alcisthenes	1
371	Phrasiclides	2
370	Dysnicetus	3
369	Lysistratus	4
		ciii
368	Nausigenes	1
367	Polyzelus	2
366	Cephisodorus	3
365	Chion	4
		civ
364	Timocrates	1
363	Chariclides	2
362	Molio sive Molon	3
361	Nicophemus	4
		cv
360	Callimedes	1
359	Eucharistus	2
358	Cephisodorus	3
357	Agathocles	4
		cvi
356	Elpines seu Elpinius	1
355	Calistratus	2
354	Diotimus	3
353	Eudemus	4
		cvii
352	Aristodemus	1
351	Thessalus	2
350	Apollodorus	3
349	Callimachus	4
		cviii
348	Theophilus	1
347	Themistocles	2
346	Archius	3
345	Eubulus	4
		cix
344	Lycisicus	1

343 Pytho-

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
343	Pythodorus	2
342	Sosigenes	3
341	Nicomachus	4
		cx
340	Theophrastus	1
339	Lysimachides	2
338	Charondas seu Charonidas	3
337	Phrynicus	4
		cxi
336	Pythodorus	1
335	Euenetus	2
334	Cteficles	3
333	Nicorates	4
		cxii
332	Niceratus	1
331	Aristophanes	2
330	Aristophon	3
329	Cephisophon	4
		cxiii
328	Euthycritus	1
327	Hegemon	2
326	Chremes	3
325	Anticles	4
		cxiv
324	Hegesias	1
323	Cephisodor	2
322	Philocles	3
321	Archippus five Apollodorus	4
		cxv
320	Neæchmus	1
319	Apollodorus	2
318	Archippus	3
317	Demogenes	4
		cxvi
316	Democlides	1
315	Praxibulus	2
314	Nicodorus	3
313	Cheophrastus	4

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
		cxvii
312	Ptolemo	1
311	Simonides	2
310	Hieromnemon	3
309	DemetriusPhalereus	4
		cxviii
308	Charinus five Cœrinus	1
307	Anaxicrates	2
306	Coræbus five Corybus	3
305	Xenippus five Euenippus	4
		cxix
304	Pherecles	1
303	Leostratus	2
302	Nicocles	3
301	Calliarchus	4
		cxx
300	Hegamachus	1
299	Euctemon	2
298	Mnesidemus	3
297	Antiphates	4
		cxxi
296	Nicias	1
295	Nicostratus	2
294	Olympiodorus	3
293	Philippus	4
		cxxii
290	Philippus	3
		cxxv
279	Gorgias	2
278	Anaxicrates	3
277	Democles	4
		cxxvii
271	Pytharatus	2
		cxxix
264	Diognetes	1
		clx
140	Antitheus	1
		clxxx
60	Herodes	2

As we are obliged to gather the hiſtory of Athens at the entrance of this period from ſuch paſſages in far later hiſtorians as have a retroſpective view thereto, the reader cannot expect that it ſhould be very exactly connected. He will ſee from the foregoing table, that the names of many of the archons are loſt; and of ſeveral which remain, we know nothing more, than that they were archons in ſuch a year, which is frequently diſcovered from writers of other nations, who, for the better ſettling the facts of which they wrote, referred them to the years in which ſuch and ſuch perſons were archons; becauſe anciently the Athenian ſtory was better known than that of any other people, and therefore ſerved the purpoſe of hiſtorians in this reſpect perfectly well. If the people laboured for power in Athens, the nobility were likewiſe deſirous of preſerving it to themſelves, and tho' they frequently found it neceſſary to give way to popular humours, yet they generally fell upon expedients, which in the end defeated the deſigns of the people, and hindered them from attaining that meaſure of authority they ſought. The archons were from the beginning of the democracy choſen by the people, but they were choſen out of the nobility, and they ſtill retained one privilege of the ancient magiſtrates, which very probably bore hard upon the people, viz. that of deciding all cauſes that came before them, according to their own notions of right or wrong; for as yet the Athenians had no written laws, but every magiſtrate acted according to the principles of natural equity.

THE more populous the city grew, and the greater wealth its citizens acquired, the leſs eaſily were they governed. Merchants from Syria and Egypt very probably gave them firſt to underſtand the expediency of written laws, which might ſerve to rule the magiſtrates as well as the people. This once inculcated, the Athenians would not be at reſt without them; the ſame ſpirit, which had compelled former alterations in government, made it neceſſary now, that laws ſhould be compiled, and therefore the nobility pitched upon Draco to undertake this arduous employment (B).

DRACO

[d] Suidas. in Δρακων.

(B) When it is ſaid, that Draco firſt gave laws to the Athenians, it muſt be underſtood in an extenſive ſenſe, for otherwiſe it is certain, that Ceres was the firſt who taught the Athenians to lead a ſocial life, and to become ſubject to the wiſeſt amongſt them,

Draco was archon in the second, though some say in the last, year of the thirty-ninth olympiad, when it is supposed he published his laws. Though the name of this great man occurs frequently in history, yet we no where find so much as ten lines together relating to him and his institutions, which is certainly the reason that the collectors of Greek history have written so superficially about them. We cannot pretend to supply their deficiencies; but from the scattered fragments relating to him, we will give the reader the best account of him and his laws that we can. He was without doubt a man noble by birth, and endued with high qualifications. He was learned, virtuous, and a true lover of his country, but at the same time severe in his temper, and extremely rigid in the rules which he laid down for the government of Athens [e]. He esteemed the taking away of life so high a crime, that, to imprint a deep abhorrence thereof in the minds of men, he ordained, that process should be carried on even against inanimate things, if they had accidentally caused the death of any person. So that for instance, a statue, which had fallen upon and killed a man, was banished, it being rendered criminal for any one to keep it in Attica [f]. Happy had it been for himself and for his country, if the same spirit of humanity had reigned throughout his institutions; but them, that their wisdom might be made generally beneficial. It is commonly believed, that Ceres gave these laws by her favourite Triptolemus, and we are farther told what those laws were, the whole body of them being comprized in one line; Honour your parents; Worship the gods; Hurt not animals (5). These precepts were retained likewise by Draco, and made the very foundation of his institutions, yet notwithstanding all this, he was, in the sense we usually take the word in, the legislator of the Athenian, since he first restrained the magistrates from pronouncing arbitrary judgments, and declared what actions were criminal, and in what manner such as committed them should be punished.

*Year of the Flood, 2389. Year before Christ, 614.

[e] A. Gellius. Noct. Attic. lib. ii. c. 18. Tatian. Orat. cont. Græcos. Clem. Strom. l. i. [f] Pausan. Attic.

(5) Porphyr. de Abstinentia.

* The authors having in the history of the Phrygians, Athenians, and Achæans, changed their chronology, adding five years to the time between the flood and the birth of Christ, making it 3003 years, it is thought proper to take notice of it in this place.

but ſo it was, that he puniſhed all things with death, even indolence; and the taking of an apple was as ſeverely puniſhed as ſacrilege, for which he himſelf aſſigned this reaſon; Small faults ſeem to me worthy of death, and for the moſt flagrant offences I can find no higher puniſhment [g]. The care of executing theſe laws he intruſted chiefly with the Ephetæ, a court we have heretofore mentioned, which he took upon him to reform in many reſpects, whence he is by ſome ſaid to have inſtituted it, but that is a miſtake. He did indeed make it ſuperior to the Areopagus, to which it was before inferior, and Solon, reſtoring the precedency of the laſt-mentioned court, has been by a like miſtake reported to be the inſtitutor thereof [h]. Draco was far in years when he gave laws to Athens; ſome have been of opinion, that he borrowed moſt of his principles from the books of the Phœnicians, but this can hardly be proved [i]; certain it is, that his inſtitutions were not ſtiled Nomoi, but Theſmoi, i. e. not laws, but ſanctions, as if they proceeded from more than human wiſdom [k]; but this did not hinder their falling into diſlike with the Athenians, even in his life-time; and as their diſlike was always fatal, he was obliged to retire from Athens, from whence he went to the iſland of Ægina, where he was received with the higheſt reſpect; but the favour of the inhabitants of that country proved more fatal to him than the hatred of the Athenians. For coming one day into the theatre, the audience, to ſhew their regard for him, threw, as the cuſtom of that age was, their bonnets and cloaks upon him, and the multitude of theſe being very great, they ſtifled the old man, who was too weak to diſengage himſelf from that load, their inconſiderate kindneſs caſt over him [l]. Ariſtotle tells us, that Herodicus was wont to ſay, That his inſtitutions ſeemed rather to have come from a dragon than a man, alluding to his name [m], and Demades rendered himſelf famous by obſerving, that Draco's laws were not written with ink, but blood [n]. It may be the violence of the age in which he lived, and the natural turbulency of the Athenian people, made that legiſlator have recourſe to ſo harſh a method; for that he was not of altogether altogether ſo ſavage a temper, as he is generally repreſented, may be probably conjectured from thoſe fragments of his laws which are yet undevoured by time, and from the knowledge we have of his being ſtrongly inclined to poetry, a ſtudy ſeldom agreeable to cruel minds ° (C).

[g] Plutarch. in vita Solon. [h] Potter's Archæolog. vol. i. p. 102. [i] Joſeph. contr. Apion. [k] Ælian. hiſt. var. l. viii. c. 10. [l] Heſych. Illuſt. de Philoſ. [m] Rhet. l. ii. c. 23. [n] Plutarch. in vit. Solon.

NOTHING conſiderable happened at Athens from the time of Draco's archonſhip, till that republic engaged herſelf in a war with the Mityleneans about the city of Sigeium, which was ſeated near the mouth of the river Scamander; the Athenian army was commanded by Phrynon, a perſon equally remarkable for the comelineſs of his form and the generoſity of his mind. The Mityleneans were commanded in chief by Pittacus, one of the famous ſages of Greece; as theſe commanders looked on the honour of their ſeveral countries to be engaged in this buſineſs, they exerted their utmoſt abilities with equal ſucceſs. At laſt theſe chiefs met in ſingle combat, wherein Phrynon de-

Year of the Flood, 2397. Year before Chriſt, 606.

° Vide Note C.

(C) Ariſtotle ſpeaks very ſlightly of Draco's laws. He ſays, they had nothing extraordinary in them except their cruelty (6); which expreſſion, as I apprehend, hath given occaſion to the cenſures of many other authors. With reſpect to Draco's laws, what fragments ſtill remain put it not in our power to decide either for him or againſt him. Porphyry hath preſerved a part of one of his laws, which runs thus: It is an everlaſting law in Attica, that the gods are to be worſhipped, and the heroes alſo, according to the cuſtoms of our anceſtors and in private only, with good words, firſt-fruits, and annual libations (7). This ſeems to have been a commentary on Triptolemus's laws, and is declarative only of the manner in which the gods and heroes ought to be worſhipped. Heſychius (8) mentions a law, whereby a perſon, eaſing himſelf in the temple of Apollo, was adjudged to ſuffer death. It is highly likely, that, amidſt the diſturbances which made laws neceſſary, Draco ſaw, or at leaſt thought he ſaw, a neceſſity of puniſhing very ſeverely, ſince the licentiouſneſs of the people was grown to ſuch a pitch, that nothing but harſh meaſures could force them within their former bounds. After all, the extravagant ſeverity of his Theſmoi or Sanctions, like an edge too finely ground, hindered them from ſtriking deep, ſo that by degrees they grew into diſſuetude, ſo that the commonwealth ſtood more in need of new laws, than ever ſhe ſtood in need of Draco's.

(6) Ariſt. Polit. lib. ii. c. 10. (7) De Abſtinent. (8) Ap. Ant. Thyſ. Coll. leg. Ath. & Rom.

pended on his valour only, but Pittacus made use of craft; for concealing behind his shield a net, he therewith suddenly entangled Phrynon, and easily slew him; but this not putting an end to the war, Periander, tyrant of Corinth, interposed, and both parties having submitted the dispute to his arbitration, he decreed, that Sigeium should belong to the Athenians. This happened in the third year of the forty-third olympiad [p] (D).

Year of the Flood, 2404. Year before Christ 599.

ABOUT seven years after this war was ended, Athens was torn by civil dissensions; Cylon, a man of a most ancient family, son in-law to Theagenes tyrant of Megara, whose affable behaviour had gained him many friends, and whose great riches procured him many dependants, formed in his own mind a design of seizing the supreme power; this he communicated to such as he thought were fit to be trusted with so important a secret, and they concurring with him in his undertaking, it was agreed to consult the oracle of Apollo, when would be the fittest time for them to put this design in execution. The oracle answered, When the citizens were employed in celebrating the highest feast to Jupiter. Cylon and his associates waited therefore for the forty-fifth olympiad, and, when many of the citizens were gone to the olympic games, the conspirators made themselves masters of the citadel. Megacles, who was at that time archon, with his eight associates and the whole

[p] Polyæn. Stratag. lib. i. c. 25. Plutarch. de Malign. Herodot.

(D) The war between the Mityleneans and the Athenians about the city of Sigeium hath cost the learned a good deal of trouble. Herodotus doth not say any thing of Pittacus in the account he gives us of this business; but Plutarch alledges this as one instance of his malignity, and the little inclination he had to do any but the Athenians justice (9). But then Plutarch, in commending excessively Pittacus's ensnaring Phrynon, seems to speak him a little prejudiced on that side, at least as the rules of honour are now settled. Polyænus tells this story without making any farther comment thereon, than that Pittacus was undoubtedly the first inventor of the art of net-fighting (10), which was afterwards common among the Romans in their shews, but with this difference from Pittacus's behaviour, that the Retiarius fought openly with his net and his dagger, whereas Phrynon thought nothing of a net till he found himself intangled in it.

(9) Plutarch. de Malign. Herodot. (10) Polyæn. Stratag. lib. i. c. 28.

whole power of Athens, immediately beſieged them therein, and Cylon and his party found themſelves ſo exceedingly diſtreſſed, eſpecially for proviſions and water, that they knew not what to do. Their chief and his brother found means to make their eſcape, but the meaner ſort were left to ſhift for themſelves [q]. In this extremity they fled to the temple of Minerva, and took ſanctuary therein; Megacles perſuaded them with much ado to come down from thence, and to put themſelves upon their country; when they aſſented to this, they tied a cord to the image of the goddeſs and carried the clew with them, to demonſtrate that they were ſtill under ſanctuary; but unfortunately, as they paſſed the temple of the furies, the line ſnapt of itſelf, and Megacles and his officers, conſtruing this into a renunciation by the goddeſs, fell upon them without mercy, and put them to death as faſt as they could: ſuch as were without the temple were immediately diſpatched: ſuch as retired thither again were killed at the feet of the altars. In a word, none eſcaped but ſuch as bribed the wives of the officers of juſtice. But this did not put an end to the ſedition; the remains of Cylon's faction created great diſturbances, not by pretending to domineer over their countrymen, but by inſinuating, that the violation of Minerva's ſanctuary had drawn down the anger of heaven, of which all the croſſes that happened to the republic were cited as indubitable proofs. Theſe diſcourſes had ſuch an effect, that Megacles and his officers were ſtiled execrable, and held to be perſons under the peculiar diſpleaſure of the gods [r]. What happened in conſequence of this we ſhall ſhortly ſee: In the mean time let us obſerve, that the oracle of Apollo juſtified itſelf, by declaring that Cylon and his adherents miſtook the feaſt; that intended by the oracle being the Diaſia held in Athens to the honour of Jupiter, and not the olympic games [f] (E).

[q] Herodot. l. v. Thucyd. lib. i. [r] Plutarch. in vita Solon.
[f] Dacier. in Plutarch ubi ſupra.

(E) There was for a long time after the democracy took place a ſtrong party againſt it, who left no meaſures untried in order, if poſſible, to reſtore their ancient form of government. Cylon, as a man of quality, repined at the ſudden change of the magiſtrates and at the thoughts of aſking that as a favour which he apprehended to be due to him as his birth-right. The deſign of

WHILE Athens was in this confusion, the Megarensians attacked Nisea, and having taken it, afterwards drove the Athenians out of Salamis, which the latter endeavoured to recover, but in vain, for the Megarensians, continually victorious, cut off such numbers of them, that at last, despairing of success and afflicted with the mighty loss they had received, the Athenians made a law, that it should be capital for any one to propose to attempt the recovery of Salamis [t]. About this time also the city was exceedingly disturbed with superstitious fears and frightful appearances: this moved them to consult the Delphic oracle, and the answer they received was, that the city must be expiated. Upon this Nicias was sent to Crete to bring from thence Epimenides the Phestian, who was reputed a holy man, beloved of the gods, and one who had deep skill in the mysteries of religion. He coming to Athens took some sheep that were all black, and others that were all white; these he led into the Areopagus, and turning them loose there, directed certain persons to follow them, who should mark where they couched, and there sacrifice them to the local deity. This being done, altars were erected in all these places to perpetuate the memory of this solemn expiation. Epimenides directed also many temples and chapels to be erected without the city, two of which have been particularly seizing the citadel, if it had succeeded, would in all probability have ended the dispute in his favour, but the number he drew together, proving far inferior to those who were under the direction of the archons, obliged him to act otherwise than he expected, and to endure a siege where he hoped to make a conquest (11). In the citadel there were two temples to Minerva, that seated in the middle was stiled Parthenion, alluding to her constant preservation of her virginity: it was afterwards burnt by the Persians, but repaired by Pericles with such skill as well as magnificence, that the remains thereof are to this day admirable, and shew it to be one of the finest structures in the world (12). As to the proceeding against Cylon's confederates, it was against the common custom of Greece, yet in these respects they were more scrupulous than any other people, as we shall see in the sequel of this history, when we come to speak of the ordinances relating to their religion.

[t] Plutarch. ubi supra.

(11) Herodot. Thucyd. Plutarch. in vit. Solonis. (12) Cecropia.

cularly noted, viz. the chapel of Contumely, and the chapel of Impudence. He is reported to have looked wiſtfully on the port of Munychia for a long time, and afterwards to have ſaid to thoſe that were near him, How blind is man to future things, for did the Athenians foreſee what miſchief will one day be derived to them from that place, they would eat it with their teeth [u]. This prediction was fulfilled two hundred and ſeventy years after, when Antipater conſtrained the Athenians to admit his gariſon into that place. During his ſtay at Athens he became intimately acquainted with Solon, who was already taken notice of for his ſhining parts and admirable moderation. As for Epimenides, the Athenians were highly ſatisfied with what he did for them, and, in token of their gratitude, offered him preſents of great value and conſiderable honours; but he requeſted only a branch of the ſacred olive, and this being given him, he returned well-ſatisfied to Crete [x] (F).

[u] Diogen. Laertius. in vita Epimen. [x] Plutarch. in vita Solon.

(F) This Epimenides was a very extraordinary perſon, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in the hiſtory of Crete. Here we have nothing to ſay of him farther, than what relates to luſtrating or cleanſing cities, Diogenes Laertius tells us, that he was the inventor of this art, or rather that he was the firſt that luſtrated houſes or fields, which, if ſpoken of Greece, may be true, for Moſes had long before taught ſomething of this nature to the Jews. This was practiſed on the great day of atonement, which might very well be called the annual luſtration of Iſrael. Upon that day the prieſt took for himſelf a young bullock, and for the people two goats; the bullock the prieſt offered for himſelf: then he caſt lots upon the goats, one was called the goat of Jehovah and was offered; the other Azazel, or as we tranſlate it, the ſcape goat; the latter was preſented alſo before the altar of God, and the prieſt, laying his hands upon him, confeſſed all the iniquities of the children of Iſrael and all their tranſgreſſions, which Moſes calls putting them upon the head of the goat, which was then ſent away into the wilderneſs, becauſe he bore upon him all their iniquities unto a land of ſeparation (13). The reader will eaſily ſee that we have given this account of the ſcape-goat here, that he might apply it to what is ſaid of Epimenides's method of cleanſing the city of Athens, which has a viſible reſemblance thereto, and was in all probability copied therefrom, or from the cuſtom of ſome other eaſtern nation, which originally borrowed it from the Hebrews. There were

(13) Leviticus xvi.

It was about this time that Solon, whom we before mentioned, began to ſhew himſelf to his countrymen, and to diſplay were, however, other ceremonies practiſed for the ſame purpoſe. Tzetzes in his poetical chronicle has given us a very remarkable account of the manner in which luſtrations were made, their cauſes, and effects.

Thus was in ancient times luſtration made;
When any city groan'd beneath the weight
Of famine, plague, or worſe calamity,
Forthwith a grateful victim was prepared,
Which at the holy altar when they had placed,
They caſt upon the pile, cheeſe, cakes, and figs;
Then ſtriking quick ſeven times its genitals
With ſea-leeks, and wild-figs, and other fruits,
Rude nature's product without help of art,
Burn it with wood cut from unplanted trees,
Next tow'rds the wind the ſportive aſhes caſt
Upon the ſea; thus they the dreadful ills,
With which the city laboured, drove away (14).

As to Epimenides, Strabo reports, that he made a great uſe of verſes and of hymns in his purifications (15), and Suidas tells us, that he wrote in verſe many rules and inſtructions for theſe ſort of rites (16). Laertius reports, that as he was about to mark out a place for a temple to three nymphs, a voice from heaven gave him this direction, not to the nymphs, but to Jupiter. Beſides the prophecy before mentioned relating to the haven Munychia, Epimenides uttered another during his ſtay at Athens, for hearing, that the citizens were alarmed at the progreſs of the Perſian power at ſea, he adviſed them to make themſelves eaſy, for that the Perſians would not for many years attempt any thing againſt the Greeks, and when they did, they would receive greater loſs themſelves than they would be able to bring upon the ſtates they ſought to deſtroy (17). Having related ſuch ſtrange things of this prophet and philoſopher, it will not be amiſs to cloſe this note with obſerving, that the ſacred olive, mentioned above, was the tree produced by Minerva when ſhe contended with Neptune, and that Ariſtotle was a downright infidel with reſpect to the ſtories of Emimenides's foretelling future events; that famous ſage being of (14) Tzetes. Chil. Hiſt. v. c. xxiii. (15) Geogr. lib. x. (16) In voce Επιμ. (17) In vit. Epimenid.

diſplay thoſe rare qualities which rendered him ſo deſervedly beloved while living, and which have preſerved uninjured, for ſo long a tract of time, the fame which he acquired. He was in every reſpect formed to make a figure in the Athenian commonwealth. He was noble by birth, if not more, for he deſcended lineally from Codrus; his mother was nearly related to the mother of Piſiſtratus, and he had a brother whoſe name was Dropides, who was archon the year after himſelf[y]. We are told, that he was born at Salamis, however, we think, that may be doubted from certain verſes of his, which we ſhall have occaſion to quote. As honourable as his family was, the generoſity of his father left Solon in no very happy (G) condition; this as it is generally believed, engaged him to merchandize, though he might otherwiſe have ſubſiſted well enough by the aſſiſtance of his friends, but this did not ſuit that greatneſs of ſoul which he inherited, he choſe rather to travel and to merchandize, that he might live independently at home on his return, and not ſuffer that houſe to receive kindneſſes, whoſe cuſtom it had been to beſtow them. It is plain, both from his actions and his writings, that he was a diſintereſted patriot. The ſhameful decree, that none under pain of death ſhould mention the recovery of Salamis, grieved him to the heart; he therefore compoſed an elegy, conſiſting of a hundred verſes, to inflame the minds of the people againſt the Megarenſians, who had taken from them that iſland. Having digeſted this elegy thoroughly in his mind, he ran into the market place as if he had been mad, with his night-cap on his head, and aſcending the ſtool of the common cryer, he repeated with great vehemence the elegy he had compoſed, to the people who had gathered round him; that poem began thus:

From Salamis, behold a cryer come
Who brings you news, in nervous verſes home.

But the moſt moving ſtrokes in this celebrated poem were contained in the following verſes:

Rather

[y] Diog. Laert. vit. Solon.

of opinion, our luſtrator's talents lay quite another way, viz. in diſcovering what old crimes had produced preſent puniſhments, and how atonement might be made, and thoſe ills taken away.

Rather than Athens, would I owed my birth,
To Pholegondrian, or Sicinian earth;
Since men will ſay, where-ever I am toſt,
He's of that daſtard race, who Salamis have loſt.

It ended thus:

To Salamis let us renew our claim,
And, with the iſle reſtored, reſtore our fame.

Piſiſtratus, who, as we before obſerved, was his near relation, mixed himſelf with the crowd which gathered round this pretended madman; he, by his perſuaſive eloquence, heightened that martial rage which Solon had kindled by his verſes, ſo that of a ſudden the ſentiments of the Athenians were wholly changed, and they determined to aſſert their right to Salamis, and decreed a war accordingly. It is not eaſy to ſay who was appointed commander in chief of this expedition, ſome ſay Solon, and that Piſiſtratus accompanied him; others ſay, that Piſiſtratus went general, and that Solon aſſiſted him with his advice [z].

THERE was various accounts of the manner in which Salamis was again reduced under the Athenian power, the moſt current ſtory is, that Solon coming with Piſiſtratus to Colias, and finding the women buſy there in celebrating according [z] Plut. Diog. Laert. Pauſan. &c.

(G) The name of Solon's father was Euphorion, or, as moſt writers affirm, Execeſtides, and we know nothing more of him, than that, notwithſtanding his liberality and nobility of his deſcent, he was far from being conſiderable in Athens. Ariſtotle reckons Solon himſelf among the inferior citizens, and quotes his own works to prove it; the truth is, that Solon was never rich, it may be becauſe he was always honeſt: ſomething of this ſort ſeems to be implied in the following verſes, which are accounted excellent:

Many unjuſt grow rich, and pious poor;
We would not change our virtue for their ſtore;
For conſtant virtue is a ſolid baſe,
Riches from man to man uncertain paſs (19).

In his youth he was mightily addicted to poetry, and as he was in thoſe days unconfined, and had no very weighty affairs upon his hands, he wrote and publiſhed a great many poems; certain it is, that all he did in this way deſerves the higheſt commendation; his language is always pure, his thoughts alike delicate and clear, his ſubjects

(19) Plutarch. in vita Solonis.

ing to the cuſtom the feaſt of Ceres, ſent a confident of his to Salamis, who, pretending to be no friend of that people, told the inhabitants, that if they had a mind to ſeize the faireſt of the Athenian ladies, they might do it by paſſing over to Colias. The Megarenſians, giving eaſy credit to what this man ſaid, preſently fitted out a ſhip, which Solon perceiving from the oppoſite ſhore, immediately diſmiſſed the women, and having dreſſed a ſufficient number of beardleſs youths in female habits, under which they concealed every one a dagger, he ſent them to the ſea-ſide, to dance and divert themſelves as the women were wont to do. When thoſe who came from Salamis drew near the coaſt, and ſaw theſe young people ſkipping up and down, they ſtrove who ſhould leap firſt out of the veſſel, and running one and all to catch theſe damſels their ſhip was ſurprized, themſelves murdered, and the Athenians, embarking on board their veſſel, ſailed immediately to Salamis and took it. Polyænus has inſerted this relation, and Plutarch alſo admits, that it was the current account of this buſineſs, he tells us, however, that others had related it after this manner: The firſt thing Solon did, after he was appointed director of this expedition, was to conſult the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, from whom he received this reſponſe; ſubjects uſeful and ſublime, and therefore Plato had juſt reaſon to ſay, that if he had finiſhed all his poems, and particularly the hiſtory he brought out of Egypt, and had taken time to reviſe and correct them as others did, neither Homer, Heſiod, or any other ancient would have been more famous (20). As he was an excellent poet himſelf, he had a juſt and high idea of the power of verſe, which he thought capable of making the ſtrongeſt impreſſions on the mind of man; yet he was a great orator, and wrote in proſe with peculiar neatneſs of expreſſion and perſpicuity. It is evident, both from the life and writings of this great man, that he was a perſon not only of exalted virtue, but of a moſt pleaſant and agreeable temper. He loved ſociety, and made it his buſineſs to promote the welfare thereof, he conſidered men as men, he kept both their capacity for virtue and their proneneſs to evil in his view, adapting his laws ſo as to ſtrengthen and ſupport the one, and to check and keep under the other; hence his inſtitutions are as remarkable for their ſweetneſs and practicability, as thoſe of Lycurgus are for harſhneſs and forcing of human nature. The reader will excuſe this ſhort digreſſion as to the character of Solon, ſince it is abſolutely neceſſary for the framing of a right idea of his conduct as a legiſlator.

Let

(20) In Timæa.

Let ſacrifice be to thoſe heroes paid,
Who under the Aſopian ground are laid,
And dead, are by the ſetting ſun ſurvey'd.

Solon took upon him to explain this dark prediction, and was ſo happy as to interpret it right. He gueſſed, that the heroes mentioned by the oracle were Periphemus and Cychris, he ſailed therefore by night to Salamis, and offered at their tombs. This being performed, he gathered a body of five-hundred Athenian volunteers, who, in caſe they ſucceeded, were to have the government of the iſland. Theſe he embarqued in a galley of thirty oars and in a conſiderable number of fiſhing-boats, and ſetting ſail in the evening, arrived the day following in a bay of the iſle of Salamis which looked towards Eubœa. The next morning the whole iſland was alarmed, though they did not well know on what account; at laſt the Athenian galley was deſcried, the Megarenſians thereupon manned out a ſtout ſhip, which doubling the cape in order to attack the galley, was on a ſudden ſurrounded by Solon's armed boats, and quickly taken. The Athenians having put to death all the men ſurprized in this veſſel, filled it with their choiceſt youth dreſſed in the Megarenſian habits, which procured them an eaſy enterance into the port, where, when they arrived, they made all imaginable haſte on ſhore, and attacked thoſe who came to welcome them as their friends. In the mean time, the remainder of the Athenians marched by land, and attacked the city on the other ſide with ſuch fury, that it was ſpeedily taken. In memory of this extraordinary event they inſtituted a ſolemn feaſt, during which an Athenian ſhip came as it were privately into the harbour, and the people running down to meet it, an armed man jumped on ſhore, and ran towards the promontory Sciradium, as if to join his companions who had marched by land. Near this place there ſtood a temple to Mars, which was ſuppoſed to have been erected by Solon in memory of this victory which put the Athenians in poſſeſſion of the whole iſland. The reſt of the Megarenſians retired to their own country in virtue of a treaty concluded with Solon. The Megarenſians ſo highly reſented the loſs of Salamis, that notwithſtanding the treaty they preſently ſent new forces thither, againſt whom the Athenians fought, ſometimes with good, ſometimes with ill, fortune. At laſt it was decreed to leave this diſpute to the Lacedæmonians, who commiſſioned the five following perſons, viz. Critolaides, Amompharetus, Hypſechidas, Anaxilaus, and Cleomenes to hear both parties. Solon pleaded pleaded on this occaſion the cauſe of his country, and ſome have ſuggeſted, that he practiſed a little fraud to make it go the better; they ſay, that finding the following verſe in Homer,

Ajax from Salamis twelve frigats brought,

He added thereto,

And ranged their troops where the Athenians fought.

From whence he would have inferred, that Salamis even at that time belonged to the Athenians. But the friends of Solon aſſert, that this is an idle ſtory, and that their great orator made uſe of quite another proof; he made it appear, ſay they, that Phliæus and Euryſaces the ſons of Ajax ſettled at Athens, and, being received into the number of citizens, gave up that iſland to the Athenians, Phliæus becoming ſo conſiderable a perſon, that one of its wards took its name from him. He urged farther, that the perſons buried in Salamis, lay with their faces to the weſt agreeable to the cuſtom of the Athenians, and directly contrary to that of the Megarenſians, who turned the faces of their dead towards the eaſt, and that moreover only one perſon was laid in a grave, which likewiſe correſponded with the practice of the Athenians, and differed from the Megarenſian cuſtom, which was to bury three or four in one grave [a]. It would be needleſs to trouble the reader with any farther circumſtances of this debate; let it ſuffice then to ſay, that we are informed by Ælian, Solon carried his cauſe, not by the arts of a fallacious eloquence, but by the force of ſtrong arguments, urged in plain and perſpicuous terms [b].

On the return of Solon to Athens he was highly extolled by the people, to whom he quickly afforded a new occaſion of admiring his wiſdom. It happened that the inhabitants of Cirrha, a town ſeated in the bay of Corinth, after having by repeated incurſions waſted the territory of Delphi, beſieged the city itſelf, from a greedy deſire of making themſelves maſters of the mighty riches contained in the temple of Apollo. Advice of this being ſent to the Amphictyons, who were the ſtates-general of Greece, Solon adviſed, that this matter ſhould be univerſally reſented, and that all the Greek ſtates ſhould immediately join, in ſaving the Delphic oracle and puniſhing the impiety of the Cirrhæans, with which the council immediately complied, and decreed a general war againſt that people. Solon was was not, however, appointed general of this expedition, as Hermippus from another author relates, nor did he command the Athenian troops. Clysthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, commanded in chief, and Alcmæon was general of the Athenian quota, Solon went, however, as counsellor or assistant to Clysthenes, and it was by his advice that the war was conducted to a prosperous issue. For when the Greek army had besieged Cirrha some time, without any great sign of success, Apollo was consulted, who answered,

[a] Plut. in vita. Solon. Diogen. Laert. [b] Var. Hiſt. lib. vii. cap. 19.

In vain you hope to take the place, before
The sea's blue waves roll o'er the hallowed shore.

This response struck the army with surprise, from whence Solon extricated them, by advising Clysthenes to consecrate solemnly the whole territories of Cirrha to the Delphic Apollo, whence it would follow, that the sea must wash the sacred coast [c]. Pausanias tells us, that he made use of another stratagem, which was this, he caused the channel of the river Plistus to be turned, which runs through the city of Cirrha, hoping thereby to have distressed the inhabitants for water; but they having a great many wells, his scheme did not thoroughly succeed, which as soon as he perceived, he caused a vast quantity of hellebore roots to be sliced and thrown into the Plistus, and when the waters were thoroughly impregnated with the juice of these roots, he caused the river to be turned back into its old channel. The Cirrhæans, overjoyed at the sight of running water, came down in troops and drank eagerly thereof, upon this an epidemic flux ensued, and the citizens being no longer able to defend the walls, the place was presently taken. Some authors have attributed this to Clysthenes, but that was because he commanded in chief, and Solon was no more than his counsellor. On the reduction of this place the inhabitants were severely punished, and Cirrha became thenceforward the arsenal of Delphi [d].

When Solon returned home from this expedition, he found all things out of order, the remnant of Cylon's faction began to gather strength, and to excite mighty disturbances in the city. The pretence of religion enabled them to do all this. They gave out confidently, that all the misfortunes the republic had met with had their source from the anger of the gods, occasioned by the impious pious cruelty of Megacles and his faction. It happened, that the loss of Salamis a second time coincided with this clamour, and now, as many writers report, Epimenides came and lustrated the city, which is indeed highly probable, if there were but sufficient authority to fix his arrival at Athens so low as this sedition must have happened. But to return to the proper subject of our history: Solon interposed on this occasion, and persuaded those who were stiled execrable to abide a trial. To this when they had consented, three hundred persons were chosen to judge them, one Myron of the Phlyensian ward taking upon him to prosecute, which he did with such effect, that the three-hundred condemned such of Megacles's faction as were living to perpetual banishment, and caused the bones of such as were dead to be taken up and cast without the limits of their country; thus this sedition was appeased, and Athens became once more at rest [e].

[c] Plut. in vita Solon. [d] Pausan. in Phocicis. Polyæn. Strat. lib. iii. c. 7. Suidas in voce Σολων.

The turbulent disposition of the inhabitants of Attica would not suffer them to remain long in quiet, they therefore began to be out of humour with their constitution, though they could not agree how it should be mended. These disputes divided the Athenians into three parties, the Diacrii, Pediæi, and Paralii; the first of these were the inhabitants of the hilly country, who declared positively for perfect democracy; the second, dwelling in the lower part of the country, and being far more opulent, were for an oligarchy, supposing, that the government would then be for the most part in their hands; the third party living on the coast were men of moderate principles, and in consequence thereof desired a mixt government. In the midst of these debates there sprung up a new cause of trouble, the rich, taking advantage of the laws, oppressed and enslaved the poorer sort in such a manner, that they were unable to bear it. The meaner people, as Plutarch tells us, being indebted to the rich, either tilled their grounds, and paid them the sixth part of their produce, or engaged their bodies for their debts, so that some were made slaves at home, and many sold abroad; nay, to such a pitch was this mischief grown, that many sold their children to pay their creditors, and others in despair quitted Attica and went elsewhere. Such, however, as had more spirits than the rest were for throwing off a yoke too heavy to be born; these began to look about for a leader, declaring openly openly enough, that they intended to make a thorough change in the government, to free ſuch as their creditors had brought into bondage, and to make a repartition of lands. In this deſperate ſituation the citizens in general caſt their eyes upon Solon. Thoſe who were in greateſt fear of what might happen from preſent troubles were for exalting him to ſovereignty; nay, the moſt prudent Athenians, when they conſidered how difficult a thing it would be to reform ſo diſordered a commonwealth by law and reaſon, inclined to have him created prince. It was likewiſe aſſerted, that the oracle of Apollo adviſed the ſame thing in the following reſponſe directed to Solon:

[e] Plutarch. in vita Solon. Diogen. Laert. in vita Solonis.

Aſſume the helm, the ſhip with prudence guide,
And thouſands will aſſiſt to ſtem the tide.

What rendered Solon ſo popular was a ſaying of his, which all liked and few underſtood; it was this, Equality breeds no ſtrife; the rich interpreted this of dignity and power, the poor of riches and ſtate. Thoſe therefore who agreed in nothing elſe, were unanimous in their reſpect towards him; the rich were contented to ſubmit to his deciſions, becauſe he was himſelf a man of fortune, and the poor dreading nothing from one ſo mild in temper, and ſo remarkably honeſt. The private friends of Solon encouraged him to lay hold of ſo fair an opportunity, and to aſſume the regal dignity, adding, that it was a ſhame ſo wiſe a man ſhould be frighted with a name, and reject a legal ſovereignty becauſe it reſembled tyranny. This great man withſtood alike the deſires of the many, and the perſuaſions of the few: he aſſured the former, that he would never become maſter of his countrymen, and he told the latter, that how fair a ſpot ſoever tyranny might ſeem, it had this misfortune, that it had no paſſage out; and when his intimates laughed at this reſolution of his, and quoted the example of Tynondas tyrant of Eubœa, and Pittacus at that time prince of Mitylene, he contented himſelf with writing thus to Phocus, who it ſeems preſſed him moſt, to ſhew that he was ſteady in his reſolution:

That I have Athens ſpar'd, preſerved my fame,
Nor ſoil'd my glory with a tyrant's name:
That, when I might have kill'd, I choſe to ſave,
I bluſh not, for I think the action brave:
And that I have done more than moſt men have.

It was upon this occaſion that Solon ſhewed a ſpirit of patriotiſm, which perhaps never had its equal: He condeſcended ſcended ſo far as to make uſe of fraud for the good of others, and with a prodigious greatneſs of ſoul diſſembled with and cheated both parties, that he might ſave all. If he would have accepted the tyranny, he would immediately have acquired whatever he could wiſh, and might have done his country good too; he refuſed this as far as it might have benefited himſelf, and yet took upon him all the care and trouble of a prince to benefit the people; thus he demonſtrated, that neither fear nor indolence had any ſhare in his reſolution [f].

He was choſen archon without having recourſe to lots, and, when he was choſen, he diſappointed the hopes of both parties; where-ever he found things tolerably well under the old conſtitution, he refuſed to alter them at all, and was at extraordinary pains to explain the reaſon and neceſſity of thoſe changes he did make, laying this down as a maxim, 'That thoſe laws will be beſt obſerved which 'power and juſtice equally ſupport.' He was a perfect judge of human nature, and ſought to rule men by ſhewing them it was their intereſt to obey, and not by attempting to force them upon whatever he eſteemed right, and therefore he anſwered a perſon who aſked him, whether he had given the Athenians the beſt laws in his power; I have eſtabliſhed the beſt they could receive; knowing well, that it was an impoſſible thing to pleaſe all, he made it his utmoſt care not mightily to diſpleaſe any, whence it followed, that none ſought to abrogate the laws he gave them.

Solon compoſes the diſſentions of the Athenians.

As to the main occaſion of the ſedition, viz. the oppreſſed ſtate of the meaner ſort, he certainly took it away in a great meaſure by a contrivance which he ſtiled Siſachthia, i. e. a diſcharge; but what this was authors are not agreed on, ſome ſay, that he releaſed all debts then in being, and prohibited for the future the making of any man's body liable for a debt. Others affirm, that the poor were eaſed, not by cancelling their debts, but by lowering the intereſt, and encreaſing the value of money, a Mina, which before was worth ſeventy-three drachms only, being by him made equal to a hundred, which was of great advantage to the debtor, and did the creditor no hurt at all. But after all, it is more probable, that the Siſachthia was a total diſcharge or remiſſion, otherwiſe Solon would hardly have boaſted in his verſes, that by this means he had removed moved the many marks of mortgages which were every where frequent; for the Athenians had a cuſtom of hanging up billets to ſhew, that houſes were engaged for ſuch or ſuch a ſum of money; that he had freed from apprehenſion ſuch as were driven to deſpair; called home exiles, whom the dread of their creditors had kept abroad, till they forgot their native language, and delivered from bondage ſuch as were ſlaves in their native ſoil. In the midſt of all his glory an unlucky accident befel him, which for a time hurt his reputation, and had almoſt overturned all his ſchemes. Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus, his intimate friends, having been conſulted by him on an oration, he had prepared to engage the people to conſent to the diſcharge of debts, on a promiſe that he would attempt nothing as to lands; theſe men, betraying the truſt he repoſed in them, borrowed great ſums of money, and purchaſed eſtates before the edict came out; this was at firſt thought to have been the effect of connivance, but this aſperſion was preſently wiped off, when it appeared, that Solon himſelf was a ſufferer, as ſome ſay, five talents, others ſeven, others fifteen, which he had lent out at intereſt, and which in conſequence of his own law he loſt: his friends, however, could never recover their credit, but were for ever ſtigmatized with the opprobrious appellation of Chreocopidæ, i. e. Debt-ſinkers [g].

[f] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Diogen. Laert. ubi ſupra.

The Athenians were as little pleaſed with Solon's management as with their former condition, the rich and the poor were equally diſſatisfied; the former thought he had done too much in cancelling their debts, the latter thought he had done too little, becauſe he had not divided the lands of Attica equally amongſt them. It is from Solon himſelf that we have this account, and we have it in his uſual manner, that is, in verſe,

I was your darling heretofore, but now
You look upon me with contracted brow;
Had any man but I obtain'd your grace,
He would have had a ſal'ry with his place.

In a ſhort time, however, they had wit enough to diſcover that they were in the wrong, and Solon in the right, and they gave at leaſt a more public, if not a more general, token of their repentance, than they had ſhewn of their diſpleaſure; for they inſtituted a ſolemn ſacrifice in teſtimony of their acquieſcing under his inſtitution, and called it Siſachthia, [g] Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

ſachthia, at the ſame time they unanimouſly elected Solon legiſlator of Athens, giving him power, not only to make laws, but to alter and new-model their conſtitution as he thought proper [h].

THE firſt thing this great man did, after his country had conferred upon him ſo extraordinary an office, was, to cancel the laws of Draco, excepting only thoſe relating to murder. A proceeding perfectly right, ſince there is nothing more diſhonourable, and at the ſame time more dangerous, to a ſtate than latent laws, i. e. ſuch as are diſuſed, and yet in being, which was the caſe of Draco's; their ſeverity rendered them hateful, but Solon took away their authority; nor would he ſuffer his inſtitutions to bear the ſame name, as we have already ſhewn. It was the deſire of Solon to act in all reſpects moderately, he therefore reſolved to place the dernier reſort, as we phraſe it, or ſupreme power, in the people, and to leave the execution of the government to the nobles; with this view he divided the people into four degrees or ranks, the firſt of theſe conſiſted of ſuch whoſe ſtock amounted to five-hundred Medimni or meaſures of fruit, theſe he ſtiled Pentacoſiomedimni, theſe paid a talent to the public treaſury. The ſecond claſs conſiſted of ſuch as were able to keep a horſe, or were worth three-hundred meaſures, they were ſtiled Hippadatelountes, i. e. bound to find a horſe; the third claſs was made up of ſuch as were worth two hundred meaſures, they were ſtiled Zengita, which implies a middle rank, becauſe they ſtood between the knights and the loweſt order of the people, who were ſtiled Thetes; theſe were not admitted to any office, but each of them had his vote in the general aſſembly of the people, which was thought at firſt a matter of little conſequence, ſo that the nobility gave themſelves no pain about it, though in after times it was found of the higheſt conſequence, as Solon foreſaw it would be; the reaſon of this was this: Solon purpoſely drew up his laws in obſcure terms, and allowing in all caſes an appeal to the people, doubts often aroſe, appeals were conſequently frequent, and hence, though the common ſort could not attain to magiſtracy, yet they had a mighty power in the ſtate. Solon himſelf was ſo well ſatisfied with what he had done in this matter, that he celebrates it in theſe words, which ſhew at once what a regard he had for their ancient conſtitution, and for the people in general.

[h] Plutarch. ubi ſupra, &c.

The commons I ſufficient weight allow'd,
Honour from none I took, on none beſtow'd ;
In power or wealth, thoſe who the reſt outſhin'd,
Within juſt bounds I by my laws confin'd ;
Thus I preſerved, what did to each belong ;
That neither high, nor low, might ſuffer wrong.

HEREIN conſiſted the ancient democracy of Athens ; but becauſe that kind of government is in its nature more apt to change than any other, Solon, in order to ſecure it, eſtabliſhed two checks, or, if we may be allowed to make uſe of his metophor, threw out two anchors to ſecure it. The firſt of theſe was the court of Areopagus, which, though ſettled long before, had loſt much of its power by Draco's preferring the Ephetæ. In ancient times, and till Solon became legiſlator, it conſiſted of ſuch perſons as were moſt conſpicuous in the ſtate for their wealth, power, and probity ; but Solon made it a rule, that ſuch only ſhould have a ſeat therein as had ſerved the office of archon ; this had the effect he deſigned, it raiſed the reputation of the Areopagites very high, and rendered their decrees ſo wonderfully venerable, that none conteſted or repined at them through a long courſe of ages. The ſecond ſtay of the Athenian commonwealth was the ſenate, which Solon made to conſiſt of four hundred, a hundred out of each tribe. Theſe had the prior cognizance of all that was to come before the people, and nothing could be propoſed to the general aſſembly till digeſted by them, ſo that, as far as he was able, he provided againſt a thirſt of arbitrary power in the rich, and a deſire of licentious freedom in the commons ; the Areopagus being a check upon the former, as the ſenate was a curb on the latter [i].

THE general frame of the republic thus ſettled, he gave the Athenians next a body of laws, of which we have ſtill ſome remaining ; theſe were ſo much eſteemed, that the Romans ſent ambaſſadors to Athens to tranſcribe them for the uſe of their ſtate. As theſe tranſcribed laws became the baſis of the Roman Juriſprudence, which has ſince been received almoſt throughout Europe under the name of the civil law ; we may with reaſon affirm, that many of Solon's conſtitutions are yet in force. Such as are aſcribed to him by ancient authors we ſhall give a conciſe account of in this place.

WE

[i] Pollux. lib. viii. cap. 10. Plutarch, ubi ſupra. Potter's Archæologia. Meurſius. Solon, &c.

We will begin with one of the moſt extraordinary ſtatutes enacted by this law-giver, and which has given politicians the moſt trouble to underſtand; we are obliged to A. Gellius for preſerving to us the very words of this law. It runs thus: "If through diſcord and diſſenſion any ſe-
" dition or inſurrection rend the people into two parties,
" ſo that with exaſperated minds they take arms and fight
" againſt each other; he who at ſuch a time, and in ſuch
" a caſe, ſhall not engage himſelf on one ſide or other, but " ſhall endeavour to retire and ſeparate himſelf from the " evils fallen on his country, let ſuch a one, loſing houſes,
" country, and eſtate, be ſent out an exile" [k]. Cicero, ſpeaking of this law, by ſome ſlip of his memory, makes the penalty capital [l]. Plutarch explains the reaſon of it [m], as does the author firſt cited, who highly commends it and ſays, that though at firſt ſight it may ſeem dangerous to the public peace, yet in truth it was calculated to ſupport it; for the wiſe and juſt, as well as the envious and wicked, being obliged to chuſe ſome ſide, matters were eaſily accommodated; whereas, if the latter only, as is generally the caſe in other cities, had the management of factions, they would for private reaſons be continually kept up, to the great hurt, if not the utter ruin, of the ſtate [n].

The rules which Solon gave for beſtowing of heireſſes have been very harſhly cenſured; we will put them together, that the reader may ſee the general intent of the legiſlator. The next of kin to an heireſs may require her in marriage, and ſhe may likewiſe require him; if he refuſes let him pay five-hundred drachms for her dowry. If he who poſſeſſeth ſuch an inheritrix by law, as her lord and maſter, be impotent, let it be lawful for her to admit any of her huſband's neareſt kindred, and let him who has married an heireſs be obliged to viſit her thrice a month at leaſt. The intent of theſe injunctions was, that neither a rich heireſs might carry the eſtate out of her family, nor a poor one be in danger of marrying below her birth; as to allowing a woman to make choice of her huſband's neareſt relation, it might poſſibly be made in terrorem, to prevent perſons who knew themſelves to be impotent from marrying rich heireſſes, whereby ſuch a one defrauded him, to whom by this law the woman was to have recourse, of his due [o].

[k] Noct. Attic. lib. ii. cap. 12. [l] Ad Attic. lib. x. E. 1.
[m] ubi ſupra. [n] A Gellius ubi ſupra.

He enacted, that a bride should bring no more with her than three gowns and some slight household goods of little value, and that the bride and bridegroom should be shut into a room together, and there eat a quince; the bride likewise brought an earthen pan, wherein barley was parched, to the house of her husband. The meaning of all this was, that Solon desired, as much as in him lay, to render marriage no longer a mercenary business, but a contract of minds founded upon mutual affection; the eating of a quince implied, that their discourses ought to be pleasant to each other, that fruit making the breath sweet; the earthen vessel, which was called Phrogeteon, signified, that she undertook the business of the house, and would do her part towards providing for the family [p].

He ordained, that none should revile the dead, even though provoked by the children of the deceased. This law procured him great applause, and had certainly in it much both of humanity and policy. He directed, that none should revile any living person at sacred solemnities, in the courts of justice, or at public spectacles, on pain of paying three drachmæ to the person reviled, and two more to the public treasury. He likewise made a law against slander. This great man knew very well, that a general law against anger could never be put in execution. He therefore contented himself with providing, that the passions of private men should not dishonour religious ceremonies, the justice of the state, or public diversions, and that no passion should excuse calumny [q].

Before Solon's time, citizens had not the power of making wills, but a man's goods and estates went, whether he would or no, to his heir at law; but Solon, haveing abrogated this custom, enacted, that such as had no children might leave their estates to whom they pleased, preferring friendship to family, and the ties of affection to consanguinity; but then he added this proviso to his law, that the maker of such a will should be in the full possession of his senses, not wrought upon by sickness, potions, bondage dage, or the blandiſhments of a wife; wherein he ſhewed his great wiſdom by making no diſtinction between actual conſtraints and thoſe impoſed by art, both having the ſame power of putting a man out of his right mind. He likewiſe ordained, that adopted perſons ſhould make no will, but as ſoon as they had children lawfully begotten, then they were at liberty to return into the family whence they were adopted, or if they continued in it to their death, then they were to return back the eſtates to the relations of the perſons who adopted them [r].

[o] Plutarch. ubi supra. Diod. Sicul. lib. xii. Terent. Hecyr. Act. 1. scen. ii. [p] Plutarch ubi supra. Pollux. lib. i. cap. 2. 15. Isidor. Epist. lib. iii. E. 243. [q] Plutarch. ubi supra. Demosth. in orat. Leptin.

With reſpect to women and their expences, he made the following laws: when a woman travelled, he permitted her not to carry with her above three gowns, nor to carry any proviſion above the value of an obolus, her pannier or baſket was not to be above a cubit in bigneſs, nor was ſhe allowed to travel in the night, but in a chariot, and with torch-light. He forbad them likewiſe to tear their cheeks to procure mourning and lamentation at the funerals of ſuch as they had no relation to: he allowed not, that an ox ſhould be ſacrificed at funerals, nor that more than three garments ſhould be buried with them, and he forbad women to approach the monuments of perſons not related to them, except at the time of their interring; theſe laws were particularly tranſcribed by the Romans [f].

The liberty and other emoluments which were enjoyed at Athens drawing thither a great concourſe of people from other parts, Solon foreſaw, that this would have bad conſequences, if ſome means were not deviſed to make theſe people induſtricus; he therefore eſtabliſhed by law, that a ſon ſhould be releaſed from all obligation to maintain an aged father, in caſe that father had not bred him up to ſome trade. He veſted the court of Areopagus with a power of examining how people lived, and of puniſhing idleneſs: he allowed every man a right to proſecute another for that crime, and in caſe a perſon was convicted thereof thrice, he ſuffered Atimia, i. e. Infamy. Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus agree, that a law of this kind was in uſe in Egypt. It is probable therefore, that Solon, who was thoroughly acquainted with the learning of that nation, borrowed it from them, a practice for which the Greeks were famous, though at the ſame time they ſtiled thoſe nations barbarous from whom their own laws and policy were borrowed [t].

[r] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Demoſth. ubi ſupra. [f] Plutarch. ubi ſupr. Cicer. de Legib. lib. ii.

THE huſband who ſurpriſed his wife in adultery was allowed by Solon to kill the adulterer: whoever raviſhed a free woman was to be fined a hundred drachmæ. He who debaſed himſelf ſo low as to become a pandar, except to a common woman, ſuffered a fine of 20 drachmæ; a man was forbid to put either his daughter or ſiſter to the ſcandalous trade of proſtitution, unleſs he firſt ſurpriſed her with a man: he enacted, that no adultereſs ſhould be permitted to adorn herſelf, and in caſe ſhe did, he gave liberty to any that thought fit to tear her cloaths off her back, and beat her into the bargain [u].

To the victor at the Iſthmian games, Solon adjudged the reward of five-hundred drachmæ. To the victor in the Olympic, he ordered that one hundred ſhould be given. He contracted the rewards beſtowed upon wreſtlers, eſteeming ſuch gratuities uſeleſs and even dangerous, tending to encourage idleneſs by putting men upon waſting that time in exerciſes, which ought to be ſpent in providing for their families [x].

HE directed five drachmæ to be given to him who caught a he-wolf, and one to him who took a ſhe-one, the former being the price of an ox, the latter of a ſheep. Attica was at this time extremely infeſted by theſe creatures, of which this law occaſioned a ſpeedy deſtruction.

WATER being extremely ſcarce at Athens and in its neighbourhood, he ordained, that where there was a public well, all who lived within a Hippicon, i. e. four furlongs of it, ſhould have leave to uſe it. They that lived further off were bound to dig wells for themſelves; but if a man digged ten fathom and met with no water, then he might fill a pitcher of ſix gallons twice a-day at his neighbour's well; and whoever ſunk a well was to take care, that it was as far diſtant from his neighbours as it was deep. If a man planted a tree, he was to ſee that it was five foot diſtant from his neighbours, and if a fig or olive-tree, nine, a hive of bees was to be thirty feet diſtant; all all these tended to the same end, viz. to prevent one man from trespassing on the property of another [y].

[t] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Vitruvius Præfat. lib. vi. Herodot. lib. vii. Diod. Sicul. lib. i. [u] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Lyſias. Orat. de cœd. Erat. [x] Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

He enacted, that whoever refused to maintain his parents, or had wasted his paternal estate, should be atimos, i. e. infamous. It seems Solon did not conceive, that a man could be privately bad and publicly good, that one who neglected his duty to his parents should preserve it to the state, or be frugal of his country's revenue when he had spent his own [z].

Such as commonly frequented infamous women, he forbad to make orations, believing, that men without shame were not to be trusted to speak to the people: Demosthenes highly commended this law, and exhorted the Athenians to take care that it was put in execution, as the surest means to preserve the peace and honour of the republic [a].

He forbad a guardian to marry the mother of his ward, and permitted not the next heir to be admitted guardian of the infant; some say, that he forbad likewise a guardian to marry his son to the mother of his ward [b]. All these were made beyond question to hinder collusion, and to bar as far as possible the scandalous practice of cheating minors.

He enjoined gravers to keep no impressions of the seal-rings they sold; if a man put out the eye of another who had but one eye, he directed, that he should lose both his; as to theft, Demosthenes gives us Solon's law in these words; "If any man steal in the day-time, he may be "carried to the eleven officers; if he steal any thing by "night, it shall be lawful for any to kill him, or in the "pursuit to wound him, and to carry him to the eleven "officers. Whosoever is convicted of such offences as are "liable to chains, shall not be capable of giving bail for his "theft, and his punishment shall be death; but if any "one steal out of the Lyceum, or the Academy, or Cyno-"sarges, a garment, or small vessel of wine, or any other "thing of little value, or some vessel out of the gymnasia "or havens, he shall be punished with death; but if any "man shall be convicted privately of theft, it shall be law-"ful for him to pay a double value, and it shall be also at "the pleasure of the convictor, besides payment of mo-"ney, [y] Plutarch. ubi supra. Caius de Legib. lib. iv. [z] Liban. Declam. xviii. Dion. Halic. lib. ii. [a] Æschin in Timarch. Demost. in Androt. [b] Diogen. Laert. ubi supra.

" ney, to put him in chains five days and as many nights, " ſo as all men may ſee him bound " [c].

By his laws, an archon taken in drink was to be puniſhed with death, Solon wiſely conceiving, that a magiſtrate guilty of ſuch an offence muſt be rendered vile and contemptible in the eyes of the people. He decreed, that in caſe a man ſurpriſed his wife in adultery, and lived with her afterwards, he ſhould be deemed infamous; he compelled children to be dutiful to their parents, permitting the latter in caſe of diſobedience to diſinherit and turn them out of doors: he condemned ſuch as avoided going to war, fled from the army, or ſhewed any other flagrant ſign of cowardice, to be expelled the ſanctified precincts of the forum, to be for ever debarred from wearing a crown or wreath, and from being allowed to enter any places of public worſhip. He appointed it for a ſtatute, that a citizen of Athens ſhould be tried nowhere but at Athens, and that the eldeſt citizens ſhould firſt make orations, but with the greateſt modeſty, and without any endeavours to ſtir the paſſions of the people; afterwards, he ordered, that all ſhould ſpeak according to their ſeniority, and have leave to deliver their opinions freely on any matter in debate; but he prohibited young men, however wiſe they might be eſteemed, either to become magiſtrates, or to make orations to the people [d].

It was a maxim eſtabliſhed by this wiſe legiſlator, that the common people ſhould be puniſhed ſlowly, but magiſtrates and perſons in authority ſuddenly, aſſigning for it this reaſon, that the former might be puniſhed at any time, but that in correcting the latter there ought to be no delay. As to funerals, the expence of which were in his time exceſſive, Demoſthenes recites his directions in theſe words; " Let the dead bodies be laid out within the houſe, " according as the deceaſed gave order, and the day fol- " lowing before ſun-riſe carried forth; whilſt the body is ' carrying to the grave, let the men go before, the wo- " men follow: it ſhall not be lawful for any women to " enter upon the goods of the dead, and to follow the bo- " dy to the grave under threeſcore years of age, except " ſuch as are within the degrees of couſins " [e]. Cicero reports, that with reſpect to ſepulchres, he enacted, no man ſhould demoliſh them or bring any new thing into them, and that ſuch ſhould be puniſhed as demoliſhed any monument ment erected to the memory of the dead [f]. From theſe laws of his inſtituting it appears, that his philoſophy did not lead him to treſpaſs on thoſe notions of humanity commonly received in his country; he ſought to moderate the extravagance of their funerals, but at the ſame time permitted all reaſonable honours to be paid to the memory of ſuch as were defunct.

[c] Demoſth. in Timocr. [d] Demoſth. ubi ſupra. Æſchin in Chryſip. [e] Orat. in Macart.

We will conclude our account of Solon's laws with two or three which had more regard to the ſociety, than to the intereſt of private perſons. He ordained, that if one citizen injured another, any Athenian might have his action againſt him [g]; hence it is evident, he regarded each individual as a member of the body politic, which could not be hurt without affecting all the other members; and thus he provided againſt the power of the great; for though a poor man who was injured might think fit to acquieſce, yet a perſon of equal rank with the aggreſſor, might, either out of a principle of juſtice or of rivalſhip, commence a proſecution on that account. Solon inſtituted feaſts in the common halls under the title of public Meals, but he forbad, that the ſame perſon ſhould be entertained often, and ordered ſuch to be fined as did not come in their turns, aſcribing the former offence to greedineſs, the latter to a contempt of the public [h]. He forbad any ſtrangers to be naturalized at Athens, who were not either perpetual exiles from their own country, or, out of love to Athens, had brought their whole families to ſettle there, ſo as to have no intereſt in another place [i]: he provided for the children of ſuch as were ſlain in the ſervice of the ſtate, by directing, that they ſhould be brought up and inſtructed at the public expence till they were twenty years old [k]. He made but few laws relating to religion, and againſt parricides he made none, aſſigning for it this reaſon, that he ſcarce believed any Athenian would be ſo wicked [l].

He ſhewed the excellence of his knowledge by correcting the irregularity of months; for conſidering that the courſe of the moon did not agree with the riſing and ſetting of the ſun, but that ſometimes ſhe overtook and paſſed him in the ſame day, he ordered ſuch a day to be called the laſt and the firſt, attributing that part of the day which preceded the conjunction to the old moon, and that which ſucceeded ceeded it to the new. The next day he ordered to be called Noumenia, i. e. the new moon, and for theſe alterations he is reckoned by Plutarch to have been the firſt who underſtood a verſe in Homer, wherein mention is made of a day wherein one month ended, and the next began (H).

[f] De Legib. lib. ii [g] Plut. ubi ſupra. [h] Id. ibid. [i] Meurs. in Solon. [k] Ariſtides in Panathen. [l] Maxim. Tyr. Diſſ. xxxix. Cicer. Orat. pro Roſc.

He

(H) It is a point worthy of obſervation, that the ancient heroes gained their reputation as much from the ſtrength of their wits as of their arms, and that though ſome excelled in valour, others in wiſdom, yet in all there was a happy mixture of both. Hercules, ſo famed for his labours, inſtructed the Greeks in aſtronomy, which he learned from Atlas, and is thence ſaid by the poets to have borne for a time the heavens upon his ſhoulders. Numa, as he gave laws to Rome, reformed the Roman kalendar, and in ſucceeding times, Julius Cæſar, when he had reduced his enemies, purged away thoſe errors which were grown hoary among his countrymen, and is celebrated not as a lover only of this ſcience of aſtronomy, but as a conſummate maſter therein. Such alſo was Solon for the times in which he lived, for though ſome have pretended to aſcribe the honour of introducing aſtronomy into Greece to Oenopidas of Chios, or Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, yet it is certain, that they were no more than the improvers of it; the firſt principles of this art came certainly into Greece with its firſt planters, and were from time to time cultivated by ſuch as either came out of Egypt or the eaſt, and ſettled in Greece, or had at leaſt travelled into thoſe countries. Thales the Mileſian and Pythagoras the Samian were the two great maſters who brought the undigeſted notions of the heavenly ſyſtem, which hitherto had amuſed the Greeks, into tolerable form; and this they did by dint of their acquaintance with the learning of foreign nations. As to Homer, in whoſe poems we meet with the firſt ſeeds of all the various kinds of ancient literature, we find, that he deſcribes the heroical year, as divided not into months, but by the ſeaſons. The returns of ſeed-time and harveſt, the conſtant revolutions of labour and reſt in conſequence of the annual returns of fair and foul weather, ſerved well enough to mark the ſucceſſion of events, and therefore it was an act of judgment in this great poet to make uſe of theſe characters in his account of a battle (21), as he elſewhere introduces Achilles meaſuring the day, not by hours, but by the more obvious diviſion of morning, noon, and evening (22). We are not to infer from hence, that years and months were not known in the time of Homer; the contrary appears from ſeveral paſſages in his poems, and particularly from this very line which Solon is ſaid to have been the firſt who penetrated its true ſenſe:

Τὰ

(21) Iliad. λ. v. 84. (22) Iliad. φ. v. 3.

He procured his laws to be ratified for a hundred years, and caused them to be conserved in different tables. Such as

Τῷ μεν φθίνοντος μηνὸς τῷ δ'ἱσταμενόιο,
When one month ended and the next began (23).

Thales divided the year into twelve months, making each month consist of thirty days, and the year consequently of three hundred and sixty days; but finding, that this year did not answer the motion of the sun, he intercalated thirty days at the end of two full years; which intercalation, because it happened at the beginning of the third year, some have mistaken for a triennial period. It is easy to perceive that this method of Thales must in a short time have introduced great confusion, there being a redundancy of almost ten days in a year (24). Solon discovered this, and not only discovered it, but discovered its cause, or at least its principal cause, which was Thales's maxim, that the moon performed her revolution in thirty days, which Solon found to be false, and that the true time was twenty-nine days and a half. This account sets what has been said above in a clear light, and shews with what justice Solon was applauded for his skill as an astronomer; let us see with what dexterity he applied that skill as a legislator: he did not alter the number of months which Thales had fixed, but directed, that each of them should be accounted twenty-nine or thirty days alternately; by this means a lunar year was formed of three hundred fifty-four days; but perceiving, that this would leave things still in confusion, he invented a method of reconciling it to the solar year, which was thus; at the end of two years he directed a month of twenty-two days to be intercalated, and at the end of a second two years he ordered, that a month of twenty-three days should be intercalated; now if we take all these sums together we shall find, that the number of days in Solon's cycle of four years was one thousand four hundred sixty-one, the fourth part of which is three hundred sixty-five and a quarter, the true solar year, as it was then accounted. Solon likewise engaged the Athenians to divide their months into three parts, stiled the beginning, midling, and ending; each of these consisted of ten days, when the month was thirty days long, and the last of nine, when it was nine and twenty days long. In speaking of the two first parts they reckoned according to the usual order of numbers, viz. the first day of the moon beginning, the second day of the midling moon, but with respect to the last part of the month they reckoned backwards, that is, instead of saying the first day of the ending moon, they said the tenth day of the ending moon, and instead of the second the ninth day, and so on to the last. This is a circumstance that must be carefully noted; for without being aware as related to private actions in paralellograms of wood, with caſes which reached from the ground and turned about upon a pin like a wheel, from whence they were called Axones, placed firſt in the citadel and then in the Prytanæum, that his people might ſee them when they pleaſed, and ſome remains there were of them even in Plutarch's time. Such as concerned public orders and ſacrifices were contained in triangular tables of ſtone called Cyrbes [m]; the Athenian magiſtrates were ſworn to obſerve both; in time, theſe monuments of his wiſdom became ſo famous, that all public acts were from them named Axones and Cyrbes, as we are informed by Harpocration and Suidas [n].

(23) Odyss. ξ. v. 161. (24) Diog. Laert. in vit. Thal.

After his laws were promulgated, ſome or other were coming to him daily to have them explained, to know the reaſons on which they were founded, and to adviſe him to alter this or that, according as their humour or intereſt led them, which importunities made him ſo uneaſy, that to avoid them he reſolved to travel. For he conſidered, that not to anſwer theſe people would argue pride, and that the anſwering them would beget great inconveniencies: with this view he bought a ſhip, and, pretending an inclination to trade, prevailed on the Athenians to permit him to be abſent for ten years, during which ſpace he hoped his laws would become familiar to them [o].

It will not be amiſs to interrupt the Athenian hiſtory here, in order to inſert our promiſed account of the republic, a thing ſo neceſſary, that we could not proceed farther without confounding the reader. For the ſake of perſpicuity we ſhall not tie ourſelves to the form ſettled by Solon, but give a conciſe hiſtory of the Athenian government, as it ſubſiſted in ſucceeding times, that we may not be obliged at [m] Plut. ubi ſupra. Pollux, viii. 10. [n] In vocibus Ἄξονες & Κυρβεις.

[o] Plutarch. ubi ſup.

aware of it, it is impoſſible to underſtand many paſſages in ancient authors. As for inſtance in Ariſtophanes's comedy of the clouds, a man ſpeaking of the manner in which intereſt became due, reckons the days thus; five, four, three, two, and the moſt abominable of all days that of the old and new moon. Thus much as to Solon's knowledge in aſtronomy, we ſhall in its proper place give a farther account of the Attic year (25).

(25) Cenſorin, de Die Natal. Hen. Dodwell. de An. vet. Græc. Stanley's life of Solon cum mult. al.

at every turn to inſert notes for the explaining of theſe terms which may once for all be rendered familiar, by introducing ſuch an account of the Athenian common-wealth in this place.

In the firſt place it will be neceſſary to take a ſhort view of the city of Athens. In the moſt early times, that which was afterwards called the citadel was the whole city, and went under the name of Cecropia from its founder Cecrops, whom the Athenians in after-times affirmed to have been the firſt builder of cities, and called this therefore by way of eminence Polis, i. e. The city. In the reign of Erichthonius it loſt the name of Cecropia, and acquired that of Athens, on what account is not certain; the moſt probable is, that it was ſo named in reſpect to the goddeſs Minerva, whom the Greeks called Athene, who was always eſteemed its protectreſs [p]. This old city was ſeated on the top of a rock in the midſt of a large and pleaſant plain, which, as the number of inhabitants increaſed, became full of buildings, which induced the diſtinction of Acræ and Catapolis, i. e. of the upper and lower city; the extent of this citadel was ſixty ſtadia, it was ſurrounded by olive-trees, and fortified, as ſome ſay, with a ſtrong paliſade; in ſucceeding times it was incompaſſed with a ſtrong wall in which there were nine gates, one very large one, and the reſt ſmall. The inſide of the citadel was adorned with innumerable edifices, concerning which the curious reader may thoroughly inform himſelf from the treatiſe written expreſsly on this ſubject by a learned perſon already mentioned [q] (I). The moſt remarkable of theſe were,

[p] Ariſtid. Panathen. Stephan. voce Αθηναι. [q] Plutarch. in Pericl. Pauſan. Atticis. Harpocrat. Ariſtid. ubi ſupra.

(I) This learned perſon is the celebrated John Meurſius, to whom the learned world ſtands indebted for the moſt laboured pieces which perhaps ever came from the pen of a critic; he was by birth a Dutchman, but he ſtudied the civil law at Orleans, where he became very early remarkable for his love, or rather for his paſſion, towards Greek learning. Amongſt other pieces he wrote that referred to in the text under the title of Cecropia, or, the citadel of Athens, and its antiquities in one book; this treatiſe conſiſts of thirty-two chapters, and contains a prodigious diſplay of its author's learning; almoſt every paſſage in the Greek authors, relating to the ſubject, is there to be found in the proper were, The magnificent temple of Minerva, ſtiled Parthenion, becauſe that goddeſs was a virgin; the Perſians deſtroyed it, but it was rebuilt with ſtill greater ſplendor by the famous Pericles, all of the fineſt marble, with ſuch ſkill and ſtrength, that, in ſpight of the rage of time and barbarous nations, it remains perhaps the firſt antiquity in the world, and ſtands as a witneſs to the truth of what ancient writers have recorded of the prodigious magnificence of Athens in her flouriſhing ſtate. The temple of Neptune and of Minerva, for it was divided into two parts, one ſacred to the god, in which was the ſalt-fountain ſaid to have ſprung upon the ſtroke with his trident, the other to the goddeſs protectreſs of Athens, wherein was the ſacred olive which ſhe produced, and her image which fell down from heaven in the reign of Erichthonius, both which edifices are ſtill remaining. At the back of Minerva's temple was the public treaſury, which was burnt to the ground through the knavery of the treaſurers, who, having miſapplied the revenues of the ſtate, took this ſhort method of making up their accounts[r]. The lower city comprehended all the buildings ſurrounding the citadel, the fort Munychia, and the havens Phalerum and Piræus, the latter of which was joined to the city by walls five miles in length; that on the north was built by Pericles, but that on the ſouth by Themiſtocles; but by degrees the turrets, which were at firſt erected on theſe walls, were turned per words of the author, with a very exact Latin tranſlation, which was added, as the author tells us, in the ſecond edition, at the deſire of ſeveral ingenious perſons in Spain and Italy, who had requeſted it by letter. Upon which Meurſius makes this reflection, that, as things ſtood, it was indeed reaſonable and neceſſary, ſince there were not many who affected the Greek learning, and of thoſe the greater part rather loved than underſtood it. The inquiſitive and intelligent reader may find a multitude of curious particulars accurately digeſted in this laboured hiſtory, or if he is not inclined to take ſo much pains, he may peruſe a very ſuccinct abridgment of Meurſius's book in Dr. Potter's excellent antiquities of Greece, to whom we are in a great meaſure beholden for this part of our hiſtory of Athens (26).

[r] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Harpocrat. &c. Sir George Wheeler's Travels.

(26) Vide Gronov. Theſ. Græc. vol. iv.

turned into dwelling-houſes for the accommodation of the Athenians, whoſe large city was now become too ſmall for them. The city, or rather the lower city, had thirteen great gates, with the names of which it is not neceſſary to trouble the reader. Among the principle edifices which adorned it, we may reckon the temple of Theſeus erected by Conon, near its centre adjacent thereto the young people performed their exerciſes. It was alſo a ſanctuary for diſtreſſed perſons, ſlaves or free: It remains intire to this day, and is uſed as a church, being dedicated to St. George. The Olympian temple, erected in honour of Jupiter, the honour of Athens and of all Greece, the foundation of it was laid by Piſiſtratus, it was carried on but ſlowly in ſucceeding times, ſeven-hundred years elapſing before it was finiſhed, which happened under the reign of Adrian, who was particularly kind to Athens; this was the firſt building in which the Athenians beheld pillars. The pantheon dedicated to all the gods; a moſt noble ſtructure, ſupported by 120 marble pillars, and having over its great gate two horſes carved by Praxiteles; it is yet remaining, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew hereafter, when we come to ſpeak of the preſent ſtate of this famous city. In ſeveral parts of it were Stoai or porticoes, wherein people walked in rainy weather, and from whence a ſect of philoſophers were denominated ſtoics, becauſe their maſter Zeno taught in theſe porticoes [f]. There were at Athens two places called Ceramicus from Ceramus the ſon of Bacchus and Ariadne; one within the city, containing a multitude of buildings of all ſorts, the other in the ſuburbs, in which was the academy and other edifices. The Gymnaſia of Athens were many, but the moſt remarkable were the Lyceum, Academia, and Cynoſarges. The Lyceum ſtood on the banks of Iliſſus, ſome ſay it was built by Piſiſtratus, others by Pericles, others by Lycurgus. Here Ariſtotle taught philoſophy, inſtructing ſuch as came to hear him as they walked, whence his diſciples are generally thought to derive the name of peripatetics [t]. The Ceramicus without the city was at the diſtance of ſix ſtadia from its walls, the academy made part thereof, as to the name of which there is ſome diſpute; ſome affirm, that it was ſo called from Academus an ancient hero, who, when Helen was ſtolen by Theſeus, diſcovered the place where ſhe lay hid to Caſtor and Pollux, for which which reaſon the Lacedæmonians, when they invaded Attica, always ſpared this place [u]. Dicæarchus writes, that Caſtor and Pollux had two Arcadians in their army, the one named Echedemus, the other Marathus, from the former of theſe he ſays this place took its name, and that the borough of Marathon was ſo called from the other [x]. It was a marſhy unwholeſome place, till Cimon was at great pains to have it drained, and then it became extremely pleaſant and delightful, being adorned with ſhady walks, where Plato read his lectures, and from thence his ſcholars were ſtiled academics [y]. The Cynoſarges was a place in the ſuburbs, not far from the Lyceum; it was famous on many accounts, but particularly for a noble gymnaſium erected there, appointed for the ſpecial uſe of ſuch as were Athenians only by one ſide; in after-times Themiſtocles derived to himſelf ill-will, by carrying many of the nobility to exerciſe with him here, becauſe being but of the half blood he could exerciſe no-where elſe; in this gymnaſium Antiſthenes inſtituted a ſect of philoſophers, who from the name of this diſtrict, as many think, were ſtiled Cynics [z]. The havens of Athens were three, firſt the Piræus, about 35 or 40 ſtadia from the city, till joined thereto by the long walls before-mentioned, after which it became the principal harbour of the city; it had three docks, Cantharos, Aphrodiſium, and Zea, the firſt was ſo called from an ancient hero, the ſecond from the goddeſs Venus, who had there two temples, and the third from bread-corn. There were in this port five porticoes, which joining together formed one great one called from thence Macra Stoa, or the long portico; there were likewiſe two great markets or Fora, one near the long portico, the other near the city. The ſecond port was Munychia, a promontory not far diſtant from Piræus, a place very ſtrong by nature, and afterwards rendered far ſtronger by art. It was of this that Epimenides ſaid, if the Athenians foreſaw what miſchief it would one day produce to them, they would eat it away, with their teeth. The third was Phalerum, diſtant from the city according to Thucydides 35 ſtadia [a], but according to Pauſanias only 20 [b]. This was the moſt ancient harbour of Athens, as [u] Plut. in vit. Theſ. [x] Poem. apud. Gronov. Theſ. Grec. vol. iv. [y] Horat. Ep. lib. ii. E. ii. Plutarch. in vit. Theſei. [z] Plutarch. in vit. Themiſt. Diog. Laert. in vit. Antiſthen.

[f] Athenæus. Deip. l. viii. [t] Suidas, & al.

[a] Bell. Pelop. lib. ii. [b] In Arcad.

as Pyræus was the moſt capacious. As to the extent of this city and other particulars, the reader will meet with them at the bottom of the page (K).

THE people of Athens were freemen, ſojourners, or ſlaves, the citizens, called in Greek Politai, were never very numerous; but, what may ſeem ſtrange, were as many in the time of Cecrops, as in the moſt flouriſhing ſtate of

(K) If Athens eclipſed other cities by her fame for arms and arts, ſhe was no leſs conſpicuous for her beauty, as appears from two authentic teſtimonies, the accounts given us by ancient authors, and the relations exhibited by modern travellers; we had once an intention of comparing theſe, but conſidering that it would have taken up a great deal of room, and have interrupted too much the courſe of the hiſtory, we have choſen to refer the deſcription of Athens, as it now ſtands, till we come to ſpeak of the preſent ſtate of the Morea. It may not, however, be amiſs to obſerve, that Ariſtides, an author who wrote expreſsly on this ſubject, affirms, that Athens in her glory was a day's journey in compaſs; thoſe who have thought this account too general inform us, that it was one hundred ſeventy-eight ſtadia in circumference, that is, ſomething more than twenty-two Roman miles. After it fell from its ancient ſplendor, it endured great variety of fortune. Sylla deſtroyed it without mercy, made its ſtreets overflow with blood, and taught its moſt ſuperb buildings to ſubmit to the flames. It provoked Julius Cæſar by an obſtinate reſiſtance, but when it ſubmitted at laſt, he contented himſelf with ſaying, That he pardoned the living for the ſake of the dead, and neither hurt the city nor its inhabitants. They ſided with Brutus againſt the Triumvirate, and with Anthony, who called himſelf a lover of Athens, againſt Auguſtus. Tiberius, or at leaſt his ſon Germanicus, favoured them, but it was to Adrian, who had been archon of their city, that the Athenians owed the revival of their ancient luſtre. The ſucceeding emperors took a pleaſure in adorning it, but the Goths, in the reigns of Arcadius and Honorius, deſtroyed it, as they did the other cities of Greece. Theodoſius the ſecond out of reſpect to his empreſs cauſed it to be re-edified. This may ſerve to make the deſcription in the text perfectly intelligible; for as to its fortune in later times, that muſt be referred to the ſubſequent part of this hiſtory, of which it will be the proper ſubject; the curious reader may, however, if he pleaſes, conſult the very learned Meurſius, in his elaborate work referred to at the bottom of the page (27).

(27) Meurſ. de Fort. Athen. apud Gronov. Theſaur. Antiq. Græc. vol. iv.

the commonwealth, hardly ever exceeding twenty-thouſand [c]. It was Solon who decreed, that none ſhould be accounted free, but ſuch as were Athenians both by father and mother. After his time it fell into diſſuetude, till revived by Pericles, and again at his inſtance repealed. After the expulſion of the thirty tyrants Solon's law was reſtored. A perſon born of a ſtranger was ſtiled Nothos, a baſtard, whereas the ſon of a free woman was called Gneſios, i. e. legitimate. There was in the Cynoſarges a court of judicature, to which cauſes of illegitimacy properly belonged, and the utmoſt care was taken to prevent any from being inrolled Athenian citizens, who had not a clear title thereto [d]. The citizens, for at preſent we will not meddle with the ſtrangers and ſlaves, were divided by Cecrops into four tribes, the firſt called Cecropes from Cecrops, the ſecond Autochthon, from a king of that name, the third Actai from Acteus another king of Athens, or rather from Acte which ſignifies a ſhore, the 4th Paralia; theſe names were altered by Cranaus, and again by Erictbonius. In the reign of Erictheus they were again changed, the ſoldiers were called Oplitai, the craftſmen Ergatai, the farmers Georgoi, the graziers and ſhepherds Aigicorai; in this ſtate they were when Solon ſettled the commonwealth, and appointed the ſenate to be compoſed of four hundred, one hundred out of each tribe [e]. Clyſthenes encreaſed the number of the tribes to ten, and made the ſenate conſiſt of five hundred, taking fifty out of each tribe; in ſucceeding times two other tribes were added, each tribe was ſubdivided into its Demoi or wards, and with reſpect to theſe it was that Solon inſtituted the public feaſts before-mentioned, at which ſometimes the whole tribe aſſembled, ſometimes ſeveral wards, and ſometimes only the inhabitants of one ward. The ſecond ſort of inhabitants we mentioned were called Metoicoi, i. e. ſojourners; theſe were perſons who lived always at Athens, yet were not admitted free denizens; as for ſuch as did not conſtantly reſide in Athens they were ſtiled Xenoi, i. e. ſtrangers. The ſojourners were obliged to chuſe out of the citizens protectors who were ſtiled Patrons, they paid ſeveral ſervices to the ſtate, and beſides theſe an annual tribute of twelve drachms for every [c] Plut. in vit. Periclis. Athenæus. Deipnoſ. lib. vi. [d] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Pollux. lib. iii. [e] Plutarch. in vit. Solon. Pollux. lib. viii. c. 9.

ry man, and ſix for every woman; but ſuch as had ſons, and paid for them were exempted; if people fell to poverty and were not able to pay this tribute, they were ſeized by the tax-maſters and actually ſold for ſlaves, which, as Diogenes Laertius tells us, was the fate of Xenocrates the philoſopher [f]; the ſojourners in Attica were under the ſame law as thoſe in Athens; as to ſervants, they were freemen, who through indigency were driven to receive wages, and while they were in this ſtate had no vote in the aſſembly; as to ſlaves they were abſolutely the property of their maſters, and as ſuch were uſed as they thought fit; they were forbidden to wear cloaths, or to cut their hair like their maſters, and, which is indeed amazing, Solon prohibited them from loving boys as if that had been honourable: They were likewiſe debarred from anointing or perfuming themſelves, and from worſhipping certain deities; they were not allowed to be called by honourable names, and in moſt other reſpects were uſed like dogs. They ſtigmatized them at their pleaſure, that is branded them with letters in the forehead and elſewhere; however, Theſeus's temple was allowed them as a ſanctuary, where, if they were exceedingly ill uſed, they might fly, and thereby oblige their maſters to let them be turned over; in this and many other reſpects the Athenian ſlaves were in a much better condition than thoſe throughout the reſt of Greece; they were permitted to get eſtates for themſelves, giving a ſmall premium to their maſters, who were obliged to make them free if they could pay their ranſom; they likewiſe obtained the ſame favour from the kindneſs of their maſters, or for having rendered military ſervices to the ſtate; when they were made free they were obliged to chuſe patrons, and had likewiſe the privilege of chuſing a curator, who, in caſe their patrons injured them, was bound to defend them [g]. Having thus ſpoken of the people in general, let us return to the conſideration of the Athenian citizens in their political capacity (L).

[f] In vit. Xenocr. [g] Plutarch. in vit. Solon. Ariſtoph. in Avibus, &c. Pollux. lib. vii. Plautus, &c.

(L) In Cecrops's time the citizens were, as we have ſaid above, twenty-thouſand; under the adminiſtration of Pericles, when the

THE general aſſembly of the people, which Solon, as we have ſhewn before, made the dernier reſort, was called Eccleſia, and conſiſted of all the freemen of Athens, excepting ſuch as were atimoi or infamous. The meetings of the Athenian power was at its greateſt height, they were not ſo many (28). When Demetrius the Phalerean preſided over them there was an exact account taken of the ſeveral ſorts of inhabitants within the city, as we are informed by Athenæus, from whence it appeared, that there were twenty-one thouſand citizens, ten thouſand ſojourners or foreigners, and four hundred thouſand ſlaves (29). The knowledge of this is a material thing, for without it it would be a difficult matter to account for the ſmallneſs of the Athenian armies. At the time of Cecrops's poll the whole number of his ſubjects was without doubt included; in early times they were glad of citizens; but when Athens roſe in power and glory, ſhe ſet a high value upon this dignity. Menon, who ſent them a ſupply of two hundred horſe, was refuſed the freedom of Athens when he deſired it (30). Perdiccas king of Macedonia, who had done them great ſervices, could obtain no more than a right of dwelling in the city with an exemption from taxes; but though they were thus ſtiff in reſpect to perſons of high quality, they were more pliable towards men of diſtinguiſhed merit. Hippocrates the phyſician was readily admitted a citizen of Athens, and the ſame favour was granted to all the inhabitants of Platæa, for their ſeaſonable aſſiſtance in the Perſian war. It was only the general aſſembly of the people which could confer this privilege. Nay, when it was conferred, the grant was not valid unleſs ratified in a ſecond aſſembly, wherein ſix thouſand citizens were preſent. And as this honour was generally ſued for by perſons of eminent diſtinction, the people gave their votes privately, by putting little ſtones into veſſels, that no ſort of undue influence might reach them; if, after all theſe ceremonies, it appeared, that the perſon on whom it was conferred was unworthy, there was a power lodged of taking it away in the court of Areopagus; nor are inſtances of this ſort wanting in the Athenian ſtory (31). As to the foreigners or ſojourners, though they were incapable of the honours belonging to free citizens, yet if they manifeſted an extraordinary love towards the ſtate by any ſhining action, they had a ſort of half freedom beſtowed upon them, whereby they were exempted from the

(28) Plutarch. in vit. Periclis.
(29) Deipnoſ. lib. vi.
(30) Potter's Arch. Vol. I. p. 44.
(31) Demoſt. Orat. in Neæram.

of theſe aſſemblies were either ordinary or extraordinary. The ordinary were ſuch as were appointed by law, the extraordinary ſuch as neceſſity required. Of the firſt there were four in five and thirty days, for reaſons which will be hereafter given. In the firſt aſſembly they approved or rejected magiſtrates, heard propoſals for the public good, and certain cauſes. In the ſecond they received petitions, and heard every man's judgment on the matters that were before them. In the third they gave audience to foreign ambaſſadors. The fourth was employed altogether in affairs relating to the gods and their worſhip. The extraordinary meetings were appointed by the magiſtrates when occaſion required, whereas to the ordinary aſſemblies the people came of their own accord. The firſt were held either in the market-place, in the Pnyx a place near the citadel, and in the theatre of Bacchus; as to the latter, the magiſtrates, who appointed the extraordinary meeting, appointed alſo the place where it ſhould be held. If any ſudden tempeſt roſe, or an earthquake happened, or any ſign notoriouſly inauſpicious appeared, the aſſembly was immediately adjourned, to prevent the people from apprehending unhappy conſequences from their deliberations. But if the weather was fair and ſerene, and nothing happened out of the ordinary courſe of things, they proceeded to purify the place where the aſſembly was held, which was done by ſprinkling it round with the blood of young pigs, then the cryer made a ſolemn prayer for the proſperity of the republic, and that heaven would beſtow a hap-

the taxes they bore before, and in reſpect to pecuniary matters, were on the ſame foot with free denizens; this they ſtiled Ateleia (32). Such Athenians as through poverty became ſervants, were ſtiled Pelatæ; except the right of voting, they enjoyed all the rights of free citizens, they changed their maſters when they thought fit, and in caſe they found themſelves in a condition to live in a ſtate of independency, they were reſtored to their votes, and their ſervitude was no more imputed to them as a bar to their preferment (33). As to ſlaves, they on their coming to a new place had a handſome entertainment given them, and ſweetmeats thrown over their heads, as it were to welcome them to their ſervice, which, if they fell into good hands, was ſometimes eaſy enough, but for this they were obliged not to the gentleneſs of their laws, but of their maſters.

(32) Suidas. Harpocration. Heſychius. (33) Pollux, lib. iii. c. 8.

py iſſue on their councils and undertakings; he then pronounced a bitter execration againſt any who ſhould in that aſſembly propound what might be diſadvantageous to the ſtate; theſe ceremonies over, they proceeded to buſineſs. There were ſeveral magiſtrates who had the overſeeing and regulating of theſe aſſemblies; theſe were firſt the Epiſtates, or preſident of the aſſembly, who was choſen by lot out of the Proedri; his office was to give the ſignal for the people's voting; next to him were the Prytanes, i. e. a committee of the ſenate, who of courſe were preſent on this occaſion; by their order a Programma, or ſcheme of the buſineſs to be propoſed at the aſſembly, was previouſly ſet up in ſome public place, that every man might know what buſineſs to apply his thoughts to. The Proedri were nine in number, appointed by lots out of all the tribes to which the Prytanes did not belong; they had the right of propoſing to the people what they were to deliberate upon, and their office ended with the aſſembly; there ſate with them aſſeſſors, who were to take care that nothing they propoſed was detrimental to the commonwealth; the firſt ſtep to buſineſs was the cryer's reading the decree of the ſenate whereon the aſſembly was to deliberate; when he had finiſhed this, he made proclamation in theſe words; Who of the men above fifty will make an oration? When the old men had done ſpeaking, the cryer made proclamation again, that any Athenian might then offer his ſentiments whom the law allowed ſo to do, that is, all ſuch as were above thirty years old and were not infamous. If ſuch a one roſe up to ſpeak, the Prytanes interpoſed, and bid him be ſilent, and if he did not obey them, the lictors pulled him down by force. When the debates were over, the preſident permitted the people to voté, which they did by caſting firſt beans, but in after-times pebbles, into certain veſſels; theſe were counted, and then it was declared, that the decree of the ſenate was either rejected or approved, after which the Prytanes diſmiſſed the aſſembly [h].

HAVING ſpoken of the people, their privileges, and aſſemblies, let us now proceed to the ſenate, which, as we have already ſhewn, was inſtituted by Solon to prevent the dangerous conſequences of leaving the ſupreme power in the people; at the time of his inſtitution it was to conſiſt of four hundred, a hundred out of each tribe; it was increaſed to five hundred, when the tribes were augmented to

[h] Vide Sigon. & Ubbo. Emmius. Rep. Athen.

to ten, and when they came to twelve, it was alſo ſwelled to ſix hundred. They were elected by lots after this manner: At a day appointed, towards the cloſe of the year, the preſident of each tribe gave in a liſt of ſuch perſons belonging thereto, as were fit for and deſired to appear for this dignity; theſe names were engraven on tablets of braſs, and a number of beans equal to the number of the amount of them, among which were a hundred white ones, put into a veſſel, then the names of the candidates and the beans were drawn one by one, and ſuch as were drawn by the white beans were received into the ſenate [i]. After the ſenate was elected, they proceeded to appoint the officers who were to preſide in the ſenate: theſe were the Prytanes before-mentioned, and they were elected thus; the names of the ten tribes were thrown into one veſſel, and nine black beans and a white one into another veſſel. Then the names of the tribes were drawn with the beans. The tribe to which the white bean anſwered preſided firſt, and the reſt according to the order in which they were drawn. The time in which they preſided was thirty-five days, and was called Prytania, the Attic year being by this means divided into ten parts. Some authors ſay, that the firſt four Prytania contained thirty-ſix days in order to make the lunar year complete, which according to their computation conſiſted of 354 days; but others affirm, that theſe four days did not belong to any of the Prytania, but were ſpent in the election of magiſtrates, and that during this ſpace the Athenians were without magiſtrates [k]. The Prytanes while the ſenate conſiſted of five hundred were fifty in number; for the farther avoiding of confuſion therefore ten of theſe preſided a week, during which ſpace they were called Proedri, and out of theſe an epiſtate or preſident was choſen, whoſe office laſted but one day, and by law no man could hold it more than once; the reaſon of this was, that he had in his cuſtody the public ſeal, the keys of the citadel, and the charge of the exchequer [l]. The reader muſt diſtinguiſh between the Epiſtates and Proedri laſt mentioned, and thoſe ſpoken of in the former paragraph, becauſe though their titles were the ſame, their office were perfectly diſtinct. The ſenate aſſembled by direction of the Prytanes once every day, excepting feſtivals, and ſometimes oftener, in the ſenate houſe, which was

[i] Steph. Byzant. de Urb.

[k] Pollux. l. viii. c. 9. Harpocrat.

[l] Pollux ubi ſupra.

was thence called Prytanium. When a member of the ſenate made a motion for a new law, it was immediately engraven on tablets, that the members when they came next might be prepared to ſpeak to it; at the ſubſequent aſſembly the epiſtates opened the matter, after which every ſenator that pleaſed delivered his ſentiments, then any of the Prytanes drew up the decree, and repeated it aloud; after which they proceeded to vote, and if there was a majority of white beans, then it became Pſephiſma, and was afterwards propounded to the people; if they approved it, it became a law, otherwiſe it was of no force longer than the ſenate who decreed it ſubſiſted. The power of the ſenate was very great, for they took the account of magiſtrates at the expiration of their offices; they directed the proviſions made for poor citizens out of the public treaſure; they had the ſuperintendency of public priſons, and a power of puniſhing ſuch as committed acts morally evil, though not prohibited by any law; they had the care likewiſe of the fleet, and beſides all theſe they had many other branches of authority, which it is not neceſſary for us to mention. Before they took their ſeats they were conſtrained to undergo a very ſtrict examination, wherein the whole courſe of their lives was enquired into; and if the leaſt ſlur on their reputation appeared they were ſet aſide. When this examination was over they took an oath, whereby they bound themſelves to promote in all their councils the public good, to adviſe nothing contrary to the laws, and to execute their functions exactly. The higheſt fine the ſenate could impoſe was five hundred drachms; if they thought the offender deſerved a heavier mulct, they then tranſmitted the cauſe to the Theſmothetæ, who puniſhed them as they thought fit. The ſenators, when their year was out, gave an account of their management to the people, but that they might have the leſs to do, they always puniſhed ſuch of their number as they found offended by expulſion, and in this they were mighty exact; yet an expelled ſenator was notwithſtanding eligible to any other office, the moſt trivial omiſſion being ſufficient to procure a diſmiſſion from the ſenatorial dignity, and therefore when the tribes choſe their ſenators they alſo choſe a certain number of ſubſidiaries, out of which when a ſenator was expelled another was ſubſtituted in his place [m]. Each ſenator nator was allowed a drachm every day, for it was a conſtant rule with the Athenians that the public ought to pay for every man's time, and therefore ſuch of the poor Athenians as thought fit to demand it had three oboli for going to the aſſembly. If during their adminiſtration any ſhips of war were built the ſenators had crowns decreed them; but if not they were forbid to ſue for them. The ſenate, as we have before remarked, was looked upon as one anchor of the Athenian ſtate, we will now ſpeak of the other.

[m] Æſchin. in Timarch. Ariſtoph. Avibus. Pollux, ubi ſupra. Demoſt. Timocrat.

THE court of Areopagus was ſo called, becauſe it aſſembled on a hill not far from the citadel called Areos Pagos, i. e. Mars's hill. Some ſay, that Mars was the firſt criminal tried in this court. It is not agreed who inſtituted this court; ſome aſcribe it to Cecrops, others to Cranaus, and many to Solon, among whom though Plutarch and Cicero are reckoned, yet it is certain, that they were miſtaken, for Ariſtotle affirms directly the contrary; nay, Plutarch himſelf cites a law of Solon's, wherein the ſentences of the Areopagi are mentioned as things of an old date [n]. The ſource of this error ſeems to be Solon's reſtoring the power of this court, and making it ſuperior to Ephetæ, whom Draco had made ſuperior to it. It is very difficult to aſcertain the number of which this court conſiſted, becauſe authors are much divided about it. Such of the archons, though ſome ſay only ſuch of the Theſmothetæ, as had given an account of their adminiſtration before the Legiſtæ, and had obtained their approbation, were received into this ſenate; this was Solon's inſtitution, and was ſtrictly obſerved for a long courſe of years, whence it became the moſt ſacred and venerable tribunal in Greece. * A ſenator in this court was an officer for life unleſs he was guilty of any immorality, and then he was immediately expelled; to laugh while the court was ſitting was an unpardonable offence, and the members thereof were forbidden by law to write a comedy; nay, if an archon was ſeen to be ſitting in a tavern or public-houſe, it was ſufficient to bar his admiſſion. Demoſthenes affirms, that to his time no judgment of that court had ever been queſtioned [o]. They had cognizance of all capital cauſes, and with them the intent to murder was puniſhed as ſeverely as if it took effect; 'till Pericles leſſened their power they were a check upon the people; they could, if they thought fit, cancel the ſentence of an aſſembly, where a criminal had been acquitted contrary to evidence; and they [n] Meurs. in Areop. [o] Ariſtocrat.

they likewise rescued innocent persons in danger from the rash sentences of the people; they had the custody of the laws, the management of the public funds, the direction of youth, for which reason they were present at marriages and sacrifices, to see that all things were transacted with decency and sobriety; they had the power of punishing idleness, and, in consequence of this, they sent for any body they pleased, and examined him what he spent, and how he came by it, so that it was impracticable for a man to live dissolutely in Athens on ill-got wealth, since on the first appearance of profusion such a person would have been convened before the Areopagi. Matters of religion, blasphemy against the gods, contempt of mysteries, all sorts of impiety, the consecration of new gods, erection of temples and altars, and the introduction of new ceremonies into divine worship, belonged wholly unto this court. Plato therefore, having learned in Egypt that there was but one God, was forced to conceal his knowledge for fear of being questioned by the Areopagites [p]; and St. Paul was on this account arraigned before them as a setter-forth of strange gods, when he preached Jesus and Anastasis, i. e. the resurrection [q]. As to state affairs, the court of Areopagus rarely meddled in them, unless in times of public calamity, when the citizens fled to them as their last refuge. They met three times every month, viz. on the 27th, 28th, and 29th days thereof, if any sudden occasion required their assembling they were wont to meet in the royal portico. It is observable, that this court always sate in the open air; secondly, that they decided all causes in the dark, that seeing neither plaintiff nor defendant their passions might be uninfluenced. Causes of murder were introduced by the Basileus or second archon, who in right of his office had a seat amongst them; but before he took it he was obliged to lay aside his crown, which, as the mark of his dignity, he wore at all other times. As to the form of trials before the Areopagus, we shall not detain the reader here, but take a proper occasion to insert it in a note. All the great men of Athens paid a high regard to this venerable tribunal, till Pericles rose, who, because he could not become a member thereof, having never been archon, took such a pique to them, that he left no means unessayed to diminish their authority and sink their credit, which by the help help of Ephialtes he in a great meaſure effected, cauſing moſt of the buſineſs which had been before them to be transferred to other courts, to which ſome authors, not without reaſon, have aſcribed the ſudden degeneracy of the Athenians, and, in conſequence thereof, the ruin of this ſtate [k].

[p] Justin. Martyr. [q] Acts xviii. 18, 19.

We come now, having ſpoken of the Athenian people, the ſenate, and court of Areopagus, to the magiſtrates. The chief of theſe were the Archons or Archontes; they were, as we obſerved, nine in number, and were choſen by lot; but after they were choſen they were obliged to undergo two examinations, one in the ſenate-houſe called Anacriſis, the other in the Forum called Docimaſia; in theſe they were aſked who were their anceſtors, whether by three deſcents they were Athenian citizens, of what tribe and ward they were, whether related to Apollo Patrius, or Jupiter Hercæus, whether they had been dutiful to their parents, had ſerved the appointed times in the wars, had the eſtate required by law, and whether they were perfect in all their limbs; theſe queſtions ſome think were put to every other magiſtrate: theſe demands being ſatisfactorily anſwered, they were conducted to the royal portico, where each of the archons took an oath in theſe words; 'I 'will be punctual in the obſervance of the laws, and if I 'am deficient in this reſpect, I will for every ſuch default 'conſecrate a ſtatue of gold as big as myſelf to the Delphian 'Apollo'. Theſe ceremonies over, the archons entered on their charge, ſome parts of which they executed ſeparately, others belonged in common to them all; they had all the power of puniſhing with death ſuch malefactors as deſerved it; they were all crowned with wreaths of myrtle, and had the power of appointing certain under-officers, and of inquiring into the conduct of other magiſtrates. As the reward of their labour in the ſervice of the public, they were free from all taxes whatſoever, and if any was ſo hardy as to ſtrike or affront them, he was puniſhed with infamy [m]. The firſt of them was ſometimes ſtiled Eponymos, becauſe the year took its denomination from him; to him it belonged to determine all cauſes between men and their wives, all matters relating to poſthumous children, dowries, legacies, and teſtaments. He had a right to appoint tutors and guardians guardians to orphans, to decide ſuch diſputes as aroſe between neighbours, and many other things. The celebration of certain feaſts and the regulation of ſtage-plays were alſo within his province, and he had a particular court of judicature wherein he heard cauſes: If even by accident he was overtaken with liquor, he ſuffered death [n]. The ſecond archon, who was ſtiled Baſileus or king, had his court of judicature in the royal portico; he decided all controverſies among prieſts, took information on impiety, blaſphemy, and ſuch-like crimes; he preſided in all the great feaſts, and aſſiſted in all the public ſacrifices for the proſperity of the republic. It was required, that his wife ſhould be a citizen of Athens and a virgin, and ſhe too was ſtiled by the Athenians Baſiliſſa. Accuſations of murder were firſt lodged in his court, and then he introduced them into the court of Areopagus [o]. The Polemarchos or third archon had all ſojourners and ſtrangers within his juriſdiction; he was bound alſo to offer a ſolemn ſacrifice to Mars, and another to Diana, and to take care, that the children of ſuch as loſt their lives in the ſtate ſhould duly receive the maintenance ſettled on them by law. As it often happened, that theſe three magiſtrates, by reaſon of their youth, were not ſo well ſkilled in the laws and cuſtoms of their country, as to be able to execute punctually all the branches of their reſpective offices; they choſe each of them two grave and diſtinct perſons who underwent the like examinations with themſelves, to ſit with them as aſſeſſors, and they were accountable as well as the archon for their behaviour in their poſts [p]. The other ſix archons were ſtiled Theſmothetæ; they had one common tribunal where they heard cauſes of various kinds; they ratified all public contracts and leagues, ſettled the court-days in the ſeveral judicatures of Athens, took care that no laws ſhould be paſſed contrary to the intereſt of the public, and proſecuted ſuch as endeavoured to perſuade the people to give their conſent to any ſuch laws; they were likewiſe obliged every year to examine the whole Corpus Juris, in order to diſcover whether there were any laws that contradicted each other, whether there was a multiplicity of ſtatutes about the ſame thing, or whether there were any ſo

[k] Plutarch. in vit. Periclis. Meurſius Areop. [l] Pollux, lib. viii. cap. 9. [m] Demoſth. in Midian.

[n] Pollux, ubi ſupra. [o] Demoſt. in Neær. & in Lacrit. [p] Pollux, ubi ſupra.

ſo doubtful as to render it impoſſible to know their true ſenſe, which if there were, then the Theſmothetæ drew up a report, wherein was briefly contained the ſtate of the caſe; this was hung up in a public place, and the next aſſembly of the people voted which of the laws ſhould be preſerved, and which repealed or altered [q]. Inferior to the archons there were many public magiſtrates; 'twill be neceſſary to mention ſome of them, becauſe they will frequently occur in the courſe of this hiſtory. In the firſt place they had Nomophylaces, who were alſo ſtiled the eleven, becauſe they were ſo many in number, one choſen out of each tribe, and a clerk or ſecretary who made up the eleventh. Their duty it was to look to the execution of the laws, they had authority to ſeize robbers and other capital offenders, and if they confeſſed to put them to death. Dr. Potter thinks they reſembled our ſheriffs [r]. The Phylarchi were the preſidents of the Athenian tribes; but in time this became a military title. The Philobaſileus was an officer in each tribe who did the ſame things within his juriſdiction, as the Baſileus did with reſpect to the ſtate. The Demarchi were the principal magiſtrates in wards, the Lexarchi were ſix in number, and were bound to take care, that the people came duly to aſſemblies; in their cuſtody was the public regiſter of citizens names; they had under them Toxotæ who were lictors or bailiffs; they were ſometimes a thouſand in number; theſe men were neceſſary, but like moſt of their ſort were in a manner infamous, as may be gathered from the comedies of Ariſtophanes; they were generally Scythians, raw-boned brawny fellows, ready to execute any thing they were commanded [s]. The Nomothetæ were a thouſand in number, their buſineſs was to watch over and inſpect into the laws. There were two ſorts of orators in the ſervice of the ſtate, ſome were appointed to defend an old law when a motion was made to repeal it; theſe had their fee from the ſtate, but the ſame man was incapable of being elected twice. Beſides theſe three were ten ſettled orators called Retores, elected by lots; their buſineſs was to plead public cauſes in the ſenate-houſe; for this they had their ſtated fees, and with reſpect to their qualifications the laws run thus; "Let no one be a public orator who hath ſtruck "his parents, denied them maintenance, or ſhut them out "of [q] Æſchin. in Cteſiph. [r] Cicero de Legib. lib. iii. [s] Ariſtophan. ejuſq; Schol. Acharn. & Theſmoph.

" of his doors, who hath refuſed to ſerve in the army, " who hath thrown away his ſhield, who hath been ad- " dicted to lewd women, notoriouſly effeminate, or has " run out his patrimony. If any man who has been " guilty of theſe crimes dare to deliver an oration, let him " be brought to trial upon the ſpot [t]. Let an orator have " children lawfully begotten, and an eſtate within At- " tica [u]; if in his oration he talks impertinently, makes " idle repetitions, affects an unbecoming railery, digreſſes " from the point in queſtion, or after the aſſembly is over " abuſes the preſident, let the Proedri fine him fifty " drachmæ; and if that is not thought enough, let him " be brought before the next aſſembly and fined again" [x]. We ſhall conclude this draft of the Athenian government with an account of their courts of juſtice, which, excluſive of the Areopagus, were ten in number; four had cognizance of criminal, and ſix of civil, cauſes. Theſe ten courts were numbered with the ten firſt letters of the alphabet, and were thence ſtiled, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, &c. When an Athenian was at leiſure to hear cauſes he wrote his own name, that of his father, and the ward to which he belonged, upon a tablet; this he preſented to the Theſmothetæ, who returned it again to him with another tablet, with the letter which fell to his lot; then he went to the cryer of the court who preſented him a ſcepter, and gave him admiſſion. When the cauſes were over, every judge went and delivered his ſcepter to the Prytanes, and received a ſtated fee for every cauſe that was tried. But as this was intended only to compenſate their loſs of time, ſo that there might be no appearance of covetouſneſs, a man was forbid to ſit in two courts on the ſame day [y]. The firſt criminal court, after the Areopagus, was that of the Ephetæ, of the inſtitution of which the reader has already had an account; it conſiſted of fifty-one members, all upwards of fifty-one years old; Draco gave it a very extenſive juriſdiction, but Solon took away from them the power of judging in any other cauſes than thoſe of manſlaughter, accidental killing, and lying in wait to deſtroy; the Baſileus entered all cauſes in this court [z]. The ſecond criminal court was called Delphinium, becauſe it was held in the temple of Apollo Delphinius, it had cognizance of ſuch murders as were confeſſed by the criminal, but at the [t] Æſchin. in Timarch. [u] Dinarch. in Demoſthen. [x] Æſchin. ubi ſupra. [y] Athen. Deipnoſ. lib. vi. [z] Pollux lib. viii, c. 10.

the ſame time juſtified under ſome pretence or other [a]. The Prytaneum was the third criminal court, it held plea of ſuch caſes where death enſued from inanimate things; cauſes were heard here with the ſame ſolemnity as in other courts, and, on judgment given, the thing, whatever it was, that had occaſioned the death of a man, was thrown out of the territory of Athens. This judicature was as ancient as the reign of Erechtheus, and the firſt thing tried therein was an ax, wherewith one of Jupiter's prieſts killed an ox which had eaten ſome of the conſecrated cakes, and who, as ſoon as he had committed the fact, ſecured himſelf by flight [b]. The laſt criminal court was ſtiled Phreatum, it ſat in a place not far from the ſea-ſhore, and ſuch perſons were brought before this court, as had committed murders in their own country and fled to Attica; the proceedings of this court were ſo ſevere, that they did not permit the criminal to come on ſhore, but obliged him to plead his cauſe in his veſſel, and if he was found guilty, he was committed to the mercy of the winds and ſeas [c]. Of the judicatures for hearing civil cauſes, the firſt was the Parabaſton, ſo called, as ſome think, becauſe in it no matter could be heard, if the cauſe of action was above one drachm [d]. The Cainon or new court was the ſecond tribunal [e]. The third was ſtiled the court of Lycus, becauſe it aſſembled in a temple dedicated to that hero, whoſe ſtatue, which was repreſented with the face of a wolf, was ſet up in all the courts of juſtice [f]. The Trigonon was ſo called, becauſe it was triangular in its form [g]. The court Metidius derived its appellation from the architect who built it [h]. The ſixth and laſt court was called Heliæa, it was by far the greateſt, and is generally conceived to have derived its name from the judges ſitting in the open air expoſed to the ſun. All the Athenians, as we obſerved before, who were free citizens, were allowed by law to ſit in theſe courts as judges. But before they took their ſeats were ſworn by Apollo Patrius, Ceres, and Jupiter the king, that they would decide all things righteouſly, and according to law where there was any law to guide them, and

[a] Pollux ubi ſupra. [b] Ælian Hiſt. var. lib. viii. c. 3. Pollux ubi ſupra. [c] Sigonius de Repub. Athen. lib. iii. c. 3. [d] Pauſan. Atticis. [e] Ariſtoph. Veſp. [f] Pollux, Suidas, Ariſtoph. ubi ſupra. [g] Sigon. ubi ſupra. Ariſtoph. ubi ſupra. [h] Pollux, Harpocr.

and by the rules of natural equity where there was none. The oath taken by the judges, who ſate in the court laſt mentioned, is reported by Demoſthenes in theſe words; "I will give ſentence according to the laws and the de- "crees of the people of Athens and the council of five "hundred; I will not conſent to place the ſupreme pow- "er in the hands of a ſingle perſon, or a few; nor per- "mit any man to diſſolve the commonwealth, or ſo much "as to give his vote, or make an oration in defence of "ſuch a revolution. I will not endeavour to diſcharge "private debts, nor to make a diviſion of lands or houſes: "I will not reſtore perſons ſent into baniſhment, nor par- "don thoſe that are condemned to die, nor expel any "man out of the city contrary to the laws and decrees "of the people and council of five hundred, nor permit "any other perſon to do it: I will not elect any perſon "into any public employ, and particularly I will not "create any man Archon, Hieromnemon, embaſſador, "public herald, or ſynedras, nor conſent, that he ſhall be "admitted into any of thoſe offices which are elected by "lots upon the ſame day with the archons, who has un- "dergone any former office and not given in his accounts; "nor that any perſon ſhall bear two offices, or to be "twice elected into the ſame office in one year: I will "not receive gifts myſelf, nor ſhall any other for me, nor "will I permit any other perſon to do the like by any "means, whether direct or indirect, to pervert juſtice in "the court of Heliæa: I am not under thirty years of "age: I will hear both the plaintiff and defendant with- "out any partiality, and give ſentence in all the cauſes "brought before me: I ſwear by Jupiter, Neptune, and "Ceres; if I violate this oath or any part of it, may I "periſh with my whole family; but if I religiouſly ob- "ſerve it, may we live and proſper"[i]. The Helæaſtic court conſiſted at leaſt of fifty, but its uſual number was five-hundred, judges: when cauſes of very great conſequence were to be tried, a thouſand ſate therein, and now and then the judges were increaſed to fifteen hundred, and even two thouſand; there were many inferior courts in Athens for the deciſion of trivial cauſes, but of theſe there is no neceſſity of ſpeaking, ſince we deſign no more than a ſuccinct view of the Athenian republic, as it was ſettled by, and in conſequence of, Solon's laws.

[i] Plutarch. & Diogen. Laert. in vit. Solonis Herodot. lib. i.

We left that great lawgiver at his departure from Athens to viſit foreign climates for the ſake of acquiring wiſdom. He went firſt to Egypt, where he converſed with Pſenophis the Heliopolitan and Sonchis the Saite, the moſt learned prieſts of that age and country, from theſe he drew the knowledge of a multitude of things unheard-of by the Greeks, and particularly the ſituation and condition of the atlantic iſle, of which he wrote an account in verſe, which Plato continued. From Egypt he went to Cyprus, where he was extremely well entertained by one of the petty kings thereof; this prince reigned in a little city called Apeia, i. e. high, built by Demophoon the ſon of Theſeus on an eminence near the river Clarius, but in a ſoil craggy and barren. Solon, obſerving, that there was a very pleaſant plain below, engaged the king to remove his people thither, and to build a new and large city for their reception. Solon himſelf aſſiſted in the execution of the undertaking which he had projected, and his ſcheme ſucceeded ſo well, that numbers of people, invited by the beauty of the place, came to ſettle themſelves therein, whence the king, whoſe capital it was, changed its name out of gratitude, and called it Solos. He is thought to have viſited about this time Thales the Mileſian, with whom it is certain he had an intimate acquaintance; Plutarch hath recorded a very ſingular paſſage which happened at this time; Solon enquiring of Thales, why, conſidering the happy ſituation of his affairs, he had neither wife nor children, Thales for the preſent made him no anſwer. A few days after he introduced a ſtranger properly inſtructed, who ſaid, that he came ten days ago from Athens; Solon immediately aſked him what news he brought from thence: "I know of nothing "extraordinary (replied he), except that the whole city "celebrated the funerals of a young man, the ſon of a ci-"tizen, moſt eminent for his virtues, who, it ſeems, went "abroad upon his travels". Miſerable man, cried Solon: But did you not hear his name? I did, returned the ſtranger, but I have forgot it; this I remember, that he was particularly famous for his wiſdom and his juſtice; Was it Solon? (ſaid our philoſopher) It was, anſwered the ſtranger. Upon this our legiſlator began to beat his head, to weep, and to bemoan himſelf. But Thales interpoſing with a ſmile, addreſſed him thus: "Theſe, O Solon, are "the things which make me afraid of marriage and chil-"dren, ſince theſe are capable of affecting even ſo wiſe a "man as you; be not, however, concerned, for this is all

" a fiction " [i]. Whether on this occasion, or on the real loss of a son, is uncertain, Solon being desired by a person not to weep, since weeping would avail nothing; he answered, with much humanity and good sense, And for this cause I weep. At Delphi he had an interview with the rest of the sophists, and the year following at Corinth by Periander's invitation; some think, that at this time also he went to Crete, and visited Epimenides, he likewise conferred with Crœsus king of Lydia, as has been before related in the history of that prince [k] (M).

WHILE

[i] Plutarch. & Diogen. Laert. in vit. Solonis Herodot. lib. 1.
[k] vol. 5. p. 585.

(M) As to the interview between Solon and Crœsus, there were in Plutarch's time many who thought it a fiction; and this great writer himself, though he thought it necessary to insert it in Solon's life, owns, that none who mentioned it as a fact were able to solve the difficulties in chronology which attended it. The very learned M. Dacier has the following note upon that passage; " Solon, " they say, was archon the third year of the forty-sixth olympiad, " and Crœsus was overthrown by Cyrus the second year of the " 58th, which makes it impossible for Solon to be living at that " time, that is to say, 47 years after his archonship. This they " prove more strongly, by making it appear, that Solon died " when Hegestratus was archon, in the second year of the 51st " olympiad. Now Crœsus was not king till the first year of the " 56th olympiad, which was twenty-two years after the death of " Solon. How then are we to make this voyage of Solon into " Lydia fall in with the reign of Crœsus? Especially, if, accord- " ing to Plutarch, this voyage was performed even before the ty- " ranny of Pisistratus. This is so full of difficulties and contrarieties, " that it is impossible to reconcile them, unless we agree with " Plutarch, that the ancient chronological tables are by no means " exact, notwithstanding the great labour and pains several per- " sons have been at to regulate them (28) ". Mr. Stanly (following Laertius) and many others have thought, that the placing this interview, not before, but after Pisistratus made himself master of Athens, would set this business quite right, and accordingly Sir Isaac Newton places this conference in the year after Pisistratus assumed the sovereignty, or rather in the same year, and makes this the year before the death of Solon (29). But to return from so perplexed a subject to the mention of a point or two not taken notice of in the account before given of this conference in the history

(28) In vit. Solonis. (29) Short Chronicle. p. 40.

WHILE Solon was abroad Athens fell all into confuſion again. The three factions before-mentioned began to be more troubleſome than ever; Lycurgus put himſelf at the head of the country people; Megacles the ſon of Alcmæon was the chief of thoſe who lived upon the coaſt, and Piſiſtratus placed himſelf at the head of the poorer ſort of people in the city, to protect them, as he pretended, from tyranny. The laws of Solon were indeed obſerved, becauſe none of theſe factions had found it for their intereſt to ſubvert them, but all looked for a change, and were uneaſy till it was effected, tho' how to change for the better none of them knew, nor pretended to know; in the interim, Solon returned, and his return ſeemed propitious for his country. All the factions paid their court to him, and affected to ſhew him the deepeſt reverence and reſpect, beſeeching him to reſume his authority, and to compoſe the diſorders of the ſtate. But this, however, he declined on account of his age, which, as he ſaid, rendered him unable to ſpeak and act for the public benefit as he was wont. However, he ſent for the chiefs of each party, and ſpoke to them in the mildeſt and moſt pathetic terms, beſeeching them not to ruin their common parent, but to prefer the public good to their private intereſt [1].

Piſiſtratus, among all the principal perſons of Athens, ſeemed to be moſt affected with Solon's diſcourſes. They were relations, intimate friends, and had a great ſimilitude in their diſpoſitions. Piſiſtratus was exceedingly courteous and affable, and as he was bleſſed with a fair eſtate, ſo he was generous without profuſion, and beneficent without oſtentation. He had always two or three ſlaves near him with bags of ſilver coin; when he ſaw any man look ſickly, or heard that any were dead inſolvent, he comforted ry of Lydia: Plutarch ſays, that Æſop the fabuliſt was at the court of Crœſus at the ſame time with Solon, and that he was extremely concerned when he ſaw how much the king ſlighted ſo great a man. He could not therefore forbear giving Solon the following ſhort piece of advice, Let your viſits to kings be as ſeldom or as pleaſant as you can. To which our Athenian anſwered, No, rather let them be as ſeldom or as profitable as you can (30). The love of liberty was ſo ſtrong in Solon, that he could not gainſay ſo much as in a compliment.

[1] Plut. ubi ſupra. Diogen. Laert. ubi ſupra. Herodot. lib. 1.

(30) Plutarch ubi ſupra.

the one with a proper ſum, and buried the others at his own expence; if he perceived people melancholy, he enquired the cauſe, and if it was poverty, he furniſhed them with what might enable them to get bread, but not to live idly; in a word, he had, or ſeemed to have, all the virtues which could adorn a nobleman: he would not ſo much as ſuffer his ſervants to ſhut his garden or orchard gates, but allowed every body to go in and take what they pleaſed. His looks were eaſy and ſedate, his language ſmooth and modeſt; he ſeemed a great lover of equality, and a zealous friend to the conſtitution. Solon penetrated all theſe appearances, yet he did not immediately break with him, but endeavoured to ſhew him the iniquity of his diſſimulation, and would often tell him, Sir, were it not for your ambition, you would be the beſt citizen in Athens [m]; and when he found this made no impreſſion upon him, Solon ſaid the ſame thing to others, that men might beware of his deſigns, and not ſuffer his virtues to be fatal his country.

About this time Theſpis, who is generally eſteemed the inventor of tragedy, either introduced or reformed it at Athens, with which the people were mightily charmed. Solon, who piqued himſelf upon learning, even in his old age, went to ſee this new divertiſement, and, after the performance was over, addreſſed himſelf to Theſpis in theſe words: "I wonder you are not aſhamed of telling lies before ſo great an audience": Theſpis replied, That there could be no harm in giving a ſpecious form to falſhood, ſo that it were in jeſt; Ah, cried Solon, ſtriking the ground violently with his ſtaff, if once we are pleaſed with your falſhoods in jeſt, we ſhall ſoon have them creep into our more ſerious affairs [n].

Piſiſtratus aſſumes the ſovereignty. Years after the flood 2439. Before Chriſt, 560.

The miſchief, which Solon apprehended his kinſman Piſiſtratus would bring upon the ſtate, was not long before it came to paſs; that great politician, perceiving how much the people were at his devotion, reſolved to ſeize the preſent opportunity to cheat them out of that liberty they neither knew how to uſe or to keep. With this view having wounded himſelf and (as Herodotus ſays) the mules that drew his chariot [o], he laſhed into the market-place as if purſued by his enemies, and ſhewing his bleeding body, beſought the people to protect him from thoſe whom his kindneſs to them had rendered his implacable enemies; they teſtifying teſtifying loudly their concern, Solon, who was by this time come to the place, drew near him, and ſaid, 'Son 'of Hippocrates, you do not act Homer's Ulyſſes well, 'ſince you deceive your fellow-citizens; whereas he, 'when he had wounded himſelf, practiſed only on the 'enemies of his country.' A general aſſembly was preſently convened, wherein Ariſton moved, that Piſiſtratus might have a guard of fifty perſons armed with clubs. Solon oppoſed it; he told the citizens, that if misfortunes befel them, they muſt not charge the gods with them, but themſelves, for that evils were not accidental, but puniſhments; that crafty perſons knew how to dreſs lies in the veſtments of truth, and that before they made innovations they ſhould well conſider the conſequences. After him Piſiſtratus ſpoke, and the people receiving all he ſaid with loud applauſe, Solon contented himſelf with ſaying,

[m] Dacier. Not. in vit. Solon. Plut. ubi ſupra. Cicer. de Orat. lib. iii. [n] Plut. ubi ſupra. o Herodot. lib i.

" You doat upon his words and ſoothing ſpeech."

The meaner ſort of people adhering unanimouſly to the propoſition of Ariſton, and the richeſt Athenians remaining ſilent when they ſaw how things would go, Solon took his leave, ſaying, that he was wiſer than ſome, and ſtouter than others; wiſer than thoſe who did not penetrate Piſiſtratus's deſign, and ſtouter than thoſe who did not oppoſe it. When he was gone the aſſembly proceeded to vote Piſiſtratus a guard, but what number is not eaſily ſettled; it ſhould ſeem from Plutarch's account that he had but fifty [p]. Herodotus does not mention any number at all [q]. Polyænus makes them three hundred [r], but Solon [s] himſelf in his letter to Epimenides ſays expreſsly there were four hundred; however it was, he made uſe of his guard to ſeize the citadel, which having performed, he without more ado, according to Herodotus [t] and Plutarch [u], aſſumed the ſovereignty. But Polyænus hath given us a very ſingular account of the method which he took to put it out of the power of the Athenians to defend themſelves, even againſt the ſmall number of men under his command. He ſummoned an aſſembly to be held at the Anacium, and directed that the people ſhould come thither armed; when they were accordingly come together, Piſiſtratus harangued them, but in a very low voice; the people complaining that they could not well hear what he ſaid, he pretended, that it was the clangor of their arms which drowned his voice, and adviſed them to lay them down in the portico of a temple. This they did, and Piſiſtratus then entertained them with a long and eloquent oration, to which they liſtened with deep attention, Piſiſtratus's guard conveyed away their arms, ſo that when he had done ſpeaking, the Athenians ſaw themſelves naked and all power of reſiſtance taken from them [x]. All hiſtorians agree, that amidſt the confuſion which followed this tranſaction there was an aſſembly held, wherein Solon made a ſpeech, inveighing againſt the meanneſs of his countrymens ſpirit, and exciting them to take arms in defence of their liberty. When he found nothing would do, he ſet down his own arms, and contented himſelf with ſaying, 'To the utmoſt 'of my power I have ſtriven for my country and my laws.' Plutarch ſays, that he refuſed to leave his country, and that on Piſiſtratus's ſending to know what it was that inſpired him with boldneſs enough to treat him in ſuch a manner, he anſwered, My old age [y]. But other authors ſay, and with greater probability, that he immediately left the dominions of Athens. About this time it is moſt likely that he wrote the following letter to his friend in Crete [z].

[p] ubi ſupra. [q] lib. i. [r] Strateg. lib. 1. c 21. [s] Vide Epiſt. Solon. ad Epimen. [t] ubi ſupra. [u] ubi ſupra.

Solon to Epimenides:

"NEITHER are my laws likely to benefit the Athe"nians long, nor have you done the city much good
"by your luſtration. For ſacred rites and wiſe lawgivers "cannot alone benefit cities, ſince it is of great conſe-
"quence, of what diſpoſition thoſe are who influence the "common people; ſacred and civil laws, if ſuch men "execute them well, are profitable, but if not, are of "little uſe. My laws are now in a very indifferent con"dition, thoſe in whom the government was lodged,
"making no oppoſition to Piſiſtratus's deſigns, abandoned
"the ſtate; this, when I foretold, I could not be believed,
"the Athenians crediting rather his flatteries than my "truth. Perceiving this, I laid down my arms before
"the magazine, and ſaid, that I was wiſer than thoſe
"who did not ſee Piſiſtratus aimed at tyranny, and
"ſtouter

[x] Strateg. lib. i. c. 21. ſect. ii. [y] ubi ſupra. [z] Diogen. Laert. in vita Solon.

" ſtouter than thoſe who were afraid to reſiſt him. For " this they looked upon Solon as a madman; however,
" I heſitated not to make this proteſtation before I departed;
" Behold, O my country, Solon ready to vindicate thee
" in word and deed; they again cried out that I was mad.
" Thus, finding myſelf alone in oppoſing Piſiſtratus, I " left them; let them ſtill, if they pleaſe, guard with " their arms this their tyrant, for you muſt know, my " friend, that the man very artfully poſſeſſed himſelf of
" the ſovereignty; he complied at the firſt with the demo" cracy, afterwards wounding himſelf, he came into the " Elioea, exclaiming, that he was thus wounded by his " enemies, deſiring that they would grant him a guard of " four hundred men, which they, regardleſs of all I could
" ſay, complied with; after this he diſſolved the popular " government. In vain I laboured to beſtow freedom on " the meaner ſort of people, ſince now the people of all
" ſorts are become Piſiſtratus's ſervants".

PISISTRATUS, in poſſeſſing himſelf of the ſupreme power in Athens, did not overturn the laws eſtabliſhed by Solon; on the contrary, he did all that in him lay to provide for their better execution, and loſt nothing of that moderation for which he had been before remarkable [a]. With reſpect even to Solon himſelf, he preſerved for him the higheſt veneration, and was ſo much diſturbed at his leaving his country, that he wrote to him the following letter to engage him to return [b].

Piſiſtratus to Solon:

" I am not the only perſon among the Greeks who " have acted in this manner, nor am I without right to
" the kingdom I poſſeſs, being the deſcendent of Codrus.
" That which the Athenians ſwore to preſerve to Codrus " and his heirs and yet took away, I have recovered. I " offend neither againſt God or man. I take care to ſee
" thoſe laws framed for the Athenians ſtrictly put in " execution, and ſuffer none to do wrong. I claim no " other privileges, though a tyrant, than the honour and
" dignity, and accept no more than what was thought,
" due to the ancient kings. The Athenians indeed pay
" the

[a] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Ariſt. Polit. lib. v. c. 12. [b] Diogen. Laert. ubi ſupra.

" the tenths of their eſtates, not to me, but for defraying
" the expences of the public ſacrifices, the other charges " of the commonwealth, and that we may have where" withal to carry on a war if we ſhould be engaged in one.
" I do not at all blame you for diſcovering my intention;
" you did it out of regard to your country, rather than
" out of hatred to me; you were ignorant of the form of " government I meant to eſtabliſh: had you known it,
" you would perhaps have borne it, and not have gone
" into baniſhment; however, return, and believe me
" without an oath, Solon ſhall never ſuffer hurt from
" Piſiſtratus; my very enemies have nothing to charge me " with of that kind. If you will be of the number of " my friends, you ſhall be the firſt, for I never obſerved
" any thing of fraud or falſehood in you; if you are re-
" ſolved to continue otherwiſe, live at Athens as you " will, only for our ſake do not deprive yourſelf of your " country".

Solon to Piſiſtratus.

" I believe I ſhall not ſuffer any harm by you, for be" fore you were a tyrant I was your friend, and at pre-
" ſent am no more your enemy than any other Athe" nian who diſlikes tyranny. Whether it be better they
" be governed by a ſingle perſon or by a democracy,
" let both parties determine. I pronounce you the beſt
" of tyrants; but to return to Athens, I think not " fitting, leaſt I incur cenſure, who ſettled an equality
" in the Athenian commonwealth, and would not ac" cept of the tyranny, by returning, I ſhould comply " with thy actions".

Solon kept ſtrictly to his word, and returned no more to Athens, but died abroad. How old this great man was at the time of his deceaſe was not agreed even in the days of Plutarch [c], who ſays, that Heraclides Ponticus affirmed, that Solon lived a long time after Piſiſtratus aſſumed the ſovereignty, whereas Phanias the Epheſian reported, that he did not live after it quite two years; Ælian agrees pretty well with this computation [d], for he ſays he died a little after, being decrepid with age; Diogenes Laertius informs us, that he reached the age of fourſcore [e], but Lucian, however, will have it, that he lived a hundred and [c] In vita Solonis, prope fin. [d] Hiſt. var. lib. viii. c. 16.

[e] ubi ſupra.

and upwards [f]; where he died is another very diſputable point; ſome ſay it was in Cyprus [g], others not [h]; Diogenes Laertius informs us, that he directed his bones ſhould be burnt, and their aſhes carried to Salamis and ſcattered over the iſland [i]. Plutarch treats this as a fable, but acknowledges at the ſame time, that many eminent writers had given into it, and mentions particularly Ariſtotle [k]. The Athenians, after the death of Solon, paid him the higheſt honours, and erected for him in the forum and at Salamis a ſtatue in braſs with his hand in his gown, the poſture in which he was wont to ſpeak; which he certainly deſerved for the mighty ſervices rendered by him to his country (N) [l]. But to return to Piſiſtratus:

At

[f] In Longævis. [g] Diogen. Laert. ubi ſupra. Valer. Max. lib. v. c. 3. [h] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. [i] Ubi ſupra. [k] Ubi ſupra. [l] Æſch. in Timarch.

(N) We have already ſaid ſo much of the genius of Solon, that it would be tedious to dwell upon it here; we ſhall therefore take notice only of ſome remarkable paſſages which were related concerning his death, give a ſuccinct account of his writings, and of the praiſes beſtowed upon him by the moſt eminent among the ancient Romans as well as Greeks. The very laſt day of his life ſome friends of his ſitting in the chamber fell into a diſcourſe, to which he liſtened with great attention; being aſked the reaſon, he anſwered, "I do this, that when I have learned "whatſoever it is you diſpute about, I may die (31)". A little before his laſt agonies, hearing his brother ſinging an ode of Sappho, he was ſo well pleaſed with it, that he called the young man, and bad him teach it him; and the reaſon of this being alſo demanded, It is, returned he, "that I may learn while I am de-"parting out of this life (32). As to his writings, we ſtand indebted to Laertius for the following account; his laws; orations to the people; poems; the Atlantic hiſtory, which was his laſt work and left unfiniſhed; again attempted by his kinſman Plato, and by him alſo left unfiniſhed; occaſional epiſtles; amongſt theſe there is the following one, preſerved by Laertius, addreſſed to the tyrant of Corinth, who was eſteemed one of the ſeven ſages of Greece; it is very ſhort, and therefore we did not think fit to omit it.

Solon to Periander.

"You ſend me word there are many who plot againſt you; if you "ſhould put them all to death, it would advantage you nothing; "ſome

31 Valer. Maxim. lib. viii. c. 7. (32) Stob. Serm. xxix.

At the very beginning of his adminiſtration, Megacles and his family retired out of the territories of Athens, but they did this with a view only to preſerve themſelves from being cut off to render his principality the ſurer. They did not renounce all hopes of returning to their country, or all correſpondence with their countrymen; on the contrary, he and his aſſociates entered into a treaty with Lycurgus and his party, and having brought them into a ſcheme for overturning Piſiſtratus, they proſecuted this with ſuch an effect, that he found himſelf obliged to retire, and ſeek, as they had done, ſhelter in a foreign clime; and the Athenians, notwithſtanding all the inſtances of love they had ſhewn him, were ſo far wrought on by his enemies, as to order his goods to be publicly ſold. However, though this reſolution was not only taken, but put into execution, there was no body but Callias who would venture to buy any of them; from an apprehenſion, no doubt, that one time or other he would be reſtored [m].

As Megacles and his party had negotiated with Lycurgus the ruin of Piſiſtratus, ſo ſome time afterwards, finding, that Lycurgus and his faction were not implicitly governed [m] Plut. ubi ſupra. Herodot. lib. i.

"ſome one there may be of thoſe whom you ſuſpect not who plots "againſt you, either fearing himſelf or diſdaining you, or de- "ſirous to ingratiate himſelf with the city, though you have "done him no injury. It is beſt, if you would be free from jea- "louſy, to acquit yourſelf of the cauſe; but if you will conti- "nue in tyranny, take care to provide a greater ſtrength of "ſtrangers than is in your own city; ſo ſhall you need to fear "no man, nor put any to death (33)".

Plato, in various places, commends the wiſdom, learning, and genius of Solon (34), ſo alſo does Ariſtides (35); Dion Chryſoſtom ſpeaks of him with the greateſt reſpect (36), as an orator and legiſlator, as a warrior and a patriot; Demoſthenes has in few words celebrated his praiſes (37); Cicero affirms, that before the times of Solon and Piſiſtratus eloquence was unknown (38); Seneca mentions Solon with great reſpect (39), and Valerius Maximus, as he records many things relating to him, ſo he fails not greatly to commend him. In fine, ancient and modern writers agree, that, without flattery, Solon might be ſtiled brave, wiſe, and honeſt; how ſhall we commend him more?

(33) Diogen. Laert. Vit. Solon. (34) In Amator. de Repub. &c. (35) Orat. Paraſth. (36) Orat. xxi. (37) In Amator. (38) De Orat. (39) Epiſt. xc.

verned by them, they began to treat with Pisistratus, and to offer him, in case he would marry the daughter of Megacles, to reinstate him in his principality, to which Pisistratus readily assented. It is easy to conceive, that this affair required rather fraud than force for its being conducted with success. Pisistratus and Megacles resolved to rest all upon an expedient which Herodotus stiles a ridiculous project; but, ridiculous as it appeared, it succeeded. They found out a woman, whose name was Phya the daughter of Socrates, a man of mean family and fortune; this woman was of prodigious stature, and otherwise very handsome; her they dressed in armour, placed her in a chariot, and having disposed all things so as to make her appear with all possible advantage, they conducted her towards the city, sending heralds before, with orders to speak to the people in these terms, "Give a kind reception, O "Athenians, to Pisistratus, who is so much honoured by "Minerva above all other men, that she herself conde- "scends to bring him back to the citadel"; when the heralds had published this in several places, the report was universally spread, that Minerva was bringing home Pisistratus, and in the city the multitude, believing this woman to be the goddess, addressed her with prayers, and readily received Pisistratus. When he had recovered the sovereignty, he married, as he had promised, the daughter of Megacles, and out of gratitude to Phya gave her in marriage to his son Hipparchus[n].

It was not long Pisistratus enjoyed in quiet that authority to which he had been so oddly restored; we have already observed, that he kept his word to Megacles in marrying his daughter, and it seems Pisistratus conceived that his word bound him to nothing more. But considering that he had children by a former wife, and that Megacles's family were held by the Athenians to be execrable, he never conversed with this new wife of his as a wife, which for a time she concealed; but at length mentioning it to her mother, the family so highly resented his proceeding, that Megacles instantly began to negociate with the malecontents, which Pisistratus perceiving, and seeing what an effect it produced on the minds of the people, he once more quitted Attica voluntarily, and retired to to Eretria. There, as ſoon as he found himſelf in ſafety, he conſulted with his ſons what courſe was fitteſt to be taken in the preſent ſituation of their affairs. Hippias propoſed the reducing Athens by force, which was agreed to, and immediately Piſiſtratus applied to ſeveral of the Grecian cities to furniſh him with men and money for the carrying this deſign of his into execution. Several yielded him their aſſiſtance as they were deſired, but the Thebans exceeded all others in their liberality. Some troops of Argives were quickly levied by the help of theſe ſubſidies, and all things were much forwarded by the kindneſs of Lygdamis, a Naxian, who, as a volunteer, joined them with a conſiderable number of men, and advanced alſo a large ſum of money. In the eleventh year of their baniſhment, ſays Herodotus, Piſiſtratus, with his family and the army he had drawn together, marched from Eretria and entered Attica. The firſt place they poſſeſſed themſelves of was Marathon, and when they were incamped there they were joined by multitudes of Athenians, who loved the government of Piſiſtratus better than a democracy. It ſeems, the government of that city had not taken any very vigorous ſteps, though they knew that Piſiſtratus was raiſeing money; but when they heard he was marching directly towards Athens, they aſſembled all their forces to defend themſelves and to repel the invaders. In the mean time, Piſiſtratus, advancing with his army from Marathon, arrived at the temple of the Pallenian Minerva; and after they had placed their arms before the gates, Amphilytus, a prophet of Acarnania, by divine impulſe went to him, and pronounced this oracle in Hexameter verſe:

[n] Herodot. ubi supra. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. i. c. 21. Valer. Max. lib. i. c. 2.

> The net is ſpread, and dexterouſly thrown,
> By the clear moon-light ſhall the tunnies come.

When the prophet had delivered theſe words, Piſiſtratus comprehending the oracle, and ſaying he accepted the omen, broke up with his army. In the mean time, the Athenians having drawn their forces out of the city and taken their dinner, betook themſelves afterwards to dice or ſleep. So that the army of Piſiſtratus, falling upon them by ſurprize, ſoon put them to flight; and as they were endeavouring to make their eſcape, Piſiſtratus contrived contrived an artful ſtratagem in order to diſperſe them ſo intirely, that they might not rally again. He commanded his ſon to ride before with ſpeed, and in his name to inform all thoſe they ſhould overtake, that they had nothing to fear, and that every man might return to his own habitation [o]. Thus Piſiſtratus became a third time poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty of Athens, out of which that he might be no more driven, he took a method directly contrary to that which Theſeus made uſe of for aggrandizeing his kingdom; for whereas that prince made the inhabitants of Attica retire from the country, and live together in the city, Piſiſtratus obliged them to addict themſelves again to agriculture, that they might not meet together in the market places and cabal againſt him. By this means he greatly mended the ſtate of the Athenian territories, and procured great plantations of olives to be made all over Attica, which before was not only almoſt void of corn, but alſo bare of trees [p]. He likewiſe commanded, that in the city men ſhould wear a certain kind of ſheep-ſkin veſt reaching only to the knees, which in ſucceeding times became proverbially the habit of ſlavery [q]. The Athenians being ſo nice in reſpect to liberty, that if things right in themſelves were commanded by perſons void of lawful authority, they looked on obedience as the greateſt miſery. On this account it was, that Piſiſtratus's laws againſt idleneſs were held tyrannical, though they were enacted merely in ſupport of thoſe of Solon. He received as prince of Athens the tenth part of every man's rents, and even of the fruits of his grounds, which, though applied, as the ancient revenues were, viz. to the ſervice of the ſtate, ſeemed to the Athenians an intolerable grievance. It happened once, that Piſiſtratus being in the country, perceived an old man buſy in creeping over the rocks and picking ſomething, Piſiſtratu, aſked him what he was doing in that uncouth place, and what were the fruits of his labour. Troubles and a few plants of wild ſage, replied the old man, and of theſe Piſiſtratus muſt have the tenth: to which Piſiſtratus made him no reply, but on his return to the city diſcharged him from paying this duty [r]. He endeavoured by all means poſſible to eradicate the fierceneſs of the Athenians, but to little purpoſe, for as he was averſe to ſeverity, [o] Herodot. lib. i. c. 6. [p] Dion. Chryſoſt. Orat vii. Maxim. Tyr. Diſſert. xiii. [q] Suidas in voce Κατουηκοι [r] Zenobius. Cent. iv. Prov. 76.

[o] Herodot. lib. i. c. 21.

ty, ſo it was a difficult thing for them to learn ſubmiſſion. Some young men, who had been drinking at a feaſt, in their return met his wife and inſulted her groſsly; the next day, however, when their ſpirits were cooler, they went in the moſt humble manner to aſk him pardon. Piliſtratus heard their apology very graciouſly, and when they had done, I would adviſe you, gentlemen, ſaid he, to behave for the future more modeſtly; but as for my wife ſhe was not abroad yeſterday [s]. He adorned the city with fine edifices, particularly the temple of the Pythian Apollo; and when the Athenians, to ſhew their averſion to him, went and eaſed themſelves there, he firſt endeavoured by gentle means to reclaim them from ſo ſcandalous a practice, and finding this had no effect, he commanded a herald to make proclamation, that ſuch as for the future were guilty of that offence ſhould ſuffer death [t]. He laid the foundations of the famous temple of Jupiter Olympius, mentioned before in our deſcription of the city of Athens. He was the firſt who built a library for public uſe, and directed, that Homer's poems ſhould be digeſted into regular order as we have them at preſent. In all other reſpects he was a great encourager of learning, and converſed familiarly with Crotoniates the epic poet, who wrote the adventures of the Argonauts [u]. As to his military virtues, we have already ſhewn what a ſhare he had in the reduction of Salamis; he is alſo reported by Herodotus to have conquered the iſland of Naxus, which he put into the hands of Lygdamis; he alſo conquered the city of Sigeium, and purified the iſland of Delos; ſo that on the whole, it ſeems he wanted nothing but a legal title to have rendered him an excellent prince [x]. He not only maintained the laws as became him in his ſtation, but when he heard he was accuſed in the court of Areopagus of a murder, he came like a private man and ſubmitted himſelf to judgment [y]. At another time having ſome way offended certain Athenians of principal dignity, and they retiring to the caſtle of Phylæ, he went thither the next day with a cloak-bag on his back; when they aſked him what he meant, Either, ſaid he, to engage you to go back with me to Athens, or to ſtay with you my ſelf, and therefore you ſee I am come provided [z]. From the time of his firſt poſſeſſing himſelf of the ſovereignty to his death there intervened vened thirty-three years, of which he reigned but seventeen, as we learn from Aristotle, and consequently his first and second exile included sixteen years; as to the latter, Herodotus tells us expressly, that it lasted eleven years; consequently his first exile was five years only [a]. He left behind him, amongst other children, two sons, both men of great capacity, viz. Hippias and Hipparchus, but which of these was the eldest is a point never to be determined. Thucydides more than once affirms that it was Hippias, and charges such as believe the contrary with being in a gross error [b]. Polyænus says the same thing [c], yet Plato is as positive that Hipparchus was the eldest [d]. Ælian follows him, and Heraclidus Ponticus seems to be of the same opinion. Thucydides supports his account of the matter by some arguments, which in the opinion of the learned Meursius are not very conclusive. Without troubling the reader farther with so perplexed a business, we will proceed to the relation of facts better asserted (O).

[s] Plutarch. Apothegm. [t] And. Schot. Append. Vatic. Prov. Cent i. p. 82 [u] Suidas. Virtuvius. Præt. lib. vii. A. Gellius. Noct. Attic. vi. c 17. [x] Herodot. lib. i. [y] Ariſt. Polit. l. v. c. 12. [z] Plutarch. Apothegm.

The

[a] Polit. l. v c. 12. Herodot. l. i. [b] Bell. Pelop. lib. i. & lib. vi. [c] Stratagem. lib. v. c. 14. [d] In Hipparch.

(O) It would have interrupted the current of our history too much to have dwelt therein on the family affairs of Pisistratus, and yet it is necessary, in order to have a perfect comprehension of the affairs of the Athenians during this space of time, that all the circumstances mentioned in ancient authors relating to the Pisistratidæ should be somewhere preserved and explained. As to the descent of Pisistratus himself, we see from his own letter to Solon that he was of the house of Codrus, the last king of Athens. Ancient authors assure us, that he was of the same family with Nestor (40), so that in point of nobility of birth, few princes have had greater cause to value themselves than Pisistratus. His father's name was Hippocrates, as we are more than once told by Herodotus; and as the ancients were very circumspect in noting whatever had relation to the birth of their children, so as to the nativity of Pisistratus something very extraordinary is recorded. Hippocrates, being at the celebration of the Olympic games, caused a victim which he had slain there to be put into a cauldron of water, which immediately began to boil without the assistance of fire. Chilon the Lacedæmonian, being present when this prodigy happened, immediately addressed himself to the Athenian, advising him not to marry any woman by whom he might have children; in case he was married to such a one to divorce her, or, if he had a son, (40) Herodot. lib. 5. c. 65. Eustath. ad Iliad. γ.

THE brothers Hipparchus and Hippias ſhared, as moſt think, the ſupreme authority between them, ſome ſay, that to abdicate him ; but Hippocrates did not take his advice, for his wife being not long after delivered of Piſiſtratus, he educated the child with great care ; nor is it unlikely, that Hippocrates apprehended why the Lacedæmonian gave him this advice, ſince he called his ſon after the name of the ſon of Neſtor, that he might continuallly remember his lineage, and be from thence excited to hope and to do great things (41). As to his mother, we are not acquainted either with her name or family, or indeed with any thing relating to her, except the following paſſage, which ſhews that ſhe lived to be pretty far in years. When her ſon was poſſeſſed of the principality of Athens, ſhe fell in love with a young man with whom ſhe converſed ſecretly and with great caution ; however, Piſiſtratus had intelligence thereof, he therefore invited the young man to an entertainment, and when they roſe from table, What think you, my friend, ſaid Piſiſtratus, of your treatment to day ? That it was moſt excellent, Sir, anſwered he. Why then, replied, Piſiſtratus, you may be aſſured, that you ſhall meet with the like fare every day, as long as you pleaſe my mother (42). As to his affability and generoſity we have ſpoken ſufficiently already; but it may not be amiſs to note, that the wiſeſt, both of the Greeks and Romans, have left us high panegyrics on the eloquence of Piſiſtratus, which they agree was the chief inſtrument he uſed in acquiring the dominion of his country (43). And that it was wonderfully great, appears from another teſtimony ſtill ſtronger than the former, viz. from the mighty apprehenſions the Athenians were in, that Pericles would attempt to make himſelf a prince, becauſe in his countenance and manner of ſpeaking he was ſaid to reſemble Piſiſtratus (44). Cicero, writing to Atticus concerning Cæſar's conqueſt of the commonwealth, tells him, that it was yet uncertain, whether the victor would prove a Phalaris or a Piſiſtratus (45), whereby he plainly means to delineate the worſt of tyrannies and the beſt, It may therefore be affirmed of Piſiſtratus, that of all the ſovereigns who illegally acquired their principalities, he governed with the greateſt juſtice, ſince both Solon and Cicero teſtify as much, and ſince it was thought the higheſt compliment that could be paid Cæſar, that he governed like another Piſiſtratus. We have ſeen many inſtances of his humanity ; there is yet another which ought not to be ſuppreſſed. Thraſibulus or Thraſimedes was in love with Piſiſtratus's daughter, and it ſeems was not (41) Herodot lib. 1. Diog. Laertius in vit. Chilonis. (42) Plutarch. Apotheg. (43) Dion. Chryſ. Orat. xxii. Cicer. de Orat. lib. iii. c. 34. Iſocrat, in Panathen, (44) Plutarch. in vita Periclis. (45) lib. vii. Epiſt. 20.

that the former only had the title, and others, that Piſiſtratus bequeathed his authority, not only to theſe two, but alſo to his third ſon Theſſalus [g]; clear it is, that

 Hippar-

[g] Athenæus Deipnoſ. lib, xiii. Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Herac. Pont. Fragm.

not hated by her. When therefore ſhe was going in a public proceſſion to ſacrifice the young man imprudently kiſſed her, with which Piſiſtratus's family was ſo much diſguſted, that they entreated him to puniſh ſeverely this inſolent offender; to which Piſiſtratus mildly anſwered, If we are ſevere to thoſe who love us, what ſhall we do to thoſe that hate us? Thraſimedes, either encouraged by this, or diſtracted by his paſſion, drew in ſome young men of his acquaintance to aſſiſt him in carrying off the lady; this they performed as ſhe came to the ſhore to offer ſacrifice to the ſea, and having conveyed her into a bark, made all the ſail they could for Ægina. Hippias, being at that time employed in ſcowering the ſeas of pyrates, without knowing any thing of what happened, boarded this bark, and recovered his ſiſter. When the delinquents were brought before Piſiſtratus and threatened with death, they could by no means be induced to acknowledge their offence. Piſiſtratus, when he had a while conſidered them, told Thraſimedes that he beſtowed on him his daughter in marriage, that no broils might be created among the Athenians on account of his family; and by this means bound the relations and friends of that young man for ever to his intereſt (46). Amongſt the worthy acts of this great man, his collecting the works of Homer is generally looked upon as one of the chief. We think it therefore neceſſary to inform our readers how this was performed, the rather, becauſe it is contained in an extract from a Greek book, the whole of which is hitherto unpubliſhed; and this very extract not eaſily met with. Our author ſays, that Piſiſtratus, conſidering the various ways by which Homer's poems had been corrupted, and fearing leſt in the end they ſhould be totally loſt, cauſed public notice to be given throughout Greece, that all who were poſſeſſed of any genuine works of Homer ſhould bring them to him, promiſing to give them ſo much a line, which he punctually performed, even where ſeveral perſons brought the ſame verſes; becauſe to the firſt the money was due, and the latter he ſaid deſerved it for their good will; he cauſed the whole to be reviſed by the moſt experienced critics, amongſt whom Zenodotus and Ariſtarchus were the chief (47). He is ſaid to have had three wives, two before he arrived

(46) Polyæn. Strateg. lib. v. c. 14. (47) Diomed. in Comment. Dionyſ. Thrac. de Arte Gram. apud. Meurſ. in Præfat. Gronov. Theſ. Grec. vol. iv.

Hipparchus and Hippias lived and reigned together; as to the former, he was a perſon of great ſweetneſs of temper, a mighty favourer of learning, and alſo himſelf a very learned man. He directed, that the rhapſodiſts, a ſort of bards by profeſſion, ſhould at the great feaſt ſtiled Panathenæa ſing all the poems of Homer, that the Athenians might be generally inſtructed both in the ſciences and in the moral conduct of life. He treated Simonides the poet with great kindneſs, and kept him always near his perſon, and ſent a galley on purpoſe to bring the celebrated Anacreon to Athens [h], Onomacritus was another of his favourites, but he having been caught in the fact of interpolating the oracles of Muſæus, Hipparchus not only diſmiſſed him his court, but baniſhed him Athens [i]. So aſſiduous was this prince in cultivating the minds of the people, that he cauſed in city and country, but eſpecially in the latter, ſtatues of Mercury to be ſet up, and certain wiſe counſels in elegiac verſe to be inſcribed on both ſides of them. Sometimes there was only a ſhort ſaying, ſuch as rived at their ſovereignty, and the third the daughter of Megacles, whom, as we have ſhewn, he married merely to keep his word. By the firſt he had Hipparchus, whom Juſtin calls Diocles, and Hippias, but her name is not known; the ſecond was called Timonaſſa, an Argive by birth, by whom he had Jophon and Theſſalus; when he was about to marry this woman, his ſons came to him and aſked him, If any miſbehaviour of theirs had induced him to think of another marriage? No, anſwered he, 'I approve your conduct ſo much, that I would have more children like you' (48). Yet he refuſed to have children by his laſt wife, becauſe her family, though noble, was ſtained with an indelible mark of infamy among the Athenians. The name of his daughter is not known. Beſides theſe children by his wives, he had a baſtard ſon by an Argive woman, whoſe name was Hegiſtratus, to whom he left the principality of Sigeium, whither his ſon Hippias retired when expelled by the Athenians (49). As to the dates when the ſeveral memorable tranſactions above-cited happened, authors are not thoroughly agreed about them, we ſhall therefore poſtpone what we have to ſay of them, till we come to the death of Hippias, and then conſider the whole matter together.

[h] Plato, ubi ſupra. [i] Herodot. lib. vii.

(48) Plutarch. de vit. Caton. (49) Herodot. Thucyd. &c. ubi ſupra.

as, ‘ This is the precept of Hipparchus, be thou ſtrictly ‘ juſt, or, deceive not thy friend’. On account therefore of theſe ſhining virtues he was greatly admired by his citizens, and the principality of the Piſiſtratidæ ſeemed to be thoroughly and quietly eſtabliſhed [k]. But when it was leaſt expected, a conſpiracy was formed for taking off both the brothers, which ſucceeded in reſpect to Hipparchus, and narrowly miſſed with regard to Hippias. Several authors report this fact with variety of circumſtances; as to the moſt material, however, they are pretty well agreed, and they are theſe: There were two young men in Athens, Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, the former was exquiſitely beautiful in his perſon, and on that account, according to the infamous cuſtom of the Greeks, violently beloved of the other; this Harmodius was alſo beloved by Hipparchus, who, if we may believe Thucydides, forced him; Ariſtogiton grievouſly reſented this, and with the injured youth determined to revenge it. Another accident concurred to heighten their reſentment, Hipparchus finding that Harmodius endeavoured to avoid him, publickly affronted him, by not permitting his ſiſter to carry the offering of Minerva, as if ſhe was a perſon unworthy of that office. The two young men, not daring to ſhew any public ſigns of reſentment, conſulted privately with their friends, among whom it was reſolved, at the approaching feſtival of the Panathenæa, when the citizens were allowed to appear in arms, to attempt, by the death of both the tyrants, to reſtore Athens to liberty; the conſpirators believing that the people would be unanimous in ſupport of a deſign ſo manifeſtly calculated for their advantage. When the day came appointed for putting this deſign into execution, and the conſpiracy appeared, as it had been agreed on, near the perſon of Hipparchus, they perceived at a diſtance one of their own number talking very familiarly with Hippias; this amazed them, they were afraid that he had diſcovered to him the conſpirators, taking courage therefore from the ſuppoſed deſperate ſtate of their affairs, they inſtantly fell on Hipparchus, and with a multitude of wounds diſpatched him. The people, however, did not ſecond them in this exploit, but ſuffered Harmodius to be killed upon the ſpot by Hipparchus's guard, and haveing ſeized Ariſtogiton themſelves, delivered him up [n]. Herodotus, [k] Plato, ubi ſupra. Ælian, var. Hiſt. lib. xi. 8.

[n] Thucyd. lib. vi. Plato, ubi ſupra.

rodotus, who was very curious in picking up ſtrange ſtories, relates a very odd one in relation to this tranſaction; Hipparchus, he tells us, in the night preceding the day on which he was killed, beheld in a dream a tall handſome youth ſtanding by him, who repeated diſtinctly theſe obſcure lines;

Lion unmov'd, ſuſtain the greateſt ill;
For puniſhment attends injuſtice ſtill.

At break of day he acquainted ſuch as had ſkill in dreams with what he had ſeen: what their interpretation was, Herodotus does not inform us; he adds, that at length Hipparchus, deſpiſing this omen, went to celebrate the feaſt, and was there ſlain in the manner we have related [o]. Hippias behaved on this occaſion with great prudence; he diſſembled his grief for his brother's death, that he might the better preſerve himſelf and family: he approached the great croud of people with his guards, and having picked out ſuch as either their looks or their wearing daggers engaged him to believe conſpirators, he diſmiſſed the reſt [p]. As for the Athenians in general, though they ſeemed to have a high eſteem for the Piſiſtratidæ, and had been governed by them with great gentleneſs for the ſpace of a long ſeries of years, and had not máde any general inſurrection in order to favour the attempt of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, yet they carried their reſpect for them after their deaths to a height ſcarce to be accounted for; they cauſed their praiſes to be ſung at the Panathenæa [q]; they forbad any citizen to call his ſlave by either of their names [r]; they erected brazen ſtatues for them in the forum, which ſtatues, as Pliny informs us, were the work of Praxiteles [s]; theſe ſtatues Xerxes afterwards carried into Aſia, from whence they were ſent back to Athens, either by Alexander [t], Antiochus [u], or Seleucus [x]; for authors do not agree which. They likewiſe granted ſeveral immunities and honorary privileges to the deſcendents of theſe patriots, and did all in their power to make their memory venerable, as we ſhall ſee elſewhere [y] (P).

[o] Herodot. lib. v. Thucydid. lib. vi. [q] Dion. Chryſ. Orat. xi. Philoſt in vit. Apoll. lib. vii. c. 2. [r] Liban. Declam. xxix. [s] H. N. lib. xxxiv. c. 8. [t] Arrian. Exped. Alex. lib. iii. [u] Pauſan. in Atticis. [x] Val. Max. lib. ii. c. 10. [y] Demoſt. Orat. in Leptin.

(P) The hiſtory of Hipparchus's murder is variouſly reported. Thucydides ſays expreſly, that Harmodius, who was in the flower of

THE ſupreme power being now in the hands of Hippias, he began to alter his conduct towards the people, and to treat them with a ſeverity unknown to his family before, and which was the worſe borne, becauſe himſelf had been ſo mild a prince. The firſt effects of this change in his temper fell upon thoſe concerned in the late conſpiracy, he ordered Ariſtogiton to be put to the torture, in order to extort from him the names of thoſe who were privy to this tranſaction. This man, as ſoon as he began to feel the torments which were prepared for him, named ſome of Hippias's beſt friends, who were immediately put to death. He then named more, who received the ſame fate, and when Hippias aſked him if there were not ſtill ſome others, he replied ſmiling, 'I know of none now, but yourſelf, 'that deſerves to ſuffer death [z].' But it was not Ariſtogiton only who triumphed over the cruelty of Hippias; a woman he kept, whoſe name was Leæna, behaved with no leſs intrepidity than he. Hippias having directed her to be tortured in order to extort diſcoveries, ſhe bore it patiently as long as ſhe was able, but when ſhe found ſhe could endure it no longer, ſhe bit off her tongue, and ſpit it out that it might not be in her power to declare any of his age, was beloved by Ariſtogiton a citizen of the middle rank, and aſcribes the murder of Hipparchus to his rival's hatred (50). Ariſtotle calls Harmodius and Ariſtogiton lovers (51), and ſo does Maximus Tyrius. Juſtin differs from every body, and gives quite another turn to the whole affair. After Piſiſtratus's death, Diocles, one of his ſons, ſays he, having raviſhed a virgin, was killed by the brother of the maid (52). He had this probably from Trogus Pompeius, whoſe work he abridged; but where he had it is not known. Ariſtogiton is by ſome authors ſaid to have been an humble dependent on Harmodius, and his miſtreſs Leæna no better than a ſinging woman who uſed to attend at feaſts. On the whole therefore, whatever honours the Athenians thought fit to decree theſe men, their conſpiracy ſeems rather the effects of paſſion, than any deſire to do their country good; or, at beſt, the latter was pretended to cover the former; but it ſuited the Athenians, who were violent enemies to the government of a ſingle perſon, to magnify this action as glorious, and to give the actors therein the title of heroes.

[z] Polyæn. Stratag. lib. i. c. 22.

(50) Thucyd. lib. vi. (51) Rhetor. lib. ii. (52) lib. ii. c. 9.

thing to the prejudice of the man ſhe loved. The Athenians, conceiving it indecent to ſet up the ſtatue of a lewd woman in their citadel, contented themſelves with erecting that of a lioneſs without a tongue, alluding to her name, on which was engraven theſe words, Her tongue herſelf bit off [a]. This conſpiracy being, as Hippias conceived, thoroughly quaſhed, he took all the meaſures, which human policy could ſuggeſt, to ſecure himſelf in the poſſeſſion of his dignity; he contracted leagues with foreign princes, he encreaſed his revenues by various methods, though till then he had been contented with the twentieth part of every man's annual income; he obliged the Athenians to bring in their ſilver coin at a certain price, and coined new. Theſe violent methods ſoon put an end to a government, the lenity of which had alone preſerved it ſo long. Hippias held the ſovereignty only three years after the demiſe of his brother, and in the fourth was expelled [b] (Q).

We

[a] Plut. de Garr. [b] Herodot. lib. v. c. 45.

(Q) It may ſeem a little ſtrange, that in ſpeaking of the government of the Piſiſtratidæ we have aſſerted, that they did not greatly violate the laws or conſtitution of their country. In order to explain this, we muſt deſcend a little into the particulars of Piſiſtratus's policy. He pretended, as we ſee in his letter to Solon, to act as a lawful monarch, yet he did not degrade any of the magiſtrates of the commonwealth, but ſuffered them to continue veſted with the ſame power they had before, taking care, however, that the archon ſhould be either of his family, or one whom he could depend on, ſo that he at once preſerved that ſuperiority over his countrymen which he affected, and that form of rule which was ſo pleaſing to them. That all the family of Piſiſtratus had in their turns a ſhare in the adminiſtration, might be made appear from various teſtimonies; at preſent we will inſiſt only on one. Piſiſtratus, the ſon of Hippias, and grand ſon of the great Piſiſtratus, as we learn from Thucydides (55), placed, during the time that he was archon, an altar in the forum of the twelve gods, and another in the temple of the Pythian Apollo; the inſcription on the former the Athenians demoliſhed, but that on the latter they ſuffered to remain, which runs thus: This monument, during the time of his magiſtracy, Piſiſtratus the ſon of Hippias placed in the temple of the Pythian Apollo. It is true, his name is not found in the table of archons, becauſe the year in which he was archon could not be ſettled; however, the authority before

(55) Thucyd. lib. vi.

WE have already obſerved, that Megacles, who was of the family of Alcmæon, left his country, when Piſiſtratus was a ſecond time reſtored, but he and thoſe who were with him carried away a great ſum of money; the Alcmæonidæ, for ſo the family of Megacles from their great anceſtor Alcmæon were ſtiled, ſettled at Lipſydrum in Pæonia, and there gave refuge to all who fled from Athens, which were not a few; for Piſiſtratus, as ſome ſay, or as others report, Hippias, baniſhed all that depended on that family, and ſuffered not ſo much as the dead to reſt in their graves, on the old ſuperſtitious account, it may be, of their being thought execrable [c]. This family reſiding, as we have ſaid, at Lipſydrum, buſied themſelves intirely in contriving means for expelling the Piſiſtratidæ, and at laſt deviſed a method which proved not unſucceſsful. They agreed with the Amphictyons or ſtates-general of Greece to rebuild the temple of Delphi; as they were poſſeſſed of great riches, they executed what they undertook with much greater magnificence than they were tied to by their contract, and particularly faced the frontiſpiece with Parian marble inſtead of common ſtone, to the uſe of which only they were obliged. While they were thus employed in the public ſervice of Greece, they ſerved themſelves too a little, for they corrupted the Pythia, i. e. ſhe who gave out the oracles, and engaged her to exhort all the Lacedæmonians who came to conſult the oracle, either on behalf of the ſtate or on their private account, to deliver Athens. This had the effect they expected, for the Lacedæmonians, finding this admonition inceſſantly inculcated, ſent Anchimolius, a man of great quality, at the head of an army into Attica to perform what the oracle had directed, notwithſtanding the Piſiſtratidæ were at that time their good friends and allies [d]. Hippias, however, receiving advice of theſe proceedings, ſent to the Theſſalians, who were his confederates, to demand their aſſiſtance, who

The Piſiſtratidæ expelled Athens, and the democracy reſtored.

[c] Suidas. [d] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

before produced may be aſſuredly relied on. The exceſſes committed by Hippias, after the death of his brother, are evident proofs of the mildneſs of the adminſtration preceding it; for few things that he did would have been thought extraordinary in another king. We will conclude this note with obſerving, that Auguſtus Cæſar affected, like Piſiſtratus, to leave the popular magiſtrates and the ſenate in the nominal poſſeſſion of their authority, tho' at the ſame time he held the ſupreme power himſelf.

who readily ſent him a thouſand horſe under the command of Cineas one of their princes. A ſhort time after, Anchimolius with his fleet arrived on the Athenian coaſt, and immediately after the army landed and incamped. The Piſiſtratidæ did not, however, abandon Athens, but Hippias, having cleared the adjacent country in ſuch a manner that the Theſſalian horſe might act with eaſe, attacked the Lacedæmonians ſuddenly, routed them with a great ſlaughter, ſlew their general Anchimolius, and obliged the ſhattered remains of his army to betake themſelves to their ſhips. The body of the Spartan general was honourably interred near the temple of Hercules in the Cynoſarges. The Lacedæmonians, incenſed at this unfortunate expedition, determined to ſend another army into Attica, which accordingly they did under their king Cleomenes, who marched by land, and having at his entrance into the Athenian territories defeated the Theſſalian horſe, who thereupon retired precipitately into their own country, he made uſe of this opportunity to beſiege Hippias, who had retired within the Pelaſgic wall; this ſiege, however, could not have produced any great matter, Hippias and his forces being well provided with all things within, Cleomenes and his army deſtitute of all things without; but an accident changed the ſcene, and conſtrained Hippias to abandon Athens. The Piſiſtratidæ were ſo careful of their children, that to prevent any unlucky accident from befalling them, they attempted to ſend them out of Attica; which meaſure of theirs, though intended for the preſervation of their offspring, proved the ruin of themſelves, their children falling into the hands of the Lacedæmonians. The Piſiſtratidæ, retaining ſtill the ſame affection for their children, agreed by treaty to retire in five days out of Attica in order to redeem them [e]. This accordingly they did, nor were they in any danger of wanting a place of refuge, the princes of Theſſaly invited them into their country, the king of Macedon offered them a city and territory if they would retire into his dominions [f]. But Hippias and his family choſe rather to go to the city of Sigeium, which Piſiſtratus had conquered and left behind him to his poſterity, Herodotus ſays to Hegiſtratus his natural ſon. From this time forwards the Athenians purſued this family with implacable hatred, retaining ſuch a ſenſe of their uſurpation, that, leſt other eminent perſons ſhould imitate them, and and through their intereſt in the people aſſume the ſovereignty, they were moſt ready to baniſh even the moſt worthy of their citizens, that at all events they might be ſafe, as we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſhew in the ſucceeding pages of this hiſtory.

[e] Ariſtoph. Lyſiſt. Pauſan. in Lacon. [f] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

THE Athenians did not enjoy an uninterrupted quiet, as they expected, after the expulſion of the Piſiſtratidæ. The people were quickly divided into two factions, at the head of the one was Clyſthenes, the moſt eminent of the Alcmæonidæ, and at the head of the other Iſagoras the ſon of Tirſander, a man of great quality and in high eſteem with the nobility of Athens. Clyſthenes, who was a perſon of great parts, as we may gueſs from his having a principal hand in corrupting the Pythia, which was the prime cauſe of Hippias's expulſion, applied himſelf chiefly to the people, and, in order thoroughly to engage them in his intereſt, ſought by all methods poſſible to encreaſe their power. With this view he altered many things in Solon's ſcheme of government; for whereas till this time the Athenian tribes had been but four in number, he augmented them to ten, and encreaſed the ſenate from four hundred to five. Iſagoras, penetrating his deſign, and readily conceiving that by this courſe he would get the better of him and his faction, immediately reſolved to ſeek aid from the Lacedæmonians. This ſeemed to him the more eaſy, becauſe in their laſt expedition he had contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Cleomenes their king; he likewiſe deviſed a very proper expedient for the expulſion of his rival, viz. the ſo often mentioned ſtory of the putting to death Cylon's aſſociates after their taking ſanctuary in the temple of Minerva; but, as we have heretofore obſerved, the Alcmæonidæ were of the ſame family with Megacles, who was principally concerned in that tranſaction: the Lacedæmonians readily came into Iſagoras's propoſition, and Cleomenes ſuddenly diſpatched a herald to Athens, with a declaration of war in caſe the Alcmæonidæ were not immediately baniſhed. The Athenians, either dreading the Lacedæmonian power, or being tired already of Clyſthenes, made no great difficulty of the thing, but to avoid a war baniſhed their benefactors. The worſt of it was, that this did not anſwer their end, for Cleomenes, at the head of a Spartan army, ſoon after entered Attica. On his arrival at Athens he drove ſeven hundred families into baniſhment, excluſive of thoſe whom the Athenians had before baniſhed with Clyſthenes; after this he would have diſſolved the ſenate, and have veſted the government in three hundred of the principal perſons of Iſagoras's faction; this was puſhing the matter too far; the Athenians therefore perceiving that either they muſt ſubmit to ſlavery or reſiſt the Lacedæmonian, immediately took up arms, and conſtrained Cleomenes and his troops to retire, together with Iſagoras and his friends, into the citadel, where they beſieged them for two days. On the third the king of Lacedæmon, being now convinced that force would do nothing with the Athenians, ſurrendered upon theſe terms, that all who were in the citadel, ſhould have leave to retire out of Attica unmoleſted. The Athenians, however, fell upon ſuch as were ſeparated from the army, and put them to death without mercy; amongſt theſe was Timeſitheus the brother of Cleomenes, ſo that the Athenians no longer kept any meaſures with the Lacedæmonians, looking upon them as avowed enemies, who above all things ſought to ſubvert that democracy, of which they were ſo fond, and to conſtitute an ariſtocracy, which in truth was ever the aim of the Spartans, who, where-ever they had authority, ſet up that form of rule. One reaſon of which among others was this, that they could the better depend on the friendſhip of ſuch ſtates than ſuch as were governed by the people, who very ſeldom know their true intereſt, and are frequently prevailed on to change their councils. But to return to the current of our hiſtory.

CLEOMENES and his Spartans had no ſooner quitted the Athenian territories, than the people of that country recalled Clyſthenes and all the families they had ſent into exile, that they might be the better able to ſupport a war which they foreſaw they ſhould be engaged in. Their conjectures were perfectly well founded, Cleomenes raiſed forces throughout all Peloponneſus, though without declaring poſitively his intention, which was to make Iſagoras, who was ſtill with him, tyrant of Athens. When all things were ready, the Lacedæmonian king engaged the Bœotians on one ſide, and the Chalcidians on the other, to attack the Athenians, while he at the head of the grand army entered the country of Eleuſis. The Athenians, knowing that it was impoſſible for them to ſet on foot armies ſufficient to look all their enemies in the face, reſolved to leave their territories to the mercy of the Bœotians and Chalcidians, and with all the forces they could draw together to march againſt Cleomenes. This reſolution of theirs they carried accordingly into execution, but before the the armies were ready to engage, the Corinthians, who were among the forces of Cleomenes, began to doubt the juſtice of their cauſe, and, thinking it ſafeſt not to act where they were doubtful, marched back to their own country. Damaratus the ſon of Ariſton, the other king of Sparta and collegue of Cleomenes, was alſo againſt this expedition; and his oppoſition was the more remarkable, becauſe till then he had never differed with his collegue. The confederates obſerving, that neither the Lacedæmonian princes could agree amongſt themſelves, or prevail upon the Corinthians to remain with the army, began to diſtaſte this buſineſs, and, dropping, off by degrees, put the Athenians out or fear.

When the Spartans and their allies were withdrawn, the people of Athens determined to revenge themſelves upon the Chalcidians, againſt whom the army marched immediately; but finding the Bœotians had aſſembled a conſiderable body of forces between them and the Euripus, they determined to attack them, which they did accordingly with ſuch ſucceſs, that the Bœotians were intirely routed, a great number of them ſlain, and ſeven hundred taken priſoners. This victory opened a free paſſage into Eubœa, whither the Athenians paſſed over the ſame day, and falling upon the Chalcidians, obtained a glorious victory over them, taking a vaſt number of priſoners, whom with the Bœotians they carried back with them to Athens, leaving in Eubœa four thouſand men. All the priſoners taken in this battle the Athenians put in irons, though they afterwards ſet them at liberty on receiving two minæ for each man by way of ranſom. The fetters, however, they hung up in the citadel, and having conſecrated the tenth part of what they received for their ranſom, they purchaſed therewith a chariot with four horſes a-breaſt, which they ſet up in the portico of the citadel with this inſcription:

Warm with juſt rage, when the Athenian youth
O'ercame Bœotian and Chalcidian bands;
Their foes in fetters bound; to Pallas then
Theſe, as the tenth of all their ſpoils, they plac'd.

This happy ſucceſs of the Athenian arms falling out in a ſhort time after the expulſion of the Piſiſtratidæ, Herodotus makes the following obſervation thereupon; "thus the "affairs of the Athenians flouriſhed, yet they are not the "only example of this kind. For all places abound in "inſtances of the proſperity that attends an equal diſtribu-"tion of power. Under their tyrants indeed they were "not

" not inferior in war to any of their neighbours: But they " had no sooner freed themselves from that servitude, than " they far surpassed all the rest, and became the principal " nation of Greece; which manifestly shews, that as long " as they were oppressed they acted remissly, and would " not exert their courage to the utmost, because they " knew their victories could only redound to the advantage " of their masters; whereas, after they had recovered their " liberty, every man contended who should do best, be- " cause they fought for themselves. And such was the state " of the Athenian affairs " [g]. That Herodotus had reason to introduce this reflection here, appears from the subsequent conduct of the people of Athens, who, no longer passive under any affronts, took up arms frequently against her insulting neighbours, and forced them to be both quiet and submissive.

The war with Æginæans.

The Bœotians, stung with the indignities offered to their countrymen, when made prisoners by the Athenians, resolved to revenge themselves; and, as the custom of those times was, before they began the war, sent to consult the oracle at Delphos. Having received its answer, and spent a considerable time in consulting on its meaning, they at last resolved to engage the inhabitants of Ægina to invade Attica at the same time, which it was easy for them to do, lying but a few miles from that coast. This nation, having an hereditary hatred to the Athenians, and being elate on account of their great wealth, readily embraced the proposal; and while the people of Athens bent all their attention towards the Bœotian war, landed a considerable army on the opposite side, and wasted all the sea-coasts. The Athenians immediately took fire at this, but sending to-and-fro to Delphi before they equipped a fleet against Ægina, they had suddenly a new affair upon their hands.

Cleomenes, when he returned to Sparta, after his unsuccessful expedition, produced certain oracles, which he said he had found in the citadel of Athens, while he was besieged therein; the purport of these oracles was, that Athens would in time rival Sparta. On the back of this came out the discovery of Clysthenes's confederacy with the priestess of Apollo, whereby the Lacedæmonians had been engaged to drive the Pisistratidæ out of Athens, or, in other words, to sacrifice their fast friends to such as by their interest were bound to be their enemies. The Spartans, repenting penting ſorely of the folly they had committed, ſent for Hippias from Sigeium, in order to reſtore him to his principality. He readily obeyed their ſummons, and, though it coſt him a long voyage by ſea, came in perſon to Lacedæmon, where the kings of Sparta, and the deputies of the ſtates in alliance with them, were in deep conſultation. Socles the Corinthian made a long harangue againſt the propoſition for reſtoring Hippias, which had ſuch an influence on the deputies from the reſt of the confederates, that the Lacedæmonians found it impoſſible to engage them in this deſign, and were therefore conſtrained to abandon it themſelves, ſo that Hippias was obliged to return to Sigeium, without relinquiſhing, however, his hopes of one day reducing Athens.

[g] Herodot. lib. v.

ARISTAGORAS the Mileſian having ſet on foot a revolt in Ionia, and having failed in his attempt to engage the Lacedæmonians to abet it, came to Athens, and, as Herodotus obſerves, found it eaſier to manage all the citizens thereof by his eloquence, than to perſuade the Lacedæmonian king. In conſequence of his fine ſpeeches, they decreed, that twenty ſhips ſhould be ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Ionians under the command of Melanthius, an Athenian nobleman univerſally eſteemed; by the aſſiſtance of which fleet the Ionians did many great exploits, and amongſt the reſt ſacked Sardis, of which when the Perſian king had advice, he declared himſelf the ſworn enemy of Athens, and ſolemnly beſought God, that he might one day have it in his power to be revenged of them. This was the ſource of thoſe wars which followed afterwards between the Perſians and the Greeks, and which were ſo fatal to both nations. In the end, however, the Ionians were unſucceſsful, and the Perſians reduced them again under their yoke. The Ionian war.

WHEN the Ionian war was ended, the Perſian king ſent to demand Earth and Water, as tokens of ſubmiſſion, from the Greeks, to which, out of fear of his mighty power at ſea, moſt of the iſlanders yielded, and amongſt the reſt the inhabitants of Ægina. The Athenians, as ſoon as they received notice of this, took it into their heads, that this nation had ſubmitted themſelves to the great king, that they might be at liberty to act againſt the Athenians, under colour of their being ſubjects to the Perſian crown. On this account they, that is the Athenians, ſent embaſſadors to Sparta to accuſe the inhabitants of Ægina of treachery towards the Greeks. The Spartans upon this complaint ſent their king Cleomenes to Ægina, who

on

on his arrival attempted to ſeize the perſons principally concerned in making their ſubmiſſion to the Perſians. But when he attempted this, Crius the ſon of Polycritus interpoſed, and told him, he ſhould not carry away any of his countrymen, becauſe he apprehended what he did was of his own head, and not by any commiſſion from the Lacedæmonians. This exceedingly irritated Cleomenes, who notwithſtanding was conſtrained to return without effecting what he deſigned; his collegue Damaratus having accuſed him at home. But having after he came back procured his collegue to be depoſed, and his own kinſman Leotychides to be crowned in his ſtead, he brought the laſt mentioned prince with him into the iſland of Ægina, and having ſeized ten of the principal perſons of that iſland, and amongſt them Crius before mentioned, he brought them away priſoners, and delivered them up to the Athenians. Not long after having in his phrenzy killed himſelf, all his tyrannical acts were diſapproved by the Spartans, who on the inhabitants of Ægina's accuſing Leotychides for the injury he had done them, delivered up that prince to them, who, however, deſired nothing more of him, than that he would go with them to Athens in order to ſolicit the releaſe of Crius and his aſſociates. When they arrived there the Spartan king made a long oration, in which he endeavoured to ſhew, that the hoſtages were only depoſited by him and his collegue in Athens that they might be ſafe, and that, now, when he came again to demand them, it was their duty to deliver them up. But this either the Athenians did not, or would not, underſtand, ſo that the war between them and the people of Ægina was ſtill carried on with various ſucceſs. The latter being informed, that the Athenian galley, which went annually to Delphi, lay at anchor at Sunium, they reſolved to intercept it, which they did, and took many perſons of diſtinction aboard it. The Athenians, to revenge this indignity, entered into a treaty with one Nicodromus, a perſon of great intereſt in Ægina; he had been formerly baniſhed his country by thoſe who then governed it, and in order to be revenged on them reſolved to betray it to the Athenians. The Athenians for this purpoſe fitted out a conſiderable fleet, but not thinking it ſufficient for their purpoſe, Ægina being then miſtreſs of thoſe ſeas, they had recourſe to the Corinthians for their aſſiſtance; this ſtate, being the faſt friend and ally of Athens, did not give her a denial, but alledged a law of theirs, whereby they

:hey were forbidden to lend their ſhips; but with much ado an expedient was found, whereby the Athenians obtained what they wanted; and yet the Corinthians did not break their law, the latter yielding to the former five of their ſhips in conſideration of their paying them five drachmæ for each. The length of this treaty fruſtrated the Athenian hopes, for Nicodromus, depending on their arrival, on the day prefixed ſeized on the old town and declared for the Athenians; but he and his party not being able alone to reſiſt the whole force of the iſland, they were obliged to ſecure themſelves by flight, which they did the very day before the Athenian and Corinthian fleet appeared before Ægina. This defection of Nicodromus, however, proved very beneficial to the Athenians, for they having aſſigned to him and his aſſociates land on the ſhore oppoſite to Ægina, they from thence committed continual piracies and depredations upon their countrymen. What the iſſue was of this war, Herodotus does not inform us: It is generally conceived, that its continuance was a thing fortunate for the Athenians and for Greece in general, for it exerciſed that people in maritime affairs, and taught them the uſe and conſequence of a naval force, which hitherto they had little underſtood. When the firſt news came, that the Perſian had in view the conqueſt of Greece, the Athenians and the inhabitants of Ægina, as well as the reſt of the Grecian ſtates, compromiſed their differences, that they might be the better able to reſiſt the power of the great king, who threatened at leaſt the liberties of the Greeks in general, in revenge for the Athenians aſſiſting the Ionians when they ſought to recover their freedom [g].

Hippias endeavours to be reſtored to the principality of Athens.

We have already taken notice of the diſpleaſure which Darius had taken againſt the Athenians on account of the ſacking of Sardis; but we hitherto forbore to mention the intrigues of Hippias in order to obtain by force the principality of Athens, from whence, as we have before related, through the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians, he had been expelled. This old man, after his returning from Lacedæmon to Aſia, went to Artaphernes, governor of the adjacent provinces for the Perſian king, and excited him to make war upon his country, promiſing, that himſelf would be obedient to Darius, and greatly further all his his deſigns, in caſe he could be reſtored to that authority which formerly he had enjoyed at Athens. The Athenians were not ignorant, either of his journey, or of the propoſitions he had made to Artaphernes, they therefore ſent embaſſadors to this nobleman, to entreat him not to give any heed to Hippias's propoſals, but to ſuffer the people of Athens to remain free and quiet as they were. But Artaphernes, conceiving that it would be more for his maſter's intereſt to have a prince governing Athens, than to leave it under a democratic form of rule, anſwered the Athenians haughtily, that if they would have peace with the great king, they muſt receive Hippias and obey him; but this was ſo diſtaſteful to that generous people, that they immediately reſolved to give the enemies of Darius all the aſſiſtance they could, and to endeavour, if it were poſſible, to cut him out ſo much work near home, that he might have no opportunity to attempt any thing either againſt them or Greece. At laſt, however, Darius commiſſioned Mardonius to revenge him of the inſults which he conceived had been put upon him by the Greeks, but Mardonius and his troops, through a ſtorm at ſea and other accidents, having been able to do nothing, Datis and Artaphernes, the ſon of Artaphernes, were commiſſioned to do what he was to have done [h].

[g] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

The Perſian war.

THE misfortune which the Perſians had had in ſuffering ſhipwreck, when their fleet doubled the promontory of Athos, made ſuch an impreſſion on the commanders laſt mentioned, that they reſolved to avoid that dangerous navigation, by drawing their forces into the plains of Cilicia, and paſſing over from thence through the Cyclades to Eubœa in order to deſtroy Eretria; and from thence to proceed to Athens, they having it in charge from Darius to ruin both places, and to bring away the inhabitants, that they might be at his diſpoſal. The Eretrians, as ſoon as they had advice of the arrival of the Perſian fleet among the Cyclades, ſent to demand aſſiſtance from the Athenians. That ſtate, with a magnanimity ſcarce to be paralleled, ordered the four thouſand men whom they had left in the Chalcidian territory to advance to the aid of the Eretrians, which they did. But the inhabitants of that city were neither ſteady nor honeſt; one party was for receiving the Athenian ſuccours into the city and holding out to the laſt extremity; a ſecond was for abandoning the city city and retiring to the mountains of Euboea; a third party sought to betray their country to the Persians for the sake of private advantage. Æschines the son of Nothon, a man of principal authority among his countrymen, perceiving the situation things were in, generously informed the commanders of the Athenian troops, and advised them to return home: in consequence of which advice they immediately retired to Oropus, and thereby escaped that total destruction which would have befallen them, if they had remained in the neighbourhood of Eretria. For that city, being betrayed to the Persians by some of its inhabitants, was pillaged, burnt, and its inhabitants sold for slaves, according to the command of Darius.

[h] Id. ibid.

The Athenians, who, as we often remarked before, were generally divided among themselves, and persecuting one another when they wanted foreign wars to employ them, united now with great zeal and earnestness, when they heard that the Persians were so near them. They raised with the utmost expedition all the forces they were able, and yet could not draw together above nine thousand men. These, with a thousand Platæans who afterwards joined them, were commanded by ten general officers, who had equal power. Among these were Miltiades, Aristides, and Themistocles, all men of distinguished valour and great abilities. But it being generally conceived, that it would be impossible for them, with their small forces, to give any interruption to the Persians, they sent Phidippides to Sparta to entreat the immediate assistance of that state. This man, as Herodotus informs us, affirmed afterwards to the Athenians, that passing by mount Parthenius, he heard himself loudly called by his name, upon which turning about, he beheld the god Pan, who, after asking him why the Athenians held him in no greater esteem, assured him, that he had deserved very well of their state, and would continue to do so, of which when the people of Athens had information, they caused a temple to be erected to his honour near the citadel, and honoured him thence-forward with annual sacrifices, and a lamp continually burning. Phidippides, after this strange adventure, arrived on the second day at Sparta, where he communicated his business to the senate in the following terms: Men of Lacedæmon, the Athenians desire you to assist them, and not to suffer the most ancient of all the Grecian cities to be enslaved by the Barbarians. Eretria is already destroyed, and Greece consequently weakened by loſs of ſo conſiderable a place. The Lacedæmonians readily agreed to what he propoſed, and ordered their troops to be ready to march, but at the ſame time declared, that they would not depart in leſs than five days, one of their laws forbidding them to begin an expedition, but at the full of the moon, of which it was then but the ninth day. The Perſians in the mean time being informed by Hippias, that the plains of Marathon would be the moſt advantagious place for them to engage in, becauſe it would afford them room to act with their horſe, following his advice, after the deſtruction of Eretria, made all the haſte they poſſibly could thither, of which when the Athenians had advice, they immediately ordered their forces to march to Marathon alſo. An act of amazng confidence, conſidering the mighty diſproportion between the Perſian and Athenian army.

The battle of Marathon. Year after the flood, 2509. Before Chriſt, 490.

THE Athenians, being encamped at the temple of Hercules, were there joined by a thouſand men, the whole ſtrength of the little city of Platæa, which ſhe now hazarded in the cauſe of Athens out of gratitude for former favours (R). A council of war being held here, the generals

(R) The city of Platæa was in old times free. Herodotus has given us a very full account of the reaſons which induced its inhabitants to raiſe their utmoſt force in the cauſe of Athens. We cannot therefore deliver it better to our reader than in his words; "The Platæans were already under the protection of "Athens, and the Athenians had gone through many dangers in "their defence. For when the Platæans ſaw themſelves oppreſſed by the Thebans, they firſt offered their ſubmiſſion to "Cleomenes the ſon of Anaxandrides and to the Lacedæmonians. "But they rejected the offer in theſe terms: We are placed, "ſaid they, at ſuch a diſtance from you, that in time of neceſſity our ſuccours will prove ineffectual. For your country "may be frequently ravaged before we can be informed of "your danger. We adviſe you therefore to put yourſelves under the protection of the Athenians, who are your neighbours, "and ſufficiently able to defend you. This counſel the Lacedæmonians gave, not out of any good will to the Platæans, "but becauſe they were deſirous to ſee the Athenians weakened "by a war againſt the Bœotians. However, the Platæans, approving their advice, went to Athens, and arriving there, "when the Athenians were met to ſacrifice to the twelve gods, "they ſat down by the altar in the poſture of ſuppliants, and made "their ſubmiſſion to that place. Which when the Thebans "heard, generals were very much divided in their opinions; ſome were for fighting, others not; Miltiades, obſerving this, and conſidering the great importance of the matter in debate, addreſſed himſelf to Callimachus of Aphidna, who was Polemarch, and whoſe power was equal to that of all the other generals, in theſe words; "You alone, O "Callimachus, muſt now determine, either to ſee the "Athenians reduced to the condition of ſlaves, or, by pre- "ſerving the liberty of your country, have an eternal mo- "nument of your fame, ſurpaſſing the glory of Harmo- "dius and Ariſtogiton. For the Athenians were never in "ſo great danger from the time they were firſt a people. "If they fall under the power of the Medes, one may "eaſily imagine what uſage they muſt expect from Hip- "pias: But if they conquer, Athens will be the princi- "pal city of Greece. To let you know then by what "means theſe things may be effected, and from what "cauſe the fate of Athens is now in your hands, I ſhall "acquaint you, that we are at this inſtant divided in "opinion touching a battle; ſome of us propoſing to fight, "and others adviſing the contrary. If we decline a battle, "I foreſee ſome great diſſenſion will ſhake the fidelity of "the army, and induce them to a compliance with the "Medes. But if we fight before the corruption ſlides "into the hearts of the Athenians, we may hope from the "equity of the gods to obtain the victory. All theſe things "are heard, they ſent an army againſt Platæa, and at the ſame time "the Athenians marched to aſſiſt the Platæans. But as they were "ready to engage in battle, the Corinthians apprehending the "conſequences, interpoſed their good offices to reconcile the con- "tending parties, and, with the conſent of both ſides, determined "the diſpute on this agreement; That the Thebans ſhould per- "mit all thoſe Bœotians, who would no longer be accounted "members of Bœotia, to do as they thought moſt convenient "for themſelves. After this reconciliation the Corinthians re- "turned home, and as the Athenians were retiring likewiſe, "the Bœotians fell upon them in their march, but were re- "pulſed with loſs. Upon which ſucceſs the Athenians enlarged "the frontiers of the Platæans, and, inſtead of that appointed "by the Corinthians, fixed the limits of the Thebans at Aſopus "and Hyſia. In this manner the Platæans came under the "protection of the Athenians, and joined their forces at Mara- "thon (55)".

(55) Herodot. lib. vi.

" are in your power, and entirely depend upon the reſo" lution you ſhall take. For if you would ſupport my " opinion with the acceſſion of your vote, you will ſee
" your country free, and Athens the moſt illuſtrious city
" of Greece: But if you join with thoſe who would diſ-
" ſuade us from a battle, you can expect no other conſe-
" quences, than ſuch as are moſt contrary to theſe hopes".
Callimachus, whoſe voice was deciſive according to the Athenian laws, joined directly with Miltiades, and declared for giving battle immediately. Each of the captains commanded in chief by turns, but Ariſtides giving up his day to Miltiades, the reſt did ſo too. That excellent perſon accepted this compliment for the good of his country, but he would not fight till his own proper day of command came about, for fear that, through any latent ſparks of jealouſy and envy, any of the generals ſhould be led not to do their duty. But when the day before-mentioned came, he, without waiting for any farther ſuccours, diſpoſed the troops in order of battle, placing the chief of his ſtrength in the wings. Callimachus, as Polemarch, commanded on the right, the Platæans were poſted on the left, and the ſacrifices being offered, they began inſtantly to advance with inexpreſſible ardour towards their enemies. The Perſian army was ranged in battalia near a mile off, and when they beheld the Athenians running towards them, they imputed it to folly and ignorance of military diſcipline, and were convinced of this, when they obſerved that they had neither horſe nor pikemen. However, they ſoon found their error when the charge began: For the Athenians and Platæans fought with ſuch obſtinate valour on the right and left, that the Barbarians were forced to fly on both ſides. The Perſians and Sacæ, however, perceiving that the Athenian center was weak, charged with ſuch force that they broke through it: This thoſe on the right and left perceived, but did not attempt to ſuccour it, till they had put to flight both the wings of the Perſian army; then bending the points of their wings towards their own centre, they encloſed the hitherto victorious Perſians, and cut them to pieces. This put an end to the engagement, for the remains of the army fled, as faſt as they could, to their fleet, whither the Athenians purſued them. When therefore the Perſians in haſte hurried on board the booty they had acquired in Eretria, and ſought to eſcape by ſea that ill-fate which attended them on ſhore; the Athenians, in order to hinder this, began to ſet the ſhips on fire, and to board ſuch as lay neareſt the ſhore; in which bold attempt, though they had ſome ſucceſs, yet the Perſians at laſt got under ſail, and bore away for Athens [i]. It was reported in thoſe times, that the Alcmæonidæ encouraged the Perſians to make a ſecond attempt, by holding up, as they approached the ſhore, a ſhield for a ſignal; however it was, the Perſian fleet endeavoured to double the cape of Sunium with a view to ſurprize the city of Athens before the army could return. But Miltiades ſeeing the danger his countrymen were in, leaving Ariſtides with a thouſand men to guard the priſoners and the ſpoil, marched at the head of the other nine thouſand with ſuch diligence, that they arrived at the temple of Hercules in Cynoſarges, which was but at a ſmall diſtance from the city, before the Barbarians were in a condition to attack it. Which when the Perſian admiral had notice of, he ſailed from the port of Phalerum for Aſia, and ſo put an end to a very unfortunate expedition [k].

on

THE battle of Marathon makes deſervedly a great figure in hiſtory; Cornelius Nepos aſſigns a juſt reaſon, becauſe never before had ſo ſmall a body of forces overcome ſo vaſt a hoſt [l]. Herodotus tells us, that ſix thouſand three hundred of the Perſians were ſlain there, and of the Athenians one hundred ninety-two [m], which is infinitely more probable than what Juſtin relates of the Perſians loſing two-hundred thouſand men in the battle and by ſhipwreck [n]. The ſame author ſays, that the Athenians took many of the ſhips, and deſtroyed many more; Herodotus ſays, there were only ſeven ſhips taken. Certain it is, that the Athenians behaved with amazing intrepidity, and that ſeveral amongſt them diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a moſt extraordinary manner. Callimachus the Polemarch, after having done all that a brave and wiſe officer could do, loſt his life in the field; Staſileus the ſon of Thraſylus, one of the ten commanders, was alſo killed; Cynegyrus the ſon of Euphorion laid hold on the prow of one of the Perſian ſhips with both his hands, and having them ſtruck off by an ax died of his wounds; this is Herodotus's account. Juſtin carries matters much farther; he ſays that Cynegyrus, having done wonders in the fight, purſued the Perſians to the ſhore, and laid hold of a ſhip ready to ſail with his right hand, when that was cut off he ſeized it with his left, of which being likewiſe deprived, he caught hold of it with his mouth, his ſpirit being ſuch, that, untamed by long fatigue and the loſs of both his hands, he, with the rage of a wild beaſt, fought at laſt with his teeth. Herodotus, who ſpeaks ſo modeſtly of Cynegyrus's bravery, tells us a very extraordinary tale of one Epizelus the ſon of Cephagoras, he ſays, that fighting in his rank with a becoming valour, he of a ſudden loſt his ſight without receiving any blow, and continued blind all the reſt of his life. This would not have been worth repeating, if Herodotus had not affirmed that he heard this man declare, that he thought he ſaw a man of uncommon height ſtanding by him in complete armour, holding a ſhield, which was covered by his beard; and that this phantom afterwards, paſſing by him, killed the perſon who was poſted next to him. Whatever we may think of the Athenian ſtory, this muſt be admitted an indubitable proof, that Herodotus's account of this battle deſerves credit in all probable circumſtances, ſince what he relates he had from the mouths of thoſe who were eye-witneſſes. The numbers of the Perſians is very differently reported; Juſtin ſays, that they were ſix-hundred thouſand, Cornelius Nepos makes them ten times the number of the Athenians, that is one hundred thouſand, which is probably not far from truth [o].

[i] Herodot. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Ariſt. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Miltiad. Valer. Max. &c. [k] Plutarch. in vit. Ariſt. [l] ubi ſupr. [m] ubi ſupra. [n] lib. ii. c. 9.

AMONGST the many eminent perſons who were preſent in this famous engagement, was Hippias the ſon of Piſiſtratus, who hoped through the power of the Perſians to be reſtored to the principality of Athens. He it was, who, as we have ſaid before, conducted the Barbarians into the plains of Marathon, when, as Herodotus tells us, he dreamt one night that he lay with his mother, and from thence concluded, that he ſhould be reſtored and die peaceably at home in his old age; but a day or two after, when he was buſy giving direction as to the diſpoſal of the booty taken at Eretria, and putting the Perſian troops in order on the ſhore, he was ſeized with ſuch a fit of coughing and ſneezeing, that moſt of his teeth grew looſe, and one of them fell out of his head upon the ſtrand, for which when thoſe about him had long ſought in vain, Hippias, fetching a deep deep ſigh, ſaid, This country neither belongs to us, nor will ever be ſubdued by us, and I ſhall have no other part here than that where my tooth lies. This was his ſecond, and, as it happened, the more juſt, conſtruction of his dream [p]. As to what became of him in the battle, both Herodotus and Thucydides are ſilent thereupon. Juſtin [q] and ſome other later authors ſay, that he was killed there; if he was, the Athenians loſt in him an implacable enemy, very capable of contriving miſchiefs againſt them, and one who was alike indefatigable in thinking and in acting (S).

[o] In vit. Miltiad.

ARISTI-

[p] ubi ſupra. [q] ubi ſupra.

(S) We have more than once in the text promiſed to ſpeak of the family of Hippias; he married Myrrhine the daughter of Callias, by whom he had five children (56); he had alſo another wife of extraordinary beauty, the daughter of one Charinus (57). Among theſe children was Piſiſtratus junior, whom we have before mentioned; he had alſo a daughter whoſe name was Archidice, who married the ſon of the tyrant or prince of Lampſacus. This lady was honoured with a fine tomb, whereon was an inſcription to the following effect; This earth covers Archidice the daughter of Hippias, a man in his time famous throughout Greece, who, tho' her father, husband, and brothers were princes, ſuffered not her mind to be elated therewith (58). Hippias viſited her before he went to the Perſian court, in order perhaps to take his leave of her, from an apprehenſion that the expedition, in which he was about to embark, might ſome way or other prove fatal to him. The dream above recorded was certainly according to the uſual rules of interpretation, fortunate, and ſo it was accounted to Julius Cæſar (59); but it may be that this interpretation was with a reſtriction, that the perſon dreaming was to have been on good terms with his country, whereas Hippias at the time of this dream was in the Perſian hoſt warring againſt his country. There is yet another account of this matter, if a dream deſerves any farther account, viz. that among the Perſians it was held ominous, and a ſign that a man would repent what he was about (60). As to his death, Cicero ſpeaks of it in theſe terms, Nefarius Hippias Piſiſtrati filius, qui in Marathonia pugna cecidit, arma contra Patriam ferens (61). Tertullian ſpeaks of it likewiſe (62); yet Suidas tells us quite another ſtory; he ſays, that the Barbarians being

(56) Thucyd. lib. vii. (57) Clidem. ap. Athæn. lib. xiii. (58) Thucyd. ubi ſupra. (59) Suetonius in vit. J. Cæſaris. cap' vii. (60) Achem. Oenocrit. cxxviii. (61) Ad. Attic. lib. ix. c. 10. (62) Ad. Gentes.

ARISTIDES, who remained on the field of battle while Miltiades marched back to Athens, diſcharged the truſt repoſed in him with the greateſt integrity; for tho' there was much gold and ſilver in the Perſian camp, and though the tents and ſhips they had taken were full of riches of all ſorts, yet he neither took any thing himſelf, nor omitted to the utmoſt of his power the neceſſary precautions to prevent other people's meddling therewith. Yet ſome there were, who, in ſpight of his orders and his care, found means to enrich themſelves by private plunder, particularly Callias the torch-bearer, Ariſtides's couſin-german (T).

For

ing routed, Hippias retired to Lemnos, and there laboured under a very grievous malady, which at length made him blind, and the blood flowing through his eyes brought on a miſerable and painful death, which he reckons a puniſhment for his having conducted the Perſian forces into the plains of Marathon. The reader will pardon the length of our hiſtory of the Piſiſtratidæ, when he conſiders, that from the time of Piſiſtratus his aſſuming the ſovereignty to the death of Hippias at the battle of Marathon, there intervened upwards of fourſcore years.

(T) Torch-bearers, ſtiled in Greek Daduchi, were perſons dedicated to the ſervice of the gods, and admitted even into the moſt ſacred myſteries. On this account, Pauſanias ſpeaks of it as a great happineſs to a woman, that ſhe had ſeen her brother, her huſband, and her ſon, ſucceſſively enjoy this office (63). We have obſerved in the text from Plutarch, that Callias was miſtaken for a king, becauſe of his flowing hair bound with a fillet, which was not unlike the royal ornaments in uſe among the eaſtern nations; the reaſon of this was, that amongſt the ancients it was an opinion almoſt univerſally received, that there was a very near affinity between the offices of king and prieſt; on this account the Romans preſerved the title of Rex among their ſacred officers when they expulſed the Tarquins, and the Athenians, as we have heard, ſtiled their ſecond archon, who preſided in the public ſacrifices, Baſileus; ſo that in affairs relating to the gods, both the Athenians and the Romans, though they hated monarchy, made uſe of kings. The ſame notion prevailed through the eaſt, for we find Jeroboam ſtanding by the altar at Bethel, when the prophet came to denounce its ruin (64). And Uzziah king of Judah, when he had been victorious over the Philiſtines, Arabians, and Ammonites, was lifted up in his heart, and deſired to add to his royal dignity the honour of being prieſt of the moſt High God (65).

(63) In Atticis. (64) 1 Kings xiii. (65) ii Chron. xxvi. 16.

For this man having long hair and a fillet about his head, one of the Perſians took him for a king, and falling down at his feet diſcovered to him a vaſt quantity of gold hid in a well; Callias not only ſeized it and applied it to his private uſe, but moſt inhumanly put to death the poor man who ſhewed it him, to prevent his diſcovering what he had done. By this action he not only blemiſhed his own reputation, but tranſmitted infamy to his poſterity, who, notwithſtanding their eminency in the ſtate, were ſtiled by the comic poets, Laccopluti, i. e. enriched by the well [r], an example which merits conſideration perhaps as much as any other recorded in hiſtory. The Athenians in token of their reſpect towards thoſe brave men who fell in this engagement, erected for them public monuments in the field of battle, with inſcriptions containing their names and the names of their tribes and families. At ſome diſtance they erected other monuments for the Platæans, Bœotians, and ſlaves, who were ſlain here. They likewiſe cauſed this battle to be painted in the Pœcilian portico, where the Platæan auxiliaries were repreſented, as well as the Athenian ſoldiers, and at the head of theſe their ten captains, Miltiades holding the firſt place [f], which was all the reward they beſtowed upon them.

It cannot ſeem ſtrange, that the Athenians were highly elate on this victory. In the firſt tranſports of their joy they granted all the Platæans the freedom of their city; as for Miltiades, Ariſtides, and Themiſtocles, who had exceedingly diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſervice of their country, they were for the preſent treated with all the marks of gratitude and reſpect they could have wiſhed, though in their turns we ſhall ſee them all ſlighted, proſecuted, and condemned. While Miltiades was thus high in the people's favour, he propoſed in a general aſſembly of the people, that he ſhould be intruſted with a fleet of ſeventy ſhips well manned and provided, promiſing them, that he would put them in poſſeſſion of great riches, and make the expedition in other reſpects turn to vaſt account. The Athenians readily embraced this project, and fitted out ſuch a fleet as he deſired, of which Miltiades taking the command ſailed to Paros. The reaſon he pretended for invading this iſland was, that the inhabitants thereof had aſſiſted the Perſians with ſhips in the expedition of Marathon, but the true ground of his hatred to that people was, that that one Lyſagoras a Parian had done him ill offices with Hydarnes the Perſian. As ſoon as he arrived on the iſland, he ſent heralds to the capital thereof, requiring a hundred talents to be paid him, threatening in caſe of refuſal to beſiege the city, and in caſe he took it, to give it up to the plunder of his ſoldiers. The Parthians, however, were not to be terrified, they refuſed ſo much as to deliberate on his propoſition, but, on the contrary, provided themſelves the beſt they could for an obſtinate defence. Miltiades cauſed the place to be inveſted, and carried on the ſiege with great vigour, till one Timo a Parian woman, who was a prieſteſs, pretended to inform him how he ſhould take the city. In conſequence of what this woman told him, he went to the temple of Ceres the lawgiver, and not being able to open its gates, he got to the top of the wall, and from thence leaped down; but being ſeized with a ſudden horror and reſolving to go back, he re-aſcended the wall, and from thence leaped down, but his foot ſlipping he fell, and either broke his thigh, or diſlocated his knee-pan; however it was, he was conſtrained to raiſe the ſiege, after having lain twenty-ſix days before the town, and to return, wounded as he was, without affecting any thing to Athens [u]. An unfortunate man was never welcome there! The whole city began to murmur, and Xanthippus the father of the famous Pericles accuſed him to the general aſſembly for deceiving the Athenians, as Herodotus ſays; of treaſon, as Cornelius Nepos informs us; or rather of peculation, as Juſtin from Trogus Pompeius acquaints us, for that is much the moſt probable opinion, and for this he demanded that they ſhould paſs upon him ſentence of death. The unhappy Miltiades was in no condition to defend himſelf, nature had already paſſed that judgment which his enemies fought; his wound through lowneſs of ſpirits had induced a mortification, ſo that he could not be moved out of his bed. His brother Tiſagoras ſpoke for him; he repreſented to the Athenians, that this Miltiades, who had failed in his laſt expedition, had ſaved Athens at Marathon, and had conquered for them the iſland of Lemnos; he therefore entreated them to remember his paſt ſervices, as well as his preſent error, and to pity him to whom they owed the power of deliberating, whether they would pity him or no. Having heard both parties, the people declared that he had not deſerved capital puniſhment, but at the [u] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

[r] Plutarch ubi ſupra. [f] Corn. Nepos. in vit. Miltiad.

the ſame time fined him fifty talents, which was the whole expence of the Parian expedition; and becauſe he was unable to pay this great ſum, they put him into a goal, ſays Cornelius Nepos, where he died; but Herodotus ſays, that his ſon Cimon paid the fine, which is true, but not till after his father died in priſon, himſelf being alſo ſent thither on the ſame account, and remaining confined, till Callias furniſhed him with the money to pay his fine in lieu of his wife Elpinice, who was alſo his ſiſter by the one ſide [x]. Such was the gratitude of the Athenians towards Miltiades and his family. If the nature of this work would have allowed it, we ſhould have digreſſed in favour of ſo great a man, who, out of his paſſion for his country, quitted ſovereignty to ſerve the Athenians; but conſidering that this manner of writing would protract the Athenian hiſtory exceedingly, we have contented ourſelves with throwing into a note at the bottom of the page ſuch circumſtances relating to Miltiades as are neceſſary to be known (U).

THE

[x] Herodot. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. ubi ſupra. Cornelius Nepos in vit. Miltiad. & Cimon.

(U) The hiſtory of the family of Miltiades, and their becoming princes is related by Herodotus; he ſays, that the Thracian Dolonces, inhabiting a part of Cherſoneſus, and having ſuffered much in a war againſt the Abſynthians, ſent to enquire of the oracle at Delphi whom they ſhould elect king, to which they received for anſwer, that they ſhould invite him to lead a colony into their country, who ſhould firſt invite them into his houſe, after their leaving the temple in order to return home. Accordingly the Dolonces paſſed by the ſacred way, through the territories of the Phocians and the Bœotians, and, receiving no offer of entertainment, turned into the road of Athens. In that time Piſiſtratus had indeed the ſupreme power, but Miltiades the ſon of Cypſelus was not without authority in Athens, being of an illuſtrious family anciently deſcended from Æacus and Ægina, and afterwards eſtabliſhed among the Athenians by Philæus the ſon of Ajax, the firſt of that blood who ſettled there. This Miltiades ſitting before his gates, and ſeeing the Dolonces paſſing by cloathed and armed in a different manner from the Athenians, called out to them, and upon their coming to him deſired they would be his gueſts, and accept the entertainment of his houſe. They accepted his invitation, and after they had been hoſpitably entertained acquainted him with the oracle, and requeſted him to act in conformity to the admonition of the god. Miltiades hearkened to their propoſition, and complied with more

The contests between Aristides and Themistocles.

THE people of Athens, being now released from all apprehensions of foreign war, fell as usual into dissentions among themselves; they were divided on the old subject, whether more readiness, because he grew impatient of the government of Pisistratus, and desired an opportunity to withdraw. In these sentiments he went to Delphi to consult the oracle, whether he should yield to the request of the Dolonces, and received an encouraging answer from the Pythian. Upon which Miltiades the son of Cypselus, who had formerly been victorious in the Olympian chariot-race, taking with him all such Athenians as were willing to join in his expedition, set sail with the Dolonces, and arriving in their own country was invested with the sovereign power. The first thing he did was to build a wall upon the isthmus of Chersonesus, from the city of Cardia to that of Pontya, in order to prevent the Absynthians from infesting the country for the future with their incursions; this isthmus is thirty-six stades in breadth; and the whole length of Chersonesus beginning in that place is four hundred and twenty stades. When Miltiades had built this wall on the neck of Chersonesus, and by that means excluded the Absynthians, he in the next place made war upon the Lampsacenians, and falling into an ambuscade was taken alive by the enemy. Crœsus, king of Lydia being informed of this event, threatened the people of Lampsacus with his displeasure, in case they did not release Miltiades; which they taking into consideration, and being afraid to disoblige so great a monarch, restored Miltiades to freedom. Thus having escaped by the means of Crœsus, and afterwards dying without children, he left his dominion and riches to Stesagoras the son of Cimon, his brother by the same mother. The Chersonesians honour him with sacrifices, as the founder of their city, in the accustomed manner, having instituted gymnastic and equestrian exercises on that occasion, in which no Lampsacenian is permitted to contend for a prize. During the war which still continued against the people of Lampsacus, Stesagoras likewise died without children; being killed by the blow of an ax he received on the head from the hand of one who, pretending to be a deserter, was indeed a most cruel enemy. After his death the Pisistratidæ sent Miltiades, the son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, to Chersonesus with one ship, to take upon him the government, having been already favourable to him in Athens, as if they had not had any part in the murder of his father Cimon, who was assassinated by their order. Arriving in Chersonesus, he kept himself retired under colour of honouring the memory of his brother Stesagoras; which the Chersonesians hearing, the principal persons of every city assembled together, and coming to his house with intentions to condole with him, whether all things ſhould be in the power of the people, or whether the ſtate ſhould be governed only by the beſt. Ariſtides, whom we have already often mentioned, was at the head of one party, and Themiſtocles was chief of the other. It will be neceſſary to ſay ſomething of the character of each of theſe great men, that the nature of their diſputes and the conſequences of them with reſpect to the ſtate may be the better known. Ariſtides was the ſon of Lyſimachus, him, were all ſeized and impriſoned. By this means Miltiades made himſelf maſter of Cherſoneſus, entertained five hundred auxiliaries for his guard, and married Hegeſypla daughter of Olorus king of Thrace. But he had not long been in poſſeſſion, before he met with greater difficulties than he had yet experienced. For in the third year of his government he fled out of the country, not daring to wait the coming of the Scythian Nomades, who, having been irritated by the expedition of Darius, had aſſembled their forces, and advanced to the frontier of Cherſoneſus. Nevertheleſs upon the departure of the Scythians, he was again reſtored by the Dolonces; and in the third year after this, hearing that the Phœnicians were at Tenedus, he put all his riches on board five ſhips and ſailed for Athens. The reader may poſſibly think this note very long, but there was a neceſſity for it, ſince ſo eminent an author as Cornelius Nepos hath rendered the hiſtory of this great man unintelligible by confounding him with his grandfather, and attributing promiſcuouſly the deeds of one to the other. As to his putting Lemnos into the hands of the Athenians, it happened thus: The inhabitants of that iſland, having had long differences with the Athenians, and being admoniſhed by the Delphian oracle to compromiſe them, they ſent to Athens to know upon what terms it might be done; the Athenians offered them no other than the abſolute ſurrender of their country, to which the Lemnian deputies anſwered, that they would obey when a ſhip from the Athenian dominions ſhould come with a north-wind in one day into a haven of Lemnos, which, becauſe Attica was ſituatedon the ſouth of Lemnos, they conceived impoſſible; but Miltiades, being poſſeſſed of the Cherſoneſus and ſailing from a port in the Helleſpont, arrived in one day at Lemnos, driven thither by a ſtrong north-wind, upon which he immediately demanded that the iſland ſhould be given up to him, which, partly through terror, partly by force, he obtained, and united it to the Athenian territories. As to the impriſonment of his ſon as well as himſelf, and the manner in which his fine was at laſt diſcharged, Cornelius Nepos expreſsly aſſerts it, as delivered in our text, whereas the account given of it by Plutarch is neither clear nor conſiſtent.

Lyſimachus, of the tribe of Antiochis and ward of Alopece. Themiſtocles was the ſon of Neocles of the tribe of Leontes, by his mother's ſide a ſtranger, neither of them of any extraordinary family; Plutarch tells us, that they were boys together, and that they were always at variance, not only in ſerious matters, but even in their ſports and plays; nor could it well be otherwiſe, for Ariſtides is ſaid by him to have been firm and ſteddy in his behaviour, immoveable in every thing that appeared juſt, and incapable of uſing the leaſt falſhood, flattery, or deceit, even in jeſt; whereas Themiſtocles was of an impetuous nature, full of ſpirit, ſubtle, daring, complaiſant, and in fine one who could put on any appearance to carry his point; he ſpent even his times of recreation in ſtudy, and was wont to divert himſelf with compoſing orations, in which he either excuſed or accuſed ſome of his companions, whence his ſchoolmaſter pronounced thus of him; Boy, thou wilt never prove an ordinary perſon, but will at ſome time or other become either a mighty bleſſing, or an outragious curſe, to thy country. As they grew up, they differed ſtill the more in their ſentiment and conduct; Ariſtides ſtudied the laws of Lycurgus, and by the reaſoning of that great man became a favourer of ariſtocracy. Themiſtocles, rather out of ſpleen to him than any other motive, favoured exceedingly the cauſe of the people: and thus childiſh quarrels, ripening into a ſtrong averſion in the breaſts of two private men, created great diſorders in a potent ſtate, and ſhook the very conſtitution of Athens [z].

How much ſoever the diſſentions between Ariſtides and Themiſtocles might in fact injure the Athenian ſtate, and how ready ſoever they might be to oppoſe each other, even in points where they were conſcious that what they oppoſed was right, yet it muſt be owned, that they ſincerely loved their country, and were aſhamed and ſorry for the very things they did. Ariſtides was the honeſter man of the two, and therefore the moſt frank. When Themiſtocles had one day propoſed to the aſſembly of the people ſomething much for their advantage, Ariſtides made a long oration againſt it, which ſo far miſled the people, that they rejected what Themiſtocles had propoſed. Ariſtides was, however, ſo much affected with what he had done, that when he went out of the aſſembly he could not help ſaying, The Athenians can never be perfectly ſafe, till till they have sent Themistocles and me to goal [a]. We have before shewn, how not only men of rank in Athens, but all Athenian citizens, had seats in courts of judicature. As these rivals differed in every thing, so they were opposite in their notions of what a man's duty was in such a station. Aristides conceived, that he ought to be inflexibly upright, and to be void alike of affection and passion; whereas it was a common saying with Themistocles, God forbid, that I should ever sit on a tribunal, where my friends should not have more favour than strangers. Aristides's conduct was certainly the more laudable, and he piqued himself so much upon acting strictly up to the maxims he laid down, that he acquired the sirname of just, and was looked upon as the most worthy and virtuous of the Athenians. Themistocles, instead of repining, rejoiced at this, for knowing well the nature of the people, he conceived it an easy thing to destroy a rival arrived at so high a reputation [b]. The ostracism was already introduced into the Athenian state, though it is not certain by whom, some say by Pisistratus, or rather by his sons; others by Clysthenes; but this not being clear, we did not think fit to attribute it to him, or to mention the ostracism till we come to a particular instance of it. By this men, eminent to such a degree as to threaten the state with danger, were banished for ten years. Plutarch says, this exile was not a punishment for any crime, but a kind of honourable retirement, used as the curb of too great power, and the remedy of the people for those apprehensions with which they were so often taken. The method in which they proceeded to inflict the ostracism was this; every citizen took a piece of a broken pot or shell, on which having wrote the name of the person he would have banished, he carried it to a certain place of the market-place which was inclosed with rails; then the magistrates began to count the number of the shells; for if they were less than six thousand, the vote did not take place; but if they surpassed that number, they laid every name apart, and the man whose name was found on the greatest number of shells was of course exiled for ten years, with free leave, however, to make what use he thought fit of his estate

[z] Plut & Corn. Nepos. in vit. Ariſtid. & Them.

[a] Plut. ubi supra. [b] Plut. in vit. Themist. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Arist.

eſtate (X) [c]. It may ſeem ſtrange, that Themiſtocles could raiſe the popular reſentment againſt a man amiable from peaceable virtues; yet he affected by cauſing it to be whiſpered about, that Ariſtides, having aſſumed the name

[c] Plut. in vit. Ariſt.

(X) The oſtraciſm makes ſo great a figure in all the Greek hiſtory, and occurs ſo often in that which we are now writing, that it is fit, that we ſhould give the reader a more particular account of it in a note, than we found it proper for us to do in the text. It derived its name from oſtracon, which ſignifies a tile, becauſe at firſt the names of perſons baniſhed in this manner were wrote on pieces of tiles, or broken earthen veſſels (66). Diodorus Siculus ſays, that ſuch as were ejected from their country by the oſtraciſm were allowed to return in five years (67); but in this he is miſtaken, for all writers agree that the time limited was ten years (68), and the time allowed him on whom this puniſhment fell to quit the Athenian territories was ten days (69). The fundamental rule of telling the groſs number of the ſhells, and rendering the oſtraciſm void, if they did not amount to ſix thouſand, was a great point in favour of eminent perſons, ſince it is a city where there were not above 18 or 20,000 free citizens, it muſt have been a very difficult thing to engage a third part of them to enter upon ſuch a deſign. It may ſeem ſtrange, that the author of ſo extraordinary a law as this ſhould not be known; and yet it is certain, that about no hiſtorical point authors differ more. Ælian aſcribes it to Clyſthenes before-mentioned (70); Diodorus Siculus ſays it took place under the Piſiſtratidæ (71), and many are of that opinion beſides him. For Plutarch reports, that Hipparchus was baniſhed under their adminiſtration (72). Heraclides fixes this general aſſertion to Hippias, whom he expreſsly declares the author of this ſevere practice (73). Photius, in his extracts from Ptolemy Hephæſtion, aſcribes it to Achilles the ſon of Lyſon (74; but Suidas and Euſebius both ſet it far higher than the days of the commonwealth, viz. under the reign of Theſeus. However uncertain its beginning is, there is no diſpute, that it ended in the baniſhment of Hyperbolus. This practice Ariſtotle ſeems to aſcribe to all the democracies of his time (75), and we are aſſured by various authors, that the Argives, Mileſians, Megarentians and Syracuſans had the ſame law, though under different titles, amongſt them.

(66) Suidas. Heſychius. (67) Biblioth. lib. xi. (68) Pollux, Plutarch. in vit. Ariſt. (69) Scholiaſt. Ariſtophan. ad. Equit. (70) Var Hiſt. lib. xiii. c. 14. (71) Biblioth. lib xi. (72) In vit. Niciæ. (73) De Rep. (74) Biblioth. lib. vi. (75) Polit. lib. iii, c. 13.

name of juſt, and acting frequently as an umpire between contending parties, had inſenſibly erected a monarchy, though without pomp or guards; for what (ſaid the agents of Themiſtocles) conſtitutes a tyrant but giving laws? On a ſudden, and when it was leaſt expected, citizens and countrymen flocked to the forum, and demanded the oſtraciſm. One of the clowns from a borough in Attica, who could neither write nor read, brought his ſhell to Ariſtides, and ſaid, Write me Ariſtides upon this. Ariſtides ſurpriſed aſked him, if he knew any ill of that Athenian, or if he had ever done him any hurt. Me hurt! (ſaid the fellow) no, I don't ſo much as know him, but I am weary and ſick at heart on hearing him every where called the juſt. Ariſtides therefore took the ſhell, and wrote his own name upon it. This was certainly a ſtrong proof of his firmneſs of mind, but he gave yet a greater. When the magiſtrates ſignified to him that the oſtraciſm fell upon him, he retired modeſtly out of the forum, and as he went out he lifted up his eyes to heaven and ſaid, I beſeech the Gods, that the Athenians may never ſee that day which ſhall force them to remember Ariſtides [f].

The war againſt the inhabitants of Ægina revived after the battle of Marathon, and was carried on by both parties with great animoſity; the nobles and their party had fallen upon the remains of Nicodromus's party, and put many of them to death, with ſuch circumſtances, as not only irritated the exiles, but made many of their own citizens uneaſy. The Athenians had revenged the death of their confederates in ſeveral expeditions, but the inhabitants of Ægina had in their turn done the ſubjects of Athens conſiderable damage, which was entirely owing to their great power at ſea, their fleets being more numerous, and their ſhips better, than their neighbours. Themiſtocles conſidering this, continually exhorted the Athenians to obſerve and weigh it in their minds. He alſo gave them to underſtand, that in his opinion the Perſian war was ſo far from being ended that it was but begun, becauſe it was unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Xerxes, who ſucceeded his father in his empire, would not alſo ſucceed him in his hatred to the Grecians, from whom the honour of his empire had ſuffered ſo much. Having often inſiſted on theſe topics, he had at laſt the boldneſs to move, that the money produced by the ſilver mines, which hitherto the Athenians had divided amongſt themſelves, ſhould be applied to building ſhips, with which, being thoroughly poſſeſſed of the nature of the thing, they complied, and a hundred gallies were immediately put upon the ſtocks; and this ſudden increaſe of the Athenian fleet, with their addicting themſelves continually afterwards to maritime affairs, proved the means of preſerving, not only Athens, but all Greece in the enjoyment of its liberties, as Themiſtocles rightly foreſaw it would [g].

[f] Plutarch & Corn. Nepos in vit. Ariſt. & Themiſt.

The Greeks prepare to reſiſt the Perſians.

By this time, that is, about three years after the baniſhment of Ariſtides, the Athenians found, that Themiſtocles had ſpoke the truth, where he affirmed that the Perſian war, inſtead of being ended, was but juſt begun; for Xerxes, after having made prodigious preparations for the total conqueſt of Greece, ſent meſſengers with a Greek interpreter to its ſeveral republics to demand Earth and Water. Themiſtocles, deſiring to make the breach ſtill wider between theſe two nations, engaged the Athenians to ſeize the interpreter, and put him to death, for preſuming to publiſh the decrees of the king of Perſia in the language of the Greeks. This act of ſeverity was followed by another; one Arthmius of Zele a town in Troas had ſettled at Athens, and had an half freedom granted him; this man, having received large ſums of money from the king of Perſia, endeavoured to corrupt ſome of the principal perſons of the city therewith, for which Themiſtocles procured him to be baniſhed Attica by ſound of trumpet, and his family to be degraded. Laſtly, with the aſſiſtance of Chileus the Arcadian, he engaged the ſeveral ſtates of Greece to lay aſide their quarrels, and to provide for their mutual defence [h].

When it came to be debated who ſhould be appointed the general of the Athenians, in caſe the Perſians ſhould invade them, one Epicydes, a great orator, but a man otherwiſe little capable of the charge, influenced the people ſo much by his ſpeeches, that it was generally believed he would be elected to that important office. Themiſtocles, ſeeing the danger of his country, and knowing the man to be covetous, ſtrained his own circumſtances and bought him off. By engaging him to deſiſt, he made way for his own election, for there was no body then left capable of contending with him, ſo he was preſently elected [i].

When

[g] Herodot. lib. vii. Plut. in Themiſt. [h] Æſchin. cont. Cteſiph. Plut. in vit. Themiſt. [i] Plut. in vit. Themiſt.

When news came to Athens, that the Perſians were upon the point of invading Greece by the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, and that to this end they were tranſporting their forces by ſea, Themiſtocles adviſed his countrymen to quit their city, embark on board their gallies, and go and meet their enemies, yet at a diſtance; to this they would by no means yield. He then put himſelf at the head of their army, and having joined the Lacedæmonians marched towards Tempe. But when advice came, that the ſtreights of Thermopylæ were forced, and not only Theſſaly, but Bœotia, had yielded to the Perſians, the army returned without effecting any thing [k].

The Athenians in this diſtreſs ſent meſſengers to the Delphian Apollo, who, on their arrival having performed the uſual ceremonies, ſat down in the ſanctuary, and there received from Ariſtonica, who was at that time prieſteſs, the following oracle. The reſponſes of the Delphian oracle.

Fly to the fartheſt regions of the earth,
Unhappy men, and ſhun the impending ill.
Fly from your houſes, and deſert your walls;
For total ruin ſhall ſubvert that place.
An angry Mars in Aſia born ſhall come,
And all your ſtately piles, and temples burn.
I ſee the ſacred walls trembling for fear,
The lofty roofs cover'd with ſweat and blood.
Depart, and be prepar'd to bear your fate [l].

The Athenian deputies were extremely amazed at this anſwer, they therefore humbled themſelves in a moſt extraordinary manner before the god, holding olive-branches in their hands, beſeeching a better anſwer, or vowing to remain in the temple till they died. The prieſteſs, feeling herſelf a ſecond time inſpired, delivered at length the following reſponſe:

Pallas in vain has uſed her utmoſt art,
To pacify the wrath of angry Jove.
So that my preſent anſwer muſt again
Of almoſt adamantin hardneſs be.
Yet for Minerva's ſake the god will give
A ſafe protection under walls of wood
To all that lies contained within the bounds
Of Cecrops, or Citheron's ſacred hills,
Theſe, theſe alone impregnable ſhall prove,
But never ſtay to fight the dreadful troops

[k] Id. ib. [l] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

Of horse and foot, advancing thro' the plains:
If e'er you see them, save yourselves by flight,
The divine Salamis shall lose her sons;
Tho' Ceres be brought home or left abroad [m].

THE Athenian deputies having wrote down this answer brought it away, and produced it to the general assembly at Athens, where the people were mightily divided about its true sense and meaning; many were of opinion, that by walls of wood the citadel was to be understood, because, as we observed before, it was pallisadoed, but others imagined, that it could intend nothing but ships, and therefore advised their countrymen to place all their hopes in their fleet; but the maintainers of the former opinion urged against such as supported the latter, that the two last lines of the oracle were directly against them, and that they without question portended the destruction of the Athenian fleet near Salamis. Themistocles, however, declared for trusting in the fleet, and in answer to what was urged from the last lines of the oracle, alledged, that if the oracle had intended to foretel the destruction of the Athenians, she would not have called it the divine Salamis, but the unhappy; and that whereas the unfortunate in that oracle were stiled the sons of women, it could mean no other than the Persians who were scandalously effeminate. All discreet people concurred in their sentiments, that Themistocles had most judiciously interpreted the oracle, and that the Athenians could only hope for freedom by following his advice. The many, however, had much ado to be reconciled thereto; the leaving their country and estates bore hard upon them; their forsaking their houses and employments still harder; their leaving the tombs of their ancestors and the temples of their gods hardest of all. But Themistocles had a set of arguments in store for them, he made the very notions which would have kept them, contribute to drive them away; for having drawn over the priests who attended in the temple of Minerva, he caused them to give out that the dragon refused to eat, that the offerings set before him were found untouched, that at last it disappeared, so that without doubt the goddess had quitted the city, and taken her flight before them towards the sea. By degrees the populace were so intoxicated with these pious frauds, that they made no manner of question of the Persians being defeated, feated, and that Salamis would be the place. They therefore decreed, that the city ſhould be recommended to the protection of Minerva, that all ſuch as were of age to bear arms ſhould embark on board the fleet, and that all poſſible care ſhould be taken for the preſervation of children, women, and ſlaves. One Cyrſilus an orator vehemently oppoſed the decree, he urged all the common topics of love to the place of one's birth, and affection for wives and helpleſs infants; but the Athenians, conceiving that the falling in with his propoſition would betray a mean deſire of preſerving life, though at the expence of liberty, ſtoned him in the midſt of his diſcourſe, and the women, to ſhew how little they reliſhed ſuch arguments, and how far they were from deſiring that the cauſe of Greece ſhould ſuffer for them, ſtoned his wife. And thus Themiſtocles not only perſuaded his countrymen to do what he conceived was expedient for their ſafety, but even infuſed into them the ſame ſpirit with which he himſelf acted [n].

[m] Herodot. ubi supra.

The Athenians quit their city.

When they began to prepare for this extraordinary embarkation, they had recourſe to the council of Areopagus, who, from funds to us unknown, diſtributed eight drachms to every man who went on board; but this ſum not being ſufficient, Themiſtocles with his uſual quickneſs deviſed an expedient for furniſhing the reſt of the money. He gave out, that in the preſent hurry ſomebody had ſtolen from the ſtatue of Minerva her ſhield, whereon the head of Meduſa was engraven, and having authority granted him to ſearch for it, under colour of this he took away all the money he could lay his hands on, and applied it to the uſe of the public. The people, in this their great diſtreſs, began to lament the loſs of Ariſtides, and to expreſs their apprehenſions, leſt he, to revenge himſelf of the ingratitude of his country, ſhould go over to the Perſians. Themiſtocles thereupon propoſed a decree, that all who were baniſhed might return again, in order to aſſiſt the Greeks with their counſels and perſons; thus he who had been baniſhed by the artifices of Themiſtocles was recalled by his virtue. Ariſtides, on his return, behaved himſelf with more than ordinary civility to Themiſtocles, and did not ſuffer any averſion to that general's perſon to influence him in his conduct as to public affairs [o] (Y).

[n] Plutarch. in vit. Ariſtid. [o] Id. ib.

(Y) At the ſame time that the Greeks thought of defending the paſs of Thermopylæ by land, they ſent a fleet to hinder the paſſage

NOTWITHSTANDING the Athenian fleet was ſuperior to that ſent by any of the confederates, nay to all the reſt of the fleet taken together, yet ſuch was the power of the Lacedæmonians, that the command thereof was committed to Eurybiades a Spartan, a man either unſkilful, or wanting fortitude enough for ſuch an undertaking; for he, when danger approached, was for ſtanding away for the gulph of Corinth in order to join the land army; which when Themiſtocles vehemently oppoſed, Eurybiades was pleaſed to ſay, Such as riſe up before the reſt at the olympic paſſage of the Perſian navy through the ſtreights of Eubœa, which fleet rendezvouſed at Artemiſium. We have taken no notice of this in the text, becauſe we ſhall be obliged to enter into a detail of this matter elſewhere; but inaſmuch as the Athenians ſent a ſquadron of ſhips, and on board them Themiſtocles, to this place, we are obliged to take ſome notice of his conduct here. The Eubœans, not being able to prevail with Eurybiades to remain on their coaſt till they could carry off their wives and children, addreſſed themſelves to Themiſtocles, and made him a preſent of thirty talents. He took the money; with five talents he bribed Eurybiades. Then Adiamanthus the Corinthian being the only commander who inſiſted on weighing anchor, Themiſtocles went on board him, and told him in few words, 'Adiamanthus, you 'ſhall not abandon us, for I will give you a greater preſent for 'doing your duty than the king of the Medes would ſend you 'for deſerting the allies'. Which he performed by ſending him three talents on board. Thus he did what the Eubœans requeſted, and put 22 talents into his pocket. In the ſucceeding engagement Themiſtocles and all the Athenians behaved with extraordinary bravery, for which they received the applauſe of all Greece. At length, when it was thought neceſſary to retire from Artemiſium, Themiſtocles cauſed certain ſtones to be ſet up in all the ports, with inſcriptions, intreating the Ionians either to deſert the Barbarians and join the Greeks, who were fighting for their liberty, or at leaſt to act but faintly in the cauſe of their maſter, remembering, that they were originally Greeks themſelves, and that this very quarrel began on account of the aſſiſtance given by the Greeks to them. This he did with double intent; firſt to influence the Ionians to act as he deſired; ſecondly to give the Perſian monarch a jealouſy of them, that he might be the leſs inclined to truſt thoſe in whoſe power it was to do them moſt ſervice, ſince the Ionians were by far the beſt ſeamen in his fleet (76).

(76) Herodot. lib. vii.

olympic games are laſhed. To which the Athenian wiſely anſwered, But they that are left behind are never crowned. Eurybiades at this lifting up his batoon, as if he would have ſtruck him, Themiſtocles cried out, Ay, ſtrike if you will, but hear me; upon which Eurybiades laid down his ſtaff, and patiently attended to his diſcourſe. One of the Lacedæmonians, however, who had not ſo much ſenſe as the admiral, replied to Themiſtocles's oration, that it did not become ſuch, as had neither houſe nor home of their own, to endeavour to prejudice others by hindering them from returning to their habitations. Themiſtocles, taking fire at this, ſaid, "We have indeed, baſe fellow, "left our houſes and our walls, not thinking it fit to be-"come ſlaves, for the ſake of thoſe things that have nei-"ther life nor ſoul, and yet our city is the greateſt of "all Greece, as conſiſting of two hundred gallies, which "are here to defend you, if you pleaſe; but if you run "away and leave us, as you did once before, the Greeks "will ſoon perceive, that the Athenians can find for them-"ſelves as fair a country, and as large and free a city, as "that they have left". In a word, he took ſuch pains to demonſtrate to this aſſembly, and to the general in particular, that it would be madneſs to think of fighting anywhere but where they were, that the wiſeſt of the Grecian captains concurred with him. The chief of his arguments were theſe; he ſhewed them, that if once they retired from Salamis, the fleet would never fight at all, becauſe being made up of quotas from different ſtates, the ſeveral ſquadrons would immediately ſail back to their own ports, and leave the common cauſe of Greece without defence; that fighting before the iſthmus, which was the ſcheme of the oppoſite party, would be attended with two dreadful conſequences; the one, that Salamis and Ægina, with all the women and children in them, would be abandoned to the enemy; the other; that with a ſmall fleet they would be obliged to engage a very great one, and that in an open ſea; that, on the contrary, if they fought in the channel of Salamis, the Perſians would not have near ſo great an advantage from the number of their ſhips, becauſe the front of the line would be on both ſides nearly equal, that fighting here would effectually ſave Peloponneſus, whereas retiring to the coaſt thereof would draw the Perſians thither, and induce all thoſe conſequences which thoſe that propoſed it ſought to ſhun. As to the wall built croſs the iſthmus upon which ſome depended, he ſhewed,

that

that it was a fooliſh and ridiculous defence, in caſe they yielded the ſuperiority of the ſea to the Barbarians, who would then make their deſcents on every ſide of it without being obliged to force the wall at all. Theſe arguments, with the dread Eurybiades was in, that, in caſe he took other meaſures, the Athenians would deſert him and ſail to Italy, as Themiſtocles had hinted, engaged that general to declare for fighting, and in this reſolution they remained for ſome time.

THE courage of the Athenians on this occaſion can never be enough commended, ſince the chief cauſe of that fear which ſpread itſelf among the reſt of the Greeks was the miſerable deſtruction of the city of Athens. We have already given ſo full an account of this matter in the Perſian hiſtory, that there is no neceſſity of repeating it here. We ſhall content ourſelves with noting two or three things, which will illuſtrate the hiſtory now before us. Such of the Athenians as had fled to the Acropolis or citadel, out of a fond opinion that it was the place pointed at by the oracle, were all put to the ſword. The Perſians, with whom the deſcendents of Piſiſtratus returned, ſhewed no mercy to ſuch as obſtinately refuſed to ſubmit themſelves again to their obedience. As to pillaging the temples and ſetting fire to all the ſacred things, which gave ſuch high offence to the Greeks, theſe were not ſo properly to be aſcribed to the barbarity of their enemies, as to their zeal; for we have ſhewn before, that the Perſians were deiſts in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, and looked upon temples, images, and altars, as they were the marks of polytheiſm, to be ſo many indignities offered to the Supreme Being, which was the cauſe that they deſtroyed them without pity, as their reſentment of the injuries done them by the ſtates of Athens engaged them to ſhew no mercy to ſuch of its people as fell into their hands.

Debates amongſt the generals of the Greeks.

WHEN Xerxes drew down all his land-forces to the ſea-ſide, and at the ſame time cauſed his fleet to approach that of the Greeks, the Peloponneſians, who were in that navy, fell again into their old opinion of leaving all to preſerve Peloponneſus from being ravaged. To this end a council of war was ſummoned, for their murmurs ran ſo high, that Eurybiades was afraid of their deſerting; in this council their opinion prevailed, for they would neither liſten to arguments, nor pay any reſpect to authority. Themiſtocles

P Herodot. ubi ſupra. Plutarch ubi ſupra.

Themiſtocles therefore, ſeeing his opinion ſet aſide by the Peloponneſians, reſolved to take meaſures for forcing them to ſtay; for, as Herodotus informs us, withdrawing privately from the aſſembly, he ſent away a man to the enemy's fleet in a ſmall veſſel, properly inſtructed; the name of this man was Sicinus, he was tutor to Themiſtocles's children, and every way capable of being made the inſtrument of great things. When he arrived in the Perſian fleet, he was conducted to their council of general officers, to whom he delivered the following meſſage, as from Themiſtocles. "The general of the Athenians, who is in "the intereſt of the king, and deſires your affairs may "proſper rather than thoſe of Greece, has ſent me pri- "vately away with orders to let you know, that the Gre- "cians in great conſternation have determined to betake "themſelves to flight, and that you have now an oppor- "tunity of atchieving the moſt glorious of all enterprizes, "unleſs your negligence opens a way to their eſcape. For "being divided in their opinions, they will not oppoſe "your forces; but you will ſee thoſe who are your friends "fighting againſt thoſe who are not of your party". This meſſage had its deſired effect, the Perſians conceived, not without ſome ſhow of reaſon, that the Athenians, finding it to no purpoſe any longer to oppoſe the great king, were reſolved by this piece of intelligence to make their peace with him at once, and thereby procure their city and country to be reſtored [q]. They therefore made all the preparations neceſſary for ſhutting up the Grecian navy, and reckoned that they were already ſo many prizes, and that now they ſhould regain their honour, and compenſate themſelves for the loſs which they had ſuſtained at Artemiſium. Ariſtides was the firſt who perceived what the Perſians aimed at; he immediately went to Themiſtocles, and when they were alone he addreſſed him, if we may believe Plutarch, who in the mean time is ſupported by Herodotus, in theſe terms: "If we are wiſe, Themi- "ſtocles, we ſhall now for ever lay aſide that vain and "childiſh contention that has hitherto been between us, "and begin a more ſafe and honourable emulation, by "contending which of us two ſhall do moſt towards the "ſafety of Greece; you by performing the part of a wiſe "and great general, and I by obeying and aſſiſting you "with my perſon and advice. I underſtand, that you alone

[q] Herodot. lib. viii.

" alone have determined rightly, adviſing to engage in the " ſtreights without delay. Your allies are of a different " opinion, but the enemies themſelves ſeem to confirm and " ſtrengthen your advice; for the ſea all round us is covered " and ſhut up by their fleet, ſo that they who have oppoſed " coming to an engagement muſt be forced to fight, and " ſhew themſelves men of courage, there being no room left " for flight." To this Themiſtocles replied, " I am " aſhamed, Ariſtides, at your having got the ſtart of me " in this noble emulation; I ſhall uſe my utmoſt endea- " vours to outdo this beginning, which is ſo much to your " honour, and to obſcure, if poſſible, this glorious ſtep of " yours by the luſtre of my future actions". At the ſame time Themiſtocles acquainted him with the ſtratagem made uſe of to compel the enemy to take the meaſures they did, and which in fact compelled alſo the Grecians to take thoſe which were moſt adviſeable for their own intereſt, and to which he had ſo often preſſed them, though to little purpoſe. Thus ended the interview between theſe two rivals for reputation, whoſe new cemented friendſhip proved of the utmoſt conſequence to the cauſe of Athens and Greece.

The battle of Salamis. Year after the Flood, 2519. Before Chriſt, 480.

THE detail of the battle of Salamis is unneceſſary here, ſince the reader has met with it before in our account of the Perſian affairs. We ſhall therefore content ourſelves with obſerving, that the Athenians reaped the higheſt honour from their behaviour on that remarkable occaſion, though Herodotus is for beſtowing the palm on the inhabitants of Ægina. We have more than once noted, that till Themiſtocles perſuaded the Athenians to apply themſelves to maritime affairs, the people of this little iſle were lords of the ſea. It is not therefore to be wondered, that their long experience enabled them to perform great things in a ſea-fight, of which the Perſian emperor was a ſpectator in perſon, and on the event of which their own liberty and that of all their confederates depended. The Athenians, after the Perſian fleet was once broke, drove their ſcattered ſhips towards the coaſt of Attica. The ſquadron of Ægina, ſtretching out to ſea, got on the other ſide of the flying Perſians, and ſunk many of thoſe veſſels which outſailed the Athenians. Thus the ſkill and conduct of thoſe two nations preſerved all their confederates, and not only carried away victory from the prodigious fleet of their enemies, enemies, but likewise obliged the Persians to account it a great happiness, if after this extraordinary defeat they preserved any part of that navy which had so lately darkened the coasts, and struck a panic through Greece.

[r] Plutarch. in vit. Ariſtid.

The morning after the battle of Salamis, the Greeks, perceiving the enemy's land-forces still encamped in the same place, conjectured, that their fleet was retired into the Phalerum, one of the ports of Athens; but they were mistaken, for Xerxes had given orders, that they should sail with the utmost diligence to the Hellespont, while himself with his land-forces pretended to throw up an artificial isthmus, in order to unite the island of Salamis to the continent of Attica. The Greeks, in the mean time, were for pursuing the Persian fleet, in hopes of taking straggling ships in order to increase their booty; but coming to Andros without discovering any of the enemy's ships, they there called a council of war, in which Themistocles gave it as his opinion, that they should shape their pursuit by the way of the islands, and make all the sail they could for the Hellespont, in order to destroy the bridge which Xerxes had thrown over it, and thereby cut off that monarch's communication with Asia. Plutarch says, that he communicated this to Aristides, who opposed it; but Herodotus, with greater probability, ascribes this opposition to Eurybiades. That Themistocles communicated his sentiments to Aristides might be, but that he informed Eurybiades of them is morally certain, because he commanded in chief. It is therefore more likely, that he and not Aristides opposed the carrying them into execution, because he thought, that shutting Xerxes into Europe with such a mighty army would be to compel him to repair his former omissions, and to exert himself with vigor against the Greeks. When Themistocles perceived that this reasoning prevailed, and that the Grecian chieftains were likely to come into it unanimously, he formed another scheme, which Plutarch says, he likewise communicated to Aristides, and that was this; he sent a trusty messenger to Xerxes to inform him, that the Greeks intended to break down his bridge over the Hellespont; wherefore he advised him to march back with the utmost speed, promising to delay, as much as he was able, the intended project of his countrymen. Herodotus says, that he actually advised the Athenians to give over the pursuit, in order to return to their country and rebuild their houses, into which they readily gave, as it was natural for people to wish for a quiet retreat,

retreat, after having ſo long endured ſo violent a tempeſt; but at the ſame time our author intimates, that Themiſtocles had in view the ſafety of the Perſians, and not the intereſt of the Athenians, which he attributes to his foreſight of following misfortunes, and his willingneſs to ſecure an aſylum, when the envy of his countrymen ſhould doom him to baniſhment. Theſe ſort of cenſures are the tribute paid by the great for the luſtre of their actions. Whether Themiſtocles really intended his country ill or no is what none can tell; that he generally meant its good is univerſally allowed, and that this advice ſuited his ſcheme of making Xerxes of his own accord abandon the war in Greece, is plain from the nature of the thing. It is hard therefore to tarniſh his glory by receiving ſuch inſinuations, and we had better ſuppoſe, that he did not foreſee his diſgrace, than by a conjectural magnifying of his prudence diminiſh the reputation he acquired as a true patriot [f].

HERODOTUS relates another thing of Themiſtocles; he ſays, that while the Grecian fleet and army were employed in beſieging Andros, this general ſent to Paros and other iſlands, and threatening the inhabitants of them, that the Greeks would invade their country, extorted from them vaſt ſums of money, which he inſinuates he applied to his own private uſe. Plutarch relates another paſſage, which muſt have happened pretty near this time, viz. that when the Grecian fleet was arrived at Pegaſa, a maritime town of Magneſia, where it wintered, Themiſtocles made an oration to his countrymen, in which he declared, that he had it in his mind to do ſome-thing which would prove of infinite conſequence to Athens; but that it was of ſuch a nature, that he could not communicate it to the aſſembly. Upon this the Athenians directed him to communicate it to Ariſtides only; and in caſe he approved it, to put it in practice. When therefore theſe great men were alone, Themiſtocles diſcovered in few words, that his ſcheme was to burn the reſt of the Grecian fleet, which would leave Athens miſtreſs of the ſeas. Ariſtides made his report to the people, that what Themiſtocles intended was indeed the moſt advantageous thing that could poſſibly happen to them, but at the ſame time it was the moſt unjuſt; upon which they readily directed him to think no more of it, eſteeming it far better to ſacrifice their intereſt to their fame, fame, than for the ſake of preſent advantage, how great ſoever it were, to hazard the cenſure of ſucceeding ages, and the ſtain of infamy never to be blotted out.

[f] Herodot. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Themiſt.

When the fleet was returned to Salamis, and the booty was divided amongſt all who had ſerved on board it, the Greeks reſolved to ſail to the iſthmus in order to confer there the cuſtomary honours on him, who by the free votes of the chiefs had deſerved beſt, and theſe being aſſembled in the temple of Neptune, and directed to write down his name who deſerved beſt, and alſo his who deſerved next, each chief put down his own in the firſt place, and the name of Themiſtocles in the ſecond, whereby, without deſigning it, they unanimouſly proclaimed him the moſt worthy of the Greeks. From thence he went to Lacedæmon, where he was received with the greateſt honour and reſpect, and the Spartans, partial as they were to their own countrymen, after decreeing the prize of valour to Eurybiades, aſſigned that of prudence to Themiſtocles, and crowned him with a wreath of olive; they preſented him alſo with the moſt magnificent chariot in Sparta, and when he returned to Athens he was eſcorted by five hundred horſe, an honour never paid to any ſtranger but him.

The Perſians attempt to treat with the Athenians.

On Themiſtocles's coming back to Athens, there were not wanting ſome who endeavoured to inſinuate, that his receiving ſuch high honours from the Lacedæmonians was injurious to his country; but he, confiding in his innocence, treated theſe clamours with contempt, and contented himſelf with exhorting the people, not to entertain any doubts of their confederates, but to be careful in maintaining the mighty reputation they had acquired, and the reſpect paid them by all the ſtates of Greece. About this time ſome of the families of the Athenians returned from Salamis to Trœzene, where they had taken refuge while the Perſians ravaged Attica; the former belonged to the Athenians, but the latter was free. They gave, however, a very kind reception to the women and children committed to their charge, they appointed them a maintenance out of their public funds, and paid alſo the beſt ſchool-maſters they could find for taking care of their youth; ſuch a high regard had the generoſity of the Athenians in abandoning all for the ſake of liberty drawn from every ſtate in Greece. The Perſians themſelves were no leſs ready in preferring them to all the Greeks: Mardonius, whom Xerxes had left to command the army deſtined for carrying on the war, choſe to treat with the Athenians, rather than to fight with them;

them; to this end he made use of Alexander king of Macedon, a person well known and highly respected at Athens. Him, as a tributary and ally of the Persian king, he sent to make proposals of peace, not in his own name, but in that of his master. When he arrived the Athenians entertained him like a friend, but delayed giving him audience, from a foresight, that the Lacedæmonians would not be long after hearing this news before they sent embassadors, which accordingly came to pass. They then appointed a day for Alexander to have audience of the people, on which, as Herodotus informs us, he spoke to this purpose: "Athenians, I am sent by Mardonius to tell you, "that he has received a message from the king in these "words; I forgive the Athenians all the injuries they have "done me, and therefore, Mardonius, observe the follow-"ing orders: Reinstate them in the possession of their "own territories; give them moreover whatever other "country they shall chuse; let them govern by their own "laws, and rebuild all their temples which I have burnt, "if they will come to an agreement with me. Having "received these orders, I am obliged to put them in exe-"cution, unless you prevent me; and now I my self "would ask you, what madness pushes you on to make "war against a king you will never conquer, nor always "be able to resist? You are not ignorant of the nume-"rous forces and great actions of Xerxes; you have heard "of the army I have, and if you should happen to be vic-"torious and to defeat us, which you can never hope so long "as you have the use of reason, another much more pow-"erful will come against you; suffer not your selves then "to be dispossessed of your country, and continually alarmed "for your own lives, by measuring your strength with the "king; but be reconciled to him, since you have now "so favourable an opportunity in your hands from the "present disposition of Xerxes. Enter therefore into an "alliance with us sincerely and without fraud, and con-"tinue to be a free people. These, O Athenians are the "words which Mardonius ordered me to say to you: "For my own part, I shall not mention my constant af-"fection to your state, because you have had sufficient "proof of that in former time. I beseech you then, "hearken to the counsel of Mardonius; for I see you "will not always be able to make war against Xerxes. "Had I not known this, I should never have undertaken

" to bring you such a message; but the king's power is " incomparably greater than that of all other mortals, " and his reach so extensive, that, unless you immediately " accept the favourable conditions he offers, I dread the " consequences to you, who, lying in the way of dan- " ger more than any other of the confederates, and " possessing a country placed as a prize between the con- " tending parties, must be always most exposed to ruin. " Let these reasons prevail with you, and consider the " important advantages you will receive, if the great " king forgives you alone among all the Grecians and " becomes your friend". The Lacedæmonian embassadors spoke in their turns, as soon as Alexander had made an end of his oration; they said, " that they were com- " missioned to exhort the Athenians not to listen to the " propofals of the Barbarians, because it was a thing un- " reasonable on many accounts; First, because the ori- " ginal quarrel was between the Persians and Athenians, " into which the rest of the Greeks were drawn merely " through their respect to them: Secondly, that the A- " thenians were always wont to be the foremost in the " cause of liberty, which it would not now become " them to desert: Thirdly, that there were no grounds " to believe the Persians would observe any terms with a " people they so much hated, when occasion would serve; " that the Spartans were exceedingly grieved for their " misfortunes, and as a mark of their regard would in " conjunction with their allies take care of their wives " and children till this war was at an end, and give them " what other assistance was in their power." The Athenians having deliberated on this proposition, answered first that of Alexander. They said, " they were well ac- " quainted with the great power of the king, but that " they were also well assured of the justice of their own " cause; that as long as the sun and moon endured they " would never desert the cause of Greece, nor forget " the injuries done them by the Persians." To the Lacedæmonians they answered, " they were sorry they " should conceive so meanly of them, as to think they " would ever compare interest with glory; that they " would continue firm to their confederates without being " a burden to them; but that, it being probable Mar- " donius would be ready for action in the spring, they " hoped the Lacedæmonians would think it more rea-

" ſonable to meet him with united forces in Bœotia,
" than to ſuffer him to ravage Attica again."

Athens a ſecond time deſtroyed.

WHAT the Athenians foreſaw came exactly to paſs; Mardonius, according to the orders of his maſter, marched directly into Attica, and began to waſte and plunder the country, levelling even the ruins of ancient buildings, and throwing to the ground ſuch as the Athenians had either erected or repaired. He proceeded to Athens, which its inhabitants were forced a ſecond time to abandon, the Spartans ſending help ſo ſlowly, that the enemy arrived long before their confederates, ſo that the Athenians were conſtrained to retire with their families to Salamis, and to ſend the army which they had raiſed, under the command of Ariſtides, to join that of the Spartans and other ſtates of Greece, which, under the conduct of Pauſanias tutor of king Pliſtarchus, was preparing to reſiſt the Perſians. This army ſoon after advanced into Bœotia, where they fought the famous battle of Platæa, in which they made a far greater ſlaughter of the Perſians than they had ever done before. It would be foreign to our preſent purpoſe to ſay any thing more of this battle here, becauſe it was fought out of the territory of Athens, and the Lacedæmonians had the ſupreme command. It will be neceſſary, however, to obſerve, that Ariſtides, with the body of troops under his command, behaved with ſuch bravery and reſolution, as procured him the praiſe of all the Greeks who were their cotemporaries, and hath tranſmitted their fame, both for valour and prudence, even to this far diſtant age. The ſame day that the battle of Platæa was fought in Greece, the Perſians were alſo defeated at Mycale in Ionia. The Grecian fleet conſiſted of two hundred and fifty gallies, under the command of Leotychides the Lacedæmonian and Xanthippus the Athenian. It is univerſally allowed, that the Athenians behaved better than any of the reſt of the Grecians in this engagement, of whom Herodotus ſays, that Harmolycus the ſon of Euthoinus, a famous wreſtler, deſerved the firſt place. When they had defeated the Perſian navy, the Greeks had the boldneſs to land and to attack the forces they found on ſhore. whom having alſo routed, they plundered all the country, and carried off an immenſe booty.

Year after the Flood, 2521. Before Chriſt, 478.

Havin

[t] Herodot. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Ariſtid. & Themiſt. Juſtin. lib. ii.

Having done this they sailed to Samos, where it was debated in their council, whether or no it would be fit to transport the Ionians into Greece and leave Ionia to the Barbarians, since it would be very difficult, if not impracticable, for the Athenians, or indeed for the rest of the confederates, to assist them at all times, and in case they were not protected, their present revolt might prove fatal to them. It was likewise proposed, in case they were transported to Greece, to give them the territories of such Greek states as had in this war sided with the Persians; but after all the Athenians changed their minds, and shewed a visible reluctance, when this design should have been put in execution. They were apprehensive, that if the Ionians were transported into Greece they would rival them in point of trade, or at least throw off that obedience and respect which hitherto they had paid Athens, as their mother city and constant protectress. They were likewise uneasy at the Peloponnesians interfering in matters relating to their colonies, and as the Athenians were at this time the state of greatest consequence in Greece, their confederates thought it necessary to satisfy them by their particular condescension in this point, and therefore, after promising the Ionians such assistance as they should have occasion for from time to time, the fleet left their coast. The Lacedæmonians sailed back to Laconia, but the Athenians, under the command of Xanthippus, resolved to make some farther attempts before they quitted these seas [u].

The strong fortress of Sestos taken.

This resolution being taken, the Athenians crossed over to the Chersonesus and besieged Sestos. It was a strong place, and had a great garrison under the command of Artayctes a Persian, whom Herodotus represents as a man of very dissolute morals. The siege was long and troublesome, and autumn drawing on, the Athenians were very desirous of returning home, but their general Xanthippus declared, that he would not depart till he had either taken Sestos, or was recalled by a decree of the Athenian people, because Artayctes had been guilty of sacrilege in rifling the sepulchre of Protesilaus, and taking thence a vast sum of money. At last, the garrison, being pressed with hunger and having no hopes of relief, resolved to shift for themselves, and accordingly made their escape in two parties, the one led by Oibazus, the other by Artayctes; Oibazus [u] Herodot. Plutarch. Corn. Nepos. Justin, &c.

and his party were overtaken by the Thracians, who, after ſurrounding him and his guards, killed moſt of them, and took him and his family priſoners; after which they ſacrificed him to Pliſtorus a Thracian god, and put the reſt of their captives to the ſword. The Athenians, as ſoon as they were maſters of the place, ſent out detachments to ſcour the country, and one of theſe coming up with Artayctes and his corps of troops, near the river Ægos, engaged, routed them, and made him and his ſon priſoners. When they were brought back to Seſtos and put under a guard, Herodotus relates a very extraordinary prodigy, which he attributes to the ſacrilege before mentioned. He ſays, that one of the Athenian ſoldiers, to whoſe cuſtody this Perſian general was committed, broiling ſome dried fiſh, ſaw them leap upon the coals, as if they had been juſt taken out of the water, upon which Artayctes addreſſed himſelf to him in theſe words; "Athenian friend, be not afraid, you are not at all concerned "in this prodigy. Proteſilaus, though dead, and embalmed "at Eleus, admoniſhes me by this ſign, that the gods "have given him power to revenge the injury he "has received: Reſolving therefore to make him repara-"tion, I will conſecrate a hundred talents to his divinity, "inſtead of the riches I took out of his temples; and I "will give two hundred talents to the Athenians, if they "will ſpare my life and the life of my ſon". But their general Xanthippus would not be perſuaded by theſe promiſes, partly becauſe he himſelf was averſe to the thing, and partly becauſe the people of Eleus, to avenge the injuries done to Proteſilaus, earneſtly ſolicited him, that Artayctes might be put to death. Having therefore conducted him to that part of the ſhore, where the bridges of Xerxes terminated, or, as others ſay, to an eminence ſtanding near the city of Madytrus, they cauſed him to be impaled on a ſtake fixed in the ground for that purpoſe, and at the ſame time ſtoned his ſon before his eyes. When the Athenians had done theſe things, they returned with their fleet to Greece, carrying, beſides other riches all the materials of the bridges, in order to be conſecrated in their temples, and nothing more was done that year.[x] (Z)

THI

[x] Herodot. ubi ſupra. Diod. Sicul. lib. xi.

(Z) The ſtory of Artayctes's ſacrilege we have from Herodotus who relates it thus: "The government of the whole provinc

"wa

THE victories of Platæa and Mycale ſealed the freedom of Greece, and particularly eaſed the Athenians of their apprehenſions; they therefore brought back all their families into Attica, and began to think of rebuilding their city, not only with the utmoſt expedition, but alſo with ſome degree of magnificence [y]. The people were more elate than ever, they were conſcious of the mighty ſhare they had in driving the Barbarians back into Aſia, and were therefore reſolved to preſerve that freedom uninvaded by citizens, for which they had ſo warmly contended againſt ſtrangers. Themiſtocles, who was always for a popular government, encouraged them in theſe expectations, and Ariſtides, having thoroughly conſidered the genius of his countrymen, thought it would be better to concede to them freely what they ſo much deſired, than to hazard new diſturbances by the riſing up of different factions. He therefore propoſed, that every citizen ſhould have an equal right to the government, and that the archons ſhould be choſen out of the body of the people without preference or diſtinction; with this the commons were ſatisfied, and the men of figure were alſo contented [z]. Themiſtocles propoſed alſo [y] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. c. 5. [z] Plutarch. in vit. Ariſtid.

" was in the hands of Artayctes, a perſon of profligate and de-
" teſtable manners, who had been placed in that ſtation by Xer" xes, and, by impoſing a fraud upon him when he marched to " Athens, had rifled the treaſures of Proteſilaus, the ſon of Iphi-
" cles, which were at Eleus. For in the city of Eleus in Cherſo-
" neſus the ſepulchre of Proteſilaus was erected in the midſt of " this temple, and a great ſum of money, with gold and ſilver
" plate, veſſels of braſs, and other offerings, were taken from " thence by Artayctes, in virtue of a grant from the king, which " he obtained by this artifice: Sir, ſaid he, here is the habita-
" tion of a certain Grecian, who having entered your territories
" with an army, periſhed as he well deſerved. Give me the houſe
" of this man, that for the future none may dare to invade any " part of your dominions. By this repreſentation he doubted not " to obtain the houſe from Xerxes, becauſe he could have no
" ſuſpicion of his project; and told him Proteſilaus had invaded
" the royal dominions, becauſe the Perſians imagine that all Aſia
" is the property of their kings. Thus after Artyactes had ob" tained his requeſt, he brought away the treaſure to Seſtos, con" verted the ſacred place into paſture and arable land; and when " he was at Eleus, lay with divers women in the ſanctuary (76).

(76) Herodot. lib. ix. prope fin.

ſo at this time, that Athens ſhould be inſtantly fortified in the beſt manner poſſible, to prevent the misfortunes which they had lately ſuſtained by the ſudden invaſions of the Perſians. He had other views than this, but they were not then ripe for diſcovery, ſo he contented himſelf with moving that firſt which was firſt to be put into execution. The Lacedæmonians, as ſoon as they received this news, were exceedingly alarmed: they had been hitherto the principal people in Greece, and were, of conſequence, very jealous of a rival. They therefore ſent embaſſadors to Athens, who on their arrival declared to the aſſembly, that the Spartans, having nothing in view but the general good of Greece, could not avoid remonſtrating againſt the proceedings of the Athenians in fortifying their city, ſince it was clear to them, that this meaſure muſt prove very diſadvantageous to their confederates, becauſe if the Perſians ſhould again make an irruption into Attica, with the ſame ſucceſs as before, and poſſeſs themſelves of a fortified city, they would make uſe of it as a bridle on Greece, and fill it with ſuch a gariſon as would render it inexpugnable. Theſe arguments ſeeming to have no great weight with thoſe to whom they were urged, the Spartan embaſſadors proceed to exert an authority which had been admitted in other Grecian cities, that is, they abſolutely forbid the Athenians to carry their walls any higher. The people, infinitely offended at this, and at the ſame time doubtful how it might be remedied, liſtened readily to Themiſtocles's advice, which was to the following effect: He ſaid, that conſidering their own imbecillity and the power of Sparta, they were in this caſe to make uſe rather of prudence than proweſs. That to free themſelves from the Lacedæmonian embaſſadors, who were but a kind of ſpies, they ſhould promiſe not to proceed any farther in walling their city, till by an embaſſy of their own they ſhould give ſatisfaction to Lacedæmon and the reſt of their allies. He then offered to go himſelf at the head of that embaſſy, and undertook to bring all things to a happy concluſion [a].

The Lacedæmonians deceived by Themiſtocles.

THEMISTOCLES, according to his own propoſal, being named with ſome other Athenians ambaſſadors to Sparta, he ſet out before the reſt, having intimated to the ſenate that it would be for the intereſt of the ſtate, if they delayed as long as poſſible ſending the reſt of the embaſſadors to Sparta. When he arrived at Lacedæmon, he put off off ſome time receiving audience, on account of his being alone, and expecting daily his collegues. Theſe in the mean time exhorted the Athenians to proceed in building their walls with all imaginable application; this they readily gave into, ſparing neither houſes nor ſepulchres for materials, while women, children, ſtrangers, ſervants, and citizens, all wrought night and day, ſo that in a ſhort ſpace the walls were almoſt finiſhed. The Lacedæmonians having received advice of this, and the collegues of Themiſtocles being arrived, they ſummoned them before the Ephori, who began immediately to exclaim againſt the perfidiouſneſs of the Athenians in thus violating their promiſe. Themiſtocles denied the charge; he ſaid his collegues aſſured him of the contrary, that it did not become a great ſtate to depend on flying rumours, but that the Lacedæmonians ought to ſend deputies back with the Athenian embaſſadors to take cognizance of the affair, while himſelf remained as a hoſtage to be anſwerable for the event. This being agreed to, Themiſtocles engaged his aſſociates to adviſe the Athenians to commit the Spartan embaſſadors to ſafe cuſtody till he ſhould be releaſed. He then publickly avowed the whole tranſaction at Lacedæmon, took the ſcheme upon himſelf, and ſaid, That all things are lawful for our country. The Spartans, ſeeing no remedy, concealed their reſentment, and ſent him home in ſafety [b].

[a] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra.

THE next year, which was the laſt of the ſeventy-fifth olympiad, Adiamanthus being archon, Themiſtocles opened himſelf further to his citizens, as to the ſchemes he had formed for raiſing their power, and encreaſing their wealth. He obſerved, that the port Phalerum was very narrow and inconvenient, he therefore adviſed them to make the Pyræum the port of Athens, from whence he ſaid that he was ſenſible, that great advantages would accrue to the ſtate, but that it was not proper for him to diſcloſe them to the aſſembly, or to lay down publicly the methods, by which his deſign might be carried into execution. He intreated them therefore to chuſe two perſons of rank and capacity, to whom he might communicate the whole of his project. The aſſembly thereupon made choice of Ariſtides and Xanthippus, to whom Themiſtocles freely imparted his contrivance, which was to render the Pyræum the moſt capacious haven in Greece, and to unite the city thereto by long walls, for he did not conceive it fit that the port ſhould be made part of the city, becauſe, knowing that ſailors are generally diſſolute, he was afraid, that their mixing with the citizens would work a corruption of manners. He obſerved, that the Ionians were originally from the ſame ſtock with themſelves, and that of conſequence, if Athens were miſtreſs of the ſea, they would attach themſelves to her rather than to Lacedæmon, which he ſaid would be the caſe of the iſlanders alſo, who, having no idea of a land-force, would ſue for protection to that ſtate whoſe naval power was greateſt; he concluded with ſhewing the eaſineſs with which his ſcheme might be put in practice, if its ends were kept ſecret, and the danger there would be of its coming to nothing, if the Spartans had once an idea of what was intended. Ariſtides and Xanthippus went then out to the people, and told them, that Themiſtocles's project was of the utmoſt advantage to the ſtate, and yet might be performed with the greateſt eaſe. This, inſtead of ſatisfying the aſſembly, inſpired them with new ſuſpicions, they therefore directed Themiſtocles to apply himſelf to the ſenate, and, if they approved his deſign, they empowered them to furniſh him with what he wanted; accordingly Themiſtocles addreſſed himſelf to that venerable body, and they went unanimouſly into all his meaſures. In the firſt place embaſſadors were diſpatched to Sparta, to inſinuate there how fit it would be for the Greeks to have ſome great port, where a fleet might always continue in ſafety, in order to watch the deſigns of the Perſians; having thus prepared the Lacedæmonians not to take offence at their firſt preparations for enlarging and eſtabliſhing the harbour of Pyræum, Themiſtocles took ſuch care, that every thing was finiſhed, and the place in a poſture of defence, before it was well known at Sparta what the Athenians were about [c].

[b] Plut. in vit. Themiſt. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Themiſt Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

The ſovereignty of ſea transferred to Athens.

THE Greeks continuing the war all this time againſt the Perſians, Ariſtides and Cimon the ſon of Miltiades were ſent commanders of the Athenian forces, Pauſanias the Lacedæmonian having the command in chief. This Pauſanias, elate with the ſucceſs he had had at Platæa and full alſo of new deſigns, having engaged in a treaſonable correſpondence with the Perſian king, treated all the captains under his command with ſuch haughtineſs and ſtate, that they were not able to bear it; for he never ſpoke to them them but in very harsh terms; he would not allow them to provide forage, or draw water for themselves or their soldiers, till his Spartans were all served. As for the private men, under colour of preserving discipline, he treated them as if they had been all slaves, making them for the smallest offences stand with an anchor bound down on their shoulders, so that it almost sunk them into the earth. On the other hand, the justice of Aristides and the candour and generosity of Cimon attracted the hearts both of captains and soldiers, they saw, that the Athenians were far more powerful at sea than the Lacedæmonians, and that the authority of the latter was founded only in their pride; they therefore applied themselves first to Aristides, to desire, that he would interpose with Pausanias, in order to hinder him from behaving so roughly; but when Pausanias turned from him disdainfully, and said he was not at leisure to hear him, they unanimously besought the Athenian commanders to take them under their protection, promising for the future to acknowledge Athens as the first city of Greece. Aristides upon this proposition told them, that he saw clearly not only the fitness, but the necessity, of what they proposed; but as he would never hazard either the safety or honour of his country, by attempting to do what might not succeed, so he would never comply with their request, till by some public act they put their sincerity out of question, and fix the concurrence of all the troops beyond a possibility of retracting. Upon this Uliades the Samian and Antagoras of Chios, having agreed together, ran foul of Pausanias's galley as she rode at the head of the fleet before Byzantium, and upon his threatening to make them know they had not affronted him, but his country, they not only slighted his menaces, but also told him in answer, that the best thing he could do was to retire and thank fortune for her favours at Platæa, for that nothing but the regard they had for that great action restrained the Greeks from resenting and revenging the ill treatment they had received at his hands. Thus the Lacedæmonians lost that pre-eminence which they had hitherto maintained, and the supreme command was transferred to the Athenians [d].

[c] Plutarch. in vit. Themiſt. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

Aristides taxes all Greece by common consent.

THE conduct of Aristides derived yet greater honour and advantage to his country; the states of Greece saw very clearly, that it was necessary for them to be always on [d] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. c. 6. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Aristid.

on their guard againſt the Perſians, and they had already learned, that war was not be made without money; they therefore inferred, that a ſtanding fund would be convenient for the maintainance of that force which it behoved them to keep on foot; but then the ſettling the proportions of this fund, according to the abilities of the ſeveral ſtates, ſeemed to be a difficult thing. Under this dilemma all Greece caſt her eyes on Ariſtides, they demanded him of the Athenians as the only perſon who could be intruſted with ſuch a plenitude of power. He executed his commiſſion in ſuch a manner, that his taxation was unanimouſly ſtiled, The happy lot of Greece, all its ſtates being perfectly well ſatisfied with the ſums he allotted them to pay. The groſs account of this tax was four hundred and ſixty talents. When he had finiſhed this buſineſs, he obliged all the people of Greece to ſwear to the obſervation of all the articles of their grand alliance, himſelf taking the oath in the name of the Athenians, throwing at the ſame time pieces of red-hot iron into the ſea, when he pronounced curſes againſt all ſuch as ſhould violate any article of the alliance they ſwore to. Afterwards indeed, when neceſſity compelled the Athenians to act a little againſt the letter of that treaty, Ariſtides adviſed them to transfer the curſes on him, adding, that he would willingly bear the puniſhments of their perjury, rather than behold them fall upon the ſtate. Themiſtocles ſaw with great concern the mighty honours heaped upon his rival, and, in order to leſſen his reputation, he was pleaſed to ſay in a public aſſembly, that the praiſes beſtowed on Ariſtides were not praiſes worthy of a man, but of a money-cheſt, which ſafely keeps what is depoſited therein. But this did not avenge him of an obſervation which Ariſtides had made on a former ſpeech of his, wherein he declared, that he thought it the greateſt excellency in a general to penetrate the deſigns of his enemy; to which Ariſtides replied, that it was indeed a moſt neceſſary qualification, but that there was another equally illuſtrious, which was to have clean hands, and not to be a ſlave to money. Thus when the Athenians were free from foreign wars and from any contentions with their confederates, they were continually employed in domeſtic quarrels; the diſſentions of eminent men were never failing to raiſe diſturbances among their fellow citizens. An obſervation which we ſhall content ourſelves with making here once for all, though the verification thereof thereof will occur to our readers in almoſt every page of the Athenian hiſtory [c].

THE Lacedæmonians, though at firſt they made a ſemblance of ſubmitting to the pleaſure of the Greeks, who transferred the pre-eminence with reſpect to maritime affairs from Sparta to Athens, yet in a ſhort time they began to look on this as a mighty diminution of their authority; and they were the more concerned at it, becauſe it was reported among them, that an oracle had bid them beware, that they enjoyed not half an empire, yet their anger being moderated by the wiſdom of ſome of their citizens, they laid aſide all thoughts of war, and the Athenians, who had proviſionally built ſome ſtout gallies, reaped thereby ſome advantage from their threatenings. There ſeems juſt reaſon to believe, that the Lacedæmonians acted more politically in remaining at peace, than if they had taken arms; for a little after they accuſed Themiſtocles to his countrymen of having conſpired with their king Pauſanias to betray the cauſe of Greece. When this matter came to a hearing, it did indeed appear, that Pauſanias had diſcovered his intrigues to Themiſtocles; but it appeared likewiſe, that Themiſtocles did all in his power to perſuade him to let them fall, ſo that he was acquitted of this accuſation with honour. But the minds of the people being once ſtirred againſt him, as well to gratify their own private reſentment as to make their court to the Spartans, there were enow found to calumniate Themiſtocles. We have already ſhewn ſome of the reaſons which induced the people of Lacedæmon to hate this great man, there remains yet one more, which deſerves the reader's notice, becauſe of all others it exaſperated them moſt. A little after the battle of Platæa, it was propoſed in the council of the Amphictyons, or ſtates-general of Greece, that all ſuch cities as had not fought againſt the Perſians ſhould loſe their right of ſending deputies to that aſſembly. This Themiſtocles oppoſed, for he foreſaw, that if the cities of Thebes, Argos, and many others ſhould loſe their right of ſending repreſentatives to this aſſembly, the Lacedæmonians would rule all; wherefore he repreſented to the members there preſent, that there were but one and thirty cities, and moſt of them very ſmall ones, which had concurred in the war againſt the Perſians, and that if the deputies of thoſe only had ſeſſion in their council, it would undoubtedly undoubtedly come to paſs, that this auguſt ſenate would be entirely under the influence of two or three great cities, which would be at once diſadvantageous and diſhonourable to Greece. Theſe ſuggeſtions of his having deſtroyed the Lacedæmonian ſcheme of empire, the chiefs of that city ever after befriended the rivals of Themiſtocles, and ſought to bring him into odium with the Athenians. Timocreon the Rhodian, who was a famous poet in thoſe times, wrote libels againſt Themiſtocles and Ariſtides, and Cimon promoted exceedingly that ſpirit of jealouſy which began to ſpring up againſt him. Themiſtocles himſelf gave them a handle, by erecting near his own houſe a temple which he dedicated to Diana, the giver of the beſt counſel; intimating, that himſelf had given the beſt counſel both for the ſafety of Athens and Greece. The end of theſe diſputes was, that the Athenians by the oſtraciſm baniſhed Themiſtocles. The Lacedæmonians, not ſatisfied with this, accuſed him afreſh of having been concerned in Pauſanias's conſpiracy, which obliged that great man to fly from one place to another, and at laſt to take ſhelter in the court of Admetus king of the Moloſſians; but the Spartans ſending embaſſadors thither to threaten that king with the Greeks making war upon him by a confederacy, he furniſhed Themiſtocles with money to make his eſcape into Aſia, where learning not only the Perſians manners, but the language alſo, he raiſed himſelf to greater favour with Artaxerxes, than any of the native Perſians, ſo that in time he beſtowed on him a Perſian wife, a large eſtate, and great privileges, which deſcended to his poſterity, inſomuch, that Plutarch affirms, that he knew one of them, whoſe name was alſo Themiſtocles, who lived at Magneſia in full poſſeſſion of them, above five hundred years after the ingratitude of the Athenians ſent this excellent perſon to receive his bread from ſtrangers, and to make known to Perſia thoſe virtues of which Greece was no longer worthy [f] (A).

Themiſtocles baniſhed Athens, and driven out of Greece.

[c] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Ariſtid.

THE

[f] Corn. Nepos. in vit. Themiſt. Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xi. c. 12. Plut. in vit. Themiſt.

(A) As far as the affairs of Themiſtocles were mingled with thoſe of the ſtate of Athens, we have followed his various fortunes in the text; but now, when they are no longer connected, we think it neceſſary to throw together ſome memoirs of the latter part of this great man's life in a note. It does not appear, that Themiſtocles

THE popular party in Athens carried all things before them, after Themistocles was banished; and such a number of false

Themistocles when banish'd had any design either to revenge himself on Athens, or to take refuge in the court of the king of Persia. The Greeks themselves forced him upon this, or rather the Lacedæmonians; for as by their intrigues his countrymen were induced to banish him, so by their procurement, after he was banished, he was never suffered to remain in quiet, let him take refuge where he would. His journey into Persia, if we may believe Plutarch, was very dangerous; the great king having promised by proclamation two hundred talents for apprehending him. Nicogenes the Æolian found means to convey him to court in safety, for having put him into a close litter he caused the servants who attended him to give out, that they carried a young Grecian lady out of Ionia to a nobleman attending on the king's person; thus he arrived safely at the court of Artaxerxes, where he addressed himself to Artabanus, and informed him that he was a Grecian, who desired to be admitted to an audience of the king, which Artabanus having promised, demanded whom they should say he was; for you seem, said he, to be no ordinary person. Themistocles answered, no man must be informed of this before the king himself. When admitted to the royal presence, and commanded to declare who he was, he spoke thus: "I am Themistocles the Athenian, banished and "persecuted by the Greeks; I fly to thee for refuge, mighty "monarch: The evils I have done to the Persians are easily to be "forgiven, in consideration of the many atchievments performed "for them when I hindered the Grecians from pursuing the Medes "after the fatal battles of Salamis and Platæa; when having "freed my country, and placed the Greeks in safety, my ambi-"tion led me on to greater enterprizes; in which being suc-"cessful, I gratified the far-extended Persian empire, and per-"formed services acceptable to the greatest prince on earth: "Since which all things having conspired to augment my present "calamities, suitable to such a condition, I come hither hoping "to receive mercy from a gracious reconciled emperor, who hath "laid aside his anger, and is no longer mindful of former evils; "humbly imploring you, that taking the Greeks for witnesses of "the services I have done for Persia, you will make use of this "occasion to shew the world the nobleness of your virtue, rather "than the greatness of your resentment. Hereby you will pre-"serve an humble suppliant, if otherwise, you destroy a servant "of the Persians, and a public enemy of the Greeks (77)".

Thucydides mentions a letter sent by Themistocles to Artaxerxes, differing (77) de Bello Pelop. lib. i.

falſe witneſſes aroſe, that thoſe who were moſt concerned in that affair were in danger of repenting of it. Ariſtides alone, differing very little from this ſpeech, attributed to him by Plutarch. Cornelius Nepos hath copied this letter from Thucydides; and all agree, that the Perſian monarch received him with great kindneſs. Plutarch ſays, that he was ſo well pleaſed with him, that he cried out thrice, the night of his audience, in his ſleep, I have Themiſtocles the Athenian (78). The next morning the king ſent for him again, and as ſoon as the firſt compliments were over, ſaid, 'I am in your debt two hundred talents, for ſo 'much I promiſed to him who brought Themiſtocles;' he likewiſe promiſed him far greater favours, and deſired he would ſpeak his mind freely of the affairs of Greece. Themiſtocles anſwered by his interpreter, 'That diſcourſe, like a Perſian carpet, 'had in it a variety of figures, which never appeared to advan-'tage, but when it was thoroughly unfolded, and was ſcarce to 'be apprehended when wrapt together in the piece;' he therefore deſired that he might have time to learn the Perſian language, which would enable him to diſcloſe his own ideas without the help of another. This anſwer of Themiſtocles is a noble proof of his extenſive genius, it was entirely in the oriental taſte, the ſentiment great, and the figure expreſſive; he delivered himſelf like a native Perſian the very firſt day that he appeared in the court of Perſia; the king readily granted him a year for the purpoſe he intended. At the end of that ſpace he appeared frequently at court, Themiſtocles being in a ſhort time ſo great a favourite, that it became afterwards a proverb, and the Perſian kings were wont to promiſe any Greek whom they ſought to bring over to their intereſt, 'That he ſhould live 'with them as Themiſtocles did with Artaxerxes.' He was alſo in favour with the queen-mother, became a convert to the Perſian religion, and was inſtructed therein by the magi. He had three cities beſtowed upon him, which, alluding to their ſituation, the king of Perſia ſaid in pleaſantry, that they ſhould ſerve to provide him bread, wine, and meat; theſe cities were Magneſia, Myon, and Lampſacus; the firſt brought him in a yearly revenue of fifty talents, and the laſt had in its neighbourhood the nobleſt vineyards in the eaſt. Themiſtocles fixed his reſidence at Magneſia, where he liv'd with all the ſplendor of a Perſian grandee, inſomuch, that he ſaid one day at table to his children, 'We had been undone, my little ones, if we had not been 'undone.' He was ſo far from expreſſing any hatred againſt his ungrateful country, that Plutarch aſſures us the tenderneſs he retained alone, when things came to extremity, ſhewed himſelf more a friend to virtue, than an enemy to Themiſtocles; he refuſed to join with Alcmæon and Cimon in proſecuting him capitally, and was ſo far from inſulting him in his misfortunes, that he ſpoke of him with greater reſpect than ever. The war with Perſia was not yet let fall, the Greeks found that great advantage accrued to them from carrying it on, eſpecially the Athenians, who, by means of their great force at ſea, were continually enriching themſelves, at the expence of ſome or other of the Perſian emperor's ſubjects. They therefore deviſed various reaſons for ſending fleets to ſea, though the real intent retained for it had like to have coſt him his life; for ſeeing at Sardis a brazen ſtatue of a virgin which he had ſet up in Athens, when he was ſurveyor of the aqueducts, he attempted to perſuade the governor of Lydia to ſend it back to Athens; who, far from giving into his opinion, fell into a great paſſion, and threatened to inform the emperor, ſo that Themiſtocles, in order to extricate himſelf from danger, was forced to make large preſents to his woman. Authors differ exceedingly as to the manner in which this noble Athenian died. Plutarch ſays, that being preſſed by the king of Perſia to undertake an expedition againſt Greece, he made a ſolemn ſacrifice, at which having kindly entertained his friends, he drank a porringer of bull's blood, and ſo put an end to his life. Thucydides, who was cotemporary with Themiſtocles, ſpeaks very doubtfully of this buſineſs; 'He died, ſays 'he, of a diſtemper, but ſome report that he poiſoned himſelf, 'ſeeing it impoſſible to accompliſh what he had promiſed the 'king.' He was ſixty-ſix years old at his death; he was honoured with a ſtately tomb at Magneſia, but his bones by his own command, were privately carried back into Attica and buried there. Some ſay, that the Athenians, repenting afterwards of their ill uſage of this great man, honoured him with a tomb in the Pyræum. And Plutarch in ſupport of this quotes the following verſes from Plato the comedian:

(78) Plut. in vit. Themiſt.

Thy tomb is juſtly raiſed upon the ſtrand,
Where from all parts admiring ſtrangers land;
In that fair port by thy great genius made
The ſeat of empire, liberty, and trade:
So that thy aſhes on this famous ſhore,
Both ſea and land may honour and adore (79).

(79) Plut. ubi ſupra. Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Themiſt.

tent was to aggrandize and enrich themselves, by the skill and valour of their troops and their commanders. With this view, in the latter end of the seventy-seventh olympiad, they equipped a navy for the relief of such of the Grecian cities in Asia as were under subjection to the great king. This expedition was pleasing to the Athenians, and no less grateful to the Greeks in general, since it seemed to be for the advantage of others, though they had in truth no less regard to their own [g].

Cimon establishes the Athenian greatness.

CIMON, the son of Miltiades by the daughter of the king of Thrace, was unanimously chosen admiral and commander in chief on this occasion: He will make a great figure in the succeeding part of this history, and therefore it is necessary that we should give the reader his character here. Cimon's abilities were fair and solid, yet less so than his virtues; his father had distinguished himself by the firmness of his courage, Themistocles by the strength of his judgment, Aristides by his probity, Cimon was equal to them all; his distinguishing perfection was an openness of temper, which made him above deceiving, the only stain on Themistocles's character; and an inflexible honesty, which raised his reputation above his father's. It was this Cimon whom the merciful Athenians put in chains for his father's fine, and for whose release his sister gave up her charms to Callias, remarkable only for being at the same time worthless, and worth money. In his youth Cimon did not promise much, he was little inclined to learning, which in an Athenian was a strange thing; he was much addicted to magnificence and the love of women, which were also thought blemishes in a young nobleman like him; but of a sudden he gave his citizens to understand, that the greatest virtues are not the soonest seen; for, when on the first news of the Persian invasion, Themistocles advised the Athenians to quit their city, and go on board their gallies, and was thereupon universally decried, Cimon went immediately to the temple of Minerva, and offered up a bridle, to signify that horsemen were no longer of use, but that they ought to trust to their ships; after which he went chearfully about taking down his goods, and carried them on board the fleet. Aristides, observing the integrity of this young man, took great care to train him up to business, that his candour might balance the craft of of Themiſtocles, in which he ſucceeded very happily; for Cimon only of all the Athenian generals was always beloved, and never ſuſpected [h]. In this expedition he took the city of Eion from the Perſians, but with little advantage to the Athenians, becauſe Butes, who commanded in that city for the Perſian king, ſet fire to the place, and burnt himſelf, his gariſon, and all the riches that were therein; however Cimon ſettled colonies in that neighbourhood after revenging himſelf on the Thracians, who had aſſiſted the Perſians in Ionia with proviſions. He afterwards reduced the iſland of Scyros, from whence he brought the bones of Theſeus, which were honourably interred at Athens (B). After this he returned to Athens, and

[g] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra.

[h] Plut. in vit. Cimonis. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejuſd.

(B) This note hath the ſame ſubject with the laſt; we are to ſpeak of the honours paid by the Athenians to the aſhes of a great man, whom they treated ill when living, and ſent to beg his bread; this was no leſs a perſon than Theſeus, to whom in a great meaſure they owed their being a people. The oracle, in the latter end of the ſeventy-fifth, or beginning of the ſeventy-ſixth, olympiad, commanded the Athenians to bring home the aſhes of this prince. When therefore Cimon made himſelf maſter of the iſle of Scyros, he ſought with great diligence for the tomb of Theſeus; but being able to find no ſuch thing, he inquired of the people of the iſland, who either could not or would not give him any intelligence; at laſt obſerving an eagle upon a riſing ground pecking it with her bill, and tearing up the earth with her talons, it came into his head to dig there. This being done, there was found a coffin of a man of more than ordinary ſize, the brazen head of a launce, and a ſword lying by him, all which he took on board his galley, and brought them with him to Athens. The Athenians, tranſported with joy, went out to meet and receive the reliques of this great man with all the pomp imaginable. They interred them in the middle of the city, and made his tomb an aſylum or ſanctuary for ſlaves and people of mean condition, who fled from the perſecution of men in power, becauſe in his life-time he had been a protector of the diſtreſſed, and above all things delighted in doing the injured juſtice. They likewiſe ſacrificed ſolemnly to him on the 8th of October, becauſe he was reported to have returned from his Cretan expedition on that day. Thus the Athenians, who injured Theſeus living, revered him dead (80)!

(80) Plut. in vit. Theſ.

Year after the deluge 2531. Before Christ 468.

and having increaſed his fleet to three hundred ſail, he ſteered for the coaſt of Caria, and having performed great things there, he ſailed for Cyprus, where he was informed the Perſian fleet lay at anchor. He found them at the mouth of the river Eurymedon, their land army, which was very numerous, being encamped not far off. Cimon, though the fleet was much ſtronger than his, attacked it, and after a very obſtinate engagement gained a complete victory, taking one hundred ſhips, their crews abandoning them to ſeek refuge on ſhore. Unſatisfied with this, he debarqued his forces, and attacked their land-army; the Perſians fought better than ever they had done, and yet after a very long and bloody battle the Athenians prevailed, and not only routed the Perſians, but poſſeſſed themſelves of their camp with all the riches contained therein; thus in one day he gained two important victories, one at ſea the other at land, equal to thoſe of Salamis and Platæa [i]. Plutarch ſays, that he afterwards made himſelf maſter of eighty Phœnician veſſels which lay in a port of Cyprus, and were intended to ſtrengthen that navy which Cimon had deſtroyed. However it was, he gained ſuch an immenſe booty, that the Athenians were enabled thereby to build the ſouth wall of the citadel, and to lay the foundation of thoſe far extended walls which united the port to the city, and which being built in a mooriſh ground, they were firſt of all forced to ſink great ſtones, that they might have whereon to erect a ſuperſtructure, beſides various other things for the accommodation of the citizens, and beſides what Cimon himſelf did out of his proportion of the ſpoils, which were very great; for he adorned the forum with palm-trees, and beautified the academy with delightful walks and pleaſant fountains. The wealth of Cimon, as it enabled him to do many things for the public, ſo it likewiſe put it in his power to live in his private capacity with that magnificence which he ſo much affected; he therefore demoliſhed the incloſures about his grounds and gardens, and permitted every body to enter and take what fruits they pleaſed; he likewiſe kept an open table, where not only the rich found delicacies, but the pooreſt Athenians eat of them freely. When he went abroad he was conſtantly attended by a train of young gentlemen extremely well dreſſed, and whoſe pockets were well well furniſhed with money. But if by chance he met any ancient citizen in a tattered ſuit, he made ſome of his domeſtics change cloaths with him; or if the quality of the perſon rendered that kindneſs unſuitable, he took a ſum of money from one of his attendants, and conveyed it into the pocket of the diſtreſſed perſon privately. Thus, as one of the ancients ſaid of him very juſtly, he gained riches that he might uſe them, and uſed them ſo as to get credit. Yet he was far from doing theſe things from a deſire of becoming popular; on the contrary he ſided always with the nobility, and oppoſed openly ſuch as ſought to make their court to the people, by putting all things into their power. The riches which his victories poûred into Athens, brought along with them their conſtant attendant corruption; but though the tide was ſtrong, yet Ariſtides, in the midſt of a voluntary poverty, and Cimon, who lived with the greateſt magnificence, eſcaped it, and were never taxed with partiality, or being under the influence of money [k].

[i] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

The Thaſians revolt, and are reduced by Cimon.

THE affairs of Athens were now in ſuch a proſperous condition, that they would not ſuffer any thing to be tranſacted to their prejudice without revenging it. The Perſians having invaded the Cherſoneſus, and by the help of the Thracians made themſelves intirely maſters of it, Cimon was ſent thither in a great hurry; he had with him but four ſhips, ſo that the Barbarians and their allies looked upon this as a very raſh attempt; however, Cimon, falling upon them ſuddenly, took thirteen of their gallies, and afterwards reduced all Cherſoneſus under the Athenian power, after which he went againſt the Thaſians, who, revolting from the Athenians, had made themſelves maſters of the gold mines, which lie between the rivers Nyſſus and Strymon, which tempted the Athenians to fall upon them. But before we enter into the event of this war, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that Cimon put the Athenians into a method of becoming irreſiſtible at ſea, and of ſaving their neighbours, not at their own expence, but at the expence of thoſe they awed. It was thus: Many of the Greek ſtates, who, by the treaty concluded with Ariſtides, were bound to furniſh men and gallies, as well as to pay the tax for their ſupport, when they ſaw themſelves out of danger from the Barbarians, were very [k] Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

unwilling to furniſh their quota of men and ſhips; this moſt of the Athenian generals diſliking, would have compelled them by high fines to remedy; but Cimon took a contrary courſe, he permitted ſuch as were deſirous of ſtaying at home to remain there, and took a certain ſum in lieu of a galley completely manned. By this means he inured the Athenians, whom he took on board his gallies, both to hardſhip and diſcipline, while the allies, who choſe to excuſe themſelves in this manner, were enervated through idleneſs, and ſo from confederates dwindled by degrees into tributaries, and almoſt ſlaves. The people of Thaſus, perceiving this, thought to have ſhaken off the Athenian yoke; but Cimon proved too many for them, though the Thraſians behaved very bravely; for having firſt ſuſtained a great loſs at ſea, they afterwards ſhut themſelves up in their city, and made a very obſtinate defence; while in the mean time they ſent privately to the Lacedæmonians, and endeavoured to ſtir them up to make war with the Athenians; but their affairs not permitting them to comply with their requeſt, the Thaſians were obliged at laſt to ſubmit; and ſo the gold mines, about which this war was commenced, fell into the power of the Athenians, who ſent a great colony to Amphipolis a city of Thrace, which for a time made a great figure, but afterwards attempting to penetrate into the country of the Edones, a great part of them were deſtroyed. In the laſt year of the ſeventy-ſeventh olympiad, the Lacedæmonians finding themſelves extremely vexed by their Helotes, who were revolted from them, and were ſupported by the Meſſenians and ſome other of their neighbours, ſent to demand aid from Athens, which produced very great diſputes there; Ephialtes, a great orator, who was at the head of the popular party, oppoſed the motion for ſending, as the Spartans deſired, an army to their aſſiſtance. Cimon, who favoured the nobility, and who was a great friend to the Lacedæmonians, by whoſe intereſt he had been ſupported againſt Themiſtocles, earneſtly preſſed the Athenians to lay hold of this opportunity of ſhewing their virtue and magnanimity, by ſuccouring their companion, who was the other eye of Greece. Ephialtes ſought to bring the people into his opinion, by ſhewing that Sparta had always been, and from the nature of her conſtitution would always be, an enemy to Athens, and therefore ought not to be ſuccoured now, when the enemies her pride had excited were about to lay her low. The Athenians, however, liſtened rather to Cimon than to his adverſary, and, full of a generous concern for Greece, ſent that fortunate general at the head of a great army to the aſſiſtance of Lacedæmon, which ſervice he very willingly performed, and returned from thence with great honour; ſome time after, the Lacedæmonians, being engaged in the ſiege of Ithome, ſent again to the Athenians for ſuccour, and were again relieved, Cimon marching with a numerous body of troops to their aſſiſtance; but the Spartans, finding that their other confederates had ſent troops ſufficient to enable them to make an end of the war ſucceſsfully, diſmiſſed the Athenian ſuccours, as being either afraid of them, or caring leaſt to be obliged by them. This grievouſly offended the people of Athens, who thenceforward not only hated the Lacedæmonians, but all of their own citizens, who were reputed to be friends to that ſtate [l].

were

The Athenians make war on Ægina, and ſend a fleet into Egypt.

THE Athenians engaged themſelves in two new wars, one againſt the inhabitants of Ægina, who, having been always free, bore very ill thoſe acts of ſovereignty which the Athenians exerciſed over them, as well as the reſt of their allies; the ſecond was againſt the great king in Egypt, which now revolted from him, and ſet up one Inarus for king. The fleet which the Athenians ſent hither performed wonders; for they enabled the Egyptians to beat the Perſians in the field, and to ſubdue two diſtricts of the great city of Memphis; but the third, which was called the white, they could not reduce, the Perſians, who retreated thither, having carried with them a vaſt quantity of proviſions and ammunition, which enabled them to hold out a ſiege of three years; but, this affair being already exactly related in our account of the Perſian monarchy, we need ſay no more of it here, than that it ended not much to the credit or advantage of the Athenians [m].

State of the factions in Athens at this time.

THEIR great buſineſs abroad did not ſo much take up the time of the people of Athens, but that they continued as much divided as ever at home; the popular party were continually making efforts againſt thoſe ſmall remains of power which were yet in the hands of the nobility; they had at their head two very great and famous men, Pericles

[l] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Cimon. Corn. Nepos vit. ejuſd. Thucyd. lib. i. [m] Univerſal Hiſtory, vol. v. p. 157.

and Ephialtes; the former of theſe was the ſon of Xanthippus, the famous Athenian captain who won the battle of Mycale, by Agariſte the niece of the celebrated Clyſthenes, who had ſo great a hand in expelling the Piſiſtratidæ. He ſtudied under Damon and Anaxagoras; from the former he learned politics, though he pretended to teach him muſic, and from the latter natural philoſophy and the art of ſpeaking. He had prodigious talents, and above all an eloquence ſuperior to that of any of his cotemporaries; but he was obliged to conceal theſe ſhining qualifications, becauſe the Athenians had taken it in their heads that he reſembled Piſiſtratus very much in his face, and ſtill more in his eloquence, which was ſo nervous and elevated, that it procured him afterwards the ſurname of Olympius. Notwithſtanding therefore that he was of a great family, had a good eſtate, and many relations who filled the firſt poſts in the commonwealth, yet he not only declined ſtanding for public employments, but even ſpeaking or appearing in public, that he might not draw upon himſelf the envy of the great, or become formidable to the people. But when Ariſtides was dead, Themiſtocles in baniſhment, and Cimon, generally ſpeaking, employed in foreign affairs, Pericles began to apply himſelf ſtrictly to public buſineſs, but in a manner very different from that in which hitherto the great men of Athens had acted; for, inſtead of courting the rich and the great, he applied himſelf wholly to the lower ſort of people, notwithſtanding that it was contrary to his natural diſpoſition, which by no means inclined him to a plauſible inſinuating behaviour. The reaſon was, that there appeared no other method than this, by which he could poſſibly attain to that eminence and ſuperiority which he affected. Cimon, by the greatneſs of his birth, the luſtre of his actions, and the largeneſs of his eſtate had placed himſelf at the head of the nobility, and was by them conſidered as their chief, being revered for his magnanimity, as he was beloved for his generoſity and condeſcenſion. The multitude therefore were the ſole reſource of Pericles, who, as he was a great and deep politician, foreſaw exactly the dangers he muſt be expoſed to in conſequence of his making court to them. To avoid theſe, he practiſed a behaviour equally ſingular and extraordinary; he left off all company, he neither received or paid viſits, and but once in all his adminiſtration was preſent at a feaſt, and then he went away early. When he went abroad, it was either to the Prytaneum or aſſembly; he preſerved an unſhaken gravity in his his look, his geſtures, and his ſpeech, and always prayed, before he delivered an oration, that nothing might ſlip from him diſpleaſing to the people. With all theſe abilities he perceived it impracticable to carry his point, unleſs he could be as liberal as Cimon, to whom though his will was equal, yet his fortune fell ſhort; but he overcame this difficulty by making bold with the public money, and doing what all artful politicians have done ſince, obliging the people at their own expence. He encreaſed the ſalaries given to ſuch of the Athenian citizens as ſat in courts of juſtice, the money given to the poor citizens for attending at aſſemblies, and to enable them to pay for ſeats in theatres [n] (C).

[n] Plutarch. in vit. Periclis.

(C) The reader might be juſtly offended, if we had ſuffered Ariſtides's ſubſequent fortunes to have ſlipped without notice. We have already marked his public character, his notions of government, and the ſhare he had, like the reſt of the great men of Athens, in the favour and in the hate of his countrymen. In this note therefore we will draw together ſuch ſcattered paſſages in relation to this great man, as the courſe of the hiſtory did not permit us to take notice of in the text. Plutarch tells us, that one Ariſto, an hiſtorian of Chios, or, as M. Dacier will have it, of Ceos, ſaid, that the contention between Ariſtides and Themiſtocles took riſe from their being both enamoured of Steſileus of the iſland of Ceos, the moſt beautiful youth of his time, in which if there be any truth, it is an inconteſtable argument, that the morality of the Greeks was far from being pure or perfect, ſince Ariſtides, who valued himſelf ſo much on his probity, could perſiſt in ſo baſe and unnatural a vice. What a high eſteem all his cotemporaries had of the rigid virtue of Ariſtides, is better known to us from an accident, than from all the laboured panegyrics of the writers of hiſtory. It happened, that Ariſtides was preſent the firſt time that Eſchylus's tragedy was played, which has this title, The ſiege of Thebes by the ſeven captains. A courier being therein introduced, relating to Eteocles the name and qualities of thoſe that commanded, thus deſcribes the genius and temper of Amphiaraus.

> He aims at real worth without the ſhow,
> Reaping thoſe fruits which in his rich mind grow;
> Whence ſage advice and noble actions flow.

As ſoon as theſe words were out of the actor's mouth, the whole audience turned their eyes upon Ariſtides, to ſhew that in their opinion this was his character alſo. He was appointed treaſurer, of Athens, and executed that office with great integrity; but inaſmuch

INASMUCH as Pericles never pretended to any of the great offices of the commonwealth, he could not of conſequence be choſen aſmuch as he had expoſed ſome of Themiſtocles's frauds, that artful politician accuſed him of miſapplying public money, and though nothing was falſer than this charge, got him condemned. But, the court of Areopagus interpoſing, his fine was remitted, and he choſen treaſurer for the next year, when he ſuffered all the collectors and under-officers to act as they thought fit, who thereupon extolled him to the ſkies, and, when the end of the year came, would have perſuaded the people to chuſe him a third time, when Ariſtides, riſing up, addreſſed himſelf to the aſſembly in theſe words: "When I diſcharged my office with care, and ma" naged your treaſure faithfully and like an honeſt man, I was re-

" viled and evil ſpoken of; but now when I have taken no care
" at all, but left it to the diſcretion of theſe public robbers, I am,
" it ſeems, an admirable treaſurer, and a moſt excellent patriot;
" I therefore declare to you, that I am more aſhamed of the ho" nour done to me this day, than of the ſentence paſſed upon me
" laſt year; and with indignation and concern I ſee, it is more
" meritorious with you to oblige ill men, than to deſerve well of " the commonwealth". The day before the battle of Platæa, a conſpiracy being diſcovered among the Athenians to introduce a democracy, Ariſtides, who commanded, would not ſuffer it to be looked minutely into, for fear it ſhould occaſion ſome ſedition in the camp; but contented himſelf with telling ſuch as were ſuſpected, that the battle would be the tribunal in which they might juſtify themſelves, and ſhew how much they were friends to their country. It is certain, that in this battle Ariſtides proved himſelf to be as great a general as he was a ſtateſman, and gave as noble teſtimonies of his valour as he had ever done of prudence and juſtice; he lived but four years after Themiſtocles was baniſhed, and notwithſtanding he had exerciſed the greateſt offices in the commonwealth, yet he was ſo poor that he was unable to make a figure himſelf, or to leave any thing to his children, except the honour of being deſcended from ſuch a father, which procured them a maintenance from the public; we will inſtance but one thing more in relation to Ariſtides, which reſpects at once his poverty and virtue, and ſo conclude. His couſin Callias the torch-bearer being under a proſecution, the orator who ſpoke againſt him obſerved, that though he was immenſely rich, he ſuffered his couſin Ariſtides to labour under the deepeſt neceſſity. Callias, perceiving that this made more impreſſion on his judges than the crime for which he was accuſed, ſummoned Ariſtides, who owned, that Callias had often preſſed him to accept money, and that he had as often anſwered, It better becomes Ariſtides to make a ſhew of his poverty, than Callias of his wealth; for many people make

choſen a member of the court of Areopagus, whence it came to paſs, that he diſtaſted their authority, becauſe he knew they could not be well pleaſed with his endeavouring to transfer all things to the general aſſembly, where by dint of his eloquence he governed all. But fearing to draw upon himſelf the diſpleaſure of the moſt venerable council among the Athenians, he encouraged Ephialtes his intimate friend to ſtir up the people againſt the Areopagites, and to make them believe, that this tribunal was the greateſt curb upon them, and the only bar to that extenſive liberty which their friends wiſhed to put into the hands of the commons of Athens; thus with great policy he laid the foundation of his own greatneſs in that of the people, but at the expence of the ancient conſtitution and of the ſafety of the ſtate, as the courſe of this hiſtory will ſhew °.

When things were in this ſituation, it was thought expedient by the popular party to attempt the deſtruction of Cimon. In order to this a proſecution was commenced againſt him for treaſon againſt the ſtate; this treaſon was pretended to conſiſt in receiving preſents or other gratifications from the Macedonians, whereby he was prevailed on to let ſlip the manifeſt opportunity he had to enlarge his conqueſts, after he had taken from the Perſians the gold mines in Thrace. Cimon made a defence ſuitable to his character, he ſaid, that he had proſecuted to the utmoſt of his power the war againſt the Thracians and other enemies to the ſtate of Athens; but that it was true, he had not made any inroads into Macedonia, becauſe he did not conceive that he was to act as a public enemy to mankind, and becauſe he was ſtruck with reſpect for a nation modeſt in their carriage, juſt in their dealings, and ſtrictly honourable in their behaviour towards him and the Athenians; that if his countrymen looked upon this as a crime, he muſt abide their judgment, but could never be brought to think that his conduct was amiſs. Elpinice his ſiſter engaged herſelf warmly in his behalf, ſoliciting all ſuch as ſhe thought might make a bad uſe of their riches, whereas there is ſcarce one to be found who bears poverty with an equal mind. He died in the ſecond year of the LXXVIIIth olympiad, 467 years before Chriſt (81).

° Plutarch. ubi ſupra. & in vit. Cimonis. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi.

(81) Plutarch. in vit. Ariſtid. Corn. Nepos. in vit. ejuſdem. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. 1. Juſt. lib. ii. c. 15. Senec. de Benefic.

might either influence the people, or any other way either prejudice or benefit her brother; amongst the rest she addressed herself to Pericles, who was one of the persons appointed by the people to accuse Cimon at his trial. Pericles heard all she had to say patiently, and then answered with a smile, You are a little too old, madam, to be employed in such affairs as these. Pericles was noted for gallantry, and, in all probability, he let fall this expression to take off all suspicion that Elpinice had any impression upon him; for it was observed, that when the trial came on, Pericles spoke but once, and then not only treated Cimon with great respect, but touched the business of which he was accused so lightly, that he seemed to have no opinion of his guilt; and when he had done speaking he withdrew; the consequence of this was, that Cimon escaped capital punishment, though he was banished by the ostracism, which cured his rivals of envy, and took away all apprehensions from the people [p].

The disposition of the Athenians appearing now to be extremely favourable to those who inclined to the commons more than the nobility, Ephialtes took this opportunity to humble the court of Areopagus, which he did by a decree, whereby most of the causes which had been cognizable by them were transferred elsewhere; and this the wisest of the Athenians have looked upon as the first step to their ruin, for it gave the people such a dangerous notion of liberty, as rendered them ever afterwards ungovernable; however, Ephialtes did not triumph long, for a little while afterwards he was assassinated in the streets by Aristodicus a Tanagrian, as Aristotle reports, induced thereto by the nobility, though Idomenes of Lampsacus, an author quoted by Plutarch, ascribes his murder to Pericles, who, when he had served his purposes, thought it best to have him out of the way [q].

A war breaking out between the Corinthians and Epidaurians on the one side, and the Athenians on the other, the former were twice routed by the latter; after which the Athenians conceiving, that the inhabitants of Ægina had some way or other been helpful to their enemies, sent Leocrates their admiral at the head of a great fleet to punish that island, which had always been troublesome to the Athenians. The inhabitants of Ægina, vainly trusting ing to their ſkill in maritime affairs, ventured with a ſmall fleet, made up for the moſt part of new-built ſhips, to hazard a battle with the Athenians, in which, however, they ſuffered dearly for their raſhneſs, being totally defeated with the loſs of ſeventy ſhips, ſo that they were conſtrained to ſubmit themſelves to the Athenians, and to purchaſe peace at the expence of honour and independence [r].

[p] Plut. in vit. Cim. & Peric. Corn. Nepos. [q] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Periclis.

THE ſtates of Peloponneſus, looking all with jealous eyes on the growing greatneſs of the Athenians, watched every opportunity of making war upon her, when ſhe was engaged in troubleſome affairs, and ſeemed to be leſs able to reſiſt them. On this account the Corinthians attacked the Megarians, whom they knew to be the allies of Athens, while the Athenians upon ſome freſh provocation were laying ſiege to Ægina; but this warlike people, far from being frighted at the number of their enemies, ſent Myronides their general, at the head of a conſiderable army, to the aſſiſtance of their allies, without deſiſting in the mean time from any of their former enterprizes. Myronides behaved ſo well, that after ſeveral engagements the Corinthians were glad to return, ſo that this attempt to check the Athenian power ſerved, as many others had done, only to increaſe it [s].

THE Lacedæmonians having ſent a great army, compoſed of their own troops and thoſe of our allies, to the aſſiſtance of the Dorians againſt the Phocians, the Athenians reſolved to attack them in their return, having long wiſhed for an opportunity of revenging thoſe inſults which they had received, or which they apprehended they had received, from the Spartans. The Athenians therefore, drawing in the Argives and Theſſalians to be confederates with them, manned out a fleet of fifty ſail, and with them approached the iſthmus, where they landed an army of fourteen thouſand men and took poſſeſſion of the paſſages, ſo that it was impoſſible for the Lacedæmonians to return home without encountering them. The Spartan army commanded by Nicomedes conſiſted of eleven thouſand five hundred men; he did not, however, haſten raſhly to a battle, but turned aſide to Tanagra a city of Bœotia, where ſuch of the Athenians as inclined to an ariſtocracy entered into ſome correſpondence with him. But, before their deſigns ripened, the Athenian army marched with great expedition to Tanagra, nagra, ſo that a battle became inevitable. When the Athenians were diſpoſing themſelves in battalia, Cimon preſented himſelf on a ſudden completely armed, and went to take poſt among the troops of his own tribe. But thoſe of the popular faction, forgetting all reſpect to their country, and minding nothing but their private reſentments, raiſed a great clamour, alledging, that he came with no other view than to put himſelf at the head of his own party in order to aſſiſt the Lacedæmonians; they therefore inſiſted, that the general ſhould not receive him, his time of baniſhment being not near expired; and Cimon being informed of this, rather than make his countrymen uneaſy, voluntarily retired, but before he withdrew, he addreſſed himſelf to Euthippus and the reſt of his friends, who were charged with being in a conſpiracy with him, earneſtly beſeeching them to behave in ſuch a manner as might wipe off the aſperſion, and convince the Athenians, that they had not amongſt them either braver or honeſter men than Cimon and his friends. Euthippus and his companions made him no other anſwer than deſiring him to leave them his armour, ſince their general would not permit him to ſerve at their head, which accordingly he did; the battle proved long and doubtful, for the Theſſalian horſe, deſerting the Athenians at the beginning of the action, added great weight to their enemies; however, the troops of Athens and their confederates fought obſtinately, particularly the little body commanded by Euthippus, which, drawing cloſe together and having Cimon's armour in the midſt of them, charged amongſt the thickeſt of the enemy, and there bravely fighting were all ſlain. In the end, however, the Athenians were routed with a very great loſs. This unfortunate buſineſs was followed ſhortly after by another unlucky accident; a great convoy coming out of Attica, the Theſſalians marched ſuddenly in the night to attack it. The Athenian eſcort, knowing nothing of what had happened at the battle of Tanagra, received the Theſſalians as friends. But they ſuddenly falling upon them, the Athenian guard ſtood on their defence, and made a very gallant reſiſtance, till at laſt their own army came in to their aid, who quickly routed the Theſſalians with great ſlaughter; yet theſe in the end being ſuſtained by the Lacedæmonians, the engagement became again doubtful, till at length both armies being ſufficiently tired, and the night coming on, they made a drawn battle, and concluded a

The Athenians beaten at Tanagra. Year after the Flood, 2541. Year before Chriſt 458.

[r] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. p. 283. [s] Id. ib.

ſhort

ſhort truce, that after ſuch rude encounters both ſides might have time to recruit their forces [t].

THE Thebans, who on account of their having joined Xerxes in his war againſt Greece, had loſt the government of Bœotia, applied themſelves now to the Lacedæmonians, entreating them to aſſiſt their recovery of it, and promiſing to be for ever their faithful allies againſt the Athenians. The Spartans, conceiving this to be a very ſeaſonable propoſal, readily complied with it, and entered into a ſtrict league with the Thebans. By their aſſiſtance Thebes was reſtored to her ancient luſtre, rendered the head of Bœotia, and one of the firſt cities in Greece. The Athenians, however, were ſo much diſpleaſed at the conduct of the Spartans in this matter, that they reſolved to ſend an army into Bœotia to overturn all they had been doing. Myronides the ſon of Callias was choſen general in this expedition, and he appointed a day certain when he would march againſt the enemy; when that day came, many whoſe names were in the muſter-roll did not attend; Myronides, however, began his march, and when many perſuaded him to wait a little, that ſuch as had been negligent might have time to come in, he anſwered roundly, that it did not become a general to wait for ſuch people, ſince it was to be doubted they would behave as ill towards the enemy as they did towards their friends; whereas the troops he had with him in their early appearance in the field had given ſuch a teſtimony of their courage as ſeemed to promiſe victory. The Thebans and their allies, making up a numerous and well-diſciplined army, marched without ſcruple to meet Myronides and his handful of Athenians; but the event did not anſwer their expectation, for after a long and obſtinate engagement Myronides prevailed, gaining a glorious and complete victory. It is indeed ſurpriſing, as Diodorus Siculus long ago remarked, that ancient authors have paſſed over ſo ſlightly this victory of the Athenians, which in ſome ſenſe was more glorious to them than either that of Marathon or Platæa. In both thoſe they fought againſt Barbarians, and were aſſiſted by their allies; in this they were alone, and yet triumphed over a ſuperior army compoſed of the braveſt of the Greeks. The firſt uſe which the Athenian general made of his victory was to march to Tanagra, where the Athenians had been ſo hardly dealt with a few months before; this city he took by ſtorm, and, and, that he might make even the defeats of his country terrible, razed it to the ground. He next plundered all Bœotia, beat an army which its inhabitants drew together, in order to force him to retreat, fell afterwards upon the Locrians, then penetrated into Theſſaly, where having chaſtiſed the inhabitants for their treachery to the Athenians, he returned home laden with riches and glory [u].

[t] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. p. 283. Plutarch. in vit. Cimonis.

THE next year, Tolmides the Athenian admiral, piqued at the great actions of Myronides, prompted the people to give him power to invade Laconia, a thing hitherto unattempted; that they might the more readily come into his project, Tolmides aſked but for a thouſand men, which were readily granted him; but he, well knowing that this was too ſmall a number, found means to quadruple it without breaking the decree; for pretending, that he would chuſe the thouſand men out of the ſtrongeſt and braveſt of the youths of Athens, he privately ſolicited all ſuch to give in their names voluntarily, ſuggeſting, that it would be a ſtain on their honours to be compelled by his choice; and when he had thus drawn three thouſand to give in their names, he then choſe another thouſand by virtue of the decree, and with this body of four thouſand men on board his fleet, which conſiſted of fifty ſail of ſtout gallies, he went on the expedition he had propounded. Arriving at Methon in Laconia, he took it, but the Spartans ſending a ſpeedy ſuccour, he was forced to quit it. However, he had better fortune at Gythium, another ſeaport belonging to the Lacedæmonians, which he took and burnt, with all the ſhipping and naval proviſions that were therein; he likewiſe waſted all the country in its neighbourhood, after which he ſailed for Zacynthus, which he reduced together with all the cities in its neighbourhood. He then ſailed over to Naupactus, which he took by compoſition, and, having ejected the Lacedæmonians, ſettled there a colony of Meſſenians, whom the Athenians had taken under their protection; thus ended this expedition, no leſs to the honour of the Athenians, than thoſe undertaken in former years againſt the Spartans and their allies [x].

ON the very back of this, Pericles was ſent with fifty ſhips and a thouſand ſoldiers to invade Peloponneſus, which he did with great good fortune, burning, ſpoiling, or taking whatever places he attempted; though he had with him, [u] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. p. 285. Thucyd. lib. i. [x] Diodor Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xi.

him, as was before ſaid, but a thouſand men, for the very fame of the Athenians half diſcomfitted their enemies, and the reputation of ſo great a general took away almoſt the power of reſiſtance. On his return to Athens he found the people not a little out of humour, becauſe Cimon remained ſtill in baniſhment; the death of his friends in the battle of Tanagra fully purged this great man of that crime, under pretence of which he had been baniſhed, and therefore we need not wonder, that all Athens looked upon it as an act of juſtice due from their ſtate to recal him. Pericles, conceiving well what would be the conſequence of their compaſſion, immediately took the thing upon himſelf, and drew up an act for his reſtoration, which Cimon took ſo kindly, that he never thwarted him after he came home. The writers of ſcandal among the ancients, for ſome ſuch there always were, as it is to be feared there always will be, have handed it down to poſterity, that this reconciliation between Pericles and Cimon was brought about by Elpinice, who, they ſay, ſtipulated for her brother, that he ſhould be content with commanding abroad, and allow Pericles to be at the head of the adminiſtration at home. However it was, he brought now, as he had ever done before, good fortune to his country, for he concluded a peace between Athens and Sparta, and generouſly preſerved the Greeks from falling upon each other [y].

The Athenians conclude a peace with Perſia. Year after the flood, 2550. Before Chriſt 449.

Cimon, rightly judging that it would be impoſſible for the Athenians to lie ſtill, equipped two hundered gallies with an intent to make a freſh attempt upon Cyprus, that by gaining new booties from the Barbarians, his countrymen might be drawn rather to make war continually on the Perſian king, than to be haraſſing the Lacedæmonians, or oppreſſing their allies. Plutarch ſuggeſts, that he had in view no leſs a conqueſt than that of the whole Perſian empire; part of his fleet he detached to aſſiſt the Athenians in Egypt, with the reſt he remained in the neighbourhood of Cyprus, or, as Diodorus Siculus ſays, made himſelf maſter of Citium and Malus; after which he defeated the Phœnician fleet, beat the Perſian army commanded by Megabyzus, which lay encamped in Cilicia, and after re-embarqued his forces, and returned to Cyprus, where he beſieged the capital city. But the Perſian an monarch, finding no eaſe from theſe Athenians, and no hopes of ſubduing them while commanded by this fortunate general, ſent orders to Artabaſus and Megabyzus his commanders to enter into a treaty of peace, which accordingly they did, and the Athenians having named on their ſide Callias the ſon of Hipponicus their plenipotentiary, the treaty was quickly finiſhed; the principal articles of which were, firſt, that all the Greek cities in Aſia ſhould be free and governed by their own laws; ſecondly, that the Perſians ſhould ſend no army within three days journey of the ſea; thirdly, that no Perſian ſhip of war ſhould ſail between Phaſelis and Cyene, the former a city of Pamphylia the latter of Lycia. Articles moſt glorious for the Greeks, and not a little acceptable to the Perſians, ſince the Athenians on their ſide undertook not to invade any of the provinces of that empire. During this treaty, and as it were in the arms of victory, Cimon died at Citium, whether of ſickneſs, or of a wound he received at the ſiege, authors were not agreed in the time of Plutarch. His death was as honourable as his life, and his laſt act the moſt glorious of it all; for when he found himſelf about to expire, he ſent for the principal commanders, adviſed them to embarque the men, to conceal his diſeaſe, and to ſail home, being afraid that if his death were known at that juncture, it might be prejudicial to his country. Such was the end of the laſt great captain of Athens, the reſt were ſoldiers and heroes too, but not patriots like Cimon; for they, flattering the humours of their countrymen, led them at every turn to fight againſt their brethren, and moſt cruelly employed the wiſdom, power, and wealth of Greece againſt herſelf. Whereas Cimon curbed the vanity of his countrymen, he told them it was lawful to make war and to ſpoil the Perſians, who had deſtroyed their city and carried away all they had: but he diſſuaded them at all times from acting tyrannically towards the Greeks, and vehemently inveighed againſt that propenſity they had to ſacrifice virtue to profit, and honour to power. On ſuch occaſions he was wont to ſay, The Lacedæmonians would not do this; which at laſt provoked his countrymen to baniſh him, to his immortal glory and their ſhame. We could not avoid this eulogium, becauſe we knew that we ſhould no where elſe have occaſion to ſpeak of a man equally admirable for his abilities and his virtues, and for applying them them conſtantly to the ſervice of the public, and not to the aggrandizing of himſelf or his family [z] (D).

[y] Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xi. p. 287. Plut. in vit. Cimonis.

THE

[z] Plut. in vit. Cimon. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Cimon.

(D) The moſt memorable occurences in the life of Cimon, regarding to the Athenian ſtate, have been already taken notice of in our text; and as to his character, his diſpoſition, and abilities, we have been obliged to touch on them alſo more than once; this note therefore will contain only ſuch paſſages in relation to the life of Cimon as did not fall properly within our notice, either in ſpeaking of the public or of him. Firſt then, Plutarch and Valerius Maximus from him report Cimon in his nonage to have been ſuſpected of folly, and to have been nick-named from thence Coalemos, as his grandfather had been before him; but Valerius Maximus ſays rightly, that this folly of his greatly benefited the Athenian ſtate, and that his ſubſequent behaviour conſtrained thoſe who thought him a fool to condemn themſelves of folly. The truth ſeems to be, that he did not affect learning, which ſeemed ſo ſtrange to the Athenians, that they took it for granted he would prove a blockhead; Cornelius Nepos, however, commends him for his eloquence, which ſome have thought incompatible with his want of learning, in which perhaps they are miſtaken; for as there is an artificial or rhetorical eloquence, ſo there is alſo a natural ability of ſpeaking, which cuſtom improves into an eaſy perſuaſive oratory, more pleaſing to a mixed audience than the moſt artful and regular ſpeeches; and this we may ſuppoſe was that kind of eloquence in which Cimon excelled. He went while a very youth into the army, and learned under the moſt experienced commanders the art of war, and the ambition of diſtinguiſhing himſelf as a great commander. His perſon was handſome, his ſtature juſt, his aſpect manly, his hair thick and curled, his behaviour affable, his temper ſweet, and his mind honeſt. But as all men have their faults, ſo this great Athenian wanted not his, which were a ſtrong paſſion for women and an inclination to feaſting and good company; beſides his ſiſter Elpinice, whom for a while he kept as his wife, he had ſeveral other miſtreſſes, yet he was paſſionately fond of his wife, whoſe name was Iſodice, the daughter of Euriptolemus the ſon of Megacles; when the Athenians were in humour with him they overlook'd theſe faults; but when they took it into their heads to be angry with him, they ſuffered their poets to treat him with great rudeneſs: As for example, Eupolis, about the time of his baniſhment, wrote a piece in which were the following verſes relating to Cimon:

In him ill-nature we cannot reproach,
But he is indolent, and will debauch;

THE affairs of Athens began to be ſuddenly and ſorely diſturbed after the death of Cimon, for, being alike hated by

He's gone to Sparta, and was ſo unkind,
To leave his poor Elpinice behind.

After reporting this, it is fit for us to obſerve, that Plutarch treats it as a downright calumny, and is of opinion, that Cimon never ſuffered his pleaſures to interfere with the buſineſs of the ſtate, of which it ſeems his victories ſhould be an inconteſtable proof. His attachment to the Lacedæmonians was the ſole cauſe of his baniſhment; for, as we obſerved in giving our readers his character, he was never ſuſpected by the people of having any deſign to aggrandize himſelf at their expence; true it is, that he had a moſt extraordinary affection for that nation, ariſing not only from the kindneſs that they had ſhewn him, but from the honeſty of his temper, which ſuited better with the ſevere virtue of Sparta, than with the ſprightly levity of the Athenians. One thing is exceeding odd in Cimon's conduct, that he gave his children ſuch names as did not ſeem to ſpeak them Athenians; for he named his three ſons Lacedæmonius, Eleus, and Theſſalus; moſt authors are of opinion, that he had theſe by a woman of Clitorium, though Diodorus the geographer aſſerts, that they were the children of his wife Iſodice. It is clear from all the writers who mention this great man, that even his baniſhment neither altered his conduct towards the Lacedæmonians or towards his countrymen. He would have fought for the latter againſt the former at the battle of Tanagra; he had intereſt enough with the former to reconcile them to the latter after he was recalled, which ſhews how ſteady he was in his conduct, and what a high opinion all his cotemporaries conceived of his virtue at home and abroad. Two remarkable incidents relating to his laſt expedition are preſerved in hiſtory; the firſt, that when he was about to embark for Cyprus he dreamed, that an angry bitch barked at him, and in the midſt of her barking uttered the following lines:

Go on, yet ſhortly ſhalt thou be
A friend unto my whelps and me.

Aſtyphylus of Poſidonium interpreted this dream thus; A dog, ſaid he, is an enemy to him he barks at; a man can only be ſtiled a friend to his enemies when he is dead; that mixture of a human voice with barking which appeared hideous in the bitch, this interpreter affirmed ſignified the Medes, whoſe armies were conſtantly made up of Barbarians and Greeks, yet in ſpite of this he ſet ſail and proceeded in his expedition. The ſecond circumſtance worthy of note was, when he had arrived at Cyprus, having formed ſome great project in his head, he ſent perſons in whom he could confide to conſult the oracle of Jupiter Ammon as to his ſucceſs; the oracle readily gave them this anſwer; You may return, by their enemies and their allies, the leaſt unlucky accident furniſhed a handle for new revolts or invaſions. The Megarians were the firſt in this buſineſs, their little ſtate, which lay in an angle of Attica, had been long under the protection, which was but another word for being under the dominion, of Athens, and had brought them into ſeveral quarrels with their neighbours. But now, it ſeems, thoſe of Megara, either forgetting the obligations conferred upon them by the Athenians, or elſe conceiving that no obligations could warrant the treatment they received, diſclaimed all dependance on Athens, and entered into a ſtrict league with her conſtant and avowed enemy Lacedæmon. The Athenians, as ſoon as they were informed of this, ravaged their little country, and for a time blocked up the Megarians in their city. The Lacedæmonians quickly reſented this proceeding, and hearing that Pericles the Athenian general was employed another way, they made a great irruption into Attica and did abundance of miſchief; upon which Pericles, who was marched againſt Eubœa, was recalled in haſte to aſſiſt his country. Upon his return, he did not, as many expected, immediately attack the Lacedæmonian army; but conſidering that it was led by a very young man, Pliſtoanax then king of Sparta, who had with him one Cleondrides for a tutor, he ſent the latter a a conſiderable ſum of money, and thereby procured the return of the Lacedæmonian army without blows. When Pericles came to make up his accounts, he thought fit to charge ten talents, laid out in a fit manner on a proper occaſion; at another time the Athenians would not have bore with ſuch an article on a public account, but Pericles had ſuch an aſcendency over them, and they were ſo thoroughly ſenſible how this money had been applied, that they paſſed his accounts without a word, and ordered him to proſecute the expedition againſt Eubœa, in which he had been before employed [a].

[a] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii. p. 293. Plut. in vit. Periclis.

turn, for Cimon is already with me. The meſſengers on their return found that Cimon was at that time dead; he was ſomewhat younger than Themiſtocles, but what his age was at the time of his death, that we know not (82).

(82) Thucyd. lib. i. Diodor. Sicul. Bibliot. lib. xi, xii. Plut. in vit. Cimon. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejuſd. Cicer. de Offic. lib. ii.

WHILE Pericles was at home in the winter, Tolmides, who had done ſuch great things for the Athenians, reſolved to make an expedition into Bœotia, with a ſmall body of troops and in a very advanced ſeaſon of the year; a great number of the braveſt Athenians readily engaged to ſerve under this famous general as volunteers. Yet Pericles was conſtantly againſt it, preſſing Tolmides to wait a little, and to join in his conduct prudence with valour. But he ſeeming to take this amiſs, and not greatly to reliſh another's meddling in his affairs, Pericles told him calmly, If you will not liſten to my advice, yet certainly it won't be amiſs if you wait time's leiſure a little, who, let me tell you, Sir, is the wiſeſt of all counſellors. This ſaying, being preſently divulged, became afterwards exceedingly beneficial to Pericles; for Tolmides, after doing great things in Bœotia, was attacked by the confederate army, compoſed of the quotas ſent from all the little ſtates of that country, killed, and his army routed at Chæronea. This defeat terribly humbled the Athenians, for, in order to redeem their priſoners, they were conſtrained to renounce all pretence of dominion over the cities of Bœotia; and while this was doing, many other little ſtates declared againſt the Athenians [b].

Truce between Athens and Sparta. Year after the Flood, 2553. Before Chriſt, 446.

PERICLES, notwithſtanding all theſe checks, marched with an army into Eubœa, from whence a new revolt of the Megarians cauſed him to be recalled, but within a ſhort time he re-entered that iſland, and made himſelf maſter of the city of Heſteia; the inhabitants of which, to terrify the reſt of the country, he ejected, and placed a colony of Athenians in their ſtead. A ſhort time after the reſt of Eubœa ſubmitted, and, the Lacedæmonians finding it no longer for their intereſt to carry on the war, a negociation was ſet on foot, whereby a peace was effected for thirty years, Callias and Chares being plenipotentiaries for the Athenians [c].

ABOUT this time Pſammeticus king of Lybia, or, as Plutarch calls him, of Egypt, ſent by way of preſent to the Athenian people forty thouſand buſhels of wheat, which proved a great misfortune to the city; for Pericles, out of ſpite to Cimon's family, who had children by an Arcadian woman, had preferred a law, whereby Athenians of the half blood were diſfranchiſed; this law, on account of the diviſion of the corn before-mentioned, was proſecuted with ſuch ſuch ſeverity and effect, that no leſs than five thouſand perſons, who till then had been conſidered as freemen, were ſold as ſlaves; a moſt exorbitant ſtroke of arbitrary power, puniſhed afterwards by the hand of heaven, in taking away all Pericles's children of the whole blood, and obliging him to intreat the Athenians to cancel this law out of pity to him its author, who, without the leaſt compaſſion, had ſuffered five thouſand men to be made ſlaves at once under colour thereof. One thing this ſeverity of his produced, which has been extremely uſeful to the critics, viz. the ſettling exactly the number of the Athenian citizens at this time, when, in the midſt of ſo many enemies, Athens durſt think of ſending out colonies, humbling her neighbours, ſubduing foreigners, and even of erecting an univerſal monarchy. This number, as it is ſet down by Plutarch, was found on the poll to be no more than fourteen thouſand and forty perſons [d].

[b] Thucydid. lib. i. Plut. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xii. p. 293. [c] Thucydid. Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra.

THE year after this, that is, in the beginning of the eighty-fourth olympiad, the Sybarites, a people of Italy, being a ſecond time driven from their city by the Crotonians, ſent embaſſadors into Greece, and humbly beſought the Lacedæmonians and Athenians to reſtore them, and to ſend a colony to ſhare with them the new city they reſolved to build. The Lacedæmonians rejected their requeſt, but the Athenians, who delighted much in ſuch applications, readily yielded to it; and not only diſpatched ten ſhips, with a conſiderable body of men on board, under the command of Lampo and Xenocrates; but alſo cauſed a proclamation to be made throughout all Peloponneſus, that ſuch as were willing to go and ſettle in Italy, might do ſo under the protection of their fleet, and abundance of people accepting the propoſition, the Sybarites, by the aſſiſtance of theſe new comers, re-eſtabliſhed themſelves in their country, and built a new city which they called Thurium, from whence themſelves were afterwards ſtiled Thurians [e]. (E).

[d] Plut. in vit. Periclis. [e] Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xii. p. 295.

(E) In order to conceive rightly of this buſineſs, the reader muſt aſcend a good deal higher in point of time, and trace the cauſe of the erection of Thurium back to the foundation of Sybaris; he will then ſee how the Greeks ſettled colonies, maintained, and

At the cloſe of the eighty-fourth olympiad, according to the computation of Diodorus Siculus, and ſix years after the and reſtored them. Sybaris was a colony of the Achæans and Trœzenians, it ſtood on the gulph of Tarentum, between the rivers Crathis and Sybaris, from which laſt it took its name (83). The felicity of its ſituation was ſuch, that in a very ſhort ſpace of time it excelled all the cities in its neighbourhood in wealth, power, and people. By degrees it ſpread its dominion over four ſmall nations inhabiting this part of Italy, and reckoned no leſs than twenty-five ſmaller cities than it ſelf within its territory, ſo thoroughly peopled, that they could on an emergency bring three hundred thouſand men into the field. In conſequence of its proſperity Sybaris became formidable, and even hateful, to its neighbours; their immenſe wealth making its inhabitants at once luxuriant and inſolent, ſo that they neither knew how to behave towards others, or with what to content themſelves (84). Telys being king of Sybaris, as Herodotus ſays (85), or, as Diodorus with greater probability affirms, demagogue, i. e. a ruler in right of his eloquence, perſuaded the people upon various accuſations to baniſh five hundred of their moſt conſiderable citizens, and to confiſcate their eſtates. The exiles immediately fled for refuge to Crotona, and as ſuppliants fell down before the altars in the forum. In a very ſhort ſpace Telys engaged the Sybarites to ſend deputies to Crotona, to demand that thoſe they had baniſhed ſhould be delivered up, threatening war in caſe of refuſal. The Crotonians upon this were much at a loſs what to do, at laſt they determined to protect at all events thoſe who had fled to them, and to oppoſe force by force. The Sybarites took the field with 300,000 men, the Crotonians were able to raiſe no more than 100,000; however, valour prevailed over numbers, and the Crotonians, having beaten the Sybarites, killed all without quarter, and in the end ſacked and deſtroyed the city. This happened in the third year of the lxviith olympiad. In the fourth year of the lxxxiſt olympiad the city of Sybaris was reſettled by the Theſſalians, but in the firſt year of the lxxxiiid olympiad the Crotonians overthrew it again. After this laſt misfortune, the Sybarites made the application mentioned in the text to the Spartans and Athenians. Lampo and Xenocrates, who commanded the Athenian ſquadron, found it no difficult taſk to collect volunteers in Peloponneſus, when the Pythian oracle had declared, that the city ſhould be exceedingly proſpered if they founded it, where the water was ſcarce and bread without meaſure. When they arrived therefore (83) Steph. de Urb. (84) Ariſtot. de Rep. lib. v. ſect. 3. Strab. lib. vi. p. 263. Marcian. p. 14. Diod. Sicul. lib. 12. (85) lib. v. p. 346.

the concluſion of the peace between Athens and Sparta, as Thucydides relates, a war broke out between the Samians and Mileſians about the city of Priene, ſeated under mount Mycale in Ionia; how this war came to affect the Athenians is not very clear; Diodorus ſays, that the Samians, who were victors, conceiving that the Athenians favoured their enemies, revolted from them; Thucydides ſays, that the vanquiſhed complained to the people of Athens, who were likewiſe deſired by ſome Samian malecontents to ſend a ſufficient force thither, in order to change the government and ſettle a democracy. Plutarch intimates, that the Athenians having directed both parties to lay down their arms and ſubmit to their deciſion, the Samnians refuſed ſo to do, whereupon the war was commenced. There is yet another reaſon aſſigned, which ſeems at leaſt as well founded as any of the reſt; and it is this, that Pericles engaged the Athenians in this war to gratify his miſtreſs therefore in Italy, and began to ſearch through the territory of Sybaris for ſuch a place as ſuited the oracle, they found at laſt a ſmall ſpring which was called Thuria, the water of which was conveyed through a brazen pipe that was called Medimnum. Concluding inſtantly, that this was the ſituation pointed out by the oracle, they began to lay out the city which they came to build, and from the ſpring before-mentioned called it Thurium. They who had the direction of the buildings contrived to have four ſtreets in length, called, Heraclea, Aphrodiſiade, Olympiad, and Dionyſiad, and three in breadth, viz. Heroa, Thuria, and Thurina. When the buſineſs was executed according to this ſcheme, and the city completed, it appeared wonderfully neat and compact, every thing being ſo diſpoſed as to be at once beautiful and commodious. Peace did not long inhabit theſe new-raiſed dwellings, the Sybarites, conceiving that in their own country they ought to rule all, ſhut out the new comers from all employments and honours, which ſo diſguſted them, who were by far the majority, that they ſuddenly took up arms, fell on the Sybarites, extirpated them, and ſending for freſh ſupplies from Greece, formed themſelves into a commonwealth, making Charondas, one of their fellow-citizens, their legiſlator. The ſubſequent hiſtory of Thurium will be found in its proper place. From what is ſaid here, the circumſtances attending eſtabliſhing colonies will be ſufficiently underſtood, as alſo the conveniencies flowing to their mother cities from theſe kind of ſettlements, which was the principal intent of this long note (86).

(86) Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

Aſpaſia a Mileſian, one of the handſomeſt women in her time, and who had ſuch an aſcendency over Pericles, that for her ſake he ſacrificed his family and his peace (F). However

(F) Aſpaſia, who is to be the ſubject of this note, was one of the moſt famous women in all antiquity, on account both of her virtue and her vices. She was lovely in her perſon, admirable for her natural endowments, and no leſs diſtinguiſhed by the accompliſhments ſhe had acquired. Her birth-place was Miletum a city in Ionia, famous for producing perſons of extraordinary abilities. She was the tutoreſs, miſtreſs, and at laſt wife, to Pericles who by his eloquence ruled Athens, and as ſuch claims a place here. The time of her birth can only be gueſſed at, ſhe was in all probability about fifteen years younger than Pericles, and therefore might be born about the fourth year of the lxxviiith olympiad. Her father's name was Axiochus, but of his quality we are ignorant. How ſhe came to Athens is alſo a point unſettled; but as to the remaining part of her hiſtory we are not ſo much in the dark. She rendered herſelf conſpicuous by her perfection in the art of ſpeaking, which ſhe poſſeſſed in a ſuperlative degree, being alſo admirably verſed in all the branches of uſeful literature, particularly natural philoſophy and politicks. One Thragelia an Ionian was her model, ſhe had made herſelf conſpicuous in Greece by her charms, addicted herſelf chiefly to the grandees, many of whom ſhe brought over to the intereſt of the great king, and, as Plutarch ſays, ſowed the firſt ſeeds of the Median faction in moſt of the cities of Greece. Aſpaſia reſembled, and even ſurpaſſed her. It is not to be imagined, that this fair one excelled (like ſome of our age) in light and amorous diſcourſes. Her diſcourſes were on the contrary not more brilliant than ſolid. It was even believed by the moſt intelligent Athenians, and amongſt them by Socrates himſelf, that Aſpaſia compoſed the celebrated harangue hereafter mentioned, which Pericles pronounced with ſo much applauſe. What then muſt we conceive of her abilities, who had Pericles for a lover, and Socrates for a diſciple? Whoſe fine qualities atoned even for want of reputation, and engaged the moſt conſiderable perſons in Athens, not only to viſit her, but to bring their wives to hear her lectures, though they deteſted her conduct? As eloquence was of all others the moſt neceſſary talent to an Athenian ſtateſman, ſo Pericles, on hearing Aſpaſia, determined to become her ſcholar, obſerving that with an exact method ſhe mingled the moſt warm and pathetic ſtrokes of perſuaſive oratory, uniting the ſymmetry ariſing from art with the vehemence flowing from nature. From admiring her wiſdom, this great Athenian fell ſoon into a deep affection for her perſon, a thing not wonderful in itſelf, and leſs ſo, if what moſt writers report of Pericles be true, that he was of a very amorous

However it was, war was decreed againſt the Samians, and Pericles was ſent againſt them with a fleet of forty ſail;

amorous diſpoſition. Certain it is, that Aſpaſia gained an abſolute dominion over him, and had as great an aſcendency over his genius as he had over the Athenians. Plutarch reports, that as often as Pericles went to, or returned from, the forum, he went to the apartment of Aſpaſia and ſaluted her. The tenderneſs this nobleman expreſſed for Aſpaſia made his wife, who was a woman of family, very uneaſy, which Pericles perceiving, readily conſented that ſhe ſhould betake herſelf to a huſband more agreeable to her (though ſhe had borne him two ſons, Xanthippus and Paralus) and then took Aſpaſia to wife, whom he had ſo long and ardently loved before. Heraclides of Pontus ſays, that Pericles, having divorced his wife, abandoned himſelf to his pleaſures, and living with Aſpaſia, ſpent on her the greateſt part of his fortune; but this ought to be regarded as meer calumny, it being morally certain, that Pericles in the firſt place was never profuſe, and in the ſecond that Aſpaſia piqued herſelf exceedingly on her ſkill in œconomy. As to the affair ſpoken of in the text, viz. the Samian war, we are undoubtedly warranted by the authority of Plutarch in what we have advanced. For though it be true, that Thucydides makes no mention of Aſpaſia in his detail of this war, yet that might be owing to the gravity of the author, or to his generous diſdain of blackening Pericles, by recording things incapable from their nature of direct proof. As to collateral circumſtances tending to ſupport this ſuggeſtion, there are many. Aſpaſia was a Mileſian by birth, Pericles was wont to conſult her; ſhe is reported to have accompanied him in this expedition, and to have built a temple to perpetuate the memory of his victory; and laſtly, ſhe compoſed, as we remarked before, the funeral oration pronounced by Pericles in honour of thoſe who were ſlain in this war. The comic poets, as they laſhed Pericles for affecting ſovereignty, ſo they failed not treating Aſpaſia with the ſame ſeverity, and as they called him Jupiter, they ſtiled her Juno; they likewiſe characteriſed her under the name of Omphale and Dejanira, the one the wife, and the other the miſtreſs, of Hercules, and many other ways. Cratinus uſed her the worſt; for he, without palliating the matter, painted her as an abandoned ſtrumpet. It is evident enough, that the ſpleen of Pericles's enemies prompted them to ſay any thing of him, or of thoſe in his favour, men or women. The former they called the pimps and courtiers of the new Piſiſtratus, the latter not only his whores, but his bawds. Beſides various remarkable events relating to Aſpaſia, which we ſhall be conſtrained to take notice of in the text, it may not be amiſs to obſerve here, that it is generally conceived the ſon, to whom Pericles bequeathed his name and his eſtate, was by her; certain ſail; he preſently brought them into ſubjection, and began to change all things according to his will, directing firſt, that the government ſhould be democratical for the future, and that fifty hoſtages of principal perſons ſhould be delivered to him with as many children. Plutarch ſays, that all imaginable methods were tried to ſoften Pericles upon this occaſion; the hoſtages offered him a talent a-head by way of ranſom; thoſe who diſliked the democracy proffered him a large ſum if he would leave the government as he found it, and Piſſuthnes, the governor of Sardis for the Perſian king, thinking an ariſtocratic government in Samos more advantageous to his maſter, would have given ten thouſand pieces of gold to have made up this breach with the Athenians; but Pericles, having no reſpect to money, carried away the hoſtages to Lemnos, and eſtabliſhed the democracy in Samos as he had been directed to do. But as governments founded in force ſeldom laſt long, the Samians fell into mighty diſſentions as ſoon as Pericles was gone home. Some of them who had retired to Piſſuthnes, having procured from him an aid of ſeven hundred men, returned into their own country, and their faction opening the gates to them, thoſe of the oppoſite party were ejected and the Athenian gariſon expelled; they procured certain it is, that ſon was but of the half blood, as any ſon of Aſpaſia's muſt have been, and that his father, to ſecure the inheritance to him, prevailed on the people to abrogate the law which himſelf had procured to exclude ſuch from ſucceſſions. Beſides theſe circumſtances, there is another favouring this opinion, viz. that Eupolis the comic poet, introducing Pericles aſking news of this baſtard ſon, makes the perſon he ſpeaks, to anſwer, He is alive and well, and had been married long ago, if the fear of meeting with a wife as diſhoneſt as his mother did not deter him. Which is ſo correſpondent with what Eupolis elſewhere ſays of Aſpaſia, that one can hardly conceive this ſon to have ſprung from any but her. That ſhe ſurvived Pericles is certain, but for her adventures afterwards we are pretty much in the dark. Plutarch indeed informs us, that ſhe attached herſelf to one Lyſicles, a man of mean birth and as mean parts, whom by her intereſt, however, ſhe raiſed to great employments in the ſtate. What thoſe employments were is not recorded, nor any thing farther of Aſpaſia which deſerves notice (87).

(87) Plutarch. in vit. Periclis. Athen. lib. xiii. p. 560. Cicero in Bruto. Menoxen. Platonis. in tom. ii. A. D. 1578. p. 235, 249.

procured alſo their hoſtages to be privately ſent away from Lemnos, and, having drawn the Byzantines to their party, they declared themſelves open enemies to Athens. That city, unuſed to bear inſults, immediately equipped ſixty gallies, and ſent them under Pericles to ſubdue the Samians a ſecond time.

When Pericles was at ſea with this fleet, he found it neceſſary to detach ſixteen ſhips, as well to gain intelligence of the Phœnician fleet, as to haſten the auxiliary ſquadrons he expected from Chios and Lesbos; with the forty-four remaining veſſels he engaged the Samians and their allies, though their fleet conſiſted of ſeventy ſail, and beat them. Being afterwards ſtrengthened by a reinforcement of forty ſhips from Athens and twenty-five from Chios and Lesbos, he beſieged Samos by land and ſea. Receiving intelligence that the Phœnician fleet was comeing to its relief, he ſailed with ſixty ſhips to meet it. Dureing his abſence the beſieged fell upon the remainder of the Athenian ſhips under the command of Tiſagoras, defeated them, and for fourteen days remained maſters of the ſea, during which ſpace of time they furniſhed themſelves with whatever they wanted. Plutarch cenſures Pericles's conduct on this occaſion, and attributes the loſs which the Athenians ſuſtained to his leaving the ſiege; but there ſeems to be no foundation for this, becauſe fighting the Phœnician fleet at ſea, rather than in the neighbourhood of Samos, was certainly his intereſt. On his return to the ſiege, having received a farther reinforcement of fourſcore ſhips, according to Thucydides, of ninety, as Diodorus tells us, he ſtraitened the Samians more than ever, and having divided his men into eight bodies, kept ſeven every day on duty, and allowed the eighth to refreſh themſelves. At length after nine months ſiege the Samians ſurrendered, upon which Pericles demoliſhed their walls, ſeized their ſhips, and mulcted them in the whole expence of the war, part of which he obliged them to pay down, and took hoſtages for the remainder [f].

When Pericles returned from this war, he procured himſelf to be appointed to pronounce the public oration in commemoration of ſuch as fell in this war, which he did with ſuch eloquence, that when he came down from the pulpit or place where ſuch public declamations were delivered, delivered, the ladies gathered about him, took him by the hand, and crowned him with garlands. Amongſt the reſt Elpinice drew near him, but not with the ſame intention with the reſt, for ſhe addreſſed him in theſe words: "Theſe are brave things, Pericles, that you have done, "and ſuch certainly as deſerve theſe wreaths of glory, "who have deprived us of ſo many worthy citizens, "not in a war againſt Phœnicians or Medes, the na- "tural enemies of our country, for ſuch my brother "Cimon waged; but in the overthrow of a city that "was in alliance with us, whoſe people ſpoke the ſame "language and were of our kindred." Pericles gave a ſtrong inſtance of his great compoſure and readineſs of mind on this occaſion, for he repeated careleſsly the following verſes from the poet Archilocus:

[f] Thucydid. lib. i. de Bello Pelopon. Plutarch. in vit. Periclis. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii. p. 302.

A dame like you in deep decline,
Should not attempt by art to ſhine;
You ſhould not powder thus your hair,
Nor ſhould your unguents taint the air;
Follies which ſuit the young and fair.

In recording theſe paſſages we had the reader's profit as well as pleaſure in view, for they ſhew, that as abſolute as Pericles was become in Athens, by dint of his eloquence and good fortune, yet even a woman could, and durſt, diſtinguiſh between the ſervices done the ſtate by a patriot general, one who ſought nothing but to exalt the intereſt and glory of his country, and him who had the preſervation of his own power chiefly in view. They ſhew too the particular grandeur of mind inherent in Pericles, who was not to be ruffled even by the ſhrewdeſt ſpeeches, but maintained always ſuch an equality of temper as enabled him to make ſuch an anſwer as was moſt proper on every occaſion [g]. It is on all hands confeſſed, that Pericles valued himſelf very much on the reduction of Samos, and Thucydides gives us great reaſon to believe, that the Athenians conceived highly of him for that exploit; the Samians at the time he deſtroyed them being one of the moſt flouriſhing nations in that part of the world, and who bid fair for wreſting from the Athenians the dominion of the ſea [h].

THE war between the Corcyrians and Corinthians commenced a little after this, and drew by degrees the Athenians nians into thoſe engagements, which at laſt proved the ruin of their ſtate. There is a neceſſity therefore that we ſhould give here a ſuccinct account of the cauſes of this war, and of the methods by which the Athenians were drawn to take part in it. An inteſtine war breaking out in the little territory of Epidamnum, a city in Macedonia founded by the Corcyrians, one party called in the Illyrians to their aſſiſtance, and the other, finding themſelves ſtraitened, applied themſelves for aid to the people of Corcyra. They neglecting the buſineſs, the people of Epidamnum ſent to Corinth for ſuccours, owning her for their foundreſs, becauſe the Corcyrians were a colony from Corinth. The Corinthians, partly out of pity to the Epidamnians, and partly out of ſpleen to the Corcyrians, ſent a very great fleet to the aſſiſtance of the former, which thoroughly eſtabliſhed that party which had applied to Corinth; this being reſented by the Corcyrians, they ſent a fleet to Epidamnum to ſupport the exiles, who on its arrival at that port did not act offenſively, the chief commanders having inſtructions to propoſe an amicable compoſure of all differences, into which the Corinthians would by no means come. The next year the Corcyrians beat the Corinthians and their allies at ſea, and took Epidamnum by ſtorm, after which they waſted the dominion of the confederates of the Corinthians, which greatly exaſperated the latter. At Corinth therefore they began to make new preparations for carrying on the war, and preſſed their confederates to do the ſame, that they might be in a condition to retrieve the honour they had loſt, and humble this ungrateful colony, which had taken upon her to inſult her mother city. When the Corcyrians received advice of theſe proceedings, they inſtantly diſpatched embaſſadors to carry their complaints to Athens, and the Corinthians, on the receipt of this news, diſpatched theirs likewiſe; both on the ſame errand and with equal hopes [i].

[g] Plutarch. in vit. Periclis. [h] de Bello Pelop. lib. i.

THERE could be nothing more glorious for the Athenians than ſuch an application as this, which ſeemed to acknowledge the legality of that dominion which this ſtate had always affected. Thucydides therefore, who begins his hiſtory with the ſtory of this war, hath given us at large the harangues, as well of the Corinthian as of the Corcyrian embaſſadors, to which we muſt refer our our readers. At firſt the Athenian people approved the cauſe of the Corinthians, but they ſoon changed their minds, and took part with the Corcyrians, yet they did not make a league offenſive and defenſive with that ſtate, becauſe by ſuch a ſtep Athens would immediately have broken with Corinth and all her allies; they contented themſelves with making a defenſive alliance only with the Corcyrians, whereby both parties reciprocally promiſed to aſſiſt each other in caſe either ſhould be attacked. It does not appear, that the Athenians entered much into the merits of this cauſe; they were become too great politicians for that; the reaſons aſſigned by Thucydides, who was perfectly well acquainted with them, are theſe; firſt, Corcyra was a very great maritime power; ſecondly, this iſland lay very convenient for aſſiſting Athens in her deſigns on Italy and Sicily. When the Corinthian fleet therefore was ready to ſail, the Athenians, according to their treaty, ſent ten gallies to Corcyra under the command of Lacedæmonius the ſon of Cimon, with whom were joined Diotenes and Proteus as collegues: Plutarch ſays, that Pericles, by ſending this ſmall ſquadron under Lacedæmonius, intended to affront him, or at leaſt to put it out of his power to do any great matter, whereby to revive the ancient ſplendor of his family, againſt which that great politician had always a pique. But there ſeems to be very little colour for this. Thucydides ſays, that the Athenians, who were indeed under the direction of Pericles's counſels, did not intend the Corcyrians any real aſſiſtance, but ſent this ſmall ſquadron to look on, while the Corinthians and Corcyrians weakened and waſted each other. The Corinthians, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year permitted, made for the coaſt of Corcyra, with a fleet conſiſting of one hundred and fifty ſail under the command of Xenoclides, aſſiſted by four other Corinthian admirals, each ſquadron of their allies being commanded by a chief of their own. The Corcyrians prepared as well as they could for the reception of this great armada; they put to ſea a fleet of one hundred and ten gallies, which by the Athenian ſhips was augmented to one hundred and twenty; as ſoon as the navies were in ſight, they prepared for an engagement. The Corcyrians gave the right wing to their allies, the Athenians ranging their own fleet in three ſquadrons, each commanded by an admiral of reputation. The Corinthians gave gave their right wing to the Megarians and other of their allies, disposed the rest of them in the centre, and placed their own gallies in the left, that they might engage the Athenians. The action was very brisk for a time, the Corcyrian right wing broke the left of the Corinthian fleet, and forcing some of the ships on shore, landed, pillaged their camp, and made a great number of prisoners; on the other hand, the Corinthian ships in their left wing beat the right wing of the Corcyrians, whom the Athenians, according to their instructions, aided but faintly; at last the Corinthians charging them briskly, the Athenians were obliged to defend themselves, which they did so well, that the Corinthians were glad to retire, which accordingly they did, after taking up part of the broken ships and most of their own dead. The next day the Corinthians resolved to attack the Corcyrians again, who prepared on their side to receive them; but when the action was ready to begin, the Corinthians of a sudden retired, which the Corcyrians knew not what to make of, till the arrival of a fleet of twenty sail from Athens put it out of doubt, that the Corinthians, seeing them, and fearing there might be more behind them, had wisely chosen to withdraw. The next day the Athenian and Corcyrian fleets went and braved the Corinthians in their harbour, who would not be provoked to hazard an engagement, because all the ships from Athens were clean, and the Athenians, for ought they knew, might have another fleet waiting for them in their return to Peloponnesus. Both sides claimed the victory, and both erected trophies at Sybotis. The Corinthians, because they remained masters of the field of battle, had carried away a part of the broken vessels, made a thousand prisoners, and sunk seventy of the Corcyrian ships; the Corcyrians, because by the assistance of the Athenians they had sunk thirty of the Corinthian vessels, taken some spoils, and forced them to retire home. This was the greatest sea-fight, which to this time had happened among the Greeks, there being no less than two hundred and seventy vessels engaged. The Corinthians complained loudly against the Athenians, as if they had broken the peace; the Athenians on the other hand alledged, they had only assisted their allies; and thus these states began to hate each other. As for the prisoners made by the Corinthians, they sold eight hundred of

[i] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xii.

of them for slaves, the rest they treated kindly in hopes of making use of them for facilitating a peace [k].

The revolt of Potidea.

THE Corcyrian war was followed by the revolt of Potidea, a town in Macedonia, founded by the Corinthians, but joined in alliance to the Athenians. As soon as the Corcyrian war broke out, the Athenians sent orders to the citizens of Potidea immediately to demolish a part of the walls of the city, to send back the magistrates whom they had received from Corinth, and to give hostages for their own behaviour. Perdiccas king of Macedon, hating the Athenians, took this opportunity to persuade the Potideans to revolt, which accordingly they did, though they sent ambassadors to Athens to entreat the revocation of the orders sent them; but in the mean time they sent deputies to Sparta, to join with the Corinthians and Megarians in their complaints of the Athenians. The Athenians in the mean time sent a considerable fleet against Macedonia, and some time after another, with a considerable body of land troops on board, under the command of Callias, a man of great quality and courage. The Corinthians on their side dispatched Aristeus with a considerable force to the assistance of the Potideans. Not to detain the reader too long with a detail of all the little circumstances of this war, which may be found in the accurate history of Thucydides, we shall content ourselves with observing, that an engagement happened before Potidea, in which the Athenians were victors, but with the loss of their general Callias. Phormio, who succeeded him in his command, invested the city in form, and shut up its port with his fleet; but the Potideans, dreading to fall into the hands of the Athenians, made a most obstinate defence, while in the mean time they warmly solicited the Corinthians to perform their promises, and to engage the rest of the states of Peloponnesus in their quarrel [l].

Dissentions at Athens.

WHILE affairs abroad were in this condition, the Athenians were very far from being quiet at home. Pericles had attained such a superiority as had never been seen in Athens since the days of Pisistratus; the last competitor with him for the favour of the people was Thucydides, a man noble by birth, and of qualifications suiting therewith; he endeavoured to the utmost to hinder those alterations in government which the popular party sought to bring about, [k] Thucydid. ubi supra. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii. Plutarch. in vit. Periclis. [l] Thucydid. lib. i. Diodor. lib. xii.

and

and more eſpecially oppoſed Pericles, who, perceiving that one of them muſt give way, put the matter to the teſt, by procuring an oſtraciſm, wherein, upon counting the votes, it was found, that Thucydides was exiled by the people. From this time forward Pericles altered the whole tenor of his conduct, and behaved rather like a prince than a private man; for he procured all things to be at his diſpoſal, and took the whole management of the Athenian affairs at home and abroad upon himſelf. When the ſtate of things began to have an ominous appearance, and the Athenians apprehended a war, in which they ſhould be obliged to contend, not for ſpoil, for glory, or authority, but for their lands, and houſes, and whatſoever was dear to them, they grew out of humour with Pericles, and received readily for truth whatever the envy of his enemies prompted them to ſay of him. For example, when Menon one of Phidias's workmen, preferred a petition to the people, wherein he charged that excellent ſtatuary with purloining a part of the gold which had been delivered to him for the ſtatue of Minerva; many reaſons induced ſuch as diſliked Pericles to abet this proſecution, among the reſt theſe two; firſt, they conceived that they ſhould try the minds of the people by this ſtep, and diſcover whether they were at preſent diſpoſed to bear with the proſecution of Pericles or not: ſecondly, they thought to revenge themſelves on the ſtatuary, for having inſerted a picture of Pericles fighting with an Amazon in the ſhield of the goddeſs. But in the end this buſineſs had an iſſue little expected, for Phidias having declared that by Pericles's direction the gold was ſo laid on, that the whole of it might be taken off without injury to the figure, the experiment was made accordingly, and the weight found to be juſt. However, Phidias either died in priſon, or was baniſhed; Plutarch ſays, that he was poiſoned by the procurement of Pericles's enemies, who afterwards ſought to charge it upon him [m]. Hermippus next accuſed Aſpaſia of impiety or irreligion, as alſo for being a bawd to Pericles, and, as ſuch, ſeducing the wives and daughters of Athenian citizens; Diopithes preferred a pſephium or decree to the people, that it might be rendered criminal not to inform the proper court, i. e. the Areopagus, againſt ſuch perſons as diſputed the religion of their country, or taught ſuch things, under colour of natural philoſophy, in relation to celeſtial bodies, as were in-

[m] Diodor. lib. xii. c. 7. Plutarch. in vit. Periclis.

conſiſtent therewith. This was known to ſtrike at Anaxagoras the preceptor of Pericles, and even at Pericles himſelf. The people aſſented thereto, and in conſequence thereof, Anaxagoras was judicially accuſed (G). To wind up

(G) It is not clearly expreſſed by Plutarch, on what account either Aſpaſia or Anaxagoras was accuſed of impiety; however, it is not hard to conjecture, that perſons, eminent as they were, for the brilliancy of their parts, and their great knowledge in natural philoſophy, ſhould be ſuſpected on account of their notions of religion, in a country, where even in Heſiod's time they had no leſs than thirty thouſand gods, for whoſe honour their votaries were wonderfully zealous. As to Anaxagoras, we ſhall have elſewhere occaſion to mention him and his opinions; at preſent we will ſtick to the point before us, and ſay nothing but what relates to this proſecution, its cauſes, and conſequences. Laertius reports from one Sotion, who wrote a book of the ſucceſſion of philoſophy, that Anaxagoras was accuſed by Cleon of impiety, for aſſerting the ſun to be a burning plate; but that, being defended by Pericles his ſcholar, he was fined five talents, and baniſhed, whereas Satyrus reported, that he was accuſed by Thucydides, not only of propagating impious opinions, but of holding intelligence with the Perſians, and in his abſence ſentenced to die. Hieronymus wrote, that Pericles brought him into court in poor garments, and much broken with ſickneſs, which moved his judges to compaſſion. Suidas is poſitive, that he was caſt into priſon for introducing a new opinion concerning the divine nature, and baniſhed, notwithſtanding Pericles undertook to plead his cauſe. Joſephus tells us, that the Athenians believing the ſun to be a god, and he affirming it to be without ſenſe and knowledge, they adjudged him to ſuffer death as a blaſphemer. None of theſe opinions quadrate with Plutarch's account, and, which is ſtill worſe, Plutarch does not agree with himſelf; for though ſpeaking of his retirement from Athens, he aſcribes it to Pericles's precaution, yet he elſewhere admits, that Anaxagoras was accuſed. The truth ſeems to be, that the whole tenor of Anaxagoras's philoſophy was, according to the religious notions of the Athenians, impious. For he taught, that matter was compoſed of infinite ſimilar atoms, as gold is of grains, and that they were diſpoſed in the frame we ſee them, by an infinite ſelf-moving mind; whence he acquired, from the novelty of his doctrine, the ſurname of Nous, i. e. the mind. He lived after his baniſhment at Lampſacus, and was ſo little affected therewith, that when a perſon told him one day, You are deprived of the Athenians: he anſwered, You are miſtaken, friend, they are deprived of me. As to his notion of the ſun, he retained it to his death; what that notion was, we learn up Pericles's troubles, Dracontides moved, that Pericles might bring in his accounts, and that the final deciſion of his cauſe ſhould be committed to judges, who ſhould write their ſuffrages upon billets taken from the altars [n]. Our great orator found means to diſengage himſelf from all theſe ſnares, he appeared in perſon for Aſpaſia, pleaded her cauſe as an advocate; but in the midſt of his pleadings let fall a ſhower of tears like a child, which was the more remarkable, becauſe he had never been known to weep before; and thus either the force of his eloquence, or the ſight of his grief, engaged the judges to acquit her. As for Anaxagoras, he was afraid to truſt his eloquence with the defence of him whoſe wiſdom was his only crime, and therefore he wiſely ſent him out of Attica, with this mark of reſpect, however, that he attended him in perſon. As for what was objected to his own conduct, he was in the leaſt pain about it; for being a very exact œconomiſt, he was able to ſhew two things from it, that he had always lived within the bounds of his fortune; and ſecondly, that he had no more than his father left him. This, as Thucydides obſerves, was the very baſis of his greatneſs, that he was univerſally known to be ſtrictly juſt to the public, above corruption, and, thro' the innocence of his actions in reſpect to pecuniary affairs, ſuperior to all the calumnies that could be raiſed againſt him [o].

[n] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Diogen. Laert. in vit. Anax. [o] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

learn from various authors, who agree, that he thought it to have been a burning maſs, many times bigger than Peloponneſus, and that its revolution was occaſioned by the repulſe of the northern air; he held the moon to be a dark body enlightened by the ſun, habitable, having plains, hills, and water, which he inferred from the inequality of her ſurface. He aſſerted likewiſe, that the ſtars were earthy; which opinions we mention here, becauſe they were all contrary to the Athenian religion. His ſcholars were the greateſt men of Greece, but all ſuſpected of irreligion. To mention only a few, Archelaus the philoſopher, Euripides the tragic poet, Socrates the famous moraliſt, who heard both him and Aſpaſia; ſome ſay, that Democritus was alſo his hearer; but Laertius affirms, that Anaxagoras could not endure him, which Phavorinus likewiſe aſſerts (88).

(88) Diogen. in vit. Anaxag. Plut. in vit. Periclis. Id. de Superſtit.

The Spartans prepare for war.

THE Spartans having heard all that the little ſtates of Greece had to ſay againſt the Athenians, and laſt of all the Corinthians; embaſſadors were ſent to Athens, to demand reparation for theſe injuries, or to denounce war in caſe of refuſal. Thucydides, of all ancient authors the moſt to be relied on, tells us, that they demanded in the firſt place the expulſion of thoſe Athenians who were ſtiled execrable on account of the old buſineſs of Cylon and his aſſociates, becauſe by his mother's ſide Pericles was allied to the family of Megacles; they next inſiſted, that the ſiege of Potidea ſhould be raiſed; thirdly, that the inhabitants of Ægina ſhould be left free; and laſtly, that the decree made againſt the Megarians, whereby they were forbid the ports and markets of Athens on pain of death, ſhould be reſcinded, and the Grecian ſtates ſet at liberty, who were under the dominion of Athens. It is certain, that Pericles perſuaded the Athenians to reject theſe terms, but authors are not well agreed upon what motives he acted; ſome ſay, that he thought the din of war would diſſipate that cloud of impeachments which his enemies were framing againſt him: others, that perſonal injuries done to him and to Aſpaſia provoked him to fall into theſe meaſures; the moſt probable ſeems to be, that he adviſed the Athenians according to his apprehenſion of the affair, and directed ſuch meaſures as he thought ſuited beſt with the dignity of the Athenian ſtate. The harangue attributed to him by Thucydides, and which we have no reaſon to doubt is to the ſame effect with that which he delivered, offers the following arguments to the conſideration of the Athenians. That whatever the Lacedæmonians might pretend, as to the complaints of allies and injuſtice of them, the true ground of this reſentment was the proſperity of the Athenian republic, which they always hated, and now ſought an opportunity of humbling. That it muſt be the fault of the Athenians themſelves, if they ſucceeded in this ſcheme, becauſe, for many reaſons, accurately and judiciouſly ſtated by him, they were better able to engage in a long and expenſive war, than the Peloponneſians; that therefore it ſhould be propoſed as the moſt feaſible, and at the ſame time the moſt equitable, ſatisfaction that could be given, that they would reverſe their decree againſt Megara, if the Lacedæmonians would allow free egreſs and regreſs in their city to the Athenians and their allies; that they would leave all thoſe ſtates free, who were free at the making of the laſt peace with Sparta, provided, the Spartans would alſo

alſo leave all ſtates free who were under their dominion; and that future diſputes ſhould be ſubmitted to arbitration. In caſe theſe offers ſhould not prevail, he adviſed them to hazard a war, telling them that they ought not to think they ran ſuch a hazard for a trifle, or to retain a ſcruple in their minds, as if a ſmall matter moved them to it, becauſe on this ſmall matter depended their ſafety and the reputation of their conſtancy and reſolution; whereas, if they yielded in this, the next demand of the Lacedæmonians would be of a higher nature; for having once diſcovered, that the Athenians might be taught to fear, they would thence conclude, that they durſt deny them nothing, whereas a ſtiff denial in this inſtance would teach them to treat Athens for the future on terms of equality. He enforced theſe reaſons, by ſhewing, that their anceſtors had always acted on the like principles, and had in all caſes preferred their glory to their eaſe, and their liberty to their poſſeſſions. Diodorus informs us, that he laid before the people an exact account of their circumſtances, putting them in mind, that the treaſure brought from Delos amounted to ten thouſand talents, and that though four thouſand had been expended on the ſtately gate to their citadel, yet that ſix thouſand were ſtill in hand, that they were alſo entitled to the ſubſidies paid by the confederate ſtates, that the ſtatues of the gods, the Perſian ſpoils, and other marks of their magnificence were worth immenſe ſums, that private men were arrived at vaſt fortunes, and that, conſidering their trade by ſea, they had a certain annual increaſe of wealth; that they had an army on foot of twelve thouſand men, and in their colonies and gariſons ſeventeen thouſand; that their fleet conſiſted of three hundred ſail, which might eaſily be increaſed, whereas the Peloponneſians had none of theſe advantages; which alſo Thucydides mentions, but places this oration lower. Theſe were the cauſes, and this the beginning, of the famous Peloponneſian war, which though, while it laſted, brought innumerable evils upon Greece, yet there reſults from it this circumſtance of glory, that perhaps of all the wars which ever happened, the events of this are beſt recorded, ſo that the minuteſt circumſtances thereof are known even in theſe far diſtant times; which ſhews how far learning is preferable to power, ſince now that all the ſtates of Greece have been for many ages ſubverted and deſtroyed, the reſpect due to the writeings of Thucydides hath preſerved them, as the merit of Xenophon's hath alſo done his continuation of Thucydides's des's ſtory, and thereby kept alive the remembrance of actions, which, however great and glorious in themſelves, had otherwiſe been buried in oblivion (H).

Platæa ſurprized by the Thebans.

THINGS being in this ſituation, the Thebans conceiving with themſelves, that Platæa, which had been always remarkable for her fidelity to the Athenians, would be a perpetual thorn in their ſides, reſolved to ſurprize it; with this view they ſent Eurymachus at the head of three hundred men, to aſſiſt ſuch of the Platæans as they had drawn over to their party, in making themſelves maſters of the place. In this deſign they ſucceeded very happily, the Platæans, who had promiſed to open the gates, kept their words exactly, and the Thebans in an inſtant took poſſeſſion of the place. The Platæans, that is, the townſmen in general, perceiving at laſt how ſmall a number the Thebans were, unanimouſly roſe and fell upon them, killing great [p] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Juſtin, lib. iii. c. 7. Demoſt. adv. Neær.

(H) Beſides what is mentioned in the text of Pericles adviſing the Peloponneſian war, to get over an impeachment, there is a famous ſtory related both by Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos, that he was induced thereto by a ſprightly ſaying of the young Alcibiades; who ſeeing him melancholy one day, aſked him what was the matter, and upon his anſwering, that he knew not how to account for the public money which had gone through his hands, Alcibiades ſharply replied, Then ſtudy to give no account at all. Others pretend, that he was the author of the decree againſt Megara to revenge Aſpaſia, two of whoſe harlots ſome young men of that city had ſtolen away. It is true, that the decree happened on this account, but Pericles does not ſeem to have been any ways guilty; for a herald being diſpatched to Megara to complain of the injury, he was ſlain upon the road; and this violation of a ſacred character gave birth to the war. The enemies of Pericles indeed ſay, that he cauſed the herald to be ſlain, that he might pick a quarrel with the Megarians; but that the fact was notoriouſly otherwiſe, may be gathered from this, that when the emperor Adrian granted many privileges and favours to the citizens of Greece, he expreſsly excepted the Megarians on account of this very murder. If Thucydides had conceived, that any of theſe charges on Pericles had been juſtly founded, he would certainly have reported them. As to the ſneers of Ariſtophanes and other comic poets, they ought not in juſtice to paſs for evidence, ſince they were enemies alike to all who were eminent (89).

(89) Plut. in vit. Periclis.

great numbers, and in the end forcing the reſt, with Eurymachus their chief, to render themſelves priſoners of war. It happened, that another party from Thebes came to aſſiſt their companions, but came too late; the Platæans, foreſeeing that they would waſte their country, offered to releaſe their priſoners, if they would forbear to ſpoil their lands; but threatened at the ſame time, that, if they committed any waſte, they would put their friends to death. The Thebans upon this withdrew, but the Platæans, however, put their priſoners to death, alledging, that they never promiſed to releaſe them but in caſe of peace; their number was one hundred and eighty, and Eurymachus, as he led them, died with them. The Athenians, as ſoon as they had notice of this attempt of the Thebans, cauſed all the Bœotians in their territory to be arreſted, and when they underſtood how the Platæans had delivered themſelves, they ſent a great convoy of proviſions to that city, and a numerous body of troops to eſcort their wives and children to Athens. The league being now broken on both ſides, each party prepared for the war, both ſent embaſſadors to the Perſian, both ſought to rouſe their allies. Moſt of the ſtates of Greece were inclined to the Lacedæmonians, becauſe they profeſſed themſelves on this occaſion the deliverers of Greece; they likewiſe hated the Athenians, either becauſe they already oppreſſed them, or becauſe they apprehended that in time they would. With the Spartans joined all the Peloponneſians, except the Argives and part of the Achæans; without Peloponneſus the Megarians, Phocians, Locrians, Bœotians, Ambraciots, Leucadians, and Anactorians, declared themſelves on their ſide. On the other hand, the Chians, Leſbians, Platæans, Meſſenians, Acarnanians, Corcyrians, Zacynthians, Carians, Dorians, Thracians, the iſlands for the moſt part, and all the Cyclades, excepting Melus and Thera, with Eubœa and Samos. The Lacedæmonians aſſembled their army at the iſthmus, but Archidamus, the Spartan king and commander in chief, diſpatched a herald to Athens before he would enter Attica; his herald was ſent back without an anſwer, which put an end to all motions for peace, the Lacedæmonians reſolving to act immediately offenſively, and the Athenians preparing to defend themſelves as well as they could [q].

[q] Thucyd. lib. ii. prop. Init. lib. xii.

The Peloponnesian war. Year after the Flood, 2567. Year before Christ 432.

PERICLES, as he had engaged his countrymen to undertake this war, so his wisdom seems to have been the only resource they had in it. He was aware, that Archidamus, being his friend, might forbid the plundering of his estates, of which he immediately gave advice to the people, and, to cut off all grounds of suspicion, declared, that in such a case he made a present of his lands to the public. He then advised, that, without thinking how to defend their country-seats, they should turn all their care to the city, busy themselves especially in equipping their ships, and settle a thorough resolution, not to be intimidated with the first evils of war. The Athenians came readily into all that he proposed, and appointed him with nine more generals of all their forces. To say the truth, the Lacedæmonians themselves assisted his rise, for their ambassadors continually attacking him, the Athenians apprehended from thence, that he of all others must have the greatest regard for their interest. When, however, the Peloponnesian army advanced as far as Acharne, one of the largest boroughs in Attica, and at a very small distance from Athens, the Athenians began to grow very discontented, and to exceedingly clamour against Pericles, for not so much as attempting to drive them away. In which, however, he shewed his judgment, for that army consisting of no less than sixty thousand men, the Athenians were unable to set on foot any force capable of looking it in the face; wherefore, when some hot men pressed for an engagement, Pericles very prudently said, Trees, when they are lopped and cut, grow up again in a short time; but men, once lost, cannot easily be recovered. By degrees the madness of the people grew still more violent, so that he was persecuted with libels of all sorts, and even his own friends pressed him earnestly to alter his conduct, and to attempt something for his own and his country's honour; but he remained firm and calm in the midst of this storm, pursued the plan which he had laid down, in spight of the clamour raised against him, and gave a happy turn to all things by the dint of his own magnanimity [r].

HE sent, however, a fleet of a hundred gallies with fourteen hundred land-forces on board, which fleet being joined by fifty vessels from Corcyra, coasting the Peloponnesian shore, did infinite mischief, so that its inhabitants had no reason to boast of their expedition into Attica, since they left left their own country to feel thoſe miſeries which they pretended to inflict upon others. Another Athenian fleet infeſted the Locrians, and becauſe Ægina had been a principal occaſion of the preſent war, when the fleet returned from Peloponneſus it ejected all the inhabitants of that iſland, which was repeopled from Athens. They likewiſe reduced Cephalenia, and ſeveral towns in Acarnania and Leucas, while in the mean time Pericles refreſhed thoſe who were ſhut up in the city with diſtributions of public money, a law for the diviſion of lands, and whatever elſe he could think of to amuſe and divert them. In the autumn, when the Peloponneſians were retired, Pericles, at the head of a great army, entered the Megarean territory, and did all the miſchief therein which could be expected from a provoked enemy. The reaſon of this was, becauſe on their account the Lacedæmonians pretended to have made war; thus in the end of this firſt year the Athenians made up accounts as it were with the Peloponneſians, and repaid them thoſe miſchiefs, inſults, and ravages, which they had committed in Attica at the beginning of it [f].

[r] Thucyd. ubi supra. Diodor. ubi supra.

In the winter of this year, the Athenians ſolemnized in an extraordinary manner the funerals of ſuch as firſt died in the war after this manner; firſt, their bones were laid in a tent to be ſeen of all, and thither their friends were permitted to come in order to pay their laſt offices to their relations. Then they were carried out, each tribe providing a cypreſs coffin or coffins and chariots for their dead, and one empty coffin was carried for ſuch whoſe bodies had not been recovered, and conſequently could not have thoſe honours paid them, the women all the way making loud lamentation for them. They were then interred in a public ſepulchre in the Ceramicus, and after burial, a perſon, appointed by the ſenate of Areopagus, made a funeral oration to their honour; the perſon appointed on this occaſion was Pericles. How he diſcharged this glorious employment, the reader may be informed from Thucydides, who, if he has not preſerved the words of Pericles, has undoubtedly kept ſtrictly to his ſenſe, ſince he wrote and publiſhed his hiſtory within ſo ſhort a time after this happened, that it would undoubtedly have been decryed, if in all its circumſtances it had not been exactly conformable to truth. Thus ended the firſt year of the Peloponneſian war [t].

The

[f] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi, ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra.

[t] Thucyd. ubi ſupra.

THE ſpring of the next year was doubly fatal to Athens; nature afflicted her at home, and the Peloponneſians, under the command of Archidamus, waſted all things abroad; but the plague was the more dreadful enemy of the two, as the reader will eaſily perceive from the deſcription of Thucydides, who was ſick thereof (I). Pericles in the midſt of theſe diſtreſſes

(I) This plague in Athens makes ſo remarkable a figure in hiſtory, and the deſcription of it by Thucydides has been ſo much commended, that we ſhould deal unjuſtly with our readers, if we either omitted the deſcription of this plague, or gave it in other words than thoſe of that accurate hiſtorian. When the plague firſt began among the Athenians, the Peloponneſians had not been long in Attica; but ſo great a plague, and ſo fatal as this was, is not remembered to have happened in any place before. For at firſt neither were the phyſicians able to cure it, through ignorance of what it was, but died faſteſt themſelves, as being the men that moſt approached the ſick, nor any other art of man availed whatſoever. All ſupplications of the gods, and enquiries of oracles, and whatſoever means they uſed of that kind, proved all unprofitable; inſomuch as, ſubdued with the greatneſs of the evil, they gave them all over. It began by report, firſt in that part of Ethiopia that lieth upon Egypt, and thence fell down into Egypt and Afric, and into the greateſt part of the territories of the king. It invaded Athens on a ſudden, and touched firſt upon thoſe that dwelt in Pyræus, inſomuch as they reported, that the Peloponneſians had caſt poiſon into their wells; for ſprings there were not any in that place. But afterwards it came up into the high city, and then they died a great deal faſter. Now let every man, phyſician or other, ſpeak concerning the ground of this ſickneſs, whence it ſprung, and what cauſes he thinks able to produce ſo great an alteration, ſpeak according to his own knowledge; for my own part, I will deliver but the manner of it, and lay open only ſuch things as one may take his mark by to diſcover the ſame, if it come again, having been both ſick of it myſelf, and ſeen others ſick of the ſame. This year, by confeſſion of all men, was of all other for other diſeaſes moſt free and healthful. If any man was ſick before, his diſeaſe turned to this; if not, yet ſuddenly without any apparent cauſe preceding, and being in perfect health they were taken firſt with an extreme ach in their heads, redneſs and inflamation in the eyes; and then inwardly their throats and tongues grew preſently bloody, and their breath noiſom and unſavory. Upon this followed a ſneezing and hoarſeneſs, and not long after, the pain, together with a mighty cough, came down into the breaſt; and when once it was ſettled in the ſtomach, it cauſed vomit, and with great diſtreſſes retained his courage, and endeavoured to infuſe it into his countrymen, though he held them to the obſervance great torment came up all manner of bilious purgation that phyſicians ever named. Moſt of them had alſo the hiccoughs, which brought with it a ſtrong convulſion, and in ſome ceaſed quickly, but in others was long before it gave over. Their bodies outwardly to the touch were neither very hot nor pale, but reddiſh, livid, and beflowered with little pimples and wheals; but ſo burned inwardly, as not to endure any the lighteſt cloaths or linen garments to be put upon them, nor any thing but mere nakedneſs, but rather moſt willingly to have caſt themſelves into the cold water; and many of them that were not looked to, poſſeſſed with inſatiate thirſt, ran into the wells; and to drink much or little was indifferent, being ſtill from eaſe and power to ſleep as far as ever. As long as the diſeaſe was at the height, their bodies waſted not, but reſiſted the torment beyond all expectation, inſomuch, as the moſt of them either died of their inward burning in nine or ſeven days, whilſt they had yet ſtrength; or if they eſcaped that, then the diſeaſe falling down into their bellies, and cauſing there great exulcerations and immoderate looſneſs, they died many of them afterwards through weakneſs. For the diſeaſe which took firſt the head, began above, and ran down, and paſſed through the whole body; and he that overcame the worſt of it, was yet marked with the loſs of his extreme parts; for breaking out both at their privy members, and at their fingers and toes, may with the loſs of theſe eſcaped. There were alſo ſome that loſt their eyes, and many that preſently upon their recovery were taken with ſuch an oblivion of all things whatſoever, as they neither knew themſelves nor their acquaintance. For this was a kind of ſickneſs which far ſurmounted all expreſſion of words, and both exceeded human nature in the cruelty wherewith it handled each one, and appeared otherwiſe to be none of thoſe diſeaſes that are bred amongſt us, and that eſpecially by this: For all, both birds and beaſts, that uſe to feed on human fleſh, though many men lay abroad unburied, either came not at them, or taſting periſhed. An argument whereof, as touching the birds, was the manifeſt defect of ſuch fowl, which were not then ſeen, neither about the carcaſſes, or any where elſe; but by the dogs, becauſe they are familiar with men, this effect was ſeen much clearer. So that this diſeaſe, to paſs over many ſtrange particulars of the accidents that ſome had differently from others, was in general ſuch as I have ſhewn; and for other uſual ſickneſſes at that time, no man was troubled with any. Now they died, ſome for want of attendance, and ſome again with all the care and phyſic that could be ſervance of the ſame rule which he had preſcribed before, and would not ſuffer them to ſtir without the city, either to eſcape be uſed. Nor was there any, to ſay certain, medicine, that applied muſt have helped them; for if it did good to one, it did harm to another; nor any difference of body, for ſtrength or weakneſs, that was able to reſiſt it; but it carried all away what phyſic ſoever was adminiſtered. But the greateſt miſery of all was the dejection of mind in ſuch as found themſelves beginning to be ſick, for they grew preſently deſperate, and gave themſelves over without making any reſiſtance; as alſo their dying thus like ſheep, infected by mutual viſitation. For if men forbore to viſit them for fear, then they died forlorn, whereby many families became empty for want of ſuch as ſhould take care of them. If they forbore not, then they died themſelves, and principally the honeſteſt men: for out of ſhame they would not ſpare themſelves, but went in unto their friends, eſpecially after it was come to paſs, that even their domeſtics, wearied with the lamentations of them that died, and overcome with the greatneſs of their calamity, were no longer moved therewith. But thoſe that were recovered, had much compaſſion both on them that died, and on them that lay ſick, as having both known the miſery themſelves, and now no more ſubject to the like danger: For this diſeaſe never took a man the ſecond time, ſo as to be mortal. And thoſe men were both by others counted happy, and they alſo themſelves through exceſs of preſent joy, conceived a kind of light hope, never to die of any ſickneſs hereafter. Beſides the preſent affliction, the reception of the country people, and of their ſubſtance into the city, oppreſſed both them, and much more the people themſelves that ſo came in. For having no houſes, but dwelling at that time of the year in ſtifling booths, the mortality was now without all form, and dying men lay tumbling one upon another in the ſtreets, and men half dead about every conduit through deſire of water. The temples alſo where they dwelt in tents were all full of the dead that died within them; for oppreſſed with the violence of the calamity, and not knowing what to do, men grew careleſs both of holy and profane things alike. And the laws, which they formerly uſed touching funerals, were all now broken, every one burying where he could find room. And many for want of things neceſſary, after ſo many deaths before, were forced to become impudent in the funerals of their friends. For when one had made a funeral pile, another getting before him would throw on his dead, and give it fire. And when one was in burning, another would come, and having caſt thereon him whom he carried, go his ways again. And the great licentiouſneſs, which alſo in other kinds was uſed in the city, began at firſt from this diſeaſe.

For

eſcape the plague or infeſt the enemy. He cauſed, however, a great fleet to be equipped, and drew together fifty veſſels of the allies of Athens, on board of which and of a hundred Athenian gallies, he embarked three hundred horſe, and four thouſand foot, with which he ſailed to Epidaurus. The Peloponneſians, hearing how great a force he commanded, did as he conceived they would do, that is withdrew their troops out of Attica, after they had waſted it for forty days. Pericles, however, did no great matter, the plague raging amongſt his ſoldiers and ſeamen. On his return home, the fleet under the command of Agnon and Cleopompus was ſent againſt Chalcis and Potidea, but carrying the plague with them thither, they were able to do little or nothing, ſo that after a ſhort ſtay they returned from thence, alſo bringing back to Athens about fifteen hundred men out of four thouſand, the reſt being loſt through peſtilence and war. Theſe evils drove the Athenians to madneſs and deſpair. In vain Pericles made uſe of all his eloquence to appeaſe them; they ſent embaſſadors to Lacedæmon to deſire a peace, which the Spartans were much too proud to beſtow; after this fruitleſs negociation, Pericles harangued the aſſembly afreſh, and with the utmoſt force of reaſon ſought to combat their apprehenſions and fears; when he had done ſpeaking, they confeſſed he was in the right in adviſing them to begin the war; yet, diſtracted

For that which a man before would diſſemble, and not acknowledge to be done for voluptuouſneſs, he durſt now do freely, ſeeing before his eyes ſuch quick revolution of the rich dying, and men worth nothing inheriting their eſtates: inſomuch, as they juſtified a ſpeedy fruition of their goods even for their pleaſure, as men that thought they held their lives but by the day. As for pains, no man was forward in any action of honour to take any, becauſe they thought it uncertain whether they ſhould die or not before they atchieved it. But what any man knew to be delightful, and to be profitable to pleaſure, that was made both profitable and honourable Neither the fear of the gods, nor laws of men, awed any man. Not the former, becauſe they concluded it was alike, to worſhip or not worſhip; from ſeeing that alike they all periſhed: nor the latter, becauſe no man expected that his life would laſt till he received puniſhment of his crimes by judgment. But they thought there was now over their heads ſome far greater judgment decreed againſt them; before which fell they thought to enjoy ſome little part of their lives (90).

(90) Thucyd. lib. ii. prop. init.

diſtracted with the evils it had brought, they diſmiſſed and fined him; yet, with an inconſtancy natural to a people, they in a ſhort time recalled him, and veſted him with almoſt abſolute authority. But the ſtorms in his family did not blow over ſo eaſily; his ſon Xanthippus quitted his houſe, becauſe his father would not allow him more money than his eſtate would bear; but to conceal the true cauſe, the profligate youth gave out his father converſed criminally with his wife. While this quarrel was open, Xanthippus died of the plague; ſhortly after him Pericles's ſiſter died, after her almoſt all his relations and friends, laſt of all his ſecond ſon Paralus. At his funeral, Pericles loſt his heroiſm quite; for going to place a chaplet of flowers on the head of the corps, he burſt out into a loud fit of crying, after which being conveyed home, he kept his houſe cloſely, and abandoned himſelf to melancholy. It was then, that the Athenians invited him to accept of thoſe honours of which they had ſtripped him. At the perſuaſion of Alcibiades and others of his friends he came abroad, and ſhewed himſelf to the people, who received him with acclamations, and at his requeſt cancelled that very unjuſt law, which they had made at his motion, for baſtardizing all children of the half blood; and hereupon he enrolled a ſon of his by Aſpaſia a freeman of Athens, by the name of Pericles. In the ſummer of this year, a Peloponneſian navy of a hundred gallies waſted the iſland of Zacynthus, whereby they did much hurt to the inhabitants, and little good to themſelves. Towards the end of the ſummer they ſent embaſſadors to the king of Perſia, to intreat his aſſiſtance againſt his ancient enemies the Athenians; theſe embaſſadors had it alſo in commiſſion to make application to Sitacles king of Thrace; but his ſon Sadocus, being a citizen of Athens, ſeized them and delivered them to the Athenians, who put them to death, to teach the Lacedæmonians more mercy than they had ſhewn of late in killing ſuch as they found in their territories, who were natives of places allied to Athens. In the winter the Athenians ſent Meleſander, with a fleet of twenty ſhips, to Caria and Lycia, where he was ſlain. About this time Potidæa, which had held out from the very beginning of the war, and wherein the people had been driven to the eating of human fleſh, yielded to the Athenians, who permitted the men to depart with one garment, and the women with two. This city was repeopled afterwards by a colony from Athens. Such were the events which fell out in the ſecond year of the war [u]. In [u] Thucid. Diodor. &c.

In the ſpring of the third year, Archidamus king of Sparta came with a great army and beſieged Platæa. The Platæans inſiſted, that Pauſanias, after the famous battle in the neighbourhood of their city, had declared them free, wherefore they hoped he would not overturn what his predeceſſors had ſolemnly eſtabliſhed; but Archidamus inſiſted, that they ſhould forſake the ſide of the Athenians, give up their city and all that they had during the time of the war, on a promiſe of having all things reſtored to them when it ſhould be over. The Platæans were ſo far from accepting theſe terms, that they reſolved to abide all things rather than deſert Athens. Archidamus then waſted their country, but not with impunity; for thoſe of Platæa made continual ſallies, and cut off great part of his forces; he then cauſed the city to be ſet on fire, whereby a great part of it was reduced to aſhes, yet this had no effect. In the end therefore he was conſtrained to turn his ſiege into a blockade, and having thrown up a retrenchment, fortified with a deep ditch, he left a ſufficient number of men to guard his lines, and then returned back to Peloponneſus. In Thrace and Acarnania the Athenians fought with variety of fortune, and under the command of Phormio gained two ſmall victories at ſea. But the great event of this year was the death of Pericles, which happened in the end of the ſummer. He fell by the plague, but in a manner different from any body elſe; for whereas it hurried off others ſuddenly, it deſtroyed him by degrees, preying at once on the conſtitution of his body and the noble faculties of his mind. As an inſtance of this laſt obſervation, Plutarch ſays, that when he drew near his end, he ſhewed ſome of his friends an amulet or charm which the women had hung round his neck, intimating, that he muſt be very ſick indeed when he ſuffered ſuch a remedy to be applied. In his very laſt moments, ſome of his friends, ſitting by his bed-ſide and conceiving him to have quite loſt his ſenſes, amuſed themſelves with reckoning up the glorious events of his life: of a ſudden he raiſed himſelf on his bed, and turning to them, ſaid, I wonder you ſhould commend thoſe things in me, which were as much owing to fortune as any thing elſe, and which have happened to others alſo, and omit that which has been peculiar to me, and more to my reputation than all the reſt; that never any of my fellow citizens put on mourning on my account. Thus Pericles died as he lived, as much ſuperior to the greateſt men of Athens as they to the vulgar; and after his death it appeared, that the ſame grandeur, which in other men became fatal to the commonwealth, was in him its preſervation; only it muſt be allowed, that he gave way to the corruption of the people that he might govern them, and that while he exalted the Athenian ſtate and adorned its capital, he deſpoiled the people of their virtue, introducing an ambitious ſpirit of dominion, inſtead of that love of true glory which had been cultivated by Ariſtides and Cimon [y] (K).

the

In

[y] Thucyd. lib. i, ii. Plut. in vit. Periclis.

(K) This note, though it relates to one of the greateſt men of Greece, will not be very long, becauſe we have had occaſion to ſay ſo much of him in his hiſtory, that very little remains unſaid. He was very learned, eſpecially in uſeful ſcience; and there is a ſtory related of him, though the time in which it happened is not very well fixed; but it muſt have been within a year or two of his death at fartheſt, which ſhews what courage he had, and of what a different temper he was from moſt of his countrymen: juſt as he was going on board the fleet, and had entered the admiral's galley, an eclipſe of the ſun happened, which ſtruck all the ſeamen with aſtoniſhment, and terrified his own pilot ſo much that he knew not what to do. Pericles perceiving this, inſtantly pulled off his cloak, and muffling up the man's face in it, aſked him if that was terrible, and whether he drew any ill omen from it. He anſwered, no. Why then, ſaid Pericles, what difference can you make between one darkneſs and the other, except that what ſhades the ſun is bigger than my cloak: Which brought the pilot and his crew to their ſenſes again. How much he owed to Anaxagoras appears from this, and indeed from almoſt every great circumſtance of his life; how grateful he was, the reader will determine, when he hears that he ſuffered that wiſe man to be in ſuch diſtreſs, that throwing himſelf on the ground, and muffling his face in his cloak, he took a reſolution of ſtarving to death. When Pericles was told of this he ran to him in all haſte; yet inſtead of lamenting his diſtreſs, he fell to bewailing his own loſs, in caſe he ſhould be deprived of ſo wiſe a counſellor; to which Anaxagoras, opening his cloak, anſwered with a low voice: Thoſe, Pericles, who have need of a lamp, ſupply it with oil. Whereupon the ſtateſman took him home, and uſed him better for the future. It was at his motion that the Athenians ſeized the treaſure of all Greece at Delos, and applied a great part of it to the adorning of their own city; which when complained of as a breach of truſt, Pericles thus defended it: It was given, ſaid he to defend Greece from the Barbarians, which the Athenians having done have a juſt title to the money; for money, ſaid he, is not

In the ſummer following, the Peloponneſians, under the command of Archidamus, invaded Attica the third time, deſtroying the ripe corn, and waſting with implacable hatred whatever belonged to the Athenians, though without profit to themſelves. In the mean time, the whole iſle of Leſbos, the city and diſtrict of Methymna only excepted, revolted from the Athenians, who thereupon ſent a fleet of forty gallies under the command of Clippides and two other generals; their orders were to come before the city of Mitylene, to demand that the citizens ſhould pull down their walls and deliver up their ſhips, which if they did not do, they were then to act offenſively. The Mitylenians endeavoured to amuſe the Athenians, and to that end procured a truce till they ſent embaſſadors to Athens; but in the mean time they diſpatched other embaſſadors to intreat aid of the Lacedæmonians, who directed them to make their ſolemn application at the olympic games not theirs who give, but theirs who receive, provided they fulfil the conditions; and as the Athenians were always ready to carry on war, it was but juſt that ſomething ſhould be done for their peace, and to give life and ſpirit to tradeſmen, which was effected by theſe public buildings. This reaſoning of his drew over to his party merchants, ſeamen, labourers, and artiſts of all kinds; as for ſuch as were not obliged this way, he provided largeſſes for them and penſions from the public ſtock; whence many writers of his own time complain, that whereas other Athenians had made themſelves eminent, Pericles had made himſelf a prince. In times of peace, when he apprehended that the murmurs of the people might be moſt dangerous, he cauſed them to be draughted off in colonies, and thereby rendered thoſe dependent abroad, who would have been factious at home: In a word, he made Athens the richeſt and moſt powerful of the Greek ſtates; he exalted the power of the people, which all the other chiefs had ſought to depreſs; and in the midſt of all the Athenian greatneſs, when her commons were moſt vain and moſt unruly, he directed all things at his will, was but once, and then but for a ſmall time, in diſgrace, recalled afterwards with honour by the people, and remained in poſſeſſion of his authority to his death. But in the midſt of this great fortune his hands were clean, he did all things for Athens, and nothing for himſelf, leaving his paternal eſtate rather diminiſhed than improved, an example admirable rather than imitable (91).

(91) Plut. in vit. Pericles. Thucyd. lib. i, & ii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. xii. Juſtin. iii. c. 7. & mult. al.

games to the several states of Greece, which accordingly they did, and were thereupon admitted into the alliance formed against Athens. The Spartans meditated another inroad into Attica, and actually advanced as far as the isthmus; but their allies not sending their quotas as they had promised, they thought fit to retire, having received advice that an Athenian fleet had appeared on the coast of Peloponnesus. Yet the Peloponnesians, in pursuance of their promise to the Mitylenians, sent a fleet of forty gallies to their assistance; but they were able to effect little, because the Athenians had sent a hundred gallies on that coast. Hitherto they pursued the maxims of Pericles, and cultivated a naval force; but as this cost immense sums of money, they were constrained to make new demands upon their allies, and to raise that tax which Aristides had imposed with the consent of the Greeks, by which they were enabled to keep up a fleet of 250 gallies. The Mitylenians and the rest of the Lesbians, greatly incensed at those of Methymna for remaining stedfast in their duty to the Athenians, made excursions into their country, whereupon the Athenians invested the city of Mitylene, and thereby obliged them to think of defending themselves, instead of offending their neighbours. Platæa was all this time blocked up, its little garison, consisting of four hundred natives, and fourscore Athenians, having thus long withstood the whole power of Peloponnesus; but finding it a vain thing to hope assistance from Athens, and being very much streightened for provisions, they took a desperate way of forcing a passage through the enemies lines, which when they came to execute, many declined; three hundred, however, persisted in their intention, and fell with such fury on their enemies, that two hundred and twelve forced a passage and marched to Athens, the rest were compelled to retire back into the city; thus ended the fourth year of the Peloponnesian war [z].

In the very beginning of the next year, the Peloponnesians sent forty ships to the relief of Mitylene, and at the same time entered with a great army into Attica for the fifth time, under the command of Cleomenes. The Athenians were exceedingly distressed by these cruel ravages; but in the mean time their troops were victorious in Lesbos. Paches, who commanded before Mitylene, obliged it to surrender before the Peloponnesian fleet, sent to succour it, could could arrive; he likewiſe chaſed that fleet, and returning to Leſbos ſent the Lacedæmonian miniſter, whom he found in Mitylene, together with a deputation from the inhabitants of that place, to Athens, where the Lacedæmonian was immediately put to death; and in a general aſſembly of the people it was reſolved, at the motion of Cleon, that orders ſhould be ſent to Paches to put all the Mitylenians, who were at man's eſtate, to death; and to ſell the women and children for ſlaves. The next day, however, they reconſidered this decree, which Cleon ſtill ſupported with all his eloquence; but Diodotus, an orator of a milder diſpoſition, having ſhewn how injurious it would be to the Athenian glory to deal ſo ſeverely with perſons who had ſurrendered at diſcretion, it was carried by a very ſmall majority to reverſe the decree. A clean ſhip was immediately diſpatched to Lesbos to countermand the orders that had been ſent to Paches the day before, and inſtructions were given to the commander to make all the ſail he could, that he might arrive there before the other ſhip, which, though he ſtrongly endeavoured, he could not perform. He arrived, however, time enough to ſave the Mitylenians from utter deſtruction, for Paches, being a man of great humanity, took a day to conſider the orders he had received, and in that ſpace the galley arrived which brought him a countermand. The Athenians, however, did not wholly pardon the Mitylenians; on the contrary, they put a thouſand of the briſkeſt of the rebels to the ſword, demoliſhed the walls of the city, took away all their ſhips, divided their lands among themſelves, and let them again to the Mitylenians at very high rents. The ſame ſummer they made themſelves maſters of the iſland of Minoas, lying over-againſt the territory of Megara; they ſeized likewiſe the port of Niſæa, and fortified it, which acquiſitions were of mighty importance to them. The Platæans, driven to the laſt extremity, ſurrendered, and by the judgment of the Lacedæmonians were, to the number of two hundred, including twenty-five Athenians, put to death, and their women ſold for ſlaves. Such was the end of one of the braveſt and moſt generous people of Greece. Their city was ſometime afterwards razed by their implacable enemies the Thebans, who left only an inn to ſhew where it ſtood. The fame, however, of its ancient inhabitans moved Alexander the great to rebuild it. In this year happened the famous ſedition in Corcyra, from whence future ſeditions. when their effects rendered them terrible, were ſtiled Cor-cyrian. Thucydides hath inserted a very copious description thereof, its causes, and consequences, in his admirable work; as far as it relates to the affairs of the Athenians, we are bound to insert a succinct relation of it here. We have already observed, that the war waged by this state against the Corinthians induced the Peloponnesian war; and in speaking thereof we have shewn, that a great number of Corcyrians were carried away prisoners into Peloponnesus, where the chief of them were very well treated, though the rest were sold for slaves; the reason of this conduct of the Corinthians was a design they had formed of engaging these Corcyrians to influence their countrymen to side with them and their allies; full of this intent, they treated them with all the lenity and tenderness imaginable, instilling into them by degrees an hatred of democratic government, and a desire of vesting the rule of their island in their own hands. When it was found that the Corcyrian prisoners had thoroughly imbibed these principles, they were told, that, on condition they would use their interest at home in favour of the allies and to the prejudice of Athens, they might obtain their freedom. The Corcyrians promised largely, returned home, and, which may seem extraordinary, endeavoured to perform all they promised. From these endeavours sprung the sedition before-mentioned; at first such as were for an aristocracy prevailed, and in right of their power cut the throats of such as inclined to a democratic government; they were assisted by the Peloponnesians, but the Athenians sending a fleet, and afterwards another fleet, to the assistance of the distressed party, the Peloponnesians were forced to withdraw; and then the democratic party, taking heart again, in Corcyra, revenged themselves for the injuries they had received from the now depressed faction; nor would they suffer any notions of religion to restrain their hands, but dragged away suppliants from the altars to execution, on the standing maxim of all faction, that it was for the public good. The worst of all was, that this example once set, almost all the states in Greece felt in their turns the like commotions, which were always incited and blown up by agents from Sparta and Athens, the former pretending to settle aristocracies every-where, and the latter exerting her utmost power to prevent their remaining any-where. In the midst of these momentous affairs, and while they had so many important businesses on the carpet, the Athenians were engaged in a new one, which proved in the end more fatal to them than all the reſt. It happened thus; the inhabitants of Sicily were ſplit into two factions, the one ſtiled the Doric, which had the ſtate of Syracuſe at its head, the other the Ionic, which owned the Leontines for their chiefs; the latter, conceiving themſelves too weak without foreign aid, applied themſelves to Athens, and ſent a citizen of theirs, one Gorgias, and a great orator, to intreat it; never was any miniſter ſuited better to his negotiation than this man to treat with the Athenians; he was bold, vain, and eloquent, and ſo tickled the ears of the people by his fine ſpeeches, that they ran head-long into a war with which they had no buſineſs, and which they were unable to maintain, while they were engaged with the Peloponneſians. Pericles had warned them of this at the very beginning of the war, he told them it would be as much as they could manage, but that they might manage it, if they medled with nothing elſe, and that their ſucceeding therein would fix their empire over Greece, and ſecure Athens in as high a ſtate as ſhe could expect, or ought to deſire. But the people giddy with ſucceſs, and hoping at once to graſp the empire of Greece and the dominion of Sicily, reſolved to aſſiſt the Leontines, and to that end diſpatched a fleet under the command of Lachetes and Chabrias; and, as if this new buſineſs had taken up all their thoughts, that fleet was hardly ſailed before they began to equip another. The plague, however, made prodigious havock in the midſt of all theſe great deſigns, cutting off this year four thouſand citizens, three hundred knights, and an infinite number of meaner people, Diodorus ſays, ten thouſand: he likewiſe acquaints us with what he ſuppoſes to have been the cauſe of this diſtemper, he aſcribes it chiefly to great rains falling in the winter, and a very hot ſummer following thereupon, dureing which the Eteſian gales or evening breezes were wanting. The Athenians, however, aſcribed it to the pollution of the iſle of Delos, by burying therein dead bodies, which they therefore cauſed to be removed, and ſought to appeaſe Apollo by various ſacrifices; ſuch were the events in the fifth year of the Peloponneſian war [a].

[z] Thucyd. Diodor. ubi supra.

all

At the opening of the next ſummer, the Peloponneſians, under the command of Agis the ſon of Archidamus king of Sparta, invaded Attica, or rather aſſembled in order to invade it; for the many earthquakes, which happened at this time throughout Greece, alarmed them ſo much, that they they returned home without doing any great matter. The war was carried on in Sicily with various ſucceſs; Carcades, one of their generals, being ſlain, the ſole command devolved upon Paches, who diſcharged his truſt with great reputation. At Athens the people ordered new ſhips to be daily fitted out, and created new admirals to command them; among theſe Demoſthenes gained great reputation, and made himſelf very agreeable to their allies. The Athenians, however, received ſome check from the Ætolians, but in the winter they thrice overthrew the Ambraciots, and conſtrained them to conclude a peace with the Acarnanians the allies of Athens; Eurymedon and Sophocles, who commanded in Sicily, gained, as the winter drew on, ſome advantages over the Syracuſians, and in this year it is remarked that mount Ætna made a greater eruption than it had done for fifty years; this was the ſixth year [b].

[a] Thucyd. lib. iii, Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii.

In the ſucceeding ſpring, Agis the ſon of Archidamus invaded Attica with a great army; the Athenians, however, fitted out a great fleet, ſending forty ſhips to Sicily, and to their commanders gave inſtructions to keep a ſtrict eye on Corcyra, the inhabitants of which were under great apprehenſions leſt their exiles ſhould make any attempt, or the Peloponneſians make a deſcent with their fleet of ſixty gallies which was in their neighbourhood. Demoſthenes was ſent with another fleet to infeſt the coaſts of Peloponneſus, he was one of the greateſt generals of his time, of which he gave evident proof in this expedition; for as the fleet ſailed by Laconia, he took notice of the promontory of Pylus, which was united to the land by a narrow iſthmus, having before it a barren iſland about two miles in circumference, in which, however, there was a very good ſafe port, all winds being kept off, either by the head-land or by the iſle; theſe advantages gave him to apprehend, that a gariſon left here would give ſo much trouble to the Peloponneſians, that they would find it more adviſable to protect their own country than to invade their neighbours. He propoſed therefore to his collegues, that they ſhould immediately ſeize it, and fortify it with the greateſt expedition; but they, deſiring rather to fulfil their inſtructions than to do extraordinary ſervice, for which perhaps they might not be thanked, refuſed to follow his advice, and inſiſted upon ſailing to Corcyra, according as their orders bore. A ſtorm ariſing obliged the fleet to put into the haven in the iſland, where where Demoſthenes revived his perſuaſions to ſeize and fortify ſo convenient a poſt, but in vain; his collegues were all of another opinion, ſo that he was forced to give way; but the matter taking air, the ſoldiers declared unanimouſly that they would not quit the place, which they immediately fell to fortifying, and in ſix days finiſhed a ſtrong wall; and then the reſt of the admirals ſailing for Corcyra, Demoſthenes was left with five ſhips to guard his new-raiſed fortification. As ſoon as the news of this event was carried to the Peloponneſian army, it was immediately reſolved to return back and beſiege Pylus. When they arrived before the place, they took poſſeſſion of the harbour, and cauſed a choſen body of Spartans to take poſſeſſion at the ſame time of the iſland Sphacteria, and theſe precautions taken they attacked the Athenian retrenchments with great vigour; Demoſthenes and his gariſon made a prodigious defence, and a fleet of forty Athenian ſhips arriving in the nick of time, offered battle to the Peloponneſian fleet; but this being refuſed, becauſe the Lacedæmonians were at preſent ſet on taking Pylus, the Athenians boldly ſailed into the harbour, broke and ſunk moſt of the veſſels therein, and took the reſt, after which they beſieged the Spartans in the iſle, which threw the affairs of the Peloponneſians into the greateſt diſorder. The Lacedæmonians ſent for their magiſtrates into the camp, which was their cuſtom in all great dangers, and they, perceiving that no ſafety could be wrought for the Spartans in Sphacteria, but by a treaty with the enemy, concluded a truce with the Athenian army, while a negociation was carried on at Athens; the articles of this truce were, that the Peloponneſians ſhould deliver up all their ſhips, on condition to have them punctually reſtored to them in caſe the treaty did not take effect; that neither the Athenians nor they ſhould undertake any thing till this negociation ended ſome way or other; that a certain quantity of victuals ſhould be carried daily to the iſland, but that no ſhip ſhould attempt to paſs thither by ſtealth; that the truce ſhould end at the return of the embaſſadors, and that, if in the mean time it were broke in any of its articles, it ſhould be held utterly void in all. The Lacedæmonian embaſſadors ſpoke to the Athenians with great gravity and wiſdom, they ſhewed them how much for their honour it would be to make a peace at their requeſt; and in proof of this they urged an argument worthy of the Spartans. You have now, ſaid they, an advantage, which whether it be owing to your wiſdom, or fortune, may be diſputed hereafter; but if you lay hold of this occaſion to make a juſt and honourable peace, you will ſhew, that your nation do not acquire advantages by chance, but by prudence; whereas, if you do not make peace, you will riſque that reputation, and even thoſe advantages, from the pride of which you reject the accommodation we offer. The Athenians in general were inclined to put an end to this troubleſome war, but Cleon, one of their demagogues, a warm and obſtinate man, ſo wrought upon them, that they inſiſted on very unreaſonable conditions, and treated the embaſſadors in ſuch a manner, that, finding nothing could be done with honour, they withdrew, and by their return to the camp put an end to the truce. The Peloponneſians then demanded their ſhips, but the Athenians, pretending that the truce had been infringed, refuſed to deliver them, and thereby kept the poſſeſſion of ſixty good veſſels, to which they had but a very indifferent title. Hoſtilities being recommenced on both ſides, the Lacedæmonians attacked the Athenian retrenchments at Pylus, while the Athenians renewed their aſſaults on the Lacedæmonians at Sphacteria; the latter, though under all the diſcouragements imaginable, behaved with great bravery, inſomuch, that the buſineſs went on very ſlowly, which gave the people of Athens much uneaſineſs. They began then to wiſh they had embraced the peace, and to rail vehemently at Cleon, who to excuſe himſelf ſaid, that it would be eaſy for the general of the forces they were now ſending to attack the Spartans in the iſle, and put an end to this diſpute at once. Nicias, who had been appointed to this command, ſaid immediately, that if Cleon believed he could do ſuch great things, he would do well to go thither in perſon; the latter, conceiving this to mean only to try him, ſaid, he was ready to go with all his heart, whereby Nicias catched him, and declared that he had relinquiſhed his charge. Cleon thereupon ſaid, modeſtly enough, that he was no general; but Nicias anſwered, he might then become one; and the people, pleaſed with this controverſy, held the orator to his word; Cleon then advancing, ſaid, I am ſo little afraid of the enemy, that I will deſire but a very ſmall body of troops; and yet, in conjunction with thoſe at Pylus, I will undertake in twenty days either to bring you the Spartans you are in ſuch pain about, or periſh in the attempt; at which the people, little expecting ſuch things from an orator, fell a laughing. They decreed him, however, the troops he deſired, and he ſet ſail on this expedition, in which he conducted himself with great prudence and fortitude; for he first sent a herald to the enemies camp, signifying, that if the Lacedæmonians in the isle surrendered at discretion, a new negotiation might be commenced; but this demand, being looked upon as dishonourable to the Lacedæmonian state, was rejected. He afterwards in conjunction with Demosthenes made a descent upon the island, and partly by their conduct, and partly by their valour, reduced the Spartans to the last extremity. Cleon perceiving it to be in their power to cut these brave men to pieces, restrained his Athenians, and sent a herald to inform them, that they might yet yield at discretion; whereupon the Lacedæmonian commander, who had been the third officer in the army, his two superiors being killed, demanded a conference with the Athenian generals, in which he desired leave to send for orders to the Peloponnesian camp, but that was refused; at length the terms offered were accepted, and the prisoners were put on board the ships in order to be conveyed to Athens. They had sustained a siege of seventy-two days, and a terrible engagement, wherein they lost one hundred and twenty-eight persons out of four hundred and twenty, so that two hundred and ninety-two yielded. Cleon, who had been laughed at when he made it, performed exactly his promise, producing the prisoners within the time prefixed, which wonderfully elated the people, who in their next assembly decreed, that these prisoners should be safely kept till a peace should be made, unless the Peloponnesians should in the mean time invade Attica, in which case they resolved that they should be put to death. They sent a colony of Messenians, who had been cruelly expelled out of their own country by the Spartans, to repossess Pylus, and their neighbourhood was so troublesome to the Lacedæmonians, that they quickly resolved to send embassadors afresh to Athens, in order if it was possible to put an end to the war. The people of Athens were too much exalted with their success, to treat the Lacedæmonians either with justice or candour, and the embassadors of that steady nation, disdaining to be amused with frivolous pretences, returned without doing any thing. This summer, the Athenians fought the Corinthians near the isthmus; they sent likewise a fleet to Sicily, which fleet had instructions to put in at Corcyra, and to assist the government there against the faction which was in the interest of the Lacedæmonians; this they effectually performed, for they gave the Corcyrians such assistance, that the exiles fell into their

[b] Thucyd, lib. iii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii.

on,

